(5) ALEXANDER ROBERT (b. Brighton, Aug. 21, 1799; d. Kidlington, near Oxford, Apr. 6, 1877), the son of the younger Joseph (3), settled with his father in Oxford, where he became teacher, organist and a well-known figure in musical circles. He was organist of the church of St. Peter in the East. He composed a number of sacred pieces, including the well-known 'St. Peter' psalm-tune. He also wrote and compiled many books of instruction for the violin and violoncello.

His wife, (6) CAROLINE (née ORGER) (b. London, 1818; d. Mar. 11, 1892), married Reinagle (5) in 1846. She was associated with her husband as a teacher, and wrote some technical works for the pianoforte, besides a concerto and several chamber compositions. She also attained some success as a pianist.

REINCKEN (REINKEN), JOHANN ADAM (JAN ADAMS REINCKEN) (b. Wilshausen, Lower Alsace, Apr. 27, 1623; d. Nov. 24, 1722), eminent organist, pupil of Heinrich Scheide-mann, became in 1654 organist of the church of St. Catherine at Hamburg, and retained the post till his death. He was a person of some consideration at Hamburg, both on account of his fine playing, and of his beneficial influence on music in general, and the Hamburg Opera in particular, but his vanity and jealousy of his brother artists are severely commented on by his contemporaries. So great and so widespread was his reputation that Sebastian Bach frequently walked to Hamburg from Lüneburg (1700-03), and Cöthen (1720), to hear him play. Reincken may be considered the best representative of the North German school of organists of the 17th century, whose strong points were, not the classic placidity of the South German school, but great dexterity of foot and finger, and ingenious combinations of the stops. His compositions are loaded with passages for display, and are defective in form, both in individual melodies and general construction. His works are very scarce; 'Hortus musicus,' for two violins, viola da gamba and bass (Hamburg, 1704) is reprinted as No. XIII. of the publications of the Maatschappij tot bevordering der Toonkunst (Amsterdam, 1887). No. XIV. of the same publication consists of Reincken's 'Partie diverse' (variations), but even in MS. only very few pieces are known—two on Chorals, one toccata, and two sets of variations (for clavier).¹ Of the first of these, one—on the Choral 'An Wasserflüssen Babylons'—is specially interesting, because it was by an extempore performance on that Choral at Hamburg in 1720 that Bach extorted from the venerable Reincken the words, 'I thought that this art was dead, but I see that it still lives in you.' (Cf. EXTEMPORISATION.) Two organ fugues, a toccata in G, variations on Chorals and on a 'ballet,' etc. are in MSS. at Dresden, Leipzig and Darmstadt. REINECKE, CARL HEINRICH CARSTEN (b. Altona, June 23, 1824; d. Leipzig, Mar. 10, 1910), composer, conductor and performer, director of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzig, the son of a musician, was from an early age trained by his father, and at 11 performed in public.

As a youth he was a first-rate orchestral violin-player. At 18 he made a concert tour through Sweden and Denmark, with especial success at Copenhagen. In 1843 he settled in Leipzig, where he studied diligently, and eagerly embraced the opportunities for cultivation afforded by the society of Mendelssohn and Schumann, with a success which amply shows itself in his music. In 1844 he made a professional tour with Wasiclewski to Riga, returning by Hanover and Bremen. He was already in the pay of Christian VIII. of Denmark, and in 1846 he again visited Copenhagen, remaining there for two years. On both occasions he was appointed court pianist. In 1851 he went with the violinist Otto von Königlów to Italy and Paris; and on his return Hiller secured him for the professorship of the piano and counterpoint in the Conservatorium of Cologne. In 1854 he became conductor of the Konzertgesellschaft at Barmen, and in 1859 Musikdirector to the University of Breslau. On Julius Rietz's departure from Leipzig to Dresden in 1860, Reinecke succeeded him as conductor at the Gewandhaus, and became at the same time professor of composition in the Conservatorium. Between the years 1867 and 1872 he made extensive tours; in England he played at the Musical Union, Crystal Palace, and Philharmonic, on the 6th, 17th and 19th of Apr. 1869, respectively, and met with great success both as a virtuoso and a composer. He reappeared in this country in 1872, and was equally well received. In 1895 he resigned the post of conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts, but kept his position in the Conservatorium, being appointed in 1897 director of musical studies until 1902, when he retired altogether.

Reinecke's industry in composition was great, his best works, as might be expected, being those for piano; his three PF. sonatas indeed are excellent compositions, on the lines of Mendelssohn's technique; his pieces for two PFs. are also good; his PF. concerto in F# minor, once a well-established favourite both with musicians and the public, was followed by two others in E minor and C respectively. Besides other instrumental music—a wind octet, quintets, four string quartets, seven trios, concertos for violin and violoncello, etc.—he composed an opera in five acts, 'König Manfred,' and two in one act each, 'Der vierjährige Posten' (after Körner) and 'Ein Abenteurer Händels' ; 'Auf hohen Befehl' (1886) and 'Der Gouverneur von Tours' (1891); incidental music to Schiller's 'Tell'; an oratorio, 'Belsazar'; cantatas for men's voices 'Hakon Jarl' and 'Die Flucht nach Ägypten'; overtures, 'Dame Kobold,' 'Aladdin,' 'Friedensfeier,' an overture, 'Zenobia,' and a funeral march for the Emperor Frederick (op. 200); two masses, and three symphonies (op. 79 in A, op. 134 in C minor, and op. 227 in G minor); and a large number of songs and of pianoforte pieces in all styles, including valuable studies and educational works. Of his settings of fairy tales as cantatas for female voices, 'Schneewittchen,' 'Dornröschen,' 'Aschenbrodel' and several others became very popular. His style was refined, and he wrote with peculiar clearness and correctness. Various contributions to musical literature will be found enumerated in Reimann.

REINE DE SABA, LA, opera in 4 acts; words by Barbier and Carré; music by Gounod. Produced Opéra, Feb. 28, 1862; in concert form as 'Irene' (H. B. Farnie), Crystal Palace, Aug. 12, 1865; as opera, F. Archer Co., Apr. 21, 1880, Theatre Royal, Manchester. See also KÖNIGIN VON SABA (Goldmark).

REINER (RENER), ADAM (b. Liège, late 15th cent.), an important early 16th-century composer who was ranked with Moralis. He composed masses, other church music and songs, two of which appeared in a modern edition. (See list in Q.-L.)

REINER, AMBROSIVS (b. Altdorf i. Weingarten, Dec. 7, 1604; d. Innsbruck, July 5, 1672). Between 1643-56 he was first organist, then Kapellmeister, at the archducal court, Innsbruck. He composed masses, psalms, litanies, odes and sacred songs (Q.-L.; Riemann).

REINER, FRITZ (b. Budapest, Dec. 19, 1888), orchestral conductor, was educated at the Landesmusik-Akademie in Budapest, became conductor of the Landestheater at Laibach (1910), and of the Volks Oper at Budapest in 1911. In 1914 he was conductor at the Hof Oper at Dresden, and in 1921 he followed Ysaÿe as director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra (see CINCINNATI). He visited London, conducting the London Symphony Orchestra in Elena Gerhardt's concert on May 27, 1924. G.

REINER, JACOB (b. Altdorf, Württemberg, c. 1559 or 1560; d. Aug. 12, 1606), was brought up at the Benedictine Monastery of Weingarten, where he also received his first musical training. We have it on his own authority that he was afterwards a pupil of Orlando Lassus at Munich, where also his first publication, a volume of motets a 5-6, appeared in 1579. Incidentally it may be mentioned that in 1589 Lassus dedicated a book of six masses, the eighth volume of the Patrocinium musices, to the Abbot of Weingarten. Reiner himself returned to Weingarten, and from at least 1586 to his death in 1606 was engaged as lay singer and choirmaster at the monastery. His publications are fairly numerous, and consist of several volumes of motets, masses and Magnificats, which need not here be specified in detail (especially since partbooks are frequently missing), also two volumes of German songs a 3-5. Three settings a 5 of the Passion exist in MS., of a similar character to those by Lassus. The first volume of Reiner's motets was reproduced in lithograph score by Otto Dresel in 1872, and one of the numbers also appears in the supplement to Proske's 'Musica divina,' edited by F. X. Haberl in 1876. J. R. M.

REINE TOPAZE, LA, opéra-comique in 3 acts; words by Lockroy and Battes, music by Victor Massé. Produced Théâtre-Lyrique, Dec. 27, 1856. In English, Her Majesty's Theatre, Dec. 24, 1860. G.

REINHARD, ANDREAS (REINHARDUS), organist and notary at Schneeberg, Saxony, wrote 3 treatises: Musica (Leipzig, 1604), De harmoniae limbo (1610), Methodus de arte musica (MS. c. 1610, in Erfurt Library?) (Riemann).

REINHARD, JOHANN GEORG (b. circa 1677; d. Vienna, Nov. 6, 1742). From Jan. 1, 1708, he was imperial court organist; from 1734-40 also court composer of ballets and serenatas. He composed an opera and church music (Q.-L.).

REINHOLD, HUGO (b. Vienna, Mar. 3, 1854), was a choir-boy of the Hofkapelle of his native city and a pupil of the Conservatorium der Musikfreunde till 1874, where he worked with Bruckner, Dessoff and Epstein under the endowment of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, and obtained a silver medal. His many compositions include piano music and songs, a string quartet (op. 18 in A major), a suite in five movements for piano and strings, and a Prelude, Minuet and Fugue for stringed orchestra. The two latter were performed at the Vienna Philharmonic Concerts of Dec. 9, 1877, and Nov. 17, 1878, respectively, and were praised by the Vienna critic of the Monthly Musical Record for their delicate character and absence of undue pretension. The quartet was executed by Hellmesberger. H. V. H.

REINHOLD, THEODOR CHRISTLEB (b. 1682; d. 1755), was the teacher of Johann Adolf Hiller (Huller), the composer of numerous motets, and cantor of the Kreuzkirche at Dresden from 1720 till his death. H. V. H.

REINHOLD, (1) THOMAS (b. Dresden, c. 1690; d. Chapel Street, Soho, 1751), was the reputed nephew, or, as some said, son, of the Archbishop of Dresden. He had an early passion for music, and having met Handel at the Archbishop's residence conceived so strong a liking for him that after a time he quitted his abode and sought out the great composer in London, where he appeared in various works of Handel's, after making his first appearance in July 1731 at the Haymarket Theatre as a singer in 'The Grub Street Opera.'

His son, (2) FREDERICK CHARLES (b. 1737; d. Somers Town, Sept. 29, 1815), received his musical education first in St. Paul's and afterwards in the Chapel Royal. On Feb. 3, 1755, he made his first appearance on the stage at Drury Lane as Oberon in J. C. Smith's opera 'The Fairies,' being announced as 'Master Reinhold.' He afterwards became organist of St. George the Martyr, Bloomsbury. In 1758 he appeared as a bass singer at Marylebone Gardens, where he continued to sing for many seasons. He afterwards performed in English operas, and sang in oratorios, and at provincial festivals, etc. He was especially famed for his singing of Handel's song, 'O ruddier than the cherry.' He was one of the principal bass singers at the Commemoration of Handel in 1784. He retired in 1797. See Mus. T., 1877, p. 273. W. H. H.

REINTHALER, KARL MARTIN (b. Erfurt, Oct. 13, 1822; d. Bremen, Feb. 13, 1896), conductor of the Private Concerts at Bremen, was early trained in music by G. A. Ritter, then studied theology in Berlin, but after passing his examination, devoted himself entirely to music, and studied with A. B. Marx. His first attempts at composition, some psalms sung by the Cathedral choir, attracted the attention of King Frederick William IV., and procured him a travelling grant. He visited Paris, Milan, Rome and Naples, taking lessons in singing from Gheraldi and Bordogni. On his return in 1853 he obtained a post in the Conservatorium of Cologne, and in 1858 became organist in the Cathedral of Bremen, and conductor of the Singakademie. He had already composed an oratorio, 'Jephtha' (performed in London by Hullah, Apr. 16, 1856, and published with English text by Novello), and in 1875 his opera 'Edda' was played with success at Bremen, Hanover and elsewhere. His 'Bismarck-hymn' obtained the prize at Dortmund, and he composed a symphony and a large number of partsongs. He was a member of the Berlin Academy from 1882, and had the title of Royal Professor in 1888. His cantata 'In der Wüste' had a great success, and his opera 'Kathchen von Heilbronn' received a prize at Frankfurt. He retired from the Singakademie in 1890. F. G., with addns.

REISSIGER, KARL GOTTLIEB (b. Belgiz, near Wittenberg, Jan. 31, 1798; d. Nov. 7, 1859), son of Christian Gottlieb Reissiger, who published three symphonies for full orchestra in 1790.

His father was cantor at Belgiz. He became in 1811 a pupil of Schicht at the Thomasschule, Leipzig. In 1818 he removed to the university with the intention of studying theology, but some motets composed in 1815 and 1816 had already attracted attention, and the success of his fine baritone voice made him determine to devote himself to music. In 1821 he went to Vienna and studied opera thoroughly. Here also he composed 'Das Rockenweibchen.' In 1822 he sang an aria of Handel's, and played a PF. concerto of his own composition at a concert in the Kärnthnerthor Theatre. Soon after he went to Munich, where he studied with Peter Winter, and composed an opera, 'Dido,' which was performed several times at Dresden under Weber's conductorship. At the joint expense of the Prussian government and of his patron von Altenstein, a musician, he undertook a tour in 1824 through Holland, France and Italy, in order to report on the condition of music in those countries. On his return he was commissioned to draw up a scheme for a Prussian national conservatorium, but at the same time was offered posts at the Hague and at Dresden. The latter he accepted, replacing Marschner at the Opera, where he laboured hard, producing both German and Italian operas. In 1827 he succeeded C. M. von Weber as conductor of the German Opera at Dresden. Among his operas, 'Ahnenschatz' (1824), 'Libella,' 'Turandot,' 'Adèle de Foix' and 'Der Schiffbruch von Medusa' had great success in their day. The overture to the 'Felsenmühle,' a spirited and not uninteresting piece, was occasionally played. Masses and church music, an oratorio, 'David,' a few Lieder, numerous chamber compositions (particularly some graceful and easy trios for PF., violin and violoncello) made his name very popular for a period. He was the composer of the piece known as 'Weber's Last Waltz.' This is No. 5 of his 'Dances brillantes pour le pianoforte' written in 1822, and published by Peters at Leipzig in 1824. On his death Reissiger was succeeded at Dresden by Julius Rietz. F. G.

REISSMANN, AUGUST (b. Frankenstein, Silesia, Nov. 14, 1825; d. Berlin, Dec. 1, 1903), musician and writer on music, was grounded in music by Jung, the cantor of his native town. In 1843 he removed to Breslau, and there had instruction from Mosewius, Baumgart, Ernst Richter, Lüstner and Kahl in various branches, including pianoforte, organ, violin and violoncello. He at first proposed to become a composer, but a residence in 1850-52 at Weimar, where he came in contact with the new school of music, changed his plans and drove him to literature. His first book was Von Bach bis Wagner (Berlin, 1861); rapidly followed by a historical work on the German song, Das deutsche Lied, etc. (1861), rewritten as Geschichte des deutschen Liedes (1874). This, again, was succeeded by his General History of Music—Allg. Geschichte der Musik (3 vols., Leipzig, 1864), with a great number of interesting examples; Allg. Musiklehre (1864); and Lehrbuch der musik. Compositionen (3 vols. Berlin, 1866-71). His later works were of a biographical nature, attempts to show the gradual development of the life and genius of the chief musicians—Schumann (1865), Mendelssohn (1867), Schubert (1873), Haydn (1879), Bach (1881), Handel (1882), Gluck (1882), Weber (1883). In 1877 he published a volume of lectures on the history of music, delivered in the Conservatorium of Berlin, where he resided from 1863. His chief employment from 1871 was the completion of the Musik-Conversationslexikon, in which he succeeded Mendel as editor, after the death of the latter. The 11th volume, completing the work, appeared in 1879.

As a practical musician Reissmann was almost as industrious as he was in literature. The operas 'Gudrun' (Leipzig, 1871), 'Die Bürgermeisterin von Schorndorf' (Leipzig, 1880) and 'Das Gralspiel' (Düsseldorf, 1895), a ballet, 'Der Blumen Rache' (1887), a work for singing and speaking soloists, with choir and piano, 'König Drosselbart' (1886), dramatic scenes, an oratorio, 'Wittekind' (1888), a concerto and a suite for solo violin and orchestra; two sonatas for pianoforte and violin; and a great quantity of miscellaneous pieces for piano solo and for the voice are mentioned. In 1881 he edited an Illustrated History of German Music. G.

RELATIVE is the word used to express the connexion between a major and a minor key which have the same signature; A minor is the 'relative' minor of C, C the 'relative' major of A minor. M.

RELFE, JOHN (b. Greenwich, 1763; d. London, c. 1837), studied under his father, Lupton Relfe, fifty years organist at Greenwich Hospital, and under Keeble. He was a member of the King's Band in 1810 and a teacher of harmony and PF. He composed a cantata, numerous songs, PF. sonatas, etc., and wrote several books on musical theory, and Remarks on the Present State of Musical Instruction (1819).

RELLSTAB, (1) JOHANN KARL FRIEDRICH (b. Berlin, Feb. 27, 1759; d. Charlottenburg, Aug. 19, 1813). His father, a printer, wished him to succeed to the business, but from boyhood his whole thoughts were devoted to music. He was on the point of starting for Hamburg to complete, with Emanuel Bach, his musical studies begun with Agricola and Fasch, when the death of his father forced him to take up the business. He added a music-printing and publishing branch; was the first to establish a musical lending library (1783); founded a Concert Society, on the model of Hiller's at Leipzig, and called it 'Concerts for connoisseurs and amateurs.' The first concert took place Apr. 16, 1787, at the Englisches Haus, and in course of time the following works were performed; Salieri's 'Armida,' Schulz's 'Athalie,' Naumann's 'Cora,' Hasse's 'Conversione di San Agostino,' Bach's 'Magnificat' and Gluck's 'Alceste,' which was thus first introduced to Berlin. The Society at last merged in the Singakademie. He wrote musical critiques for the Berlin paper, signed with his initials; and had concerts every other Sunday during the winter at his own house, at which such works as Haydn's 'Seasons' were performed; but these meetings were stopped by the entry of the French in 1806, when he frequently had twenty men and a dozen horses quartered on him; lost not only his music but all his capital, and had to close his printing-press. In time he resumed his concerts; in 1809 gave lectures on harmony; in 1811 travelled to Italy. Not long after his return he was struck with apoplexy while walking at Charlottenburg, and was found dead on the road some hours afterwards. As a composer he left three cantatas, a 'Passion,' a Te Deum and a Mass. Also an opera; songs too numerous to specify; vocal scores of Graun's 'Tod Jesu' and Gluck's 'Iphigénie'; and a German libretto of Gluck's 'Orphée,' apparently from his own pen. Of instrumental music he published—marches for PF., symphonies and overtures; a series of pieces with characteristic titles, 'Obstinacy,' 'Sensibility,' etc.; twenty-four short pieces for PF., violin and bass, etc. Also Versuch über die Vereinigung der mus. und oratorischen Deklamation (1785); Über die Bemerkungen einer Reisenden . . . (1789) (see REICHARDT); and Anleitung für Clavierspieler (1790). These works, for the most part bibliographical curiosities, are very instructive.

Relstab had three daughters, of whom (2) CAROLINE (b. Apr. 18, 1794; d. Feb. 17, 1813) was a singer, distinguished for her extraordinary compass. His son,

(3) HEINRICH FRIEDRICH LUDWIG (b. Berlin, Apr. 13, 1799; d. there, Nov. 27, 1860), though delicate in health, and destined for practical music, was compelled by the times to join the army, where he became ensign and lieutenant. In 1816, after the peace, he took lessons on the piano from Ludwig Berger, and in 1819 and 1820 studied theory with Bernhard Klein. At the same time he taught mathematics and history in the Brigadeschule till 1821, when he retired from the army to devote himself to literature, ultimately settling in Berlin (1823). He also composed much part-music for the 'Jüngere Liedertafel,' which he founded in conjunction with G. Reichardt in 1819, wrote a libretto, 'Dido,' for B. Klein, and contributed to Marx's Musikzeitung. A pamphlet on Madame Sontag (Henriette, oder die schöne Sängerin) procured him three months' imprisonment in 1826, on account of its satirical allusions to a well-known diplomatist. In 1826 he joined the staff of the Vossische Zeitung, and in a short time completely led the public opinion on music in Berlin. His first article was a report on a performance of 'Euryanthe,' Oct. 31, 1826. Two years later he wrote a cantata for Humboldt's congress of physicists, which Mendelssohn set to music.

Relstab quarrelled with Spontini over his 'Agnes von Hohenstaufen' (Berlin Musikalische Zeitung for 1827, Nos. 23, 24, 26 and 29), and the controversy was maintained with much bitterness until Spontini left Berlin, when Relstab, in his pamphlet Über mein Verhältnis als Kritiker zu Herrn Spontini (1827), acknowledged that he had gone too far.

Relstab's novels and essays are to be found for the most part in his Gesammelte Schriften, 24 vols. (Leipzig, Brockhaus). A musical periodical, Iris im Gebiet der Tonkunst, founded by him in 1830, survived till 1842. His recollections of Berger, Schroeder-Devrient, Mendelssohn, Klein, Dehn and Beethoven (whom he visited in Mar. 1825), will be found in Aus meinem Leben (2 vols. Berlin, 1861).

REMBT, JOHANN ERNST (b. Suhl, Thüringer-Wald, 1749 or 1750; d. there, Feb. 26, 1810), was appointed organist at Suhl in 1773 and remained till his death. He was distinguished as a performer, and, devoting himself to the study of the works of Sebastian Bach, he worthily upheld the more solid traditions of the Bach school of organ-playing against the prevailing shallowness of his time. Breitkopf & Härtel still retain in their catalogue some of his works originally published by them, such as his six fugued Choral-preludes, six organ trios and various Choral-preludes in trio-form. Various fuguetas for the organ also appear in Volkmar's 'Orgel-Album.'

REMÉNYI, EDUARD (real name HOFFMANN) (b. Heves,¹ Hungary, 1830; d. San Francisco, May 15, 1898), a famous violinist, received his musical education at the Vienna Conservatorium during the years 1842-45, where his master on the violin was Joseph Böhm, the famous teacher of Joachim. In 1848 he took an active part in the insurrection, and became adjutant to the famous general Görgey, under whom he took part in the campaign against Austria. After the revolution had been crushed he had to fly the country, and went to America, where he resumed his career as a virtuoso. He toured in Germany, taking Brahms² with him, in 1852-53. In 1853 he went to Liszt in Weimar, who at once recognised his genius and became his artistic guide and friend. In the following year he came to London and was appointed solo violinist to Queen Victoria. In 1855 he was in America, and in 1860 he obtained his amnesty and returned to Hungary, where some time afterwards he received from the Emperor of Austria a similar distinction to that granted him in England. After his return home he seems to have retired for a time from public life, living chiefly on an estate he owned in Hungary. In 1865 he appeared for the first time in Paris, where he created a perfect furor. Repeated tours in Germany, Holland and Belgium further spread his fame. In 1875 he settled temporarily in Paris, and in the summer of 1877 came to London, where also he produced a sensational effect in private circles. The season being far advanced he appeared in public only once, at Mapleson's benefit concert at the Crystal Palace, where he played a fantasia on themes from the 'Huguenots.' In the autumn of 1878 he again visited London, and played at the Promenade Concerts. He was on his way to America, where he gave concerts and took up his residence. In 1887 he undertook a tour of the world, in the course of which he appeared in private in London in 1891 and 1893. As an artist he combined perfect mastery over the technical difficulties of his instrument with a strongly pronounced individuality. His soul was in his playing, and his impulse carried him away as he warmed to his task, the impression produced on the audience being accordingly in an ascending scale. Another important feature in Reményi's playing was the national element. He strongly maintained against Liszt the genuineness of Hungarian music, and showed himself thoroughly imbued with that spirit by writing several 'Hungarian melodies,' which have been mistaken for popular tunes and adopted as such by other composers. The same half-Eastern spirit was observable in the strong rhythmical accentuation of Reményi's style, so rarely attained by artists of Teutonic origin. Reményi's compositions are of no importance, being mostly confined to arrangements for his instrument, and other pieces written for his own immediate use. Reményi died during a concert at which he was playing at San Francisco. E. H. A.

RÉMY, W. A. (b. Prague, June 10, 1831; d. there, Jan. 22, 1898), the name by which an eminent musician and teacher in Prague preferred to be known. His real name was Wilhelm Mayer, and he was the son of a lawyer in Prague. A pupil of C. F. Pichs, he appeared at the age of 17 years as the composer of an overture to Sue's 'Fanatiker in den Cevennen'; but in obedience to the parental desires, he studied law, took the degree of Dr. Jur. in 1856, and did not take up music as his profession until 1862, when he became conductor of the Steiermärkische Musikverein, and earned experience as an orchestral director. He kept the post till 1870, composing many orchestral works during the period, among them an overture to 'Sardanapalus' and a symphonic poem, 'Helena,' as well as his first symphony in F. The three works made their way as far as Leipzig, where they were received with great success. From the date of his resignation he lived as an unofficial teacher, and devoted himself to composition, until his death. His works include two more symphonies (in F and E flat), a 'Phantasiestück' for orchestra, given at the Vienna Philharmonic Concerts under Dessoff; a 'Slawische Liederspiel' for soli and chorus, with accompaniment of two pianos, another work of the same kind, 'Östliche Rosen,' a concert-opera, 'Waldfräulein,' and many songs, etc. Among his most eminent pupils may be mentioned Busoni, Kienzl, Heuberger, von Reznicek and Felix Weingartner. (Neue Musik-Zeitung, 1890, p. 261.) M.

RENALDI (RINALDI), GIULIO (b. Padua, early 16th cent., still living there, 1569), composed 3 books of madrigals and canzone, two of which were published in 1567 and one in 1569. E. v. d. s.

RENAUD, MAURICE ARNOLD (b. Bordeaux, 1862), studied singing at the Conservatoire, Paris, and subsequently at that of Brussels. From 1883-90 he sang at the Monnaie, Brussels, in a variety of parts, making a great impression: on Jan. 7, 1884, as the High Priest in Reyer's 'Sigurd,' and on Feb. 10, 1890, as Hamilcar in Reyer's 'Salammbô,' on production of these operas. On Oct. 12, 1890, he made his début at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, as Karnac in 'Le Roi d'Ys,' and sang on Dec. 3 as the hero of Diaz's new opera 'Benvenuto.' On July 17, 1891, he made a very successful début at the Opéra as Nelusko, and remained there until 1902. On leave of absence, on June 23, 1897, he made his début at Covent Garden as Wolfram and De Novers in selections from 'Tannhauser' and 'Huguenots,' at the State performance in honour of the Diamond Jubilee of Queen Victoria; and in the same season he sang the above parts, Don Juan and Juan in D'Erlanger's 'Inez Mondo.' He fully confirmed his Parisian reputation by his fine voice and presence, and excellent singing and acting. From 1898-1905 he reappeared here frequently at the above theatre, singing the part of Henri VIII. in Saint-Saëns's opera, July 19, 1898, that of Hares in De Lara's 'Messaline,' July 13, 1899; and appearing as Hamlet, Rigoletto, Valentine, Escamillo, etc. He sang at Monte Carlo in 1907 in Bruneau's 'Nais Micoulin.' He was considered one of the best representatives of Bocknesser.

RENDANO, ALFONSO (b. Carolei, near Cosenza, Apr. 5, 1853), studied first at the Conservatorio at Naples, then with Thalberg, and lastly at the Leipzig Conservatorium. He played at the Gewandhaus with marked success on Feb. 8, 1872. He then visited Paris and London, performed at the Musical Union (Apr. 30, 1872), the Philharmonic (Mar. 9, 1873), the Crystal Palace and other concerts, and much in society; and after a lengthened stay returned to Italy. He became professor of piano-playing at the Naples Conservatorio, and settled later in Rome. An opera by him, 'Counello,' was produced at Turin in 1902, and also given at Stuttgart.

RENÉ, HENRIETTE (b. Paris, 1876), harpist and composer, gained first prize for harp at the Paris Conservatoire, awarded unanimously, in 1887 (at the age of 11 years). From this time she had such a vogue that the Queen of Belgium came to Brussels to hear her. Composers (Gounod amongst others) encouraged her to pursue her theoretical studies, and she afterwards gained a prize for harmony (Lonepveu's class) and composition. In 1901 she appeared as a virtuoso in the Concerts Lamoureux in a concerto of her own composition. The combination of harp with orchestral accompaniment was at that time a novelty. Since then she has been well received in all the Parisian symphony concerts and elsewhere in Europe. She is unquestionably, since the death of Hasselmans, the most important of the French school of harpists.

As a composer, in addition to the concerto already mentioned, she has written an 'Élégie' for harp and orchestra (Lamoureux, 1907), a trio for harp, violin and violoncello, a sonata for PF. and violoncello, 2 pieces for violin and harp, a number of pieces for harp solo (Ballades, Contemplation, Légende, etc.) and some songs. In the matter of transcription she has successfully created a repertory for the harp out of the works of numerous old masters of the clavessin, without ever doing violence to their thought.

RENNES, CATHARINA VAN (b. Utrecht, Aug. 2, 1858), Dutch singer and composer, was a pupil of Richard Hol and Johannes Messchaert. Her parents were musical, though not in any professional sense, and she was encouraged to sing and play from her earliest infancy. After a schooling abroad she settled in Utrecht as a teacher of singing and piano, where she had considerable success. Later she taught at Hilversum and at The Hague and numbered among her pupils the Princess Juliana, only daughter of the Queen of the Netherlands.

As a composer she has been extremely popular in her own country, particularly for her children's songs and cantatas, which are written to Dutch words. Many of the solo songs are settings of German poems, and in these she sometimes rises to considerable heights. Instrumental music, except simple pianoforte pieces connected with children's stories, she has left practically untouched. Her style is graceful and melodious, the music being always well fitted to the words, while the pianoforte part is rarely more than a simple and suggestive accompaniment written in a somewhat conservative manner.

REPORTS (the word seems not to be used in the singular), an old English and Scottish term for points of imitation. From the eight examples in the Scottish Psalter of 1635 (reprinted in the Rev. Neil Livingston's edition, 1864) it would seem that the term was used in a more general sense, of a setting of certain tunes in which the parts moved in a kind of free polyphony, not in strictly imitative style. In Purcell's revision of the treatise which appears in the third part of Playford's Introduction to the Skill of Musick (12th edition, 1694), the term is mentioned but not explained further than as being synonymous with 'imitation': 'The second is Imitation or Reports, which needs no Example.' (See Sammelbande of the Int. Mus. Ges. vi. p. 562.)

M.

REPRISÉ, repetition; a term which is occasionally applied to any repetition in music, but is most conveniently confined to the recurrence of the first subject of a sonata movement after the conclusion of the working out or development. (See FORM and SONATA.) In Couperin, Rameau and other French composers the term is used of a short refrain at the end of a movement, which was probably intended to be played over more than twice, as sometimes it contains the ordinary marks of repetition within the passage covered by the word. c.

REQUIEM (Fr. messe des morts; Ital. missa per i defunti; Lat. missa pro defunctis; Ger. Totenmesse), a solemn Mass, sung annually in Commemoration of the Faithful Departed on All Souls' Day (Nov. 2); and, with a less general intention, at funeral services, on the anniversaries of the decease of particular persons, and on such other occasions as may be dictated by feelings of public respect or individual pity.

The Requiem takes its name¹ from the first word of the Introit—'Requiem æternam dona eis, Domine.' When set to music, it naturally arranges itself in nine principal sections: (1) The Introit—'Requiem æternam'; (2) the Kyrie; (3) the Gradual and Tract—'Requiem æternam' and 'Absolve, Domine'; (4) The Sequence or Prose—Dies iræ; (5) The Offertorium—'Domine Jesu Christi'; (6) the Sanctus;

(7) the Benedictus; (8) the Agnus Dei; and (9) the Communio—'Lux æterna.' To these are sometimes added (10) the Responsorium—'Libera me,' which, though not an integral portion of the Mass, immediately follows it on all solemn occasions; and (11) the Lectio—'Taedet animam meam,' of which we possess at least one example of great historical interest.

The plain-song melodies adapted to the nine divisions of the Mass will be found in the Gradual, together with that proper for the Responsorium. The Lectio, which really belongs to a different service, has no proper melody, but is sung to the ordinary 'Tonus Lectionis.' (See INFLEXION.) The entire series of melodies is of rare beauty, and produces so solemn an effect, when sung in unison by a large body of grave-aged voices, that most of the great polyphonic composers have employed its phrases more freely than usual in their Requiem Masses, either as canti fermi, or in the form of unisonous passages interposed between the harmonised portions of the work. Compositions of this kind are not very numerous; but most of the examples we possess must be classed among the most perfect productions of their respective authors.

W. S. R.

What has been said of the effect of secular influences on the composition of music to the MASS (q.v.) applies mutatis mutandis to the Requiem Mass. Famous compositions of the text mentioned under their composers' names are those of PALESTRINA, VICTORIA, FRANCESCO ANERIO, ORAZIO VECCHI of the polyphonic period; MOZART, GOSSEC, CHERUBINI (2 settings), BERLIOZ, BRUCKNER, BRUNEAU, VERDI and DVOŘÁK.

He took holy orders and became Bishop of Leipsa, in Bohemia, about 1543. He had been a chorister in the service of the Emperor Maximilian I. He is said to have been a pupil of Isaac, and he published at Wittenberg in 1543 'Responsorium numero octoginta de tempore et festis . . . libri duo.'

He studied music at first with his father, then at the Liceo Musicale of Bologna, which he entered in 1892. His teachers were Federico Sarti (violin) and Giuseppe Martucci (composition). He left that institution in 1899, obtaining first the diplomas of both the violin and the composition schools. His interest in composition soon gained the upper hand, and when Martucci left Bologna for Naples (1902) Respighi decided to gain an insight into the methods of foreign composers. With this purpose in view he went to St. Petersburg, attracted by the fame of Rimsky-Korsakov, whose pupil he became. After some time he went on to Berlin to study awhile under Max Bruch. Respighi is now professor of composition at the Royal Liceo di S. Cecilia in Rome, to which office he was appointed in 1913. In Jan. 1924, by the unanimous vote of a Government Commission, which included Puccini and Cilea, Respighi was appointed principal of the Liceo S. Cecilia of Rome in succession to Enrico Bossi.

If not quite as prolific as some of his less successful Italian contemporaries, Respighi has already contributed much both to the theatre and to chamber music. From his Russian masters he undoubtedly learnt to look upon opera as something different from what it was to the Italians who preceded him in that field. While they have shown a marked preference for highly dramatic situations, Respighi is attracted by situations in which the ironic and comic spirits have also their share. This is the case in particular of his latest and most successful opera, 'Belfagor,' where the characterisation is both subtler and truer than is usually the case in opera. If he undoubtedly owes much to the teaching and the example of Rimsky-Korsakov, he remains nevertheless individual in feeling and expression. There is also much beautiful melody in all Respighi's works, but lyricism is no longer the tyrant forcing the composer's hand. If Respighi does not allow intellectualism to clog the wheels of imagination, he also refuses to admit anything which does not reach a high intellectual standard. Above all, his music, although modern in every sense, is free from sheer eccentricity. His main concern is never to astonish, but to express his own ideas and emotions in such a way that they represent most faithfully an intellectual conception.

RESPOND (Lat. responsorium), a form of ecclesiastical chant which grew out of the elaboration of the primitive RESPONSORIAL PSALMODY. Some of the Responds have been frequently treated in the polyphonic style with very great effect, not only by the great masters of the 16th century, but even as late as the time of Colonna, whose Responsoria of the Office for the Dead, for eight voices, are written with intense appreciation of the solemn import of the text.

A large collection of very fine examples, including an exquisitely beautiful set for Holy Week, by Victoria, will be found in vol. iv. of Proske's 'Musica divina.' W. S. R.

RESPONSE, in English church music, is in its widest sense any musical sentence sung by the choir at the close of something read or chanted by the minister.

The musical treatment of Versicles and Responses offers a wide and interesting field of study. There are great varieties of plain-song settings to be met with, gathered from Sarum and other uses. Merbecke's Booke of Common Praier noted provided a plain-song for the English text. Building on this, Tallis, Byrd and others wrote harmonised settings to responses of the daily Offices, including the Litany. Examples are to be found among 17th-century composers also founded on the plain-song in the tenor voice, but many later settings abandoned this sound principle. Some of these survive in certain cathedrals. Specimens, both of the earlier and later settings, are to be found in Jebb's 'Choral Responses.'

The medial accent is used in Versicles and Responses when the last word is a polysyllable, thus:

Medial Accent.

When the last word is a monosyllable or is accented on its last syllable, there is an additional note, thus:

Moderate Accent.

In comparing our Versicles and Responses with the Latin from which they were translated, it is important to bear this rule as to the 'final word' in mind; because the Latin and English of the same Versicle or Response will frequently take different 'accents' in the two languages. For example, the following

Versicle takes in the Latin the medial accent, but in the translation will require the moderate accent:

The Litany is in binary form. Its opening sentences or Invocations are each divided by a colon and take this form:

used without variation for all the Invocations. It happens that each of the sentences of Invocation contains in our English version a monosyllable before the colon; but it is not the case in the Latin, therefore both Versicle and Response differ from our use, thus:

In the Petitions of the Litany the whole sentence of music stands thus:

It only remains to say a few words on (1) Amens, (2) Doxology to Gospel, (3) Responses to the Commandments.

(1) Since the Reformation two forms of Amen have been chiefly used in the English Church, the monotone and the approach by a semitone, generally harmonised thus:

(2) The Doxology to the Gospel is in the same tone and should be sung at the same pitch as the Gospel. This is the most familiar form, but few singers can recite the Gospel on C, so it is set too high. When the Gospel is inflected with the drop of a minor third (C to A) instead of C to B, the response of the choir should follow suit.

(3) The Responses to the Commandments are an expansion of the ancient ‘Kyrie eleison,

Christe eleison,

made to serve as ten responses instead of being used as one responsive prayer. The ancient form appears in Merbecke (1550), and the so-called Merbecke's Kyrie now used is an editorial manipulation. J. s.; rev. and abridged.

RESPONSORIAL PSALMODY is the earliest form in which psalms have been sung in the Christian Church. It is a development from inflected monotone (see INFLEXION). In the earliest Christian days the recitation of the psalms was carried out by a single soloist, who monotoned the greater part of the psalm, but inserted various cadences or inflexions at certain points of distinction in the verse. This was very probably but the carrying on of what had long been current in the Synagogue. (See PLAIN-SONG; HEBREW MUSIC.) It was very advisable not to leave the whole of the performance of the psalm to the soloist; and it became customary for the congregation to interject some small response at the close of each verse. Such a response was known among the Greeks as an acrostic (ἀκροστιχίον or ἀκροτελεύτιον), and the technical word in Latin for this performance by the congregation was Responderere; hence this form of psalmody was called Responsorial Psalmody. The refrain was originally very brief—an Amen or an Alleluia, a short text like the ‘For his mercy endureth for ever’ of Psalm cxxxvi. or some pregnant sentence drawn from the psalm which was being sung. In the earliest days the soloist's text was very little removed from monotone, but already by the time of St. Augustine it had become more elaborate, and the ancient simplicity was looked upon as an archaism. The result was a performance somewhat resembling the familiar Litany. The psalmody remained such a short time in this comparatively simple stage that very few actual monuments of it have survived. The Responsorial Psalmody that exists is of the elaborate sort. Partly as a result of the growing artistic feeling, partly also in consequence of the existence of trained singers in the great Song School at Rome, the music, alike of the soloist who sang the verses of the psalm and of the choir who responded, was elaborated to a very high pitch. Then, since it was impossible to sing the whole psalm to a highly ornate chant habitually, certain verses were selected from the psalm for this elaborate treatment; and there grew up, therefore, the musical form called the Respond, which consisted in its simplest shape of a choral melody (called the Respond proper), alternating with one or more Verses sung by the soloist. This form is found both in the music of the Mass and in that of Divine Service, and mainly as an interlude between the reading of lessons. In the former it is called for distinction's sake Responsorium Graduale or the Gradual. In the latter case the second mode, and are decorated with similar melodic themes.

The music falls into eight divisions, each of which consists of (a) an intonation, (b) the recitation in inflected monotone, (c) the cadence or pneuma or melisma. There are in all fifteen different texts set to this scheme of music; the Justus ut palma is given here as being the best representative of the group; but in two of the divisions another text is given as well, in order to reveal the structure the more clearly.

The same plan holds good with the responds of the Office which are found for the most part it is simply called Responsorium; for the lesser Offices, which were sung without musical elaboration, there came to be a few simple forms of Responsorial music, modelled on the elaborate responds of Matins but differing from them in being simpler in texture. This brief form was then called Responsorium breve as distinct from the Responsorium prolixum.

The highest development of elaboration was reached in the Gradual; but even there, in spite of all the embroidery, the primitive monotone around which everything else centres is still traceable; and careful analysis will show that with all its elaboration the chant is still an inflected monotone. This statement can most easily be proved by the study of a single group of Graduals which are ordinarily ascribed to in the service of Matins. It is visible more plainly in the verses of the responds than in the responds themselves. Those of the Office use a set of invariable psalm melodies, one belonging to each mode; in these the monotone is very clear, and yet there is much elaboration in the cadences, and the forms are so plastic that they can by certain well-defined rules be readily adapted to the various texts of the verses. (See PSALMODY.) The Graduals in the Mass do not utilise these common forms for their Verses; each Verse is peculiar to the Gradual; but even so there is much similarity observable amongst them both in general structure and in detail. In decadent days even the responds of the Office have their Verses set to a special melody and not to the common one.

As regards liturgical (as distinct from musical) structure the respond of the Office is like the Gradual-Respond of the Mass, but not identical. In neither case is it common now to find more than one Verse, but the Respond in the Office is often accompanied by the Gloria patri as well, in the early shape in which it consisted of one phrase, not two. Further, it became customary in France to repeat after the Verse not the whole of the Respond but only a part of it; and this custom spread till it was universal.

The following Respond, then, which belongs to Matins of the First Sunday in Advent and stands at the head of the series, may be taken as representing this form of composition in an unusually full shape.

Three boys sing the Respond—

A boy sings the first Verse to the psalm melody of the seventh mode (see PSALMODY)—

Quilque terrigenae et filii hominum, simul in unum dives et pauper' (Ps. xlix. 2).

The choir repeats the Respond from Ite onwards. A second boy sings a second Verse as before—

'Qui regis Israel intende, qui deducis velut ovem Joseph' (Ps. lxxx. 1).

The choir repeats the Respond from Nuncia. A third boy sings a third Verse—

Excita domine potentiam tuam, et veni ut salvos facias nos

RESULTANT TONES

The Ky is repeated from Qui regnaturus. The three boys sing the Gloria patri (down to Santo only) to the same psalm melody, and the choir repeats the closing section of the Respond—In populo Israel. W. H. F.

RESPONSORIUM, see RESPOND; RESPONSORIAL PSALMODY.

REST (Fr. silence, pause; Ger. Pause; Ital. pausa), the sign of silence in music. The duration of the silence, equivalent to a note value, is shown by the form of the character employed to denote it. (See NOTATION, Vol. III. p. 658.)

RESULTANT TONES (Fr. sons résultants; Ger. Combinationstöne) are produced when any two loud and sustained musical sounds are heard at the same time. There are two kinds of resultant tones, the 'Differential' and the 'Summational'. The 'Differential tone' is so called because its number of vibrations is equal to the difference between those of the generating sounds. The 'Summational tone' is so called because its number of vibrations is equal to the sum of those of the generating sounds. The following diagram shows the pitches of the differential tones of the principal consonant intervals when in perfect tune:

Generators.

If the interval be wider than an octave, as in the last two examples, the differential is intermediate between the sounds which produce it. These tones can be easily heard on the ordinary harmonium, and also on the organ. They are not so distinct on the piano, because the sounds of this instrument are not sustained. By practice, however, the resultant tones can be distinguished on the piano also.

Dissonant as well as consonant intervals produce resultant tones. Taking the minor seventh in its three possible forms, the differentials are as follows:

The first form of minor seventh is obtained by tuning two fifths upwards (C-G-D) and then a major third downwards (D-B \flat); its differential tone is $\text{A}\flat$, an exact major third below C. The second form is got by two exact fourths upwards (C-F-B \flat): the differential is then $\text{A}\flat$, which is flatter than the previous $\text{A}\flat$ by the interval 35:36. The third form is the so-called 'Harmonic seventh' on C, whose differontial is G, an exact fourth below C. Of the marks \backslash , $\#$, here used to distinguish notes which are confused in the ordinary notation, it may be briefly explained that the acute sign $\#$ refers to notes arrived at in an ascending series of fifths, the grave sign \backslash to those in a descending series of fifths.

Hitherto we have spoken only of the differential tones which are produced by the fundamentals or prime PARTIAL TONES (q.v.) of musical sounds. But a differential may also arise from the combination of any upper partial of one sound with any partial of the other sound; or from the combination of a differential with a partial, or with another differential. Thus the major third C-E may have the following differential tones:

All these tones are heard simultaneously; but for convenience the differentials of the first, second, third and fourth orders are written in notes of different length. We see, then, that the number of possible resultant tones is very great; but only those which arise from the primes of musical sounds are sufficiently strong to be of practical importance.

In enabling the ear to distinguish between consonant and dissonant intervals, the differential tones are only less important than the upper partials. Thus if the chord G-E-C be accurately tuned as 3 : 5 : 8, the differential of G-C coincides with E, and that of E-C with G. But if the intervals be tempered the differentials are thrown out of tune, and give rise to beats. These beats are very loud and harsh on the ordinary harmonium, tuned in equal temperament. Again, in the close triad C-E-G the differentials of C-E and of E-G coincide and give no beats if the intervals be in perfect tune. On a tempered instrument the result is very different. If we take C to have 264 vibrations, the tempered E has about 332 and the tempered G about 395½ vibrations. The differential of C-E is then 68½, and that of E-G 63. These two tones beat 5½ times each second, and thus render the chord to some extent dissonant.

In the minor triad, even when in just intonation, several of the resultant tones do not fit in with the notes of the chord, although they may be too far apart to beat. In the major triad, on the contrary, the resultant tones form octaves with the notes of the chord. To this difference Helmholtz attributes the less perfect consonance of the minor triad, and its obscured though not inharmonious effect.

The origin of the differential tones has been the subject of much discussion. Thomas Young held that when beats became too rapid to be distinguished by the ear, they passed into the resultant tone. This view prevailed until the publication in 1856 of Helmholtz's investigations, in which many objections to Young's theory were brought forward. The later mathematical theory given by Helmholtz is too abstruse to admit of popular exposition. (See ACOUSTICS.)

As a consequence of his theory, Helmholtz deduced a different series of resultant tones, which he calls summational tones, because their number of vibrations is the sum of those of the generators. The existence of the summational tones, which Helmholtz believed he verified experimentally, has been called in question by Dr. Preyer.

Not only the origin but also the discovery of differential tones has been disputed. The earliest publication of the discovery was made by a German organist named Sorge in 1745. Then came Romieu, a French savant, in 1751. Lastly, the great Italian violinist, Tartini, made the phenomenon the basis of his treatise on harmony in 1754. But Tartini explicitly claims priority in these words:

'In the year 1714, when about twenty-two years of age, he discovered this phenomenon by chance on the violin at Ancona, where many witnesses who remember the fact are still living. He communicated it at once, without reserve, to professors of the violin. He made it the fundamental rule of perfect tuning for the pupils in his school at Padua, which was commenced in 1728 and which still exists, and thus the phenomenon became known throughout Europe.'

Tartini in some cases mistook the pitch of the differential tone; but there does not appear to be any reason for taking from him the credit of the discovery which has so long been associated with his name.

RESZKE, DE, (1) EDOUARD (b. Warsaw, Dec. 23, 1855; d. Poland, May 25, 1917), was taught singing by his brother Jean, Ciaffei, Steller and Coletti, and made his début Apr. 22, 1876, as the King in 'Aida,' on its production at the Italiens, Paris. He sang there with success for two seasons, and afterwards went to Italy, where, in 1880, at Turin, he made a success in two new parts—the King in Catalani's 'Elda,' Jan. 31, and Charles V. in Marchetti's 'Don Giovanni d' Austria,' Mar. 11, and appeared at Milan on the production of Ponchielli's 'Figliuol prodigo,' Dec. 26. From 1880-84 he was engaged in London with the Royal Italian Opera until its collapse. He made his début on Apr. 13, 1880, as Indra ('Roi de Lahore'), but his success as a foremost lyric artist was established by his admirable performances of St. Bris, the Count in 'Sonnambula' and other important parts. He appeared as Hagen, on production of Reyer's 'Sigurd,' July 15, 1884, etc. In 1883-1884 he reappeared in Paris at the Italian Opera (Théâtre des Nations), with great success, in 'Simone Boccanegra'; in Massenet's 'Hérodiade,' on its production in Paris; in Dubois's 'Aben Hamet,' Dec. 16, 1884, and in other operas. He was engaged at the Opéra, where he first appeared Apr. 13, 1885, as Mephistopheles, a part he sang subsequently in the 500th performance of 'Faust.' He appeared as Leporello in the centenary performance of 'Don Juan,' Nov. 4, 1887. He played at the Italian Opera at Drury Lane in 1887 the part of Ramfis in 'Aida,' and sang during the season as Basilio, St. Bris, Mephistopheles and Henry the Fowler ('Lohengrin'). From 1888 to 1900 he sang every season (except 1899), and added to his repertory the parts of Almaviva, Marcel, the Mefistofele of Boito, and, most important of all, the Wagnerian parts of Hans Sachs, King Mark, Kurwenal, Hunding and Hagen. From 1890, for many seasons, he sang in America with his brother, with the greatest success. He sang at the Mozart (concert) Festival at the Nouveau Théâtre in Paris in the spring of 1906, under the direction of Reynaldo Hahn. In Feb. 1907 he advertised his intention of opening a school of singing in London, and appeared there on June 13.

His brother, (2) JEAN (more correctly JAN MECZISLAW) (b. Warsaw, Jan. 14, 1850¹; d. Nice, Apr. 3, 1925), the eldest son of the controller of the government railways, was taught singing by his mother, a distinguished amateur, and at the age of 12 sang solos in the cathedral there. He was taught later by Ciaffei, Cotogni and Sbriglia. Under the name 'De Reschi' he made his début at Venice as a baritone in 'Favorita' in Jan. 1874, according to an eye-witness, with success.² He made his début at Drury Lane on Apr. 11 of the same year, and in the same part, and played there two seasons as Don Giovanni, Almaviva, De Nevers and Valentine. A contemporary³ spoke of him as one of whom the highest expectations might be entertained, having a voice of delicious quality; he phrased artistically and possessed sensibility, but lacked experience such as would enable him to turn his vocal gifts to greater account and to become an effective actor. It is interesting to find that the quality of the organ was even then considered to be more of the robust tenor timbre than a baritone. Under his own name he made his début at the Italiens as Fra Melitone ('Forza del destino'), Oct. 31, 1876, with some success, and as Severo (Donizetti's 'Poliuto'), Dec. 5; Figaro ('Barbiere'), Dec. 19.

Hemade his tenor début as 'Robert' at Madrid in 1879 with great success, and was engaged at the Théâtre des Nations in 1884. He played there the part of St. John the Baptist on the production of 'Hérodiade' so much to the satisfaction of Massenet, that he procured him an engagement at the Opéra to create the title-part of 'Le Cid,' in which he made his début on its production, Nov. 30, 1885. He was engaged there for four years, and sang the usual tenor parts, notably Don Ottavio ('Don Juan' centenary) and Romeo (in 1888, on the production of Gounod's opera at the Opéra). On June 13, 1887, he reappeared at Drury Lane as Radames, and sang as Lohengrin, Faust and Raoul. He worthily fulfilled his early promise by the marked improvement both in his singing and acting, and by his ease and gentlemanly bearing, the improvements being almost entirely due to his own hard work and exertions. On June 4, 1888, as Vasco de Gama, he made his first appearance at Covent Garden, and from that season dates the revival of opera as a fashionable amusement in London. Till 1900, inclusive, he sang nearly every year in England, his parts including John of Leyden, the Duke in 'Un ballo,' Don José, Phoebus in Goring Thomas's 'Esmeralda,' Lancelot in Bemberg's 'Elaine,' Werther (in Massenet's opera). In the great parts of Wagner, such as Walther, Tristan and Siegfried, he was unrivalled, throwing new light upon the music by his wonderful power of interpreting the dramatic side, without losing sight of vocal purity. He sang for several seasons in America with his brother, and at Warsaw and St. Petersburg. On Dec. 11, 1890, he assisted gratuitously in the performance of 'Carmen' at the Opéra-Comique in Paris, where Mme. Galli-Marié reappeared in her original part, and Melba and Lassalle were in the cast. He reappeared at intervals at the Paris Opéra, singing in 'Siegfried' and 'Pagliacci' on the Paris production of those operas. He was announced in Reyer's 'Sigurd' in 1904, but was unable to appear through illness. He spent the latter part of his life in Paris, and from 1919 at his villa at Nice,⁴ and devoted himself to teaching.

Their sister, (3) JOSEPHINE (d. Warsaw, Feb. 22, 1891), educated at the Conservatorium of St. Petersburg, attracted the notice of Halanzier at Venice, and was engaged by him at the Opéra, where she made her début as Ophelia, June 21, 1875. She sang there with success for some time, where she was the original Sita ('Roi de Lahore'), Apr. 27, 1877. Later she was very successful at Madrid, Lisbon, etc.; sang at Covent Garden as Aida, Apr. 18, 1881, and again in Paris at the Théâtre des Nations as Salomé ('Hérodiade'), Mar. 13, 1884. She retired from public life

RETARDATION is a word used by some theorists to distinguish a small group of discords which are similar in nature to suspensions, but resolve upwards, as in the following example :

C. H. H. P.

REUBKE, (1) ADOLF, a famous German organ-builder, 1805–75. His principal achievement appears to be the organ of 88 stops in Magdeburg Cathedral.

(2) JULIUS (b. Hausniedorf, Mar. 23, 1834 ; d. Pillnitz, June 3, 1858), second son of the above, pianist and composer. His works, published posthumously, comprise a sonata and various pieces for PF., songs and an organ sonata, 'The Ninety-fourth Psalm.' Of these only the last-named is widely known. Reubke was a favourite pupil of Liszt, who regarded him as a composer of unusual promise. The organ sonata, however, is a work of far more than mere promise : it shows a ripeness and imaginative power truly remarkable in a youth barely out of his 'teens. It is also of considerable importance in the history of organ music, as it undoubtedly led to the composition of a good many important organ works based on a 'programme.' It is in one continuous movement, falling into three sections—a fantasia and a very free fugue divided by a brief adagio, one theme serving as a basis of the three sections. The portions of the Psalm dealt with are vv. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, 17, 19, 22, 23 of the English Prayer Book version. No indication is given as to the connexion between text and music, but the following appears to be the scheme : First section, vv. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7 ; adagio, 17, 19 ; fugue, 22, 23. The influence of Liszt is apparent, not only in the metamorphoses of theme, but in harmony and figuration. The sources of some of its most striking passages are to be found in Liszt's fugue on 'Ad nos.' But this does not detract from its merit ; and its genuine originality, power and effectiveness have established it firmly in the repertory.

REULX (RIEU, REUX), ANSELME DE, an early 16th-century Netherlander, singer, c. 1524, in the Spanish chapel of Charles V. ; composed 2 books of madrigals (1543 and 1546), single madrigals in collective volumes (Q.-L.).

REUSNER, ESAJAS (b. Löwenberg, in Silesia, Apr. 29, 1679 ; d. Cölln on the Spree, May 1, 1679), of a patrician family, was a pupil of his father (also called ESAJAS), a lutenist who arranged a book of sacred songs for the lute (published 1645). Esajas, jun., was in 1651 at the court of the Polish Princess Radziwill, where he was instructed in the art of composition by a French lutenist. In 1655 he became court lutenist at Liegnitz-Brieg, and on Feb. 5, 1674, was at the court of Brandenburg. He composed 4 books of suites of dances, beginning with a prelude or sonatina. One of these, 'Musikalische Taffel-Erlustigung' (Brieg, 1688), shows on the title-page the remark : 'Arranged in 4 parts (1 vln., 2 violas, Bc.) in the French manner by J. G. Stanley.' The latter, also a chamber musician at Brieg, was apparently an Englishman. Esajas arranged 100 sacred melodies for the lute, the latest of his published works, in 1676 (Riemann ; Q.-L.).

REUTTER, (1) GEORG (b. Vienna, 1656 ; d. Aug. 29, 1738), became in 1686 organist of St. Stephen's, and in 1700 Hof- and Kammerorganist. He also played the theorbo in the Hofkapelle from 1697 to 1703. In 1712 he succeeded Fux as Kapellmeister to the Gnadenbild in St. Stephen's, and in 1715 became Kapellmeister of the cathedral itself. His church music (see Q.-L.), was sound without being remarkable. Some of his instrumental music for organ or harpsichord has been published in D.T.O. XIII. ii. On Jan. 8, 1695, he was knighted in Rome by Count Francesco Sforza, on whose family Pope Paul III. had bestowed the privilege of conferring that honour in 1539. His son,

(2) JOHANN ADAM KARL GEORG (b. Vienna, Apr. 6, 1708¹ ; d. Mar. 12, 1772), became court-composer in 1731, and succeeded his father in 1738 as Kapellmeister of the cathedral. In 1746 he was appointed second court Kapellmeister, his duty being to conduct the music of the Emperor's church, chamber and dinner-table. On Predieri's retirement in 1751 Reutter exercised the functions of chief court Kapellmeister, but did not receive the title till the death of the former in 1769. As an economical measure he was allowed the sum of 20,000 gulden (£2000) to maintain the court Kapelle (the whole body of musicians, vocal and instrumental), and he enjoys the melancholy distinction of having reduced the establishment to the lowest possible ebb. Reutter composed for the court numerous operas, cantatas d'occasion and Italian oratorios for Lent ; also a Requiem and smaller dramatic and sacred works. His masses are showy, with rapid and noisy instrumentation, so much so that 'rushing (rauschende) violins à la Reutter' became a proverb. Burney heard one of them during his visit to Vienna in 1772, and says 'it was dull, dry stuff ; great noise and little meaning characterised the whole performance.'²

A symphony by Reutter is published in D.T.Ö. XV. ii. In 1731 Reutter married THERÈSE HOLZHAUSER (d. 1782), a court singer of merit. He was much favoured at court owing to his great tact: and Maria Theresa ennobled him in 1740 as 'Edler von Reutter.' His name is inseparably associated with that of Haydn, whom he heard sing as a boy in the little town of Hainburg, and engaged for the choir of St. Stephen's, where he sang from 1740-48. His treatment of the poor chorister, and his heartless behaviour when the boy's fine voice had broken, are mentioned under HAYDN.

REY, JEAN-BAPTISTE (b. Tarascon, circa 1760; d. Paris, 1822), is said to have taught himself the harpsichord, violin and violoncello; occupied the post of maître de musique at the cathedrals of Viviers and Uzès, and went to Paris in 1785, establishing himself there as a professor of music. A year later he was admitted into the Opéra orchestra, and held an appointment as violoncellist until his death. A potpourri (op. 1) of his for pianoforte was published by Leduc in Paris, and Nadermann of Paris brought out his Cours élémentaire de musique et de piano. In 1807 the same firm published his Exposition élémentaire de l'harmonie; théorie générale des accords d'après les différents genres de musique. Q.-L. mentions twelve sonatas for violoncello, op. 4.

REY, (1) JEAN-BAPTISTE (b. Lauzerte, now Farn-et-Garonne, France, Dec. 18, 1734; d. Paris, July 15, 1810). His musical studies began at an early age at Toulouse, where later he became chef d'orchestre at the Opéra. Until the age of 40 he filled similar posts at Montpellier, Marseilles, Bordeaux and Nantes. It was at the last-named town that a summons to Paris to assist in the production of Gluck's 'Alceste' reached him in 1776. Three years later Louis XVI. appointed him master of his private music with a salary of 2000 frs. In the same year the King decorated him with the Order of Saint Michel and appointed him Surintendant de la Chapelle. In 1781 he was appointed conductor at the Opéra, replacing Francœur. According to Fétis and Michel Brenet, Rey conducted the orchestra of the Concert Spirituel between 1782 and 1786, and some of his compositions were performed there. In 1794 he became a member of the jury of the Institut National de Musique. After the French Revolution he was elected a member of the Committee of Administration for the Affairs of the Opéra, and in May 1799 was nominated professor of harmony at the Conservatoire. It was there that F. J. Fétis became a pupil of Rey, and was instructed by him according to the complicated principles of Rameau. So staunch was his adherence to bygone traditions that he became involved in the turbulent discussions which were roused by Catel's innovations. Finally his championship of his friend Lesueur brought about his dismissal from the Conservatoire in 1802. Napoleon soothed his wounded feelings by nominating him his maître de chapelle two years later. As a conductor Rey was closely associated with all the great composers of his day and assisted in the productions of the masterpieces of Piccini, Gluck, Paisiello, Grétry, Lemoine and Méhul. Sacchini, on his death-bed, entrusted the completion of his opera 'Arvire et Evelina' to his friend Rey. This commission was conscientiously executed by him, and the opera was produced Apr. 29, 1788. He is also said to have written all the ballet music in the same composer's opera 'Œdipe à Colone' and in Salieri's 'Tarare.'

His original compositions comprise some MS. motets with orchestra, several of which were performed in the Chapelle du Roi, and some solfège studies which are included in the third part of the 'Solfèges du Conservatoire de Paris.' His two-act opera 'Diane et Endymion' was produced in Paris in 1791, and the opera in one act, entitled 'Apollon et Coronis,' was performed at the Opéra in 1781. This last was written in conjunction with his brother,

(2) LOUIS CHARLES JOSEPH (b. Lauzerte, Oct. 26, 1738; d. Paris, May 12, 1811), a chorister at the Abbey of St. Sernin, Toulouse. He became a violoncellist in the theatre orchestra at Montpellier, and came to Paris in 1755 to profit by Berteau's teaching. Two years later he occupied the post of violoncellist at the principal theatre in Bordeaux, an appointment which he held for nine years. At the end of the year 1766 he became a member of the Paris Opéra orchestra, and in 1772 was admitted into the orchestra of the Chapelle du Roi. After forty years' service Rey retired from the orchestra with a pension in 1806. Fétis says that he cut his throat in delirium caused by a nervous fever. He wrote some trios for two violins and violoncello; some duos for violin and violoncello, etc., and a brochure entitled: Mémoire justificatif des artistes de l'Académie Royale de Musique ou réponse à la lettre qui leur a été adressée le 4 Sept. 1789. This last was a reply to Papillon de la Ferté's complaint

REY COLAÇO, ALEXANDRO (b. Tangier, Apr. 1854), Portuguese musician. He studied at Madrid, Paris and Berlin, and returned to Lisbon as a teacher of the PF. He has done much to encourage the performance of chamber music; but is chiefly remarkable for his interest in fados and other forms of Portuguese national song, which in his hands appear as genuine music. He has edited one or two collections of Portuguese folk-songs and dances. J. B. T.

REYER, ERNEST (b. Marseilles, Dec. 1, 1823; d. Levandou, Hyères, Jan. 15, 1909) whose real name was Louis Ernest Etienne Rey, best known to fame as the composer of the opera 'Sigurd,' learnt the elements of music as a child at the free school of music founded at Marseilles by the Florentine Barsotti.

At this age, though he had made up his mind to become a professional musician, he did not display more than an average aptitude for the task; so that his father, seeing no reason to suppose that he would earn a livelihood by music, and hoping to cure him of his ambitions, sent him at the age of 16 to Algiers, where the boy's uncle was a government official. Neither his uncle nor his comparative ignorance of scholastic harmony and counterpoint prevented him from composing songs and other works on a small scale, some of which became popular successes, and he even succeeded in having a Mass performed in the cathedral at Algiers to celebrate the return to the city of the governor-general, the Duc d'Aumale. This composition, which was dedicated to the Duchess, has never been heard again and has remained unpublished; but its performance opened the eyes of his parents, and when, on the outbreak of the revolution in 1848 Reyser found himself deprived of his patron's support and obliged to return to Paris, no further objections were raised to his making music his career, and he settled down to hard study under his aunt Mme. Louise FARRENC, herself a composer of some distinction.

He made many literary friends at this time, amongst them being Flaubert, Gautier, Louis de Cormenin, Méry and others who had then, common Oriental interests. The cast was as it is now, a ready source of inspiration to the romantics, and it influenced Reyser in his choice of libretti throughout his career. Two of his first works, written after he had emerged from his technical studies with Mme. Farrenc, were on Oriental subjects and both were provided by Gautier. These were 'Le Sélam' a symphonic ode in 4 parts on the model of Félicien David's 'Le Désert,' which was produced with success at the Théâtre-Ventadour on Apr. 5, 1850, and 'Sacountala' a ballet-pantomime in 2 acts which was given in July 1858 at the Opéra, where another dramatic cantata 'Victoire' saw the light just a year later. Both 'Le Sélam' and 'Sacountala' were favourably criticised by Berlioz, who praised the young composer for the beauty and restraint of his orchestration and commented on the fact that his instruments of 'percussion' were not instruments of 'persecution.' Between these two works he had written a one-act opéra-comique with a libretto by Méry, 'Maître Wolfram' (Théâtre-Lyrique, May 20, 1854, revived Opéra-Comique, 1873), and this again was warmly praised by Berlioz as well as by Halévy and ran for many nights. His next opera 'La Statue,' based on a subject in the 'Arabian Nights,' showed signs of maturity in its understanding of the technique of the theatre, and the individual character and melodiousness of the music attracted the notice of Bizet. Originally in 3 acts it was produced at the Théâtre-Lyrique, in Apr. 1861, two years after the appearance of Gounod's 'Faust,' revised for the Opéra-Comique in Apr. 1878; with recitatives to take the place of spoken dialogue so that it might conform to the conventions of opera-houses outside France, and rewritten in 5 acts for the Opéra in Mar. 1903. In 1862, the year after the original production of 'La Statue,' a 2-act opera 'Érostrate' was given at Baden (Aug. 21), along with Berlioz's 'Béatrice et Bénédict,' and was revived for two nights only at the Opéra in Oct. 1871.

Meanwhile Reyser was meditating another opera on a legend drawn from the Nibelungen cycle by his friends Du Locle and Alfred Blau. For the moment, however, this was to remain only in his head, as he found it easier to earn a living by writing musical criticism than grand opera. Twenty years previously he had tried his hand at journalism in the columns of the Presse, the Revue Française and the Courrier de Paris, and now after various vicissitudes he was offered the post of critic to the Débats in place of d'Ortigue, who had succeeded Berlioz. He went out to Cairo for the paper to see the first night of Verdi's 'Aida,' in Dec. 1871, and then returned to Paris to break lances on behalf of Wagner, Berlioz, Frank, Bizet, Lalo and other composers of the young French school. Many of these articles were subsequently published in the volume Notes de musique (Paris, Charpentier, 1875) and in the posthumous Quarante ans de musique (Paris, Calmann-Lévy, 1909), the material for which was selected by Emile Henriot from articles which had appeared between 1857 and 1897.

literary activities, as it was a definite official recognition of his merits as a composer. But there were many obstacles to the production of the new opera 'Sigurd,' and for years the work remained unheard except for a few excerpts and the overture, which Padeloup introduced to the public at his popular concerts. At last, in 1883, the management of the Théâtre de la Monnaie at Brussels offered to mount it, and here it received its first performance in January of the following year. In the following July it was produced at Covent Garden and again in Jan. 1885 at Lyons, and then on June 12 of that year it was heard at Paris at the Opéra, but in a truncated version which the composer refused to remain in the house to hear. Brussels, which had welcomed 'Sigurd,' also saw the first production, in Feb. 1890, of 'Salammbô' (based on Flaubert's novel), which reached the Paris Opéra in May 1892. The parts of Brunehild and Salammbô in these two operas were taken in Brussels and also in Paris by Mme. Rose Caron, and both works quickly won their way into popular favour, which they retained until after Reyers's death. The musical idiom in which they are couched, whilst owing more than a little to Wagner and Berlioz and even to Gluck and Weber, is fresh and attractive; the use of leitmotiv is judicious and free from monotony; the conventional tricks and repetitions of the operas in vogue in his day are generally avoided, the orchestration is picturesque and the musical phrases fit the natural declamation of the words. As a literary critic, too, Reyers was undoubtedly effective. He wrote with vigour and with sympathy for his subject (he said of his own criticism that though he had keen predilections he was without prejudice), and his admirable use of irony combined with a playful wit makes many of his articles thoroughly readable to-day.

In addition to the works for the theatre mentioned above, Reyers composed a number of songs, a few small pieces for pianoforte, three unaccompanied male-voice choruses, 'Le Chant des paysans,' 'Chœur de buveurs,' and 'Chœur des assiégés'; three sacred pieces, Ave Maria, Salve Regina, and O Salutaris; a hymn, 'L'Union des arts,' for the inauguration of a musical society (Marseilles, 1862); 'Le Hymne du Rhin,' for soprano, choir and orchestra (Baden, 1865); and 'La Madeleine au désert' (a scène lyrique first sung by M. Bouhy at a Padeloup concert in 1874). He also edited and harmonised a volume of '40 Vieilles Chansons.'

REZNIČEK, EMIL NIKOLAUS VON (b. Vienna, May 4, 1860), composer, was at first destined for a legal career, and for that purpose was entered as a law student at Graz, where he contrived to pursue some musical studies under Prof. Wilhelm Mayer. He made the acquaintance of Busoni and Weingartner, and at the age of 21 married the latter's kinswoman, Milka Thurn. Rebelling against the irksomeness of legal studies he became, a year later, a student at the Leipzig Conservatorium under Reinecke and Jadassohn. A year's hard work sufficed to perfect his knowledge of the art of composition, and he wrote several important works, including a symphonic suite in E minor (1883).

Being drawn towards the dramatic side of music, Reznicek undertook the duties of theatre conductor at Graz, Zurich, Stettin, Berlin, Jena, Bochum and Mainz, the last appointment alone giving him something like the scope he desired. Then, branching out in a different direction, he obtained an appointment as military conductor in Prague.

Reznicek's first opera, 'The Maid of Orleans,' was composed in 1886, and two other works for the stage, 'Satanella' and 'Emmerich Fortunat,' followed in 1887 and 1888. All these operas were produced in Prague. But his greatest theatrical success came in 1894, when the comic opera, 'Donna Diana,' was written within a few weeks, and given for the first time in Prague on Dec. 16. The scene is laid in the castle of Don Diego at Barcelona, at the period of the independence of Catalonia; the libretto is by Moreto. Reznicek had in the meantime retired from his military post. Another important work belonging to the Prague period is the Requiem in D minor for Schmeikal, for chorus, orchestra and organ.

For a short time Reznicek was court Kapellmeister at Weimar, and in 1896-99 held a similar post at Mannheim. His folk-opera 'Till Eulenspiegel,' dealing with the pranks of the well-known German comic character, was produced at Karlsruhe in 1901, and revived in Berlin in 1903. In 1902 he removed to Berlin, where he founded the Kammer-Orchester-Konzerte for works requiring small orchestral combinations. He also directed the monthly concerts of the Warsaw Philharmonic Society, and made frequent journeys to Russia, where he was as highly appreciated as in Berlin. He became teacher of composition at the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatorium in 1906. In Nov. 1907 he conducted two concerts in London, introducing his symphony in D major to an English audience. For the next two seasons he was conductor at the Opera in Warsaw, a post he lost when a new management was installed in 1909. Reznicek then became conductor at the Komische Oper in Berlin.

After an orchestral fugue in C sharp minor, written in 1906, Reznicek composed little until his Berlin appointment came to an end in 1911, when the Komische Oper closed down; but now a number of important works followed each other in rapid succession, including a symphony in F minor, a violin concerto, incidental music to a play by Strindberg, a choral work entitled 'Vater unser', and the opera 'Ritter Blaubart,' finished in 1918.

In Mar. 1919 Reznicek was made a member of the Akademie der Künste in Berlin, and he retired from public life.

In addition to the works already referred to, the following may be mentioned:

RHAMES, a family of Dublin music publishers. (1) AARON was issuing sheet music in Dublin c. 1729-32. His son (2) BENJAMIN was in an extensive way of trade and was established in 1753 at 16 Upper Blind Quay at the sign of the Sun, and published great quantities of single sheet songs, mainly of contemporary English music. He was succeeded by his widow, (3) ELIZABETH, about 1773 or 1775. In the year 1776 the name Upper Blind Quay was altered into Exchange Street, and the later imprints of Elizabeth Rhames bear the new address with the same number, 16. She remained in business until about the year 1790, when (4) FRANCIS, her son, took over the concern and greatly increased the output of music sheets. In 1809 Paul Alday bought the business and remained at the same address until 1823 or 1824, removing then to 10 Dame Street. Elizabeth Rhames and her son published, among other Irish works, pieces by Sir John Stevenson, the copyright of which, after being held by Alday, was transferred to James Power of London.

RHAPSODY. The Greek Rhapsodist (ῥαψωδός) was a professional reciter or chaunter of epic poetry. ῥαψωδία is the Greek title of each book of the Homeric poems, the first book of the Iliad being ῥαψωδία Α, and so forth. The Rhapsody was the song of the Rhapsode; a sequel of Rhapsodies when sung in succession or written down so as to form a series, constituted an epic poem, and when a long poem was chanted in sections at different times and by different singers it was said to be rhapsodised. The usual derivation of ῥαψωδία is ῥάπτω=I sew, and ὥδή=song, ode.

Musicians might speak, in Hamlet's phrase, of a 'rhapsody of words,' or of tunes—that is to say, of a string of melodies arranged with a view to effective performance in public, but without regular dependence of one part upon another. Such a description would seem to apply pretty closely to Liszt's fifteen 'Rhapsodies hongroises,' and to his 'Reminiscences d'Espagne' (a fantasia on two Spanish tunes, 'Les Folies d'Espagne' and 'La Jota aragonesa,' 1844-45), which, in 1863, he republished as a 'Rhapsodie espagnole.' The history of the latter piece is similar to that of the Hungarian rhapsodies—portions of which were originally published under the title of 'Mélodies hongroises—Ungarische National-melodien'—short transcriptions of Hungarian tunes as they are played by the wandering bands of gipsies, the national musicians of Hungary. The prototype of these 'melodies' in all probability was Schubert's 'Divertissement à la Hongroise,' in G minor, op. 54—a piece Liszt was always fond of, and of which he produced several versions—as of the whole for pianoforte solo, and of the march in C minor for orchestra.¹ Liszt's ten sets of 'Mélodies hongroises' date from 1839-47; the fifteen so-called 'Rhapsodies hongroises' from 1853-54.

In 1859 Liszt published a book in French, Des Bohémiens et de leur musique en Hongrie—a late and overgrown preface, as he confesses, to the Rhapsodies. In this brilliant, though at intervals somewhat meretricious work,² an effort is made to claim for the set of Rhapsodies the dignity of an Hungarian Epic sui generis. Be this as it may, the term 'Rhapsodie' remains as one of Liszt's many happy hits in the way of musical nomenclature.

Brahms has adopted the term 'Rhapsodie' both in Liszt's sense and in that of the Greek Rhapsodist; and, as usual with him, he has added weight to its significance. His original 'Rhapsodien,' op. 79, for pianoforte solo—in B minor and G minor—are abrupt, impassioned aphoristic pieces of simple and obvious structure, yet solidly put together. The 'Rhapsodie' in C, op. 53, for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, justifies its title, in the Greek sense, inasmuch as it is a setting—a recitation, a rhapsody—of a portion of Goethe's poem 'Harzreise im Winter'; it, also, is a compact and carefully balanced piece. The last pianoforte piece, in op. 119, is a noble Rhapsody, in which there is perhaps rather more of the quality that is usually called 'rhapsodical' than is to be found in Brahms's other rhapsodies.

The term has become a favourite one with later composers. E. D.

RHAU (RHAW), GEORG (b. Eislefeld, Franconia, c. 1488; d. Wittenberg, Aug. 6, 1548). was cantor at the Thomasschule at Leipzig till 1520, after which he settled at Eisleben as a schoolmaster, and subsequently at Wittenberg, where he became a printer, issuing books both in ordinary typography (including many first editions of Luther's writings) and in musical notes, including his own works, Enchiridion musices ex varis musicorum libris, etc., 1518 (often reprinted), Enchiridion musicae mensuralis, 1520, etc. He also brought out many collections of musical works (see Q.-L.); Winterfeld ascribes some Chorals to him.

RHEINBERGER, JOSEF GABRIEL (b. Vaduz, Liechtenstein, Mar. 17, 1839; d. Munich, Nov. 25, 1901), composer, organist and teacher. Unusually gifted as a child, he had acquired considerable fame when only 5 years old; received at about this time lessons in theory, pianoforte and organ from Sebastian Pohly, a retired schoolmaster at Schlanders (a special pedal-board being made for him); and was appointed organist at Vaduz Parish Church at the age of 7. A few incidents of his childhood are worth relating, as evidence of his precocity, and as early manifestations of the exacting standard and refusal to compromise that throughout life marked his attitude towards his art. The public performance of his first composition, a Mass, when he was only 8 years old, roused so much interest that the Bishop of Chur asked for the boy to be brought to the cathedral, in order that his gifts might be demonstrated. Josef was set to accompany on the organ a Salve Regina for male voices, the singers being the Bishop and clergy. He soon stopped the performance, however, with the remark, 'But, my Lord Bishop, you are singing out of tune!' His opinions as to quality in music were expressed no less frankly, and in the most practical of ways. The congregation at Vaduz was alarmed one day at the sudden appearance of clouds of smoke. The source proved to be a stove into which the eight-year-old organist had thrust the copies of some masses by Buhler that did not meet with his approval.

A trifling incident in his tenth year had an important bearing on his future. Turning over the music for the leader of a string quartet—an amateur named Schrammel—Josef remarked during the tuning, 'Your A string sounds a semitone higher than my pianoforte at home.' This proved to be the case, and the violinist was so struck by the boy's acuteness that he persuaded his father to allow him to live at Feldkirch, in order that he might receive tuition from the choir-director, Philip Schmutzer. Here he stayed two years, retaining his organist's post at Vaduz, and making the weekly journey of ten miles on foot. In 1850 he left Feldkirch, and a year later entered the Conservatoire at Munich, where he remained till 1854, studying under Leonhard (piano), Herzog (organ) and Maier (counterpoint). On leaving the Conservatoire, where he had greatly distinguished himself, he settled in Munich and became a pupil of Lachner, eking out his slender income by teaching. In 1859 he succeeded Leonhard as pianoforte professor at the Conservatoire, becoming professor of composition about a year later. At the dissolution of the Conservatoire Rheinberger was given the post of 'Repetitor' at the court theatre, where he early created a sensation by playing and transposing at first sight 'The Flying Dutchman.' He found theatrical work uncongenial, however, and retired in 1867. During this period (1860-66) he was organist at the court church of St. Michael; in 1864 he became conductor of the Munich Choral Society, after acting as its accompanist since 1854; and in 1867, on the reorganisation, under von Bulow, of the Conservatoire, he was made professor of organ and composition, and 'Inspector' of instrumental and theory classes, the title of Royal Professor being conferred shortly after. These positions he held with increasing distinction during the remainder of his life. As a teacher his fame extended far, pupils coming to him from England and America. In 1877 he declined an offer of the directorship of the newly founded Hoch-Conservatorium at Frankfurt—for which decision Ludwig II. gave him the order of knighthood of St. Michael. In the same year Rheinberger resigned his post as conductor of the Munich Choral Society, and succeeded Wullner as director of the court church music. This appointment led him to compose many ecclesiastical works, among them an eight-part Mass dedicated to Pope Leo XIII., who conferred on him a knighthood of Gregory the Great. On his sixtieth birthday, in 1899, Rheinberger received from the University of Munich the degree of Doctor honoris causa. His later years were clouded by ill-health, exposure during a mountaineering tour in the Tyrol having brought about an incurable lung disease. He married (about 1867) Frau von Hoffnaas, née Jägerhuber (b. Oct. 1822; d. Dec. 31, 1892), a gifted singer and writer, who supplied the texts for many of her husband's choral works.

Rheinberger was a prolific composer in almost every field, but, beyond some of the chamber music, certain of the PF. soli, and his organ music, little of his very large output achieved popularity in his country. To-day practically everything but his organ music is forgotten. Sincerity and impeccable workmanship distinguished all he wrote, but emotional impulse is often lacking, and it must be confessed that, save in one department, he said little that was not more powerfully expressed by the greater of his contemporaries—especially Brahms. The exception, however, is important. There can be no doubt that Rheinberger found in the organ the medium above all suited to his temperament and genius. He was a fine player from childhood, serious in mood, severe in taste, and a composer exceptionally skilled in counterpoint and in all the devices that belong traditionally to organ music; small wonder that his reputation as a writer for the organ has steadily grown as his position in other respects has declined. Originally regarded as an orchestral, choral and chamber-music composer who also wrote organ music, he is now firmly established as an organ writer of the first rank, who made many less successful excursions into other fields. Did Rheinberger himself feel something of this in his latter years? The thought is suggested by a glance at his list of works, in which the organ appears with increasing frequency towards the end. Thus, from opus numbers 142 to 197 appear twelve of the twenty sonatas,¹ sixty pieces, twelve trios, one concerto, and two suites for organ and strings. This growing preoccupation with the instrument is significant, even when allowance is made for the fact that from 1877 his post as director of the church music at the court no doubt increased his interest in church and organ composition.

The great bulk of German organ music written during the past century is strongly reminiscent of Bach so far as the letter is concerned, but the spirit is too often absent. Rheinberger gives us an example of the reverse state of things. Save for some reminders of 'The Wedge' prelude and fugue in the first sonata, his idiom hardly ever recalls that of Bach, but there is a truly Bach-like spaciousness and architectural quality about his finest movements. Like Bach, too, his music depends for its effect very little on registration.² It rarely calls for more than judicious changes of power, and the simple type of variety obtainable from the alternation of manual's balanced in power and contrasted in colour; and in page after page no expression marks appear. This point in common between Bach and Rheinberger is due to the same cause. The average German organ of Rheinberger's day had made little advance on that of Bach so far as mechanical accessories were concerned. Rheinberger's own organ, for example, had not even a swell-box! This explains the extraordinary fact that in all his organ music the sign \llcorner occurs only once—in the 19th sonata, where the increase is evidently intended to be made through stops gradually added, the left hand being given a rest for that purpose. This lack of registration facilities no doubt influenced the style of Rheinberger, as it did that of Bach. Their continuity was, of course, primarily the result of the contrapuntal texture that was their normal medium; but in part it must have owed something to their necessary disregard of any but the simplest kinds of registration. Given a choice between breaking the flow, and a disturbance of it for the purpose of such effects as soloing, or subtle gradations of power, their decision was clearly on the side of the purely musical interest. As the loss of tonal variety is generally more than compensated by the continuity, it is clear that any registration that interrupts the flow is to be deprecated as being fatal to one of the music's finest qualities.

Rheinberger's affinity to Bach ends here. In melodic style, idiom, figuration, rhythm and construction he derives rather from Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms. His fugues hardly ever recall Bach, and he is surely unique among German organ composers in that he wrote only one Choral prelude,³ and that a very little one. As a Roman Catholic, he had, of course, no official concern with the Choral Plain-song⁴ also appears to have attracted him very little as a basis for organ music.

Apart from their intrinsic value, the sonatas contain much of interest and importance on the structural side. Although many of the movements are in 'sonata form,' there is almost always a good deal of modification. Evidently Rheinberger felt that an instrument so lacking in variety as the organ (especially his organ) was ill-suited to the customary 'working out' and recapitulation. Hence his avoidance of lengthy development, and his habitual shortening of the recapitulation, the balance being made good by increasing the importance of the coda, and by liberality in regard to subject matter. The Preludio in No. 7, for example, contains five subjects, almost all equally important, any two of which would provide ample material for ordinary 'first movement' development. Continuity and variety are ensured by such devices as the merging of the opening section into the working-out; by basing the latter either wholly or partly on some new material; and by making the second subject an extension of the first, rather than a definite, self-contained theme. Sometimes there is no working-out section, its place being taken by some development near the end of the movement. In fact, the student of composition, especially where form is concerned, will find in the sonatas a wealth of interest and instruction.

No fewer than seventeen of the sonatas contain a fugue, and in addition there are about thirty shorter examples among the various sets of pieces. Here, by common consent, Rheinberger is at his best. His invention moves freely under the restrictions of the form—indeed, a striking point about the sonata fugues is that, on the whole, they show more emotional power and imagination than do the nominally free movements. (Rheinberger's ability to use the stricter forms as a medium for original and expressive music—surely one of the tests of a composer—is shown no less strikingly elsewhere. The two sets of trios contain some delightful canons, and there are five admirable ground-bass treatments in the miscellaneous pieces, and a truly noble specimen in the Passacaglia of the 8th sonata.) In the sonata fugues Rheinberger makes many interesting and almost invariably successful experiments in construction. Perhaps the happiest is his method of combining fugue and sonata form by the introduction of an important theme—generally of a harmonic or broadly melodic character—to serve as second subject.¹ When this second subject is a quotation from an earlier movement in the sonata, as is the case in the B flat minor, G major, B major and A flat fugues, the procedure is even more striking, though, of course, its full effect is made only when the entire sonata is played. In the D minor fugue the stately second subject is evolved from the opening of the preceding Intermezzo; in the E flat minor, vivid contrast is provided by important new material of an agitated character; in the 'Ricercare' in D the long and apparently unrelated middle section in F, marked 'Intermezzo,' is derived from an inversion of the first six notes of the fugue subject; and so forth. But whatever the source of the non-fugal matter, it is fitted into the scheme so skilfully that the interest is enhanced, or at least maintained. There can be no doubt that in the successful working of this device, Rheinberger has solved the problem which Bach set himself in one or two of the organ fugues, notably in the 'Wedge,' i.e. the introduction of a long middle section, independent in character, yet falling well into the scheme, and increasing the interest of the fugal matter on its resumption in the final section. As Parry says,² the fact of the 'Wedge' giving an impression of being 'singularly loose in structure,' proves that Bach had not solved the difficulty of 'relieving the extreme insistence on the striking subject.' Moreover, his adoption in the 'Wedge' of the da capo form (one of the very few cases in fugal writing) cannot be said to be a success, because it is opposed to the spirit of a form which demands cumulative interest. Rheinberger avoids both pitfalls, the independent matter being at least as significant as the fugal context, and the interest of the final section of the fugue being increased by a wealth of new treatment. His one misfire in experimenting with the fugue form is in the E minor fugue, in which a short quiet theme is introduced three times, with rondo-like effect. It fails because it merely breaks into the progress of the fugue without contributing anything to the scheme as a whole.

The other important new departure in Rheinberger's fugues is the coda, which often takes the place of the conventional stretti and pedal point. Usually Rheinberger employs for this purpose a broad theme from an earlier part of the sonata³; but even more successful (especially when the fugue is played alone) is the device of rounding off the movement with a triumphant statement of the subject richly harmonised.⁴ With all this structural freedom there is little room for the time-honoured scientific devices of fugue, and in only two—the C minor and the Ricercare in D—does Rheinberger concern himself much with stretti, augmentation, inversion, etc. So intent is he on freedom that he even eschews the use of a regular counter subject. It is worth noting that much of the success of the fugues is due to their bold and striking subjects.

The slow movements of the sonatas deserve a word. The best of them brought into organ music a touch of romance and colour that had hitherto been generally absent. Mendelssohn gave a lead in this way in his 2nd, 4th and 5th sonatas, but Rheinberger extended the scope of the slow movement, making liberal use of sonata, rondo and variation forms. His frequent introduction of a loud and animated middle section is not always an advantage, for the movement is apt to fail as a contrast to its companions. He has good precedent in the classical symphony, of course, but there is a world of difference between the great varieties of f and ff of the orchestra and the limited scope and unyielding tone of the organ. Despite this fault (which a player of discretion can easily modify) the slow movements contain many delightful pages in which the composer shows himself to be a genuine tune-writer. The Cantilene (No. 11), Idyll (No. 14), Canzona (No. 13), Pastorale (No. 12) and the charming Theme and Variations (No. 10), for example, are among the most attractive things in organ music, being as melodious as the typical French 'Cantilene,' without its too frequent superficiality.

Rheinberger's miscellaneous pieces are apparently the only extensive set of short organ works by a German composer in which the Choral plays no important part. They cover a great range of style and mood, and in almost all of them the composer's invention is at its happiest. Their nearest analogy is in the short piano works of Schumann and Brahms. They show Rheinberger as a late-Romantic in the use of such titles as 'Vision,' 'Contemplation,' 'Evening Rest,' 'Lamento,' 'Riposo,' 'Aspiration,' etc., and by reason of a certain intimacy of style they take a place in the repertory near to the 'Little Organ Book' of Bach.

It will be seen from the above discussion that Rheinberger's organ music makes considerable demands on both player and hearer. Much of it will be dismissed as dull by those who look to the organ for little more than saccharine andantes, cheerful marches, or transcriptions and imitations of orchestral music. Dull moments there are, as is inevitable in so large an output. But they are few, and are mainly confined to the later sonatas, which, judged as complete works, lack the sustained invention and energy of Nos. 3 to 14. Nor are the later works free from turgidity and prolixity. But these blemishes—due apparently to failing health—do not materially affect the value of a mass of work that, in artistic purity, dignity, skill and general interest, deserves a high place amongst music written for instrumental solo.

RHEINECK, CHRISTOPH (b. Memmingen, Nov. 1, 1748; d. there, July 29, 1797), was successful with some operas in Lyons and other French towns, but returned to Memmingen on the death of his father to take over the management of the latter's hotel. He brought out another opera ('Rinaldo') at that town in 1779, and wrote a large number of songs which count among the best of their time; some appeared in Bossler's 'Blumenlese' (Riemann; Q.-L.).

RHYTHM. Italy, France and Germany have meant by 'rhythm' the larger distributions of metre, the composition of the phrase and the period. Il ritmo, le rythme, die Rhythmik have to do with such questions as the proper barring and balance of the phrase, its division into groups, how much of the preliminary group (anakrousis), if any, is essential or accidental, and the like. Books such as R. Westphal's Allgemeine Theorie der musikalischen Rhythmik, 1880, a closely reasoned account of phrasing drawn up on the lines of Greek theory, and Mathis Lussy's Le Rythme musical, 1884, full of æsthetic vision and critical insight, supply a large number of pertinent instances and illuminate them. Those who may wish to seize quickly the point of view of each of these writers may compare their account of Beethoven's op. 26 (Westphal, p. 117, Lussy, p. 11); the former is inclined to find an anakrousis everywhere, the latter to judge each phrasing on its merits.

In English 'rhythm' means something more personal. A living sense of rhythm is based on an experience of actual failure and success; books cannot teach it.

AN ACT OF FUSION.—If rhythm is the 'life' of time in all its aspects, if it redeems time from a clock-like precision, adapting it constantly to changed conditions, bridging what separates the mechanical from the human and eventually, as we may believe, the finite from the infinite, it does all this by holding two, or more, discrepant elements together as one. A melody—an Irish reel, perhaps—is in strict time, or people could not dance to it correctly; but if it had not also rhythm, they would not dance to it passionately. Rhythm seems in this case to hold together with 'the time' a number of minute, unverifiable accelerandos and ritardandos, or else to refuse resolutely to admit them. Whichever it does, it is that one fiddler's 'reading' or 'expression' of the music, the outcome of all the musicality that is in him, his special creation, inimitable, and not recoverable perhaps, even by him, again. But where did he get this rubato from? He got it from the ups and downs of the melody. What these put into the strict time is, as Lussy pointed out, pathos—'la nature douloureuse de nos sentiments.' So that in this case rhythm is, in precise language, the effect of pitch upon duration.

That is the performer's rhythm, or one instance of it; it consists in a creative act which reconciles in a flash the claims of the two warring constituents of melody, time and pitch.

COMPOSER'S RHYTHM.—When the music is harmonised, when in fact there is more than one simultaneous melody, there may be two times, or two accents, or two metres to reconcile. In this rhythm the composer shares, for he put them there (cf. POLYPHONY: PRINCIPLES OF THE 16TH CENTURY). To the performer's part is to feel them all, and to decide instantaneously which, if any, of them is to be given greater value. He can do this only by establishing a level which they may rise above and fall below, and the greatest artists are those who can consistently maintain this level.

The composer has a level to maintain too—the consistency of his work as a whole. His greatest danger is anticlimax, the 'bathos' of literature—raising expectations and not fulfilling them. To avoid that he husband his resources. If he has established a given motion (time), he does not change it capriciously; his dynamic changes (accent) have a sense of proportion; his variation of a melodic figure (metre)—from simple to complex or, as Beethoven often proceeds, from complex to simple—is part of a considered development; his greatest merit is—as it is also of the conductor's, among performers—to have kept 'the line.'

OTHER USES OF THE WORD.—The idea of rhythm, being arrived at only after some experience, is naturally subject to misconception. We speak euphemistically of the rhythm being wrong when it was the 'time' that was at fault. We call Adagio a slow 'rhythm' when we should say PACE. 'Rhythm' has been applied to groups of bars for which PERIOD would be a better word. It has been defined as 'the systematic grouping of notes with regard to duration, which includes, quite against the author's intention, the metrical distribution within the bar; that is a correct definition of METRE, but not of rhythm. Rhythm is, as has been said, time, pace, metre, and other things rolled into one, and it is not surprising that it has been used to name each of them singly.

Like good reading aloud, the true rhythmical performance of music is a verdict based on the knowledge of much else besides the matter in hand.

A. H. F. S.

RHYTHMIC MODES. Composers of the 13th and 14th centuries adapted the plain-song or other themes (tenors) of their motets in accordance with a system or series of forms known as the Rhythmic Modes. These were six in number, founded on the feet of classical poetry. In the quantitative age of Latin verse, i.e. up to the time of St. Ambrose (4th century) the foot was governed by the length of vowel, not by the accent; thus:

is made up of five feet, the first and the last two being trochees, the second a spondee and the third a dactyl (see METRE). In the days of mediæval music this rhythm would be entirely altered in accordance with the needs of pronunciation (a sign of advance, not of decadence), and would become i.e. a dactyl followed by four trochees. The foot is therefore to be taken, musically, as an accentual unit, and not in the same sense as in the classical Latin verse system.

The earliest POLYPHONY (q.v.) was nothing more than a 'double plain-song,' two parts in free rhythm kept together by certain technical conventions. Before long, however, the need of some mensurate system to ensure uniformity, and to increase the possibilities of composition, was recognised.

Musicians therefore began to cast their plain-songs into one or other of these six rhythmic moulds:

No.	Old classical scansion, now represented by accent.	Foot.	Time-value (notation halved).
1.	— —	Trochee	o o
2.	— —	Iambus	o o
3.	— — —	Dactyl	o o o
4.	— — —	Anapaest	o o o
5.	— — —	Molossus	o o o
6.	— — —	Tribrach	o o o (rarely used)

The third and fourth Rhythmic Modes are divided, it will be observed, in triple time, not in duple as we might expect. This is explained (after the event) by the mediæval writers as symbolic of the Blessed Trinity. But the cause is earlier than the explanation, and it is probably due to the fact that a unit or tempus of this form is more workable, being divisible in more ways than the forms o o o and o o o.

These rules were also applied (sometimes with less strictness) to the upper parts of the motet: the motet being the dominating form of composition during these centuries. The modes of the various voices were not usually identical; thus (from Oxf. Hist. Mus. i. 169):

The system lasted, roughly, from 1150 or 1200–1350, but its influence may be traced later. It began to die out with the widespread revival of duple time about 1300, and finally disappeared with the growth of freedom in composition which marks the 15th century.

RIÑO, JUAN FACUNDO (b. Granada, Nov. 24, 1828; d. Madrid, Feb. 27, 1901), a leading authority on the history of Spanish art, who belongs to musical history through his remarkable Critical and Bibliographical Notes on Early Spanish Music (London, 1887). Riño's exact references and accurate bibliographical descriptions of mediæval musical MSS. are in striking contrast to the vague inaccuracy of Soriano Fuertes. He held that the neumes in the Visigothic (Mozarabic) MSS. were based upon a form of the Visigothic alphabet consisting of cursive characters, rarely used, but found in the signatures to Spanish documents of the 10th–12th centuries. His theory, though it has not received much attention, is developed with great learning and acuteness. The book is also of importance in the study of early Spanish instruments.

Riño became a Senator, Privy Councillor and member of various academies; but he gave real help and encouragement to the study of the fine arts in Spain, and was founder and director of the Museo de reproducciones artísticas. His publications (in English) besides the Notes on Early Spanish Music, include a Classified and Descriptive Catalogue of the Art Objects of Spanish Production in the S. Kensington Museum (1872), and a Manual of Spanish Industrial Arts (1879).

RIBATTUTA (re-striking), an ornamental device in which the alternation of two notes was developed by the process of acceleration into a trill, thus:

Grove said of the Ribattuta, 'Beethoven has preserved it for ever in the overture "Leonora III." (bar 75 of Allegro).'

RIBERA, ANTONIO DE (early 16th-cent.), Spanish church musician; a member of the Cappella Pontificia, Rome, from 1514-22. He composed some of the music sung annually in the Mystery of ELOHE. J. B. T.

RIBERA, BERNARDINO DE (mid-16th cent.), Spanish church musician, choirmaster at Toledo in 1563, but replaced in the following year. Eslava printed 2 motets and a Magnificat; the Toledo MSS. include a Mass, 'De Beata Virgine,' and Magnificents. J. B. T.

RIBIBLE, an obsolete instrument played by a bow. It is mentioned by Chaucer and other early writers, and appears to have been either the rebec itself, or a particular form of it. Sometimes it is spelled 'rubible.' It has been suggested that both 'rebec' and 'ribible' are derived from the Moorish word 'rebeb' or 'rehab,' which seems to have been the name of a somewhat similar musical instrument. (See REBEC.) F. K.

RIBS (Fr. éclisses; Ger. Zarge), the sides of stringed instruments of the violin type, connecting the back and the table. They consist of six (sometimes only five) pieces of maple, and should be of the same texture as the back, and if possible cut out of the same piece. The flatter the model, the deeper the ribs require to be; hence the viol tribe, having perfectly flat backs and tables of slight elevation, are very deep in the ribs. The oldest violins were often very deep in the ribs, but many of them have been since cut down. Carlo Bergonzi and his contemporaries had a fashion of making shallow ribs, and often cut down the ribs of older instruments, thereby injuring their tone beyond remedy. E. J. P.

RICCATTI, CONTE GIORDANO (b. Castel Franco, near Treviso, Feb. 28, 1709; d. Treviso, July 20, 1790), mathematician, architect, musical amateur; wrote a number of essays and treatises on the harmonic systems of Rameau, Tartini and Vallotti, a book on counterpoint, contributions to Cologera's Raccolta (on acoustics, etc.) and a biography of Agostino Steffani. E. v. d. s.

RICCI, (1) LUIGI (b. Naples, June 8, 1805; d. Prague, Dec. 31, 1859), entered in 1814 the Royal Conservatorio, then under Zingarelli, of which he became in 1819 one of the sub-professors together with Bellini.

servatorio in 1823, and enthusiastically applauded. In the following four years he wrote 'La cena frastornata,' 'L' abate Taccarella,' 'Il Diavolo condannato a prender moglie,' and 'La lucerna d' Epitteto,' all for the Teatro Nuovo. In 1828 his 'Ulisse,' at the San Carlo, was a failure. In 1829 'Il colombo' in Parma and 'L' orfanella di Ginevra' in Naples were both successful. The winter of 1829-30 was disastrous for Ricci, his four new operas ('Il sonnambulo,' 'L' eroina del Messico,' 'Annibale in Torino' and 'La neve') being all unsuccessful. In the autumn of 1831 he produced at La Scala, Milan, 'Chiara di Rosemberg,' and this opera, performed by Grisi, Sacchi, Winter, Badioli, etc., was greatly applauded, and soon became successful in all the theatres of Italy. 'Il nuovo Figaro' failed in Parma in 1832. In it sang Rozer, who afterwards married Balfo. The same fate attended 'I due sergenti' at La Scala in 1833, where the following year he gave 'Un'avventura di Scaramuccia,' which was a very great success, and was translated into French by Flotow. The same year 'Gli esposti,' better known as 'Eran due ed or son tre,' was applauded in Turin, whilst 'Chi dura vince,' like Rossini's immortal Barbiere, was hissed at Rome. It was afterwards received enthusiastically at Milan and in many other opera-houses of Europe. In 1835 'Chiara di Montalbano' failed at La Scala, while 'La serva o l' ussero' was applauded in Pavia. Ricci had thus composed twenty operas when only 30 years old; and although many of his works had met with a genuine and well-deserved success, he was still very poor and had to accept the post of musical director of the Trieste Cathedral and conductor of the Opera. In 1838 his 'Nozze di Figaro' was a fiasco in Milan, where Rossini told him that its fall was due to the music being too serious.

For the next six years Ricci composed nothing. In 1844 he married Lidia Stoltz, by whom he had two children, ADELATTE, who in 1867 sang at the Théâtre des Italiens in Paris, but died soon after, and LUIGI, who settled in London.

'La solitaria delle Asturie' was given in Odessa in 1844; 'Il birraio di Preston' in Florence in 1847; and in 1852 'La festa di Piedigrotta' was very successful in Naples. His last opera, 'Il Diavolo a quattro,' was performed in Trieste in 1859. He composed in collaboration with his brother FEDERICO 'Il colonnello,' given in Rome, and 'M. de Chalumeaux,' in Venice, in 1835; in 1836 'Il disertore per amore' for the San Carlo in Naples, and 'L'amante di richiamo,' given in Turin in 1846. Of these four operas, 'Il colonnello' alone had a well-deserved reception. But the opera which placed him in a very high rank among Italian composers is

'Crispino e la comare,' written in 1850 for Venice, and to which his brother Federico partly contributed. This opera, one of the best comic operas of Italy, enjoyed a long success all the world over.

Shortly after the production of 'Il Diavolo a quattro' in 1859, however, symptoms of insanity showed themselves, and the malady soon became violent. He was taken to an asylum at Prague, his wife's birthplace, and died there. At Trieste a funeral ceremony was followed by a performance of selections from his principal works, his bust was placed in the lobby of the Opera-house, and a pension was granted to his widow.

He published two volumes of vocal pieces entitled 'Mes Loisirs' and 'Les Inspirations du thé' (Ricordi), and he left in MS. a large number of compositions for the cathedral service. His brother,

(2) FEDERICO (b. Naples, Oct. 22, 1809; d. Conegliano, Italy, Dec. 10, 1877) entered the Royal Conservatorio of that town, where his brother was then studying, and received his musical education from Bellini and Zingarelli. In 1837 he gave 'La prigioniera d' Edimburgo' in Trieste. The barcarola of this opera, 'Sulla poppa del mio brick,' was for long one of the most popular melodies of Italy. In 1839 his 'Duello sotto Richelieu' was only moderately successful at La Scala, but in 1841 'Michelangelo e Rolla' was applauded in Florence. In it sang Signora Strepponi, who afterwards married Verdi. 'Corrado d' Altamura' was given at La Scala in the same year. At the personal request of Charles Albert he composed in 1842 a cantata for the marriage of Victor Emmanuel, and another for a court festival. In 1843 his 'Vallombra' failed at La Scala. 'Isabella de' Medici' (1844) in Trieste, 'Estella' (1846) in Milan, 'Griselda' (1847) and 'I due ritratti' (1850) in Venice, were all failures. 'Il marito e l'amante' was greatly applauded in Vienna in 1852, but his last opera, 'Il paniere d'amore,' given there the following year, did not succeed. He was then named musical director of the imperial theatres of St. Petersburg, which post he occupied for many years. Of the operas written in collaboration with his brother we have already spoken.

He brought out at the Fantaisies-Parisiennes, Paris, 'Une Fête à Rome,' Jan. 30, 1869, with great success. Encouraged by this he produced an opéra-comique in three acts, 'Le Docteur rose' (Bouffes-Parisiens, Feb. 10, 1872), and 'Une Fête à Venise,' a reproduction of his earlier work, 'Il marito e l'amante' (Athénée, Feb. 15, 1872). Shortly after this Federico retired to Conegliano in Italy. He was concerned partially or entirely in nineteen operas. He also left two masses, six albums or collections of vocal pieces (Ricordi), and many detached songs.

RICCI, PASQUALE (b. Como, c. 1733), pupil of Vignati, Milan; entered a religious order and received the title 'abbate.' He travelled in Holland, England and France, where his symphonies, concertantes, quintets, quartets, trios, duets, sonatas, etc., were published and well received. He returned eventually to Como as maestro di cappella of the cathedral (Q.-L.; Riemann).

RICCIO, TEODORO (d. 1603 or 1604), a native of Brescia, who after holding the post of choir-master at one of the churches of Brescia was in 1576 invited by George Frederick, Margrave of Brandenburg-Anspach, to be his Kapellmeister at Anspach. When in 1579 George Frederick became also Duke of Prussia, Riccio accompanied him as Kapellmeister to his new capital Königsberg, where, like Scandello, also a native of Brescia, in similar circumstances at Dresden, Riccio became a Lutheran, and seems to have settled for the rest of his life, with an occasional visit to Anspach. His adoption of Lutheranism made little difference to the nature of his compositions for use in church, as Latin was still largely used in the services of Lutheran court chapels, and so we find that his publications mainly consist of various volumes of Latin masses, motets and Magnificats a 4 to 8 or 12. Probably Johann Eccard, who was called to be his coadjutor at Königsberg from 1581, provided the music required for German texts. Besides the Latin works Q.-L. mentions two incomplete books of madrigals a 5 and 6, and one book of Canzone alla napoletana. Riccio is supposed to have died between 1603 and 1604, since in the latter year Eccard is known to have succeeded him definitely as Kapellmeister.

RICERCARE (RĪĒRCĀTA) (from ricercare, 'to search out'), an Italian term of the 17th century, signifying a fugue of the closest and most learned description. Frescobaldi's Ricercari (1615), which are copied out in one of Dr. Burney's note-books (B.M. Add. MSS. 11,588), are full of augmentations, diminutions, inversions and other contrivances, in fact recherchés or full of research. J. S. Bach has affixed the name to the 6-part fugue in his 'Musikalisches Opfer,' and the title of the whole contains the words in its initial—Regie Iussu Cantio Et Reliqua Canonica Arte Resoluta.

But the term was also employed for a fantasia on some popular song, street-cry, or such familiar theme. Dr. Cummings possessed a MS. book, dated 1580-1600, containing twenty-two ricercari by Cl. da Coreggio, Gianetto Palestina (sic), A. Vuillaert (sic), O. Lasso, Clemens non Papa, Cip. Rore and others—compositions in four and five parts, on 'Ce moy de May,' 'Vestiva i colli,' 'La Rossignol,' 'Susan un jour,' and other apparently popular songs. This use of the word appears to have been earlier than the other, as pieces of the kind by Adriano (1520-67) are quoted. G.

RICH, JOHN (b. circa 1682; d. Nov. 26, 1761), son of Christopher Rich, patentee of Drury Lane Theatre. His father, having been compelled to quit Drury Lane, had erected a new theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, but died in 1714 when it was upon the eve of being opened. John Rich, together with his brother Christopher then assumed the management and opened the house about six weeks after his father's death. Finding himself unable to contend against the superior company engaged at Drury Lane, he had recourse to the introduction of a new species of entertainment—pantomime—in which music, scenery, machinery¹ and appropriate costumes formed the prominent features. In these pieces he himself, under the assumed name of Lun, performed the part of Harlequin² with such ability as to extort the admiration of even the most determined opponents of that class of entertainment. (See BALLAD OPERA; BEGGAR'S OPERA; LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS THEATRE; PANTOMIME.) Encouraged by success he at length decided upon the erection of a larger theatre, the stage of which should afford greater facilities for scenic and mechanical display, and accordingly built the first Covent Garden Theatre, which he opened Dec. 7, 1732. Hogarth produced a caricature on the occasion of the removal to the new house, entitled 'Rich's Glory, or his Triumphal Entry into Covent Garden,' copies of which will be found in Wilkinson's Londina illustrata, and in H. Saxe Wyndham's Annals of Covent Garden Theatre, vol. i. He conducted the new theatre with great success until his death, relying much upon the attraction of his pantomimes and musical pieces, but by no means neglecting the regular drama. In his early days he had attempted tragic acting, but failed. He was buried Dec. 4, 1761, in Hillingdon churchyard, Middlesex. (For list of productions, etc., see D.N.B.) W. H. H.

RICHAFFORT, JEAN, a Flemish musician of the earlier part of the 16th century, whom we know on the authority of the poet Ronsard to have been a pupil of Josquin des Prés. He was one of the more distinguished composers of the period immediately after Josquin, in which with the retention of what was valuable in the older technique of contrapuntal artifice there was, as Wooldridge observes, a greater approach made towards purity of sound and beauty of expression. The only known dates of Richafort's career are that between 1543 and 1547 he was choirmaster of the church of St. Gilles, Bruges, but this is supposed to have been towards the end of his life, since as early as 1519 a motet of his composition appears in one of the collections of Petrucci, the Motetti de la Corona, lib. ii. His works appeared only in the collections of the time, and specially in those of Attaingnant and Modernus between 1530 and 1550. Two masses are specially mentioned, one, 'O genetrix gloriosa,' published by Attaingnant 1532, and afterwards copied into the Sistine Chapel and other choir-books; the other, 'Veni Sponsa Christi,' 1540, based on one of his own motets, which Ambros describes as the finest of the collection of motets in which it appears. The motet has been reprinted in Maldeghem's 'Trésor.' A Requiem a 6 would seem from the account which Ambros gives of it to be on the whole more curious than beautiful, though it testifies to the aim after intensity of expression. While the other voices sing the ritual text, the two tenors sing in canon 'Circumdederunt me gemitus mortis,' and also reply to each other as if with exclamations of personal sorrow, 'c'est douleur non pareille.' If some of Richafort's works retain a character of antique severity, others, as Eitner observes, are remarkable for their wonderful beauty, clearness and simplicity. Several of his motets Ambros singles out for high praise. Of one which he mentions, 'Quem dicunt homines,' the opening portion is given by Wooldridge in the Oxf. Hist. Mus. vol. ii. pp. 269-70. Glarean gives in full Richafort's motet 'Christus resurgens' as a good example of the polyphonic treatment of the Ionic mode. Of the fifteen chansons of Richafort in various collections, two fine specimens are accessible in modern reprints, 'De mon triste déplaisir' in Commer Collectio xii., and 'Sur tous regrets' in Eitner's republication of Ott's 'Liederbuch,' 1544.

RICHARD CŒUR DE LION, opéra-comique in 3 acts; words by Sedaine; music by Grétry. Produced Opéra-Comique Oct. 21, 1784.⁴ Two versions were made for the English stage; General Burgoyne's was acted at Drury Lane in 1786, and Leonard MacNally's at Covent Garden in the same year. Thomas Linley adapted Grétry's music to one of them and the opera remained a standard work for many years.

profession, but became a pupil of the R.A.M., where he obtained the King's scholarship in 1835, and again in 1837. He soon gained a high position in London as a pianist. As a composer he was financially very successful, his song 'God bless the Prince of Wales' (published in 1862) having reached a high pitch of popularity, even out of England, and his sacred songs, partsongs and pianoforte pieces having been most favourably received. An overture in F minor was performed in 1840. He composed additional songs for the English version of Auber's 'Crown Diamonds,' when produced at Drury Lane in 1846. He especially devoted himself to the study of Welsh music (upon which he lectured), and many of his compositions were inspired by his enthusiastic love for his native land. He exerted himself greatly in promoting the interests of the South Wales Choral Union on its visits to London in 1872 and 1873, when they successfully competed at the National Music Meetings at the Crystal Palace. RICHARDS, HENRY WILLIAM, Mus.D. Dunelm (b. London, Apr. 16, 1865), was for 35 years organist and choirmaster of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate (1886-1921), where he maintained a high musical standard. A professor of the organ and member of the Committee of Management of the R.A.M., he became Warden (virtually vice-principal) of that institution in 1924. He is examiner to and member of the Associated Board of the R.A.M. and R.C.M., and was president of the R.C.O. (1924). He is the author of Organ Accompaniment of the Church Services and Choir Training. C.

RICHARDSON, ALFRED MADELEY b. Southend-on-Sea, June 1, 1868), organist, was educated at the R.C.M. and Keble College, Oxford, where he took the degree of Mus.D. in 1897. From that year until 1908 he was organist of Southwark Cathedral, where he did much to establish the high reputation of the cathedral music. In 1909 he went to America as organist of St. Paul's Church, Baltimore, and since 1912 has been on the teaching staff of the Institute of Musical Art, New York. His publications include church music and works on the technique of organ playing and choir training. C.

RICHARDSON, FERDINAND (real name FERDINANDO HEYBOURNE) (b. circa 1558; d. Tottenham, Middlesex, June 4, 1618), pupil of Tallis, groom of the Privy Chamber in 1587; pensioned, 1611. Eight pieces of his are in the 'Fitzwilliam Virginal Book,' others are in B.M. Add. MSS. 30,485. A Latin poem of his is in 'Cantiones sacrae' by Tallis and Byrd (1575). E. v. d. s.

engaged in most of the London orchestras, was solo-player at Jullien's concerts for many years, and afterwards became principal flute in the Queen's private band. He played at the Melodists' Club and the Società Armonica in 1836, and was a member of the Liszt concert party in 1841. His neatness and rapidity of execution were extraordinary, and were the great features of his playing. He composed numerous fantasias for his instrument, usually extremely brilliant. G.; addn. W. H. C. F.

RICHARDSON, VAUGHAN (b. London, latter half of 17th cent.; d. before June 26, 1729), was in 1675¹ a chorister of the Chapel Royal, under Dr. Blow. He was possibly a nephew of Thomas Richardson (alto singer, gentleman of the Chapel Royal from 1664 to his death, July 23, 1712, lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey), and a brother of Thomas Richardson, who was his fellow-chorister. In June 1692 he was appointed organist of Winchester Cathedral. In 1701 he published 'A collection of Songs for one, two and three voices, accompany'd with instruments.' He was author of some church music: a fine anthem, 'O Lord God of my salvation,' and an Evening Service in C (composed in 1713), are in the Tudway Collection (Harl. MSS. 7341 and 7342), and another anthem, 'O how amiable,' also in Tudway, and printed in Page's 'Harmonia sacra'; others are in the books of different cathedrals. He was also composer of 'An Entertainment of new Musick, composed on the Peace' (of Ryswick), 1697; 'A Song in praise of St. Cecilia,' written for a celebration at Winchester about 1700, and a 'set of vocal and instrumental music,' written for a like occasion in 1703. An autograph volume of music, containing fourteen anthems, a 'Song for the King' (1697), six sonatas for strings, etc., was in the possession of J. S. Bumpus.

W. H. H.
RICHARDSON, WILLIAM (b. late 17th cent.; d. circa 1731-32), a chorister in the Chapel Royal under Blow; organist of St. Nicholas, Deptford, in 1697. He composed Lessons for the harpsichord or spinet (London, 1708); 'The Pious Recreation,' containing 'A new sett of Psalm-tunes' (1729); among the latter appears the popular psalm-tune 'Greenwich' (Brown & Stratton; Q.L.).

RICHAULT, (1) CHARLES SIMON (b. Chartres, May 10, 1780; d. Paris, Feb. 20, 1866), head of a family of celebrated French music-publishers, came early to Paris, and served his apprenticeship in the music-trade with J. J. Momigny. From him he acquired a taste for the literature of music and chamber compositions; and when he set up for himself at No. 7 Rue Grange Batelière in 1805, the first works he published were classical. He soon perceived that there was an opening in Paris for editions of the best works of German musicians, and the early efforts of French composers of promise. Accordingly he was the first to publish Beethoven's symphonies and Mozart's concertos in score; to make known in France the oratorios of Bach and Handel, and the works of Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann; to bring out the first operas of Ambroise Thomas and Victor Massé; to encourage Berlioz when his 'Damnation de Faust' was received with contempt, and to welcome the orchestral compositions of Reber and Gouvy. His business increased rapidly, and he was soon obliged to move into larger premises in the Boulevard Poissonnière, first at No. 16, and then at No. 26. Here he published Mozart's concertos in 8vo score, and other works of the classical composers of Germany, and acquired the bulk of the stock of the firms of Frey, Naderman, Sieber, Pleyel, Petit, Erard and Delahante. He moved in 1862 to No. 4 in the Boulevard des Italiens. In this house he died. His son,

(2) GUILLAUME SIMON (b. Paris, Nov. 2, 1806; d. Feb. 7, 1877), had long been his father's partner, and continued in the old line of serious music. He bought the stock of the publisher Pacini. On his death his son,

(3) LÉON (b. Paris, Aug. 6, 1839; d. there, Apr. 7, 1895), resolved to give a fresh impetus to the firm, which already possessed 18,000 publications. His intelligent administration of his old and honourable business procured him a silver medal at the International Exhibition of 1878, the highest recompense open to music-publishers, the jury having refused them the gold medal. The music stock belonging to this firm is now in the possession of the publishers, Costallat, Paris. g. c.

RICHTER, ERNST FRIEDRICH EDUARD (b. Gross-schönau, Lusatia, Oct. 24, 1808; d. Leipzig, Apr. 9, 1879), son of a schoolmaster. From his eleventh year he attended the Gymnasium at Zittau, managed the choir, and arranged independent performances. In 1831 he went to Leipzig to study with Weinlig, the then cantor, and made such progress that soon after the foundation of the Conservatorium, in 1843, he became one of the professors of harmony and counterpoint. Up to 1847 he conducted the Singakademie; he was afterwards organist successively of the Peterskirche (1851) and the Neukirche and Nicolai-kirche (1862). After Hauptmann's death, Jan. 3, 1868, he succeeded him as cantor of the Thomasschule. Of his books, the Lehrbuch der Harmonie (afterwards called Praktische Studien zur Theorie), (12th ed. 1876), has been translated into Dutch, Swedish, Italian, Russian, Polish and English. The Lehre von der Fuge has passed through three editions, and Vom Contrapunct through two. The English translations of all these are by Franklin Taylor, and were published by Cramer & Co. in 1864, 1878 and 1874 respectively. Richter also published a Catechism of Organ-building. Of his many compositions de circonstance the best known is the cantata 'Dithyrambe,' for the Schiller Festival in 1859. Other works are—an oratorio, 'Christus der Erlöser' (Mar. 8, 1849), masses, psalms, motets, organ-pieces, string-quartets and sonatas for PF. He became one of the King's Professors in 1868, and on his death was succeeded as cantor by W. Rust. F. c.

RICHTER, FERDINAND TOBIAS (b. Würzburg, 1649; d. Vienna, 1711), succeeded Alessandro Poglietti as Imperial court organist at Vienna in 1683. In Q.-L. he is wrongly said to have been the teacher in composition of the Emperor Leopold I., but he was undoubtedly music teacher to Leopold's children, the future Emperor Joseph I. and the three Archduchesses. Richter enjoyed a high reputation as organ-player and composer. Several even of Pachelbel's pupils at Nuremberg came afterwards to Vienna to perfect themselves in organ-playing by further instructions from Richter, and Pachelbel himself must have held Richter in high esteem, since in 1699 he dedicated to him along with Buxtehude his organ or clavier work entitled 'Hexachordum Apollinis.' It is all the more remarkable that so few organ works of Richter have been preserved. D.T.Ö. xiii. 2 contains three clavier suites out of a set of five, and an organ toccata with short fugued versetti out of a set of five on the church tones intended for liturgical use, and printed for the first time, but these hardly suffice to explain his great reputation. The State (Imperial) Library at Vienna preserves in MS. two serenatas by Richter evidently intended for court festivities, 'L' Istro ossoquioso' and 'Le promesse degli Dei'; also five spiritual dramas composed for performance by the pupils of the Jesuit college at Vienna. There are also some instrumental works, a sonata a 7 (described as for two trombe, one timpano, two violini, two viole da braccio e cembalo), along with some balletti a 4 and a 5, also two sonatas a 8. J. R. M.

RICHTER, FRANZ XAVER (b. Hollschau, Moravia, Dec. 1 or 31,¹ 1709; d. Sept. 12, 1789). His first official post was that of Kapellmeister to the Abbot of Kempten, which he held from 1740-50, when difficulties appear to have arisen with the authorities as the result of his duplication of posts. He had been a bass-singer at the court of Mannheim since 1747, and no doubt this was the cause of his dismissal from Kempten. He is stated by F. Walter, Geschichte des Theaters, etc. (1898), to have appeared in operatic performances in 1748 and 1749. He was also engaged as leader of the second violins in the orchestra. An oratorio, 'La deposizione della croce,' was performed at Mannheim in 1748. He left Mannheim for Strassburg in 1769, becoming Kapellmeister at the Minster, and spending the remainder of his life there. On his death he was succeeded by Ignaz Pleyel, who, according to Fétis, had acted as his assistant for six years. Burney, in his Present State (Germany), ii. 327, speaks of the great reputation Richter enjoyed, and of the want of real individuality in his music.¹ He speaks of his frequent employment of the device called ROSALIA. He left sixty-four symphonies, of which the themes of sixty-two are given in the volume devoted to the Mannheim school of symphonists in the D.D.T. (2nd series), iii. 1. Three of the symphonies are printed in full, and the preface contains a detailed account of the composer. D.D.T. (2nd series), vii. 1, contains a further example of Richter's symphonic work. An enormous mass of church music is ascribed to him in Riemann, such as 28 masses, 2 Requiems, 16 psalms, 38 motets, etc. Q.-L. gives a more limited list of extant works, and contains many doubtful statements concerning the composer.

M.

RICHTER, HANS (b. Raab, Hungary, Apr. 4, 1843; d. Bayreuth, Dec. 5, 1916), celebrated conductor. His father was Kapellmeister of the cathedral at Raab. His mother, née Josephine Czazinsky (d. Oct. 20, 1892), sang the part of Venus in 'Tannhauser' at the first performance in Vienna in 1857; she was afterwards a very successful teacher of singing in Vienna. The father died in 1853, and Hans was then placed at the Löwenburg Convict-School in Vienna. Thence he went into the choir of the court chapel, and remained there for four years. In 1860 he entered the Conservatorium, and studied the horn under Klemecke, the violin under Heissler and theory under Sechter.

After a lengthened engagement as horn-player in the orchestra of the Karnthnerthor Opera he was recommended by Esser to Wagner, went to him at Lucerne, remained there from Oct. 1866 to Dec. 1867, and made the first fair copy of the score of 'Die Meistersinger.' In 1868 he accepted the post of conductor at the Hof- und National Theater, Munich, and remained there for a year. He next visited Paris, and after a short residence there, proceeded to Brussels for the production of 'Lohengrin' (Mar. 22, 1870). He then returned to Wagner at Lucerne, assisted at the first performance of the 'Siegfried Idyll' (Dec. 1870), and made the fair copy of the score of the 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' for the engraver. In Apr. 1871 he went to Pest as chief conductor of the National Theater, a post to which he owed much of his great practical knowledge of the stage and stage business. In Jan. 1875 he conducted a grand orchestral concert in Vienna, which had the effect of attracting much public attention to him, and accordingly, after the retirement of Dessoff from the court opera, Richter was invited to take the post, which he entered upon in the autumn of 1875, concurrently with the conductorship of the Philharmonic concerts. In 1884-90 he conducted the concerts of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde.

He had conducted the rehearsals of 'Der Ring des Nibelungen' at Bayreuth, and in 1876 he directed the whole of the rehearsals and performances of the Festival there, and, at the close of the third set of performances, received the Order of Maximilian from the King of Bavaria, and that of the Falcon from the Grand Duke of Weimar. In 1877 he produced 'Die Walküre' in Vienna, and followed it in 1878 by the other portions of the trilogy. In 1878 he was made court Kapellmeister, and received the Order of Franz Josef. The high standard and position of the band of the Vienna opera-house is due to him.

His first introduction to English audiences was at the famous Wagner Concerts given in the Albert Hall in 1877, when he shared the duties of conductor with Wagner himself. In 1879 (May 5-12), 1880 (May 10-June 14) and 1881 (May 9-June 23) were started what were at first called 'Orchestral Festival Concerts,' but afterwards the 'Richter Concerts,' in London, which excited much attention, chiefly for the conductor's knowledge of the scores of Beethoven's symphonies and other large works, which he conducted without book. The Richter Concerts went on for many years with great success, but after Richter went to live in Manchester in 1897, as director of the Hallé Orchestra, the London concerts were given less regularly. They were succeeded by the concerts of the LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA (q.v.) (1904 et seq.). In 1882 and 1884 he conducted important performances of German operas in London, introducing 'Die Meistersinger' and 'Tristan' to the London public. Special performances of German opera at Covent Garden were conducted by Richter from 1904 until his retirement, and amongst all the activities in concert room and opera-house by which he furthered musical development in England his performances of 'The Ring of the Nibelungs' in English for the first time (1909) are specially worthy of record as a landmark. Those performances laid the foundations of many successful careers of English singers. Richter conducted the triennial festival at BIRMINGHAM (q.v.) from 1885-1909, and continued his work at MANCHESTER (q.v.) until 1911. In that year he conducted 'Die Meistersinger' at Bayreuth for the last time. He then lived in retirement at Bayreuth. F. G.; with addns. c.

RICOCHET. The employment of the bounding staccato—staccato à ricochet—is thus indicated in violin music. As the best examples of this bowing are to be found in the works of the French and Belgian composers, it is probable that it owes its invention to the father of virtuosity—Paganini. The same system which governs the flying staccato—so brilliantly applied by Paganini, de Bériot, Wieniawski, Vieuxtemps and latter-day virtuosos to the execution of swift chromatic passages—dominates the ricochet, but being thrown upon the strings less rapidly, and with more force, the effect is heavier. To accomplish this style of bowing neatly, the stick should be held so that the full breadth of the hair at the upper part shall fall upon the strings accurately. The wrist must remain flexible, while the fingers grip the bow firmly and relax to allow the bow to rebound. Two graceful examples of the application of the ricochet are to be found in the Bolero of de Bériot's 'Scène de ballet,' and in the Polonaise of Vieuxtemps's 'Ballade et Polonaise.'

O. R.

RICORDI, (1) GIOVANNI (b. Milan, 1785; d. there, Mar. 15, 1853), founder of the well-known music-publishing house in Milan. He made his first hit with the score of Mosca's 'Pretendenti delusi.' Since that time the firm has published for all the great Italian maestri, down to Verdi and Boito, and has added to them a large catalogue of modern works of all classes. The Gazzetta musicale, edited with great success by Mazzucato, had much influence on its prosperity. It possesses the whole of the original scores of the operas it has published—a most interesting collection. Giovanni's son and successor, (2) TITO (b. Oct. 29, 1811; d. Sept. 7, 1888), further enlarged the business. His son, (3) GIULIO DI TITO (b. Dec. 19, 1840; d. June 6, 1912), was a practised writer, a skilled draughtsman, a composer of drawing-room music, under the pseudonym of Burgmein, and in all respects a thoroughly cultivated man. On his death the firm came under the management of Dr. Carlo Clausetti, with whom Renzo Valcarengi became associated in 1919. (See PERIODICALS.)

F. G., with addns.

RIDDELL (RIDDLE), JOHN (b. Ayr, Sept. 2, 1718; d. Apr. 5, 1795), composer of Scottish dance music. It is stated in 'The Ballads and Songs of Ayrshire,' 1846, that Riddell was blind from infancy, also that he was composer of the well-known tune 'Jenny's Bawbee.' This latter statement is not authenticated. Burns mentions him as 'a bard-born genius,' and says he is composer of 'this most beautiful tune' ('Finlayston House').

Riddell published about 1766 his first 'Collection of Scots Reels, or Country Dances, and Minuets,' and a second edition of it, in oblong folio, in 1782. F. K.

RIDDELL, ROBERT (d. Friars' Carse, Apr. 21, 1794), a Scottish antiquary, and friend of Robert Burns. He was an army (or Volunteer) captain, and resided on the family estate Glenriddell, Dumfriesshire. He was an amateur composer of Scottish dance music, and wrote the music to one or two of Burns's songs. His most interesting publication (1794) is 'A Collection of Scotch, Galwegian, and Border Tunes . . . selected by Robert Riddell of Glenriddell, Esq.,' folio. F. K.

RIDOTTO, see REDOUTE.

RIEDEL, CARL (b. Kronenberg, Rhine provinces, Oct. 6, 1827; d. Leipzig, June 3, 1888). Though always musically inclined he was educated for trade, and was at Lyons in the silk business until 1848, when he determined to devote himself to music as a profession. He returned home and at once began serious study under the direction of Carl Wilhelm, then an obscure musician at Crefeld, but destined to be widely known as the author of 'Die Wacht am Rhein.' Late in 1849 Riedel entered the Leipzig Conservatorium, where he made great progress under Moscheles, Hauptmann, Becker and Plaidy. He practised and performed in a private society at Leipzig Astorga's Stabat, Palestrina's 'Impropria' and Leo's Miserere, and this led him to found a singing society of his own, which began on May 17, 1854, with a simple quartet of male voices, and was the foundation of the famous Association which, under the name of the 'Riedelsche Verein,' became celebrated in Leipzig. The first public concert was held in Nov. 1855, and its first great achievement was a performance of Bach's B minor Mass, Apr. 10, 1859. In the list of the works performed by the Verein we find Beethoven's Mass in D, Kiel's 'Christus,' Berlioz's 'Messe des morts,' and Liszt's 'Graner Messe' and 'St. Elizabeth.' Riedel was one of the founders of the 'Beethovenstiftung,' and an earnest supporter of the Wagner performances at Bayreuth in 1876. His own compositions are chiefly partsongs for men's voices, but he edited several important ancient works by Praetorius, Franck, Eccard and other old German writers, especially a 'Passion' by Heinrich Schütz, for which he selected the best portions of four Passions by that master—a proceeding certainly deserving all that can be said against it. G.

RIEDER, AMBROSIO (b. Döbling, near Vienna, Oct. 10, 1771; d. Perchtoldsdorf, near Vienna, Nov. 19, 1855), was 'regens chori' at the time of his death. He was a pupil of Albrechtsberger, and a prolific composer, credited with having written 427 works, including masses and other church music, chamber music and numerous organ fugues, preludes, etc. His 'Ecce panis' is still in use in the Feast of Corpus Christi. He also wrote instruction books for thorough-bass playing, improvising and fugal playing. Rieder was a friend of Schubert's brother, Ferdinand, and of S. Sechter (Riemann; Q.-L.).

RIEMANN, KARL WILHELM JULIUS HUGO (b. Grossmehlra, near Sondershausen, July 18, 1849; d. Leipzig, July 10, 1919), one of the most famous of German musical historians in the 19th century, studied law, etc., at Berlin and Tübingen. He saw active service in the Franco-German war, and afterwards devoted his life to music, studying in the Leipzig Conservatorium.

After some years' residence at Bielefeld as a teacher, he was appointed to the post of 'Privatdozent' in the University of Leipzig, which he held from 1878-80, going thence to Bromberg; in 1881-90 he was teacher of the piano and theory in the Hamburg Conservatorium, and subsequently (after a three months' stay at the Conservatorium of Sondershausen) was given a post at the Conservatorium of Wiesbaden (1890-95). In the latter year he returned to Leipzig, as a lecturer in the University, and in 1901 was appointed professor.

Riemann was amazingly active as a writer on every branch of musical knowledge, but his work was as thorough as if it had been small in extent. First in public importance among his works stands the Musiklexikon (1882), which attained to eight editions during his life (see DICTIONARIES OF MUSIC), and beside it may be mentioned the useful Opernhandbuch (1884-93) and the Handbuch der Musikgeschichte (see list below). On the teaching of harmony, on musical phrasing and the peculiarities of notation required for explaining his system to students, he strongly supported various innovations, most of them due to his own inventive faculty. As a practical illustration of his excellent method of teaching the art of phrasing, his editions of classical and romantic pianoforte music, called 'Phrasierungsausgaben,' may be mentioned. He edited many masterpieces of ancient music, notably in several volumes of the second series (Bayern) of D.D.T. (q.v.). His original compositions—for he found time to write music as well as musical literature—are numerous but not very important, being mainly of an educational kind.

RIEMSDIJK, J. C. M. VAN (b. 1843; d. Utrecht, June 30, 1895), was a member of an aristocratic family, and an enthusiastic amateur musician. He was a cultivated scholar, and devoted himself to editing the old songs of the Netherlands with marked success. He became Technical Director of the State railway. His house was always open to any artists, and his welcome was always ready for those who followed music as a profession.

He was chairman of the 'Vereeniging voor N.-Nederlands Musikgeschiedenis' (Society of Musical History in the North Netherlands), in which capacity he doubtless had many facilities for collecting old Netherland Folk-Songs, of which he availed himself in the most able manner. His works are as follows:

1881. State Music School of Utrecht, 1631-1881 (a complete history of the Art of Music in the Netherlands between those dates).
 *1882. Netherland Dance arrangements (for FF duet).
 1888. The two first music books of Thijssen Susato (c. 1545), a collection of Netherland Folk-Songs of the 16th century.
 *1888. Hortus Musicus of J. A. Reinken (1625-1722) for two violins, viola and bass (translated into Dutch).
 *1890. Twenty-four Songs of the 15th and 16th centuries with FF accompaniment.
 1896. Folk-song book of the Netherlands (gosthumous).

The works marked thus * are among the publications of the Vereeniging voor N.-Nederlands Musikgeschiedenis.

D. H.

RIENZI, DER LETZTE DER TRIBUNEN (the last of the Tribunes), opera in 5 acts; words founded on Bulwer's novel; music by Wagner. Produced Dresden, Oct. 20, 1842; in French (Nuitter and Guillaume), Théâtre-Lyrique, Apr. 16, 1869; New York, Academy of Music, 1878; in English, Her Majesty's Theatre (Carl Rosa), Jan. 27, 1879.

G.

RIEPEL, JOSEPH (b. Horschlag, Austria, 1708; d. Ratisbon, Oct. 23, 1782), Kapellmeister to the Prince Thurn and Taxis. He composed church music, operas, concertos and chamber music, which remained mostly in MS. His theoretical works, which were all published, enjoyed a great reputation as works of sterling value. A list of these is given in Q.-L. and Riemann.

RIES. A distinguished family of musicians.

(1) JOHANN (b. Benzheim on the Rhine, 1723; d. Cologne, 1784) was appointed court trumpeter to the Elector of Cologne at Bonn, with a salary of 192 thalers, May 2, 1747, and violinist in the chapel, Mar. 5, 1754.

On Apr. 27, 1764, his daughter (2) ANNA MARIA was appointed singer. In 1774 she married Ferdinand Drewer, violinist in the band, and remained first soprano till the break-up in 1794.

Her brother (3) FRANZ ANTON (b. Bonn, Nov. 10, 1755; d. Nov. 1, 1846) was an infant phenomenon on the violin; learned from J. P. Salomon; and was able to take his father's place in the orchestra at the age of 11. His salary began when he was 19, at 25 thalers a year; he occupied the post until 1774. In 1779 he visited Vienna, and made a great success as a solo and quartet player. But he elected to remain, on poor pay, in Bonn, and was rewarded by having Beethoven as his pupil and friend. On Mar. 2, 1779, he petitioned the Elector Maximilian for a post, and received it on May 2. During the poverty of the Beethoven family, and through the misery caused by the death of Ludwig's mother in 1787, Franz Ries stood by them like a real friend. In 1794 the French arrived, and the Elector's establishment was broken up. Some of the members of the band dispersed, but Ries remained, and documents are preserved which show that after the passing away of the invasion he was to have been court-musician.¹ Events, however, were otherwise ordered; he remained in Bonn, and at Godesberg, where he had a little house, till his death; held various small offices, culminating in the Bonn city government in 1800, taught the violin, and brought up his children well. He assisted Wegeler in his Notices of Beethoven, was present at the unveiling of Beethoven's statue in 1845, had a Doctor's degree and the Order of the Red Eagle conferred on him.

Franz's son (4) FERDINAND (b. Bonn, Nov.² 1784; d. Aix-la-Chapelle, Jan. 13, 1838), who with the Archduke Rudolph enjoys the distinction of being Beethoven's pupil, was brought up from his cradle to music. His father taught him the pianoforte and violin, and B. Romberg the violoncello. In his childhood he lost an eye through small-pox. After the break-up of the Elector's band he remained three years at home, working very hard at theoretical and practical music, scoring the quartets of Haydn and Mozart, and arranging the 'Creation,' the 'Seasons' and the Requiem with such ability that they were all three published by Simrock.

In 1801 he went to Munich to study under Winter, in a larger field than he could command at home. Here he was so badly off as to be driven to copy music at 3d. a sheet. But poor as his income was he lived within it, and when after a few months Winter left Munich for Paris Ries had saved seven ducats. With this he went to Vienna in Oct. 1801, taking a letter from his father to Beethoven. Beethoven received him well, and when he had read the letter said, 'I can't answer it now; but write and tell him that I have not forgotten the time when my mother died'; and, knowing how miserably poor the lad was, he on several occasions gave him money unasked, for which he would accept no return. The next three years Ries spent in Vienna. Beethoven took a great deal of pains with his pianoforte-playing, but would teach him nothing else. He, however, prevailed on Albrechtsberger to take him as a pupil in composition. The lessons cost a ducat each; Ries had in some way saved up twenty-eight ducats, and therefore had twenty-eight lessons. Beethoven also got him an appointment as pianist to Count Browne, the Russian chargé d'affaires, and at another time to Count Lichnowsky. The pay for those services was probably not over-abundant, but it kept him, and the position gave him access to the best musical society. As to Ries's relations with Beethoven see BEETHOVEN, Vol. I. p. 283; they are fully laid open in Ries's own invaluable notices. He had a great deal to bear, and, considering the secrecy and imperiousness which Beethoven often threw into his intercourse with every one, there was probably much unpleasantness in the relationship. Meantime Ries must have become saturated with the music of his great master; a thing which could hardly tend to foster any little originality he may ever have possessed.

As a citizen of Bonn he was amenable to the French conscription, and in 1805 was summoned to appear there in person. He left in Sept. 1805, made the journey on foot via Prague, Dresden and Leipzig, reached Coblenz within the prescribed limit of time, and was then dismissed on account of the loss of his eye. He then went on to Paris, and existed in misery for apparently at least two years, at the end of which time he was advised to try Russia. On Aug. 27, 1808, he was again in Vienna, and soon afterwards received from Reichardt an offer of the post of Kapellmeister to Jerome Bonaparte, King of Westphalia, at Cassel, which Reichardt alleged had been refused by Beethoven. Ries behaved with perfect loyalty and straightforwardness in the matter. Before replying, he endeavoured to find out from Beethoven himself the real state of the case; but Beethoven, having adopted the idea that Ries was trying to get the post over his head, would not see him, and for three weeks behaved to him with an incredible degree of cruelty and insolence. When he could be made to listen to the facts he was sorry enough, but the opportunity was gone.

The occupation of Vienna (May 12, 1809) by the French was not favourable to artistic life. Ries, however, as a French subject, was free to wander. He accordingly went to Cassel, possibly with some lingering hopes, played at court, and remained till the end of Feb. 1810, very much applauded and fêted, and making money—but had no offer of a post. From Cassel he went by Hamburg and Copenhagen to Stockholm, where we find him in Sept. 1810, making both money and reputation. He had still his eye on Russia, but between Stockholm and St. Petersburg the ship was taken by an English man-of-war, and all the passengers were turned out upon an island in the Baltic. In St. Petersburg he found Bernhard Romberg, and the two made a successful tour, embracing places as wide apart as Kiev, Reval and Riga. The burning of Moscow (Sept. 1812) put a stop to his progress in that direction, and we next find him again at Stockholm in Apr. 1813, en route for England. By the end of the month he was in London.

Here he found his countryman and his father's friend, Salomon, who received him cordially and introduced him to the Philharmonic Concerts. His first appearance there was Mar. 14, 1814, in his own PF. Sextet. His symphonies, overtures and chamber works frequently occur in the programmes, and he himself appears from time to time as a PF. player, but rarely if ever with works of Beethoven. Shortly after his arrival he married an English lady of great attractions, and he remained in London till 1824, one of the most conspicuous figures of the musical world. 'Mr. Ries,' says a writer in the Harmonicon of Mar. 1824,

'is justly celebrated as one of the finest pianoforte performers of the day; his hand is powerful and his execution certain, often surprising; but his playing is most distinguished from that of all others by its romantic wildness.'

His sojourn here was a time of herculean labour. His compositions numbered at their close nearly 180, including 6 fine symphonies; 4 overtures; 6 string quintets, and 14 do. quartets; 9 concertos for PF. and orchestra; an octet, a septet, 2 sextets and a quintet, for various instruments; 3 PF. quartets and 5 do. trios; 20 duets for PF. and violin; 10 sonatas for PF. solo; besides a vast number of rondos, variations, fantasias, etc., for the PF. solo and duet. Of these 38 are attributable to the time of his residence here, and they embrace 2 symphonies, 4 concertos, a sonata and many smaller pieces. As a pianist and teacher he was very much in request. He was an active member of the Philharmonic Society. His correspondence with Beethoven during the whole period is highly creditable to him, proving his gratitude towards his master, and the energy with which he laboured to promote Beethoven's interests. That Beethoven profited so little therefrom was no fault of Ries's.

Having accumulated a fortune adequate to the demands of a life of comfort, he gave a farewell concert in London, Apr. 8, 1824, and removed with his wife to Godesberg, near his native town, where he had purchased a property. Though a loser by the failure of a London bank in 1825-26, he was able to live independently. About 1830 he removed to Frankfort. His residence on the Rhine brought him into close contact with the Lower Rhine Festivals, and he directed the performances of the years 1825, 1829, 1830, 1832, 1834 and 1837, as well as those of 1826 and 1828 in conjunction with Spohr and Klein respectively. In 1834 he was appointed head of the town orchestra and Singakademie at Aix-la-Chapelle. But he was too independent to keep any post, and in 1836 he gave this up and returned to Frankfort. In 1837 he assumed the direction of the Cecilian Society there on the death of Schellble, but this lasted a few months only, for on Jan. 13, 1838, he died after a short illness.

The principal works which he composed after his return to Germany are 'Die Rauberbraut,' which was first performed in Frankfort probably in 1829, then in Leipzig, July 4, and London, July 15, of the same year, and often afterwards in Germany; another opera, known in Germany as 'Liska,' but produced at the Adelphi, London, in English, as 'The Sorcerer,' by Arnold's company, Aug. 4, 1831, and a third, 'Eine Nacht auf dem Libanon'; an oratorio, 'Der Sieg des Glaubens' (The Triumph of the Faith), apparently performed in Dublin for the first time in 1831¹ and then at Berlin, 1835; and a second oratorio, 'Die Könige Israels' (The Kings of Israel), Aix-la-Chapelle, 1837. He also wrote much chamber music and six symphonies. All these works, however, are dead. Beethoven once said of his compositions, 'he imitates me too much.' He caught the style and the phrases, but he could not catch the immortality of his master's work. One work of his will live—the admirable Biographical Notices of Ludwig van Beethoven, which he published in conjunction with Dr. Wegeler (Coblenz, 1838). The two writers, though publishing together, have fortunately kept their contributions quite distinct; Ries's occupies from pp. 76 to 163 of a little duodecimo volume, and of these the last thirty-five pages are occupied by Beethoven's letters. The work is translated into French by L^e

(5) PIETER JOSEPH (b. Bonn, Apr. 6, 1791; d. London, Apr. 6, 1882), a brother and devoted admirer of FERDINAND, whose compositions were cherished by him until death, when they passed into the care of A. J. Hipkins, who later restored them to the Ries family.

Ries was also a musician, but his active life was spent partly in the Broadwood House as the foreign correspondent; and earlier with the East India Company during the period of Charles Lamb.¹ Although a busy man, he gave his spare time either to teaching or playing music, and also to finding a ready market for the eau de Cologne of his countrymen and friends the Farinas.

He was a staunch Roman Catholic and a good friend. He did not marry. Young as he was in the bitter winter of 1794, he well remembered the advent of the French, and of the soldiers billeted on his father's crowded home, and of their helpfulness in fetching water, in chopping wood, and in amusing the children; perhaps, most of all, Napoleon, and the compelling glance of his eyes. E. J. H*.

(6) HUBERT (b. Bonn, Apr. 1, 1802; d. Berlin, Sept. 14, 1886), youngest brother of Ferdinand, made his first studies as a violinist under his father, and afterwards under Spohr. Hauptmann was his teacher in composition. From 1824 he lived at Berlin. In that year he entered the band of the Konigstadt Theatre, Berlin, and in the following year became a member of the royal band. In 1835 he was appointed director of the Philharmonic Society at Berlin. In 1836 he was nominated Konzertmeister, and in 1839 elected a member of the Royal Academy of Arts. In 1851 he became a teacher at the Kgl. Theaterinstrumentalschule, from which he retired with a pension in 1872. A thorough musician and a solid violinist, he was held in great esteem as a leader, and more especially as a methodical and conscientious teacher. His Violin-School for beginners is a very meritorious work, eminently practical and widely used. He published two violin-concertos, studies and duets for violins, and some quartets. An English edition of the Violin-School appeared in 1873 (Hofmeister). Three of his sons gained reputation as musicians:

(7) LOUIS (b. Berlin, Jan. 30, 1830; d. London, Oct. 3, 1913), violinist, pupil of his father and of Vieuxtemps, settled in 1853 in London, where he enjoyed deserved reputation as violinist and teacher. He was a member of the Quartet of the Musical Union from 1855-

1870, and held the second violin at the Monday Popular Concerts from their beginning in 1859 until his retirement in 1897.

(8) ADOLPH (b. Berlin, Dec. 20, 1837; d. Apr. 1899), pianist, was a pupil of Kullak for the piano, and of Boehmer for composition, and lived in London as a pianoforte teacher. He published a number of compositions for the piano, and some songs.

(9) FRANZ (b. Berlin, Apr. 7, 1846), the youngest son of Hubert (6), studied the violin with his father and with Massart and Vieuxtemps in Paris. In 1870 he visited London, appearing at the Crystal Palace. His promising career as a violinist had to be abandoned owing to nerve trouble, and he went into business (Ries und Erler) in Berlin. His compositions include orchestral and chamber works. He edited the sonatas of Corolli and instrumented works of Schumann, etc.

RIETER-BIEDERMANN, an eminent German firm of music-publishers. The founder was JACOB MELCHIOR RIETER-BIEDERMANN (b. May 14, 1811; d. Jan. 25, 1876), who in June 1849 opened a retail business and lending-library at Winterthur. Since the first work was published in 1856, the business continually improved and increased. In 1862 a publishing branch was opened at Leipzig, which eventually became the headquarters of the firm. In 1917 it was acquired by Peters. The stock catalogue of the firm included music by Berlioz, Brahms (PF. concerto, PF. quintet, 'Requiem,' 'Magelone-Lieder,' etc.); A. Dietrich; J. O. Grimm; Gernsheim; von Herzogenberg; F. Hiller; Holstein; Kirchner; Lachner; F. Marschner; Mendelssohn (op. 98, Nos. 2, 3; opp. 103, 105, 106, 108, 115, 116); Raff; Reinecke; Schumann (opp. 130, 137, 138, 140, 142); etc. G.

RIETI, VITTORIO (b. Alexandria, Jan. 28, 1898), composer, of Italian parentage and up bringing, had some teaching from G. Frugatta at Milan and O. Respighi at Rome. He is reported to have destroyed all his compositions written before 1920. Since then works by him have been produced at the festivals of the International Society for Contemporary Music, namely, a concerto for wind with orchestra (Prague, 1924), a suite from a ballet, 'Noah's Ark' (Prague, 1925), and a transcription for modern performance of a 'Sonata' by Monteverdi (Venice, 1925). His ballet 'Barabau' was produced by Diaghilev in London (Coliseum, Dec. 11, 1925). C.

RIETZ (originally RITZ²), (1) EDUARD (b. Berlin, Oct. 17, 1802; d. Jan. 23, 1832), the elder brother of Julius Rietz, an excellent violinist, studied first under his father, a member of the royal band, and afterwards, for some time, under Rode. He died too young to acquire more than a local reputation, but Mendelssohn had the highest possible opinion of his powers as an executant.¹ It was for Rietz that he wrote the octet which is dedicated to him, as well as the sonata for PF. and violin, op. 4. For some years Rietz was a member of the royal band, but as his health failed him in 1824 he had to quit his appointment and even to give up playing. He founded and conducted an orchestral society at Berlin, with considerable success; he died of consumption. Mendelssohn's earlier letters teem with affectionate references to him, and the news of his death affected him deeply.² The Andante in Mendelssohn's string quintet, op. 18, was composed at Paris 'in memory of E. Ritz,' and is dated on the autograph 'Jan. 23, 1832,' and entitled 'Nachruf.'

(2) JULIUS (b. Berlin, Dec. 23, 1812; d. Dresden, Sept. 12, 1877), younger brother of the preceding, violoncellist, composer and eminent conductor. Brought up under the influence of his father and brother, and the intimate friend of Mendelssohn, he received his first instruction on the violoncello from Schmidt, a member of the royal band, and afterwards from Bernhard Romberg and Moritz Ganz. Zelter was his teacher in composition. He obtained, at the age of 16, an appointment in the band of the Königsstadt Theater, where he also achieved his first success as a composer by writing incidental music for Holtei's drama, 'Lorbeerbaum und Bettelstab.' In 1834 he went to Düsseldorf as second conductor of the opera. Mendelssohn, who up to his death showed a warm interest in Rietz, was at that time at the head of the opera, and on his resignation in the summer of 1835, Rietz became his successor. He did not, however, remain long in that position, for, as early as 1836, he accepted, under the title of 'Städtischer Musikdirector,' the post of conductor of the public subscription concerts, the principal choral society, and the church-music at Düsseldorf. In this position he remained for twelve years. During this period he wrote some of his most successful works—incidental music to dramas of Goethe, Calderon, Immermann and others; music for Goethe's Liederspiel 'Jery und Bätely,' his first symphony in G minor; three overtures—'Hero and Leander,'³ concert overture in A major, Lustspiel-overture, the 'Altdeutscher Schlachtgesang' and 'Dithyrambe'—both for men's voices and orchestra. He was six times chief conductor of the Lower Rhine Festivals—in 1845, 1856 and 1869 at Düsseldorf; in 1864, 1867 and 1873 at Aix.

In 1847, after Mendelssohn's death, he took leave of Düsseldorf, leaving Ferdinand Hiller as his successor, and went to Leipzig as conductor of the opera and the Singakademie. He gave up the post at the opera in 1854. From 1848 we find him also at the head of the Gewandhaus orchestra, and teacher of composition at the Conservatorium. In this position he remained for thirteen years. Two operas, 'Der Corsar' and 'Georg Neumark,' were failures, but his symphony in E^b had a great and lasting success. At this period he began also to show his eminent critical powers by carefully revised editions of the scores of Mozart's symphonies and operas, of Beethoven's symphonies and overtures for Breitkopf & Härtel's complete edition, and by the work he did for the Bach and (German) Handel Societies. An edition of Mendelssohn's complete works closed his labours in this respect.

In 1860 the King of Saxony appointed him conductor of the Royal Opera and of the music at the Hofkirche at Dresden. He also accepted the post of Artistic Director of the Dresden Conservatorium. In 1874 the title of General-Musikdirector was given to him. The University of Leipzig had already in 1859 conferred on him the honorary degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

Rietz was for some time one of the most influential musicians of Germany. He was a good violoncellist, but soon after leaving Düsseldorf he gave up playing entirely. As a composer he showed a complete mastery of all technicalities, yet few of his works have shown any vitality. P. D.

RIGADOON (Fr. rigadon or rigaudon), a lively dance, which most probably came from Provence or Languedoc, although its popularity in England has caused some writers to suppose that it is of English origin. It was danced in France in the time of Louis XIII., but does not seem to have become popular in England until the end of the 17th century. According to Rousseau it derived its name from its inventor, one Rigaud, but others connect it with the English 'rig,' i.e. wanton or lively.

The Rigadon was remarkable for a peculiar jumping step (which is described at length in Compañ's Dictionnaire de la danse, Paris, 1802); this step survived the dance for some time. The music of the Rigadon is in 2-4 or C time, and consists of three or four parts, of which the third is quite short. The number of bars is unequal, and the music generally begins on the third or fourth beat of the bar. The following example is from the third part of Henry Playford's 'Apollo's Banquet' (sixth edition, 1690). The same tune occurs in 'The Dancing

RIGBY, GEORGE VERNON (b. Birmingham, Jan. 21, 1840), tenor singer, first appeared in London (Mar. 4, 1861) at the Alhambra, Leicester Square (then a concert room, managed by E. T. Smith), and in Aug. following at Mellon's Promenade Concerts at Covent Garden. In 1865 he sang in the provinces as a member of H. Corri's Opera Company, until November, when he went to Italy and studied under Sangiovanni at Milan, where, in Nov. 1866, he appeared at the Carcano Theatre as the Fisherman in 'Guglielmo Tell.' He next went to Berlin, and in Jan. 1867 appeared at the Victoria Theatre there, in the principal tenor parts in 'Don Pasquale,' 'La sonnambula' and 'L'Italiana in Algieri.' He then accepted a three months' engagement in Denmark, and performed Almaviva in the 'Barbiere,' the Duke in 'Rigoletto' and other parts, in Copenhagen and other towns. He returned to England in Sept. 1867, sang the part of Samson (Handel) at the Gloucester Festival (1868) in place of Sims Reeves, and was immediately engaged by the Sacred Harmonic Society, where he appeared, Nov. 27, 1868, with signal success. In 1869 he appeared on the stage of the Princess's Theatre as Acis in Handel's 'Acis and Galatea.'

RIGHINI, VINCENZO (b. Bologna, Jan. 22, 1756; d. there, Aug. 19, 1812), composer, singer and conductor.

As a boy he was a chorister at San Petronio and had a fine voice, but owing to injury it developed into a tenor of so rough and muffled a tone, that he turned his attention to theory, which he studied with Padre Martini. In 1776 he sang for a short time in the Opera Buffa at Prague, then under Bustelli's direction, but was not well received. He made a success there, however, with three operas of his composition, 'La vedova scaltra,' 'La bottega del caffè' and 'Don Giovanni,' also performed in Vienna (Aug. 1777), whither Righini went on leaving Prague in 1780. There he became singing-master to Princess Elisabeth of Württemberg, and conductor of the Italian opera. He next entered the service of the Elector of Mainz (1788-92) and composed for the Elector of Treves 'Alcide al Bivio' (Coblenz) and a missa solennis (1790). In April 1793 (owing to the success of his 'Enea nel Lazio') he was invited to succeed Alessandri at the Italian Opera of Berlin, with a salary of 3000 thalers (about £450). Here he produced 'Il trionfo d'Arianna' (1793), 'Armida' (1799), 'Tigrano' (1800), 'Gerusalemme liberata' and 'La selva incantata' (1802). The last two were published after his death with German text (Leipzig, Herklotz).

In 1793 Righini married Henriette Kneisel (b. Stettin, 1767; d. Berlin, Jan. 25, 1801), a charming blonde, and according to Gerber, a singer of great expression. She died of consumption. After the death of Friedrich Wilhelm II. (1797) his post became almost a sinecure, and in 1806 the opera was entirely discontinued. As a composer his best point was his feeling for ensemble, of which the quartet in 'Gerusalemme' is a good example. He was a successful teacher of singing, and counted distinguished artists among his pupils. After the loss of a promising son in 1810, his health gave way, and in 1812 he was ordered to try the effects of his native air at Bologna. His own Requiem (score in the Berlin Library) was performed by the Singakademie in his honour.

Besides 20 operas, of which a list is given by Fétis (13 are mentioned in Q.-L. as still extant), Righini composed church music—a 'Te Deum' and a Missa Solennis were published—several cantatas, and innumerable scenes, Lieder and songs; also a short ballet, 'Minerva belebt die Statuen des Dädalus' (1802), and some instrumental pieces, including a serenade for two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons (1799, Breitkopf & Härtel). One of his operas, 'Il convitato di pietra, ossia il dissoluto,' will always be interesting as a forerunner of Mozart's 'Don Giovanni.' It was produced at Vienna, Aug. 21, 1777 (ten years before Mozart's), and is described by Jahn (Mozart, ii. 333). His best orchestral work is his overture to 'Tigrano,' which was often played in Germany and England. Breitkopf & Härtel's Catalogue shows a tolerably long list of his songs, and his exercises for the voice (1804) are amongst the best that exist. English amateurs will find a duet of his, 'Come opprima,' from 'Enea nel Lazio,' in the 'Musical Library,' vol. i. p. 8, and two airs in Lonsdale's 'Gemme d' antichità.' He was one of the sixty-three composers who set the words 'In questa tomba oscura,' and his setting was published in 1878 by Ritter of Magdeburg.

RIGOLETTO, opera in 3 acts; libretto by Flave (founded on V. Hugo's Le Roi s'amuse); music by Verdi. Produced Teatro Fenice, Venice, Mar. 11, 1851; in Italian, Covent Garden, May 14, 1853, and Italiens, Paris, Jan. 19, 1857; New York, Academy of Music; Nov. 4, 1857. G.

RILLÉ, FRANÇOIS ANATOLE LAURENT DE (b. Orleans, 1828; d. Paris, Aug. 26, 1915), the composer of an enormous number of partsongs and other small choral works. He was at first intended to be a painter, but altered his purpose and studied music under an Italian named Comoglio, and subsequently under Elwart. His compositions, of which a list of the most important is given in the supplement to Fétis, have enjoyed a lasting popularity with 'orphéoniste' societies, and have that kind of vigorous effectiveness which is exactly suited to their purpose. A large number of operettas of very slight construction have from time to time been produced in Paris, and the composer has made various more or less successful essays in the department of church music. M.

RIMBAULT, EDWARD FRANCIS, LL.D. (b. Soho, June 13, 1816; d. Sept. 26, 1876), son of Stephen Francis Rimbault, organist of St. Giles in the Fields, received his first instruction in music from his father, but afterwards became a pupil of Samuel Wesley. At 16 years old he was appointed organist of the Swiss church, Soho.

He early directed his attention to the study of musical history and literature, and in 1838 delivered a series of lectures on the history of music in England. In 1840 he took an active part in the formation of the Musical Antiquarian and Percy Societies, of both which he became secretary, and for both which he edited several works.¹ In 1841 he was editor of the musical publications of the Motet Society. In the course of the next few years he edited a collection of Cathedral Chants; 'The Order of Daily Service according to the use of Westminster Abbey'; a reprint of Lowe's Short Direction for the performance of Cathedral Service; Tallis's Responses; Merbecke's 'Book of Common Prayer Noted'; a volume of unpublished Cathedral Services; Arnold's Cathedral Music; and the oratorios of 'Messiah,' 'Samson' and 'Saul,' for the Handel Society. In 1842 he was elected F.S.A. and member of the Academy of Music in Stockholm, and obtained the degree of Doctor in Philosophy. He was offered, but declined, the appointment of professor of music in Harvard University, U.S.A. In 1848 he received the honorary degree of LL.D. from the University of Oxford. He lectured on music at the Collegiate Institution, Liverpool; the Philosophie Institute, Edinburgh; the Royal Institution of Great Britain, and elsewhere. He published The Organ, its History and Construction (1855) (in collaboration with E. J. Hopkins); Notices of the Early English Organ Builders (1865); History of the Pianoforte (1860); Bibliotheca madrigaliana (1847); Musical Illustrations of Percy's Reliques; The Ancient Vocal Music of England; The Rounds, Catches and Canons of England (in conjunction with Rev. J. P. Metcalfe); two collections of Christmas Carols; 'A Little Book of Songs and Ballads,' etc., etc. He edited North's Memoirs of Musick (1846). Sir Thomas Overbury's Works (1856), the Old Cheque Book of the Chapel Royal (1872), and two Sermons by Boy Bishops. He arranged many operas and other works, was author of many elementary books, and an extensive contributor to periodical literature. His compositions were but few, the principal being an operetta, 'The Fair Maid of Islington' (1838), music to The Castle Spectre (1839), and a posthumous cantata, 'Country Life.' His pretty little song, 'Happy Land,' had an extensive popularity. After his resignation of the organistship of the Swiss church, he was successively organist of several churches and chapels, such as St. Peter's, Vere Street. He died, after a lingering illness, and was buried at Highgate Cemetery, leaving a fine musical library, which was sold by auction at Sotheby's on July 3, 1877, and following days. See an account of the library in the Musical World, 1877, p. 539. An obituary notice appeared in the Mus. T., 1877, p. 427, and other papers. The most complete list of his works is in *Brit. Mus. RIMSKY-KORSAKOV, NICHOLAS ANDREIEVICH (b. Tikhvin, Government of Novgorod, Mar. 18,² 1844; d. St. Petersburg, June 21, 1908), one of the most brilliant of the Russian Nationalist group of composers.

The child's earliest musical impressions were derived from a small band, consisting of four Jews employed upon the family estate. These musicians mustered two violins, cymbals and a tambourine, and were often summoned to the house to enliven the evenings when there was company or dancing. At 6 years old the boy began to be taught the piano, and at 9 he made his first attempts at composition. His talent for music was evident to his parents, but being of aristocratic family he was destined for one of the only two professions then considered suitable for a young man of good birth. In 1856 Rimsky-Korsakov entered the Naval College in St. Petersburg, where he remained until 1862. This period of his life was not very favourable to his musical development, but he managed on Sundays and holidays to receive some instruction in the violoncello from Ulich, and in the pianoforte from an excellent teacher, Fedor Kanillé. His acquaintance with

Intercourse with the young but capable leader of the new Russian school of music, and with his disciples, Cui, Moussorgsky and Borodin, awoke in the young naval cadet an ambition to study the art to more serious purpose. He had only just begun to profit by Balakirev's teaching when he was sent abroad; but, undaunted by the interruption, during this cruise, which lasted three years (1862-65), he completed a symphony, op. 1. From the letters which he wrote at this time to César Cui it is evident that he composed under great difficulties, but the work was completed in spite of them, and, movement by movement, the manuscript was sent to Balakirev for advice and correction. The symphony was performed for the first time in Dec. 1865, when Balakirev conducted it at one of the concerts of the Free School of Music, St. Petersburg. The public, who gave it a hearty reception, were surprised when a youth in naval uniform appeared to acknowledge their ovation. Rimsky-Korsakov now remained in St. Petersburg, and was able to renew his musical studies and his close association with the circle of Balakirev.

The compositions which followed the first symphony—the symphonic poem ‘Sadko’ (1867), and the opera ‘Pskovitianska’ (‘The Maid of Pskov’)—called the attention of all musical Russia to this promising composer. In 1871 he was appointed professor of composition and instrumentation in the St. Petersburg Conservatoire. He retired from the navy, which can never have been a congenial profession, in 1873, and at the wish of the Grand Duke Constantine Nikolaevich was appointed inspector of naval bands, a post which he held until it was abolished in 1884. From 1883-1884 he was assistant director to the court chapel under Balakirev. Succeeding to Balakirev, he became director and conductor of the Free School Concerts from 1874-81, and conducted the Russian Symphony Concerts, inaugurated in St. Petersburg by Belaiev, from 1886 to 1900. His gifts in this respect were highly appreciated in Paris and Brussels. Rimsky-Korsakov's career remained closely associated with St. Petersburg, which was the scene of his earliest successes, and on more than one occasion he declined the directorship of the Moscow Conservatoire. His pupils number some distinguished names: Liadov, Ippolitov-Ivanov, Sacchetti, Grechaninov and Glazounov all studied under him for longer or shorter periods. In 1873 Rimsky-Korsakov married Nadejda Nikolaevna Pourgold, a gifted pianist, who proved a helpmeet in the truest sense of the word. This lady and her sister, A. P. Molas, played important parts in the history of the modern Russian school; the former by her clever pianoforte arrangements of many of the great orchestral works, while the latter, gifted with a fine voice and dramatic instinct, created most of the leading female rôles in the operatic works of Cui, Moussorgsky and Borodin, before they obtained a hearing at the Imperial Opera.

ORCHESTRAL WORKS.—Rimsky-Korsakov had already composed his symphonic works ‘Sadko’ and ‘Antar,’ and his opera ‘Pskovitianska,’ and had been appointed professor at the St. Petersburg Conservatoire, when his ‘ideal conscientiousness’ awoke in him some doubts as to the solidity of his early musical education. Admirably as the system of self-education had worked in his case, he still felt it a duty to undergo a severe course of theoretical study in order to have at his disposal that supreme mastery of technical means in which all the great classical masters excelled. Accordingly he began to work at fugue and counterpoint, thereby calling forth from Tchaikovsky, in 1875, this tribute of admiration: ‘I do not know how to express all my respect for your artistic temperament. . . . I am a mere artisan in music, but you will be an artist in the fullest sense of the word.’ Most of Rimsky-Korsakov's early works were revised after this period of artistic discipline. In the earlier phases of his career he was obviously influenced by Glinka and Liszt, and in a lesser degree by Schumann and Berlioz. The imitative period was, however, of short duration, and perhaps no composer of his generation could boast a more individual and distinctive utterance than Rimsky-Korsakov. But its distinctiveness lies in extreme refinement and restraint rather than in violent and sensational expression. He wins but does not force our attention. A lover of musical beauty rather than musical truth—or, to put it more justly, believing truth to lie in idealistic rather than realistic methods of creation, he was never deeply influenced by the declamatory and naturalistic style of Dargomijsky and Moussorgsky. Like Tchaikovsky, he divided his career between operatic and symphonic music, but with a steadily increasing tendency towards the former. After his first symphony, written on more or less conventional lines, he showed a distinct preference for the freer forms of programme music, as shown in the symphonic poem ‘Sadko,’ the Oriental Suite ‘Antar,’ and the symphonic suite ‘Scheherezade.’ In the sinfonietta upon Russian themes, and the third symphony in C major, he returned to more traditional treatment. Almost without exception Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic works are distinguished by a poetic and tactful expression of national sentiment. His art was rooted in the Russian soil, and the national element pervades it like a subtle but unmistakable aroma.

His music invariably carries the charm of expressive orchestration. Taking it up where Glinka left it in his 'Jota Aragonesa' and incidental music to 'Prince Kholmisky,' Rimsky-Korsakov developed this characteristic quality of Russian musicians beyond any of his contemporaries, without, however, overstepping the bounds of what sane minds must still regard as legitimate effect. He was at his best in descriptive orchestration—in the suggestion of landscape and atmospheric conditions. But his clear objective outlook lead him to a luminous and definite tone-painting quite different from the subtle and dreamy impressionism of Debussy. The musical pictures of Rimsky-Korsakov are mostly riant and sunny; sometimes breezy and boisterous, as in the sea-music of 'Sadko' and 'Scheherazade'; often full of a quaint pastoral grace, as in the springtide music in his opera 'The Snow Maiden.' His harmony has freshness and individuality. He makes considerable use of the old church modes and Oriental scales.

OPERAS.—All Rimsky Korsakov's operas, except 'Mozart and Salieri,' are based upon national subjects, historical or legendary. Tales from the Slavonic mythology, which combine poetical allegory with fantastic humour, exercised the greatest attraction for him. In his first opera, 'The Maid of Pskov,' he evidently started under the partial influence of Dargomijsky's 'The Stone Guest,' for the solo parts consist chiefly of mezzo-recitative, the dryness of which is compensated by the orchestral colour freely employed in the accompaniments. In the two operas which followed, 'A Night in May' and 'The Snow Maiden,' the dramatic realism of his first work for the stage gives place to lyrical inspiration and the free flight of fancy. 'Mozart and Salieri'—a setting of Pushkin's dramatic duologue—and 'The Boyarina Vera Sheloga' show a return to the declamatory style, while 'Sadko,' which appeared in 1896, is a skilful compromise between lyrical and dramatic forms, and may be accepted as the mature expression of his artistic creed. Of all his operatic works, 'The Snow Maiden,' founded upon Ostrovsky's poetical legend of the springtide, has perhaps the most characteristic charm, but the last of his operas, 'The Golden Cockerel' ('Le Coq d'or') has through force of circumstances won peculiar favour outside Russia and particularly in England. 'Sadko,' the thematic material for which is partly drawn from the symphonic poem of the same name, is more epic in character and full of musical interest. It must be surmised that it is only the peculiarly national character of the libretto which has hindered this remarkable work from becoming more widely known. Most of Rimsky-Korsakov's operas combine with this strong national element that also of the neighbouring East.

SONGS.—As a song-writer Rimsky-Korsakov takes a high place in a school which has shown itself pre-eminent in this branch of art. He composed about eighty songs, remarkable for an all-round level of excellence, for few are really poor in quality, while the entire collection comprises such lyrical gems as 'Night,' the Hebrew song ('Awake, long since the dawn appeared'), 'A Southern night,' 'Spring,' and 'Come to the kingdom of roses and wine.' In his songs, as in his operas, he inclined more to the lyrical grace of Glinka than to the declamatory force of Dargomijsky. His melodies are not lacking in distinction and charm, especially when they approach in style to the melodies of the folk-songs; but in this respect he is somewhat lacking in impassioned inspiration and copious invention. The richness and picturesqueness of his accompaniments make the characteristic interest of his songs.

GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS.—A close study of the works of Rimsky-Korsakov reveals a distinguished musical personality; a thinker, a fastidious and exquisite craftsman, an artist of that refined and discriminating type who is chiefly concerned in satisfying the demands of his own conscience rather than the tastes of the general public. Outside Russia he was for a time censured for his exclusive devotion to national ideals. On the other hand, some Russian critics accused him of opening the door to Wagnerism in national opera. This was only true in so far as he grafted upon the older lyrical forms the use of some modern methods, notably the occasional employment of the leitmotif. As regards instrumentation he had a remarkable faculty for the invention of new and brilliant effects, and was a master in the skilful use of onomatopoeia. Given a temperament, musically endowed, which sees its subject with the direct and observant vision of the painter, instead of dreaming it through a mist of subjective exaltation, we get a type of mind that naturally tends to a programme which is clearly defined. Rimsky-Korsakov belonged to this class. We feel in all his music the desire to depict, which so often inclines us to the language of the studio in attempting to express the quality of his work. His music is entirely free from that tendency to melancholy unjustly supposed to be the characteristic of all Russian art. The folk-songs of Great Russia—the source from which the national composers have drawn their inspiration—are pretty evenly divided between the light and shade of life; it was the former aspect which made the strongest appeal to the vigorous, optimistic, but highly poetical temperament of this musician.

Many gifted members of the new Russian school were prevented by illness, by the enforced choice of a second vocation, and by the imperfect conditions of artistic life of their time, from acquiring a complete musical education. Rimsky-Korsakov, out of the fullness of his own technical equipment, was ever ready to sacrifice time and labour in the interest of his fellow-workers. Thus, he orchestrated 'The Stone Guest' which Dargomizky endeavoured to finish on his death-bed; part of Borodin's 'Prince Igor' and Moussorgsky's operas 'Khovantshina' and 'Boris Godounov'.

In 1889, during the Paris Exhibition, he conducted two concerts devoted to Russian music given in the Salle Trocadéro. In 1890 and again in 1900 he conducted concerts of Russian music in the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Brussels.

In Mar. 1905, in consequence of a letter published in the Russa, in which he advocated the autonomy of the St. Petersburg Conservatoire, hitherto under the management of the Imperial Russian Musical Society, and complained of the too stringent police supervision to which the students were subjected, Rimsky-Korsakov was dismissed from his professorship. This high-handed action on the part of the authorities was deeply resented by all his colleagues, and Glazounov, Liadov and Blumenfeld immediately resigned their posts by way of protest. By the autumn of the same year the Conservatoire had actually wrested some powers of self-government from the Musical Society, and having elected Glazounov as director, the new committee lost no time in reinstating Rimsky-Korsakov in the professorship of composition and instrumentation which he had honourably filled since 1871. The following is a list of Rimsky-Korsakov's numerous compositions:

RINALDO. (1) Handel's first opera in England; composed in a fortnight, and produced at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket, Feb. 24, 1711. The libretto was founded on the episode of Rinaldo and Armida in Tasso's Jerusalem Liberata (the same on which Gluck based his 'Armida'). Rossi wrote it in Italian, and it was translated into English by Aaron Hill.

(2) Cantata for male voices, set to Goethe's words, by Johannes Brahms (op. 50). First performed by the Akademisches Gesangsverein, Vienna, Feb. 28, 1868.

RINALDO DI CAPUA, an Italian composer of the 18th century. Burney made his acquaintance in Rome in 1770, and since he describes him as an old man we may suppose him to have been born about 1700-10. Fétié gives 1715 as the year of his birth, and Rudhardt 1706, but neither writer states his authority for the date. According to Burney he was 'the natural son of a person of very high rank in that country [i.e. the kingdom of Naples], and at first studied music only as an accomplishment; but being left by his father with only a small fortune, which was soon dissipated, he was forced to make it his profession.'

It has been assumed that he was born at Capua, and took his name from that place; but it may be noted that whether Rinaldo had a legitimate claim to it or not, Di Capua was a fairly common surname in the neighbourhood of Naples at that time. He composed his first opera at the age of 17, at Vienna, according to Burney; Spitta showed that no opera by Rinaldo was ever produced at Vienna, but thought it probable that he had some connexion with that city, since Metastasio's 'Ciro riconosciuto,' which formed the libretto of an opera by Rinaldo produced at Rome in 1737, was set to music for the first time by Caldara for performance at Vienna on Aug. 28, 1736. A further connexion with the imperial court is shown by the fact that he composed a special work to celebrate the election of Francis I. in 1745. It seems, therefore, not unreasonable to take Burney's words literally, and to understand that the opera 'Ciro riconosciuto,' though performed in Rome, was composed in Vienna. If this was his first opera, it would settle 1720 as the year of Rinaldo's birth. Spitta was, however, not aware of the existence of a few airs from a comic opera, the title of which has not been preserved, produced at the Teatro Valle in Rome in the autumn of 1737. Burney informs us that 'In the course of a long life he has experienced various vicissitudes of fortune; sometimes in vogue, sometimes neglected.'

Most of his operas were given at Rome, a few being produced at Florence and Venice; although described in some libretti as a Neapolitan, no opera of his is known to have been performed in Naples. The Bouffons Italiens performed an intermezzo of his, 'La zingara' (La Bohémienne), at Paris in 1753, in a version which included songs by other composers; among these was the well-known 'Tre giorni son che Nina,' generally ascribed to Pergolesi, and on this account attributed to Rinaldo by Spitta. The song has, however, been recently proved to be by another composer (see CIAMPI). When Burney knew him he was in somewhat impoverished circumstances, owing to the indifference of the public which had once applauded him. He had collected his works with a view to making provision for his old age, but at the moment when they were required discovered that his son had sold them for waste paper. Burney mentions an intermezzo composed for the Capranica theatre in 1770 ('I finti pazzi') when he was already an old man. Another opera, 'La donna vendicativa' (ascribed by Clément and Larousse to 1740, though on no apparent authority), was performed in Rome in 1771, and this was probably his last work. After this date we know only of 'La giocondina' (Rome, 1778), which was probably a revival of an earlier work. Burney, with characteristic kindness, recommended him as a teacher to William Parsons, who had studied at a Neapolitan conservatory, where according to his own account he learnt nothing. Parsons became Master of the King's Musick in 1786, to the great disappointment of Burney, to whom the post had been promised. Another pupil of Rinaldo was Antonio Aurisicchio.

Rinaldo was supposed to have been the inventor of accompanied recitative; Burney pointed out that this invention belonged to Alessandro Scarlatti. Rinaldo himself only claimed 'to have been among the first who introduced long ritornellos or symphonies into the recitatives of strong passion and distress, which express or imitate what it would be ridiculous for the voice to attempt.'

An example from 'Vologeso' is in the Fitzwilliam Museum. His musical education having been that of an amateur, his technique of composition was sometimes defective; but, apart from this slight weakness of harmony, he was one of the best composers of his period for dramatic power and melodic beauty. He was especially successful in brilliant coloratura, but was also capable of producing most attractive light operas. To judge from the few fragments of his work that remain, 'Ciro riconosciuto' and 'Vologeso' seem to have been his most important dramatic works.

RISPOSTA (Lat. comes; Eng. 'Answer'), the answer to the subject of a Fugue, or point of imitation. (See PROPOSTA; FUGUE.)

RIST, JOHANN (b. Ottensen, near Hamburg, Mar. 8, 1607; d. Wedel-on-Elbe, Aug. 31, 1667), preacher and church-councillor, was also a musician, and a poet of distinction. He was made poet-laureate by the Emperor in 1644, and raised to the rank of nobility in 1653. Rist was the founder of the Hamburg Lieder-school, on whose behalf he enlisted the interest of many of the best song composers of his time, who set to music his vast number of sacred and secular poems, of which he composed a fair number himself. In this way he exercised a considerable influence upon the evolution of the Lied as well as upon the musical taste of the people. Some of his hymns are still favourites throughout Germany (Q.-L.; Riemann).

RISTORI, GIOVANNI ALBERTO (b. Bologna, 1692; d. Dresden, Feb. 7, 1753), composer. He came to Dresden in 1715 with his father, the leader of an Italian theatrical company. In 1717 he became composer to the Royal Italian theatre in Dresden, and director of the Polish chapel; in 1733 he was private organist to the court (Kammerorganist); in 1750 he was appointed, with J. H. Hassc, as vice Kapellmeister. Ristori composed chiefly operas and church music. Of 17 known operas twelve manuscripts are in existence. A number of his manuscripts are in the Dresden State Library, including 3 oratorios, 15 masses, 3 Requiems, a beautiful Stabat Mater in C minor, dated 1730, numbers of motets and other church works. In the British Museum there is a soprano cantata, 'Verdi Colli.'

RITARDANDO, RITEMENTE, RITENUTO, see RALENTANDO.

RITORNELLO (abbrev. ritornel., ritor.; Fr. ritournelle). (1) An Italian word, literally signifying a little return or repetition; but more frequently applied, in a conventional sense, (a) to a short instrumental melody played between the scenes of an opera, or even during the action, either for the purpose of enforcing some particular dramatic effect or of amusing the audience during the time occupied in the preparation of some elaborate 'set-scene' (early instances are found in Peri's 'Euridice' and Monteverdi's 'Orfeo'); and (b) to the symphonies introduced between the vocal phrases of a song or anthem. The opera and church music of the 17th and 18th centuries affords innumerable instances of this latter use of the term.

(2) An ancient form of Italian verse, in which each strophe consists of three lines, the first and third of which rhyme with each other, after the manner of the Terza rima of Dante. Little folk-songs of this character are still popular, under the name of 'ritornelli' or 'stornelli,' among the peasants of the Abruzzi and other mountain regions of Italy.

RITTER, ALEXANDER (b. Narva, Russia, June 7, 1833; d. Munich, Apr. 12, 1896), of parents of German extraction, was a prominent figure in the circle of those who fought for Wagner's music, and for the advanced side of the art generally. He learnt the violin from Franz Schubert the Dresden teacher, and in 1849-51 was a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium. He married a niece of Richard Wagner, Franziska Wagner, an actress, in 1854, and went to live at Weimar in that year in the company of the earlier pupils and friends of Liszt. In 1856 he was made conductor at the town theatre of Stettin, and after several changes of residence and employment, settled at Würzburg in 1863, establishing a music-shop there which he managed from 1875-82, when he joined the Meiningen orchestra under Bulow. On Bulow's retirement from the post of conductor in 1886, Ritter went to live in Munich. His op. 1 was a string quartet of some merit; two operas, 'Der faule Hans' (1885) and 'Wem die Krone?' (1890), were finished and produced in Munich and Weimar respectively. Several symphonic poems are mentioned in detail in Riemann, and in the article on Ritter by F. Rösch in Musikalisches Wochenblatt for 1898.

RITTER, FRÉDÉRIC LOUIS (b. Strassburg, June 22, 1834; d. Antwerp, July 22, 1891), Alsatian conductor, teacher and writer on music. His musical studies were begun at an early age under Hauser and Schletterer, were continued at Paris under Kastner, and were completed in Germany. At the age of 18 he was made professor of music in the Protestant Seminary of Fénéstrange, Lorraine. In 1856 he went to Cincinnati, Ohio, and there organised the Cecilia (choral) and the Philharmonic (orchestral) Societies, and at the concerts of these two organisations many important works were performed for the first time in America. In 1861 he moved to New York, there becoming conductor of the Sacred Harmonic Society and of the Arion Choral Society (male voices). In 1874 he went to Poughkeepsie, N.Y., as director of music at Vassar College. The University of New York conferred on him the degree of Mus.D. in 1878.

Ritter is chiefly known to-day through his writings. These include: A History of Music (2 vols., 1870-74); Music in England (1883); Music in America (1883); and Music in its Relation to Intellectual Life (1891). W. S. S.

RITTER, HERMANN (b. Wismar, Mecklenburg, Sept. 26, 1849; d. Würzburg, Jan. 1926), attracted considerable public interest in Germany during the latter half of the 19th century by his performances on the 'viola alta,' an instrument which he claimed to be his own invention. While studying history and art at the Heidelberg University, Ritter became deeply interested in the history of musical instruments, and the desire to improve the muffled tone of the ordinary viola induced him to attempt the construction of a similar instrument which should possess the acute resonant qualities of the violin. According to his own account, this consummation was effected by the aid of the rules laid down by Antonio Bagatella in his pamphlet entitled Regole per la costruzione di violini, viole, violoncelli, e violoni, etc., etc., Padua, 1786, of which a second edition appeared in Padua in 1883, and German translations at Padua in 1786 and Leipzig in 1806. In point of fact Hermann Ritter's viola alta was in reality a revival of the large tenor viol, that direct descendant of those instruments de remplissage the quinte and haute contre, which he methodised into a tenor of extra large proportions constructed on the scientific acoustical basis appertaining to the violin. His public appearances with the instrument began in 1876. They attracted the consideration of many eminent composers, and Wagner, who was at that time occupied with his 'Ring des Nibelungen,' invited his aid for the production of that opera in the same year. After completing this engagement Ritter travelled for several years, touring in Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Holland, Russia, England and Scotland, and in 1879 he was appointed professor of musical history and æsthetics, as well as of the viola, at the Royal School of Music at Würzburg. There his talents and personal influence were the means of attracting a vast number of students, who assisted in spreading the fame of his invention, and in 1889 five of his pupils were playing in the orchestra of the Bayreuth festival. In 1889 he was learnedly advocating the use of a three-footed binder in a pamphlet entitled Der dreifüssige oder Normal-Geigensteg (Würzburg, G. Hartz).

The Grand Duke of Mecklenburg appointed Ritter his 'Court Chamber Virtuoso,' and the Emperor Ludwig II. of Bavaria gave him the title of 'Court Professor.' He married the singer Justine Haacker in 1884. He wrote and arranged an immense amount of music for his viola alta and traced its history in his book entitled Die Geschichte des Viola alta

(Leipzig, Merseburg). (See VIOLIN FAMILY, subsection SUBSIDIARY MEMBERS, 7.)

RITTER, PETER (b. Mannheim, July 2, 1763; d. there, Aug. 1, 1846), studied the violoncello under Fitz and Danzi, and composition under Vogler, and toured as a violoncello prodigy. In 1784 he succeeded Franz Danzi in the Mannheim orchestra, and became Kapellmeister there in 1803. He was a composer of great merit, who produced successfully 21 singspiele, an oratorio, quartets, trios, concertos and sonatas for violoncello, also church music. His fine popular hymn, 'Lord of Glory,' was used by Humperdinck in 'The Miracle' (E. van der Straeten, Hist. of the Violoncello).

RITTER (properly BENNET), THEODORE (b. near Paris, Apr. 5, 1841; d. there, Apr. 6, 1886), was a pupil of Liszt and wrote a number of successful drawing-room pieces ('Chant de braconnier,' 'Sylphes,' etc.). He produced two operas ('Marianne,' at Paris in 1861, and 'La dea risorta,' at Florence, 1865).

RIVARDE, SERGE ACHILLE (b. New York, Oct. 31, 1865), violinist. His father was Spanish; his mother American. He lived in America till the age of 11, receiving lessons successively from Felix Simon, Henri Wieniawski and Joseph White (a man of colour). Coming to Europe he entered the Paris Conservatoire, to become a pupil of Charles Dancla. He won a first prize in July 1879, sharing the same with Franz Ondříček. In 1881 he returned to America, where he stayed three years, and then gave up violin-playing entirely for a time. In 1885 he came back to Paris and entered Lamoureux's orchestra, in which he remained for five years as principal violin, and occasional soloist. He gave up the appointment in 1891 and made his début in London in 1894.

In 1899 he took the post of violin professor at the R.C.M. He is occasionally heard as soloist in London and abroad, being the possessor of an exceptionally pure style, but spends most of his time in teaching. In 1924 he started a school of his own for violin-playing in London, but without abandoning his work at the R.C.M., where as a teacher of solo and ensemble playing he has earned a high reputation. He published (1922) a small manual of his method, Violin-playing. W. W. C.

RIZZIO (Rizzi, Ricci), DAVID (b. Turin, Italy, early 16th cent.; d. Holyrood Palace, Scotland, Mar. 9, 1566), the son of a professional musician and dancing master. He obtained a post at the court of the Duke of Savoy, and came over to Scotland in the train of the ambassador in 1561. With his brother Joseph he remained in the service of Mary Queen of Scots in the first instance as a bass singer, receiving £80 per year. He so won his way into her favour (no doubt primarily by his ability in connexion with court masques, of which she was fond), that he became, in 1564, her foreign secretary. By this he aroused political and other feelings, and he was stabbed to death, almost in the Queen's presence, in Holyrood Palace, on the evening of Mar. 9, 1566.

There is no doubt that Rizzio exercised some influence on the music then fashionable in Scotland (or at least in Edinburgh), and there appears to have been a very strong tradition that he was the composer of several of the well-known Scots tunes. In 1725 William Thomson in the 'Orpheus Caldonius' puts this tradition into definite form by affixing a mark to seven of the airs there engraved, stating them to be the composition of Rizzio (see ORPHEUS CALEDONIUS). James Oswald and others have in one or two instances also assigned other airs to Rizzio with probably less of tradition to justify them. F. K.

ROBARTT, of Crewkerne, was an 'orgyn maker' who let out organs to churches by the year. The Mayor of Lyme Regis, in 1551, paid him ten shillings for his year's rent. v. de P.

ROBERDAY, FRANÇOIS (d. circa 1695), a learned Paris organist of the 17th century. He was attached to the music of Queen Anne of Austria and Queen Marie-Thérèse, was known as one of the masters of Lully, and was organist of the church of the Petites-pères. His 'Fugues et caprices' (pub. 1660) show him to have been influenced by the German and Italian musicians, especially by Frescobaldi and Froberger. This work was republished in the 'Archives des maîtres de l'orgue,' by Guilman and Pirro. F. R².

ROBERT BRUCE, a pasticcio adapted by Niedermeyer from four of Rossini's operas—'Zelmira,' the 'Donna del lago,' 'Torvaldo e Dorliska' and 'Bianca e Faliero.' Produced without success at the Académie Royale, Dec. 30, 1846. It is published in Italian as 'Roberto Bruce' by Ricordi. G.

ROBERT LE DIABLE, opera in 5 acts; words by Scribe; music by Meyerbeer. Produced Opéra, Paris, Nov. 21, 1831; in English, imperfectly, as 'The Demon, or the Mystic Branch,' Drury Lane, Feb. 20, 1832, and as 'The Fiend Father, or Robert of Normandy,' Covent Garden, the day following; as 'Robert the Devil,' Drury Lane (Bunn), Mar. 1, 1845; in French, Her Majesty's, June 11, 1832; in Italian, Her Majesty's, May 4, 1847; New York, Park Theatre (English), Apr. 7, 1834. ROBERTS, HENRY, a music and an ornamental engraver, who issued several notable books of songs with music, now much sought after, mainly on account of their decorative character. In these works the pieces are headed with pictorial embellishments. The earliest of Roberts's publications is 'Calliope, or English Harmony,' in two volumes octavo. It was issued by and for the engraver in periodical numbers of 8 pp. and began late in the year 1737. Twenty-five numbers formed the first volume, which was completed in 1739. The second volume began in this year, but from some cause now unknown the publication came to a standstill when half through, and was not resumed until 1746, when it came out with the imprint of John SIMPSON (q.v.). This volume contains 'God save the King,' which, from the date 1739 appearing on some of the plates, has been hastily assumed to be prior to the copy in the Gentleman's Magazine of 1744. This, however, is not the case, for ample proof exists that this portion of the volume was not issued before the spring of 1746. The plates of 'Calliope,' thirty or forty years afterwards, came into possession of Longman & Broderip, who reprinted from them. Roberts's other famous work is 'Clio and Euterpe,' precisely similar in style, which, issued in two volumes, bears the dates 1758 and 1759. A later edition has a third volume added, and is dated 1762. A fourth was again added when re-issued by John Welcker. Henry Roberts kept a music and a print-shop in Holborn 'near Hand Alley almost opposite Great Turnstile.' His name is attached as engraver to several pieces of decorative engraving on music-sheets. F. K.

ROBERTS, JOHN (b. Wales, Dec. 22, 1822; d. May 6, 1877), composer of sacred music. Before 1839 he had adopted the name 'Ioum Gwyllt.' He removed to Liverpool and became editor of a Welsh newspaper, besides writing upon musical matters. In 1858 he again returned to Wales, and at Aberdare set up as a music teacher. On Jan. 10, 1859, he founded there the first of a long series of Welsh musical festivals, and in the same year published a tune-book, 'Llyfr Tonau,' which was much used throughout Wales, and passed through many editions. Roberts was a strong advocate of temperance, and preached as a Calvinistic Methodist.

ROBERTS, JOHN HENRY (b. Penzance, Wales, 1849; d. Liverpool, July 30, 1924), attained distinction among his countrymen as a composer of hymn-tunes, partongs, etc.

He became organist of a Welsh chapel at the age of 12, attracted the favourable notice of

S. S. Wesley, who offered him an organistship at Gloucester, spent four years (from 1870) at the R.A.M., where he studied with Sterndale Bennett, and then returned to Wales to become organist at Bothesda and Carnarvon. Later he became principal of the Liverpool Cambrian School of Music, and did much work as adjudicator at Eisteddfodau, where many of his part-songs became popular as test pieces. (See obit. notice, Liverpool Post, July 31, 1924.)

ROBERTS, JOHN VARLEY, Mus.D. (b. Staningley, near Leeds, Sept. 25, 1841; d. Oxford, Feb. 9, 1920), was for 37 years organist and choirmaster of Magdalen College, Oxford, during which time the musical services of the chapel attained a high reputation.

He early exhibited much ability for music, and at 12 was appointed organist of St. John's, Farsley, near Leeds. In 1862 he became organist of St. Bartholomew's, Armley, and in 1868 organist and choirmaster of the parish church, Halifax. In 1871 he graduated Mus.B., and in 1876 Mus.D., at Christ Church, Oxford. During his organistship at Halifax, upwards of £3000 was raised to enlarge the organ, originally built by Snetzler—the instrument upon which Sir William Herschel, the renowned astronomer, formerly played. In 1876 Dr. Roberts became a Fellow of the R.C.O., London. In 1882 he was elected organist at Magdalen College, Oxford, succeeding Sir Walter Parratt. He retired from this in 1919. In 1884 the University Glee and Madrigal Society was founded under his conductorship. In 1885–93 he was organist of St. Giles's, Oxford, and in the former year was appointed examiner in music to the Oxford Local Examinations, and also became conductor of the Oxford Choral Society. In 1883 he was appointed one of the University examiners for musical degrees. In 1916 he was given the degree of M.A. Oxon. honoris causa. In 1907 he presented a new organ to his native village. His compositions include sacred cantatas, 'Jonah,' for voices and orchestra; 'Advent,' 'The Story of the Incarnation,' 'The Passion,' for church choirs; Psalm ciii. for voices and orchestra; six Services, one an Evening Service in C written for the London Church Choir Association Festival in 1894; about fifty anthems, besides part-songs and organ pieces. His Practical Method of Training Choristers, 1898, 1900 and 1905, is very useful. w. b. s.

ROBIN DES BOIS. The title of the first French version of 'Der Freischütz' (q.v.).

ROBIN HOOD. An opera in 3 acts; words by John Oxenford; music by G. A. Macfarren. Produced Her Majesty's Theatre, London, Oct. 11, 1860, and had a very great run. a.

Other operas on the same subject have been produced, besides many masques of the 16th and 17th centuries, more or less associated with the May Day games and observances; of these early pieces little record as to detail has survived.

A ballad opera of the name was acted at Lee & Harper's great booth, at St. Bartholomew's Fair, in 1730; the music and libretto of this was published by John Watts in the year of production. A different 'Robin Hood,' by Moses Mendez, was performed at Drury Lane in 1750, the music being supplied by Charles (afterwards Dr.) Burney. Another English ballad opera in 3 acts, which attained some degree of fame, was entitled 'Robin Hood, or Sherwood Forest.' This was written by Leonard MacNally, with the music selected, arranged and composed by William Shield. It was produced at Covent Garden Theatre in 1784, the principals being Mrs. Kennedy, Mrs. Martyr, Mrs. Banister and Miss Kemble, while the male singers were Banister, Johnstone and Edwin. The piece had a considerable run, and several of the songs lasted in popularity long after the opera itself was dead. F. K.

ROBINSON, (1) ANASTASIA (b. circa 1698; d. Bevis Mount, Southampton, Apr. 1755) was daughter of a portrait painter, who, becoming blind, was compelled to qualify his children to gain their own livelihood. Anastasia received instruction from Dr. Croft, Pier Giuseppe Sandoni, and the singer called The BARONESS (q.v.), successively. She appeared in 'Creso' in 1714; as Ariana in Handel's 'Amadigi,' May 25, 1715; and in 1720 at the King's Theatre as Echo in Domenico Scarlatti's opera, 'Narciso.' She afterwards sang in the pasticcio of 'Muzio Scevola,' in Handel's 'Ottone,' 'Floridante,' 'Flavio' and 'Giulio Cesare'; in Bononcini's 'Crispo' and 'Gruselda,' and other operas. Her salary was £1000 for the season, besides a benefit-night. She possessed a fine voice of extensive compass, but her intonation was uncertain. She quitted the stage in 1724, having two years previously been privately married to the Earl of Peterborough, who did not avow the marriage until shortly before his death in 1735, although, according to one account, she resided with him as mistress of the house, and was received as such by the Earl's friends. According to another account, she resided with her mother in a house at Parson's Green, which the Earl took for them, and never lived under the same roof with him, until she attended him in a journey in search of health, a short time before his death. She was buried at Bath Abbey. There is a fine portrait of her by Faber after Bank, 1727.

Her younger sister, (2) ELIZABETH intended for a miniature painter, preferred being a singer. She studied under Bononcini, and afterwards at Paris under Rameau; but though an excellent singer, was said to have been prevented by timidity from ever appearing in

ROBINSON, (1) FRANCIS, was an eminent professor of music in Dublin, and in 1810 was mainly instrumental in founding 'The Sons of Handel,' probably the earliest society established there for the execution of large works. He was the father of four sons, all musicians. The eldest, (2) FRANCIS, Mus.D. (b. circa 1799; d. Oct. 1872), had a tenor voice of great beauty and sympathetic quality; was a vicar-choral of the two Dublin Cathedrals; and, at the Musical Festival in Westminster Abbey in June 1834, sang a principal part. Another son, (3) WILLIAM, had a deep bass of exceptional volume; while (4) JOHN (b. circa 1812; d. 1844), the organist of both Cathedrals and of Trinity College, had a tenor ranging to the high D. The four brothers formed an admirable vocal quartet, and were the first to make known the German partsongs then rarely heard either in England or Ireland. (5) JOSEPH, the youngest (b. Aug. 20, 1815; d. Aug. 23, 1898), was a chorister of St. Patrick's at the early age of 8, and afterwards a member of all the choirs, where his fine delivery of recitative was always a striking feature. He also played in the orchestra of the Dublin Philharmonic. But it is as a conductor that his reputation is best established. In 1834 he founded the Antient Concert Society (see DUBLIN) of which he was conductor for twenty-nine years, and which ceased to exist soon after his resignation. It began its meetings in his own house, then took a large room, now the Royal Irish Academy, and in 1843 had made such progress that it purchased and remodelled the building since known as the Antient Concert Rooms. Amongst the last things written by Mendelssohn was the instrumentation of his 'Hear my Prayer' (originally composed for voices and organ only), expressly for Robinson to produce at the 'Antients.' It did not reach him till after the composer's death. (See MENDELSSOHN, Vol. III. p. 407, n. 1.) In 1837 he became conductor of the University Choral Society, founded by the students. At one of its concerts the music of 'Antigone' was given for the first time out of Germany. He continued to conduct the Society for ten years. In 1849 he married Miss Fanny Arthur (see below). In 1852, at the opening of the Cork Exhibition, Robinson conducted the music, which was on a large scale, and included a new cantata by Robert Stewart. In 1853 an International Exhibition was opened in Dublin; there he assembled 1000 performers, the largest band and chorus yet brought together in Ireland.

In 1856 efforts were made to revive the Irish Academy of Music, founded in 1848, but languishing for want of funds and pupils. (See DUBLIN, subsection ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY.) Mr. and Mrs. Robinson joined as professors, and nearly all the Irish artists, both vocal and instrumental, who appeared during their time, owed both training and success to their teaching; and when, after twenty years, Robinson resigned, the institution was one of importance and stability. In 1859, for the Handel Centenary, he gave the 'Messiah,' with Jenny Lind and Belletti among the principals. The net receipts amounted to £900, an unprecedented sum in Dublin. In 1865 the large Exhibition Palace was opened by the Prince of Wales, and Robinson conducted the performance with a band and chorus of 700.

After the cessation of the 'Antients,' there was no Society to attempt systematically the worthy production of great works. To remedy this a chorus was trained by Robinson, and established in 1876 as the Dublin Musical Society. The last concert conducted by Robinson was on Dec. 6, 1888, previous to which the members presented him with an address and a purse of 100 sovereigns. The purse was returned² by him with warm expressions of gratitude, but with the characteristic words:

'While I think a professional man should expect his fair remuneration, yet his chief object may be something higher and nobler—the advancement of art in his native city.'

The Society was revived in 1889, under the conductorship of Dr. Joseph Smith, but collapsed after some years. Robinson wrote a variety of songs, concerted pieces and anthems, besides arranging a number of standard songs and Irish melodies. In 1881 he married for the second time.

In 1849 a young pianist, Miss Fanny Arthur (b. Sept. 1831; d. Oct. 31, 1879), arrived in Dublin from Southampton, and made her first successful appearance there—Feb. 19, 1849. She had studied under Sterndale Bennett and Thalberg. Robinson and she were married July 17 following, and she continued for thirty years to be an extraordinary favourite. Her first appearance in London was at the Musical Union, June 26, 1855, when she played Beethoven's sonata in F (op. 24) with Ernst, and received the praises of Meyerbeer: also at the New Philharmonic in 1856, where she played Mendelssohn's concerto in D.

Mrs. Robinson passed a very active musical life, though it was often interrupted by nervous illness. In teaching she had a peculiar power of infusing her own ideas into others. She played from time to time at concerts of a high class, and herself gave a very successful concert in Paris, at the Salle Erard (Feb. 4, 1864). Her pianoforte compositions are numerous and graceful. Her sacred cantata, 'God is Love,' was repeatedly performed throughout the kingdom. She met a sudden and tragic end, which caused profound regret.

ROBINSON, JOHN (b. 1682; d. Apr. 30, 1762), was a chorister of the Chapel Royal under Dr. Blow. He became organist of St. Lawrence, Jewry, in 1710, and St. Magnus, London Bridge, in 1713. Hawkins, in his History, describes him as 'a very florid and elegant performer on the organ, inasmuch that crowds resorted to hear him'; and elsewhere says:

'In parish churches the voluntary between the Psalms and the first Lesson was anciently a slow, solemn movement, tending to compose the minds and excite sentiments of piety and devotion. Mr. Robinson introduced a different practice, calculated to display the agility of his fingers in allegro movements on the cornet, trumpet, scqualtera, and other noisy stops, degrading the instrument, and instead of the full and noble harmony with which it was designed to gratify the ear, tickling it with mere airs in two parts, in fact solos for a flute and a bass.'

On Sept. 30, 1727, Robinson was appointed to succeed Dr. Croft as organist of Westminster Abbey. He had an extensive practice as a teacher of the harpsichord, and will be long remembered by his double chant in E♭. He was buried, May 13, 1762, in the north aisle of Westminster Abbey. He married, Sept. 6, 1716, Ann, youngest daughter of William Turner, Mus.D. She was a singer, and appeared at the King's Theatre in 1720 in Domenico Scarlatti's opera 'Narciso,' being described as 'MRS. TURNER-ROBINSON' to distinguish her from Anastasia Robinson, who sang in the same opera. She died Jan. 5, and was buried Jan. 8, 1741, in the west cloister of Westminster Abbey. Robinson had a daughter, who was a contralto singer and the original representative of Daniel in Handel's oratorio 'Belshazzar,' 1745; she also sang in others of his oratorios. W. H. H.

ROBINSON, THOMAS, was author of a curious work published at London in folio in 1603, bearing the following title—The Schoole of Musicke: wherein is taught the perfect method of the true fingering of the Lute, Pandora, Orpharion and Viol de Gamba. In 1609 he published 'New Citharen Lessons.'

W. H. H.

ROBLEDO, MELCHOR (d. Saragossa, 1587), Spanish church-musician, who, after some years spent in Rome, returned to Spain (1569) and became choirmaster of the old cathedral (la Seo) in Saragossa. His reputation was such that the chapters of both cathedrals (the Seo and the Pilar) decided, with unusual artistic insight, that the only church-music to be sung should be drawn from the works of Morales, Victoria, Palestrina and Robledo—a practice which, unfortunately, is no longer followed. Esclava printed 4 motets. Other works in MS. are found in the Sistine Chapel (Mass, 5 v., and motet, 5 v.); Bologna (Lamentations, 4 v.); Valencia, Patriarca, Mass, 5 v.; Saragossa. J. B. T.

ROCHE, EDMOND (b. Calais, Feb. 20, 1828; d. Paris, Dec. 16, 1861), began life as a violin-player, first as Habeneck's pupil at the Conservatoire, but quickly relinquished music for literature. Roche undertook the translation of the libretto of 'Tannhäuser' for its representation at the Opéra, Mar. 13, 1861, and in a preface to his Poésies posthumes (Paris, Lévy, 1863) Sardou has described the terrible persistence with which Wagner kept his translator to his task. (See Pougin's supplement to Fétis.) In Jullien's Richard Wagner, 1887, the facts of the case were made public; it seems that Roche, not knowing German, had recourse to the services of a friend named Lindau, and the translation, when sent to the director of the Opéra, was rejected, as it was in blank verse; the necessary alteration into rhyme was made by Roche, Nutter and Wagner in collaboration. On this Lindau brought an action against Wagner, to enforce the mention of his name as one of the translators; the case was heard on Mar. 6, 1861, a week before the first representation of the opera, and it was decided that no name but that of Wagner should appear in the books. So that Roche had not even the satisfaction of seeing his name in print in connexion with the work, for even Lajarte (Bibl. Mus. de l'Opéra, ii. 230) gives Nutter as the author of the French words. Besides the poems contained in the volume cited, Roche contributed critical articles to several small periodicals. M.

ROCHLITZ, JOHANN FRIEDRICH (b. Leipzig, Feb. 12, 1769; d. Dec. 16, 1842), critic, and founder of the Allgemeine musikalische Zeitung.

His fine voice procured his admission at 13 to the Thomasschule, under the cantors of Doles, where he spent six years and a half. He began to study theology in the University, but want of means compelled him to leave and take a tutorship, which he supplemented by writing. For the titles of his non-musical works see Riemann. He also attempted composition, and produced a Mass, a Te Deum, some part-songs for male voices, a setting of Ps. xxiii., and a cantata, 'Die Vollendung des Erlösers.' In 1798 he founded the Allgemeine musikalische Zeitung (Breitkopf & Hartel), and edited it till 1818, during which period his articles largely contributed to the improved general appreciation in North Germany of the works of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. The best of them were afterwards republished by himself under the title of Für Freunde der Tonkunst, in four vols. (1824-32, reprinted later by Dörfel, third edition, 1868). It contains, amongst other matter, an interesting account of a visit to Beethoven at Vienna in 1822. Another important work was a collection in three vols. (Schott, 1838-40) of vocal music, from Dufay to Haydn, entitled 'Sammlung vorzüglicher Gesangstücke vom Ursprung gesetzmässiger Harmonie bis auf die neue Zeit.'¹ The first two volumes of the A.M.Z. contain a series of anecdotes on Mozart, whose acquaintance he made during Mozart's visit to Leipzig; but Jahn, in the preface to his Mozart, has completely destroyed the value of these as truthful records. Rochlitz was a good connoisseur of paintings and engravings. In 1830 he was one of the committee appointed by the Council of Leipzig to draw up a new hymn-book, and some of the hymns are from his own pen. He also wrote the librettos for Schicht's 'Ende des Gerechten,' Spohr's 'Last Judgment' and 'Calvary,' and for Bierey's opera 'Das Blumenmädchen.' He was a Hofrath of Saxony. f. g.

ROCK, MICHAEL (d. Mar. 1809), was appointed organist of St. Margaret's, Westminster, June 4, 1802, in succession to William Rock, junr., who had filled the office from May 24, 1774. He composed some popular glees—'Let the sparkling wine go round' (which gained a prize at the Catch Club in 1794), 'Beneath a churchyard yew,' etc. w. h. h.

ROCKSTRO (originally RACKSTRAW), WILLIAM SMITH (b. North Cheam, Surrey,² Jan. 6, 1823; d. London, July 2, 1895), was distinguished as a student of modal music and an important contributor to this Dictionary. The form of his surname by which he was known was an older style resumed after 1846.

He was successively pupil of John Purkis, the blind organist, of Sterndale Bennett, and at the Leipzig Conservatorium, where he studied from 1846-46. He enjoyed the special friendship and tuition of Mendelssohn, and was with Hauptmann for theory and with Plaiddy for pianoforte. For some years after his return to England he was active as a teacher and performer in London, being regular accompanist at the 'Wednesday concerts,' where Braham and other eminent singers were to be heard. At this period he wrote his most popular and beautiful song, 'Queen and huntress'; and his pianoforte editions of classical and other operas led the way in popularising that class of music in an available form for the use of those who could not read full scores; and in his indications of the orchestral instruments above the music-staves he did much to point the way towards a general appreciation of orchestral colour. In the early sixties he left London for Torquay on account of his mother's health and his own, and on her death in 1876 he became a Roman Catholic.

He had been organist and honorary precentor at All Saints' Church, Babbacombe, from 1867, and won a high position as a teacher. He published, with T. F. Ravenshaw, a 'Festival Psalter, adapted to the Gregorian Tones,' in 1863, and 'Accompanying Harmonies to the Ferial Psalter' in 1869. These were the first-fruits of his assiduous study of ancient music, on which he became the first authority of his time in England. A couple of textbooks on harmony (1881) and counterpoint (1882) had a great success, and in the latter part of the first edition of this Dictionary he wrote a large number of articles on musical archaeology generally. Later research has superseded his, but at the time he wrote, his contributions to such subjects as the music of the period which closed in 1600 were important. He was too ardent a partisan to be an ideal historian, but his History of Music for Young Students (1879) and his larger work, A General History of Music (1886), contain much that is of permanent value. His Life of Handel (1883) and Mendelssohn (1884) are fine examples of eulogistic biography, though they are hardly to be recommended as embodying a calmly critical estimate of either composer. In his larger History he showed that he was, nevertheless, not above owning himself in the wrong, and his recantation of certain excessive opinions expressed by him in the Dictionary against Wagner's later works was due to true moral courage. He conducted a concert of sacred music of the 16th and 17th centuries at the Inventions Exhibition of 1885, and in 1891 gave up Torquay for London, giving lectures at the R.A.M. and R.C.M., and holding a class for counterpoint and plain-song at the latter institution. As a singing-master and teacher of the pianoforte his method of imparting instruction was remarkably successful. As a composer, he never quite freed himself from the powerful influences engendered by his studies: the lovely madrigal, 'O too cruel fair,' was judged unworthy of a prize by the Madrigal Society on the ground that it was modelled too closely on Palestrina; and his oratorio, 'The Good Shepherd,' produced at the Gloucester Festival of 1886 under his own direction, was found to bear too many traces of Mendelssohnian influence to deserve success. In 1891 he collaborated with Canon Scott Holland in writing the life of his old friend, Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt; an abbreviated edition came out in 1893, and with Otto Goldschmidt he wrote a still shorter book, Jenny Lind, her Vocal Art and Culture (partly reprinted from the biography). For many years his health had been bad, and he had many adverse circumstances to contend with. He fought bravely for all that he held best in art, and boundless enthusiasm carried him through. (D.N.B. etc.) M.; rev. C.

RODA, CECILIO DE (b. Albuñol, Granada, Oct. 24, 1865; d. Madrid, Nov. 27, 1912), Spanish musical historian, author of valuable papers on the songs, dances and instruments of the time of 'Don Quixote'—Ilustraciones del Quijote: Los instrumentos musicales y los danzas (Madrid, Ateneo, 1905); on Spanish secular music in the time of Charles V., 1516–56 (Rev. Mus. de Bilbao, 1912, Nos. 5–11); and on Spanish instruments in the 13th century (Report of 4th Congress of Int. Mus. Society; London, 1912, pp. 62, 332). He also described a sketch-book of Beethoven (opp. 130, 132 and 133) which had come into his possession, and did much to make the last quartets and PF. sonatas better known in Madrid. J. B. T.

RODE, JACQUES PIERRE JOSEPH (b. Bordeaux, Feb. 16, 1774; d. there, Nov. 25, 1830), a great violinist. When 8 years of age he came under the tuition of Fauvel aîné, a well-known violinist of his native town, and studied under him for six years. In 1788 he was sent to Paris. Here Punto (or Stich), the famous horn-player, heard him, and, being struck with the boy's exceptional talent, gave him an introduction to Viotti, with whom he studied for two years. In 1790 he made his first public appearance, when he played Viotti's 13th concerto at the Théâtre de Monsieur with complete success. Although then but 16 years of age, he was appointed leader of the second violins in the excellent band of the Théâtre Feydeau. In this position, appearing at the same time frequently as soloist, he remained till 1794, and then started for his first tour to Holland and the north of Germany. His success, especially at Berlin and Hamburg, was great. From the latter place he sailed for his native town, but the vessel was compelled by adverse winds to make for the English coast. So Rode came to London; but he only once appeared in public, at a concert for a charitable purpose, and left England again for Holland and Germany. Finally he returned to France and obtained a professorship of the violin at the newly established Conservatoire at Paris. He was solo violin at the Opéra until Nov. 1799. In 1799 he went to Spain, and at Madrid met Boccherini, who is said to have written the orchestration for Rode's earlier concertos, especially for that in B minor. On his return to Paris in 1800 he was appointed solo violinist to the First Consul, and it was at that period that he achieved his greatest success in the French capital. In 1803 he went with Boieldieu to St. Petersburg. Spohr heard him on his passage through Brunswick, and was so impressed that for a considerable time he made it his one aim to imitate his style and manner as closely as possible. Arrived at the Russian capital, Rode met with a most enthusiastic reception, and was at once attached to the private music of the Emperor with a salary of 5000 roubles (about £750). But the fatigues of life in Russia were so excessive that from this period a decline of his powers appears to have set in. On his return to Paris in 1808 his reception was less enthusiastic than in former times, and even his warmest friends and admirers could not but feel that he had lost considerably in certainty and vigour. From 1811 we find him again travelling in Germany. Spohr, who heard him in 1813 at Vienna, tells in his Selbstbiographie (i. 178) of the disappointment he felt at Rode's playing, which he now found mannered, and deficient in execution and style.

In Vienna Rode came into contact with Beethoven, who finished the great sonata in G, op. 96, expressly for him. It was played by Rode and the Archduke Rudolph, Beethoven's pupil, at a private concert, but, as far as the violin part was concerned, not much to the composer's satisfaction. Soon afterwards, at any rate, Beethoven requested the Archduke to send the violin part to Rode that he might play it over before a second performance, and he adds: 'He will not take it amiss; certainly not! would to God there were reason to beg his pardon for doing so.'¹ Fétis's statement that Beethoven wrote a Romance for Rode probably rests on a confusion of the G major sonata with the Romanza in the same key.

In 1814 Rode went to Berlin, married, and remained for some time. He then retired to his native place. At a later date he made an ill-advised attempt to resume a public career. But his appearance at Paris proved a complete failure, and Mendelssohn, writing from thence in Apr. 1825, says that he was fixed in his resolution never again to take a fiddle in hand.² This failure he took so much to heart that his health began to give way, and he died at Bordeaux, Nov. 25, 1830.

Rode was no mere virtuoso, but a true artist. His truly musical nature shows itself equally in his compositions. His concertos have a noble dignified character and considerable charm of melody, while, it need hardly be added, they are thoroughly suited to the nature of the violin, even though they hardly show high creative power.

He published ten concertos (three more were issued after his death); five sets of quartets; seven sets of variations; three books of duos for two violins, and the well-known twenty-four caprices.

Of his concertos, the 7th in A minor is still in the repertory of some eminent violinists. The variations in G major—the same which the famous singer Catalani and other celebrated vocalists after her made their cheval de bataille—are occasionally heard. But above all, his '24 caprices or études' will always, along with Kreutzer's famous forty caprices, hold their place as indispensable for a sound study of the violin. P. D.

RODIO, Rocco (b. Calabria, c. 1530), wrote a book on counterpoint which appeared in three editions (1600, 1609, 1626); a book of masses (1580), including one in 5 parts, which could be sung also in 4 or even 3 parts by the omission of quintus and treble; also 2 books of madrigals a 4 v. (2nd book in 1587) (Q.-L.; Riemann).

RODOLPHE (RUDOLPH), JEAN JOSEPH (b. Strassburg, Oct. 14, 1730; d. Paris, Aug. 18, 1812), studied the horn and violin under his father, and went to Paris in 1746, where he became Leclair's pupil on the violin. After several provincial engagements he entered the chapel of the Duke of Parma in 1754, cultivating chiefly the horn. He studied composition under Traetta, continuing under Jommelli, when he joined the Stuttgart court chapel in 1761. In 1767 he entered the private music of Prince Conti in Paris, where in 1669 he became solo horn at the Opéra and member of the Royal Chapel in 1770. In the latter year he appeared also in London; in 1784 he became teacher of harmony at the Paris Conservatoire, where under the reconstruction in 1799 he became professor 'des solfèges' (elements of music), and resigned in 1802. Mozart and Grétry speak of him with great respect. He composed several operas, ballets, horn concertos and pieces, violin duets, etc., and two instruction books (Solfèges and Théorie d'accompagnement), which were widely used (Riemann; Q.-L., Féis).

RODRÍGUEZ DE HITA, ANTONIO (d. Madrid, Feb. 21, 1787), Spanish composer. He is first heard of in 1757 as choirmaster at Palencia in Old Castille, publishing in a pamphlet of 36 pages¹ as sound advice to his pupils as any teacher could give. He was probably rewarded with the post of musical director of the Convent of the Incarnation at Madrid; the date of his appointment is sometimes given as 1754 or 1755, though on the title-pages of his pamphlet he describes himself as being still maestro de capilla at Palencia in 1757. His Hymns for 4 and 8 v. (Bibl. Nac. Madrid), probably belonging to this period, are notable for their elegance and nobility of style. Ten years later he made the acquaintance of the Spanish dramatist Don Ramón de la Cruz (1731-96), and the two produced a series of remarkable works in the style of the national lyric

'Briseida' was produced on July 10, 1768, at the Teatro del Príncipe, Madrid. It was an attempt to write an Italian opera with Spanish words and Spanish music; it was also one of the first public performances in Spain which were given at night. (The overture, some arias and a concerted number were performed under Pedrell in 1896, for the centenary of Ramón de la Cruz.) 'Briseida' was followed in the autumn of 1768 by 'Las segadoras de Vallecas,' a comic opera on popular lines, in which Spanish rustics were freely introduced; and this showed the way to the composer's masterpiece, 'Las labradoras de Murcia' (1769), revived by Pedrell in 1896. The plot is a comedy of Spanish country life and manners. An extremely effective moment depends upon the old belief that silkworms must on no account be allowed to hear the thunder; and here they are prevented from doing so (as is often actually the case) by a number of people singing and playing upon native instruments. The score is notable for its independent viola-parts, unusual in operatic music of that date, and particularly so in Spain. The music of Rodríguez de Hita (preserved in the Bibl. del Ayuntamiento, Madrid) is remarkable for its thoroughness as well as its real imaginative and dramatic talent. J. B. T.

RODWELL, GEORGE HERBERT BONAPARTE (b. Nov. 15, 1800; d. Upper Ebury Street, Pimlico, Jan. 22, 1852), brother of J. T. G. Rodwell, part proprietor and manager of the Adelphi Theatre, London, and author of several dramatic pieces, was for many years music director of the Adelphi. On the death of his brother, in Mar. 1825, he succeeded to his share in the theatre. He was a pupil of Vincent Novello and Henry Bishop, and became in 1828 professor of harmony and composition at the R.A.M. He was the composer of very many operettas and other dramatic pieces, of which the following are the principal:

* 'The Flying Dutchman' (Adelphi, 1820); * 'The Cornish Miners' (English Opera-House, 1827); * 'The Bottle Imp' and 'The Mason of Buda' (partly adapted from Auber's 'Le Maçon', 1828); * 'The Spring Lock', * 'The Earthquake' and * 'The Devil's Elixir' (1829); * 'The Black Vulture' (1830); * 'My Own Lover' and * 'The Evil Eye' (1832); * 'The Lord of the Isles' (1834); * 'Paul Clifford' (with Bellotti, 1835); * 'The Spirit of the Bell' (Lyceum, 1835); * 'The Sexton of Cologne' (1836); * 'Jack Sheppard' (1839), and * 'The Seven Sisters of Munich' (1847).

In 1836 he was director of the music at Covent Garden, where he brought out many adaptations of operas, etc., 'anticipating the repertory of Drury Lane' (D.N.B.). He was author of several farces and other dramatic pieces, amongst which were Teddy the Tiler (written in 1830 for Tyrone Power, and eminently successful), The Chimney-Piece, The Pride of Birth, The Student of Lyons and My Wife's Out; of three novels, Old London Bridge, Memoirs of an Umbrella and Woman's Love; and of The First Rudiments of Harmony, 1831. He composed also two collections of songs: 'Songs of the Sabbath Eve' and 'Songs of the Birds' (1827). For many years he persistently advocated the establishment of a National Opera. He married the daughter of Liston, the comedian. He was buried at Brompton Cemetery. W. H. H.

ROECKEL, (1) PROFESSOR JOSEPH AUGUST (b. Neumburg vorm Wald, Upper Palatinate, Aug. 28, 1783; d. Anhalt-Cöthen, Sept. 1870). He was originally intended for the church, but in 1803 entered the diplomatic service of the Elector of Bavaria as Private Secretary to the Bavarian Chargé d'Affaires at Salzburg. On the recall of the Salzburg Legation in 1804, he accepted an engagement to sing at the Theater an-der-Wien, where, Mar. 29, 1806, he appeared as Florestan in the revival of 'Fidelio'.¹ In 1823 Roeckel was appointed professor of singing at the Imperial Opera; in 1828 he undertook the direction of the opera at Aix-la-Chapelle, and in the following year made the bold experiment of producing German operas in Paris with a complete German company. Encouraged by the success of this venture, Roeckel remained in Paris until 1832, when he brought his company to London, and produced 'Fidelio,' 'Der Freischütz' and other masterpieces of the German school, at the King's Theatre; the principal artists being Schröder-Devrient and Haitzinger, with Hummel (Roeckel's brother-in-law) as conductor. In 1835 he retired from operatic life, and in 1853 finally returned to Germany, where he died.

(2) AUGUST (b. Graz, Dec. 1, 1814; d. Buda-Pest, June 18, 1876), his eldest son, was music director at Bamberg, at Weimar (1838-1843), and lastly was music director at the Dresden Opera in 1843-49, and so a colleague of Richard Wagner; being, like the latter, involved in the Revolution of 1848 (he had also witnessed the Paris Revolution of 1830), he abandoned music and devoted himself entirely to politics. He spent thirteen years in prison (1849-62), and on his release became editor of various newspapers at Coburg, Frankfurt, Munich and Vienna successively. He published an account of his imprisonment (Sachsens Erhebung, etc.). Wagner's letters to him were published in 1894, and translated into English by Miss E. C. Sellar shortly afterwards. From admiration of Wagner's genius, Roeckel withdrew an opera of his own, 'Fari-nelli,' which had been accepted for performance at Dresden. See also Praeger's Wagner as I knew him, p. 119 ff.

(3) EDWARD (b. Trèves, Nov. 20, 1816; d. Bath, Nov. 2, 1899), the 2nd son of Joseph Roeckel (1), received his musical education from his uncle, J. N. Hummel. He came to London in 1835, and gave his first concert in 1836 at the King's Theatre. He subsequently went on a concert tour in Germany, and performed with great success at the courts of Prussia, Saxony, Saxe-Weimar, Anhalt-Dessau, etc. In 1848 he settled in England, and resided at Bath, where he succeeded Henry Field. He published a considerable quantity of pianoforte music.

(4) JOSEPH LEOPOLD (b. London, Apr. 11, 1838; d. Vittel, Vosges, June 20, 1923), the youngest son, studied composition at Würzburg under Eisenhofer, and orchestration under Götze at Weimar. He also settled in England, and lived at Clifton; he was well known as a teacher and a voluminous composer of songs. His cantatas 'Fair Rosamond,' 'Ruth,' 'The Sea Maidens,' 'Westward Ho,' 'Mary Stuart,' 'The Victorian Age' (1887) and many others were received with much favour. The first of these was performed at the Crystal Palace in 1871, and a baritone scena with orchestra, 'Siddartha,' was produced at the Bristol Festival of 1896. A song-cycle was brought forward at the same festival in 1902. In 1864 Roeckel married Miss JANE JACKSON (b. 1834; d. Clifton, Aug. 26, 1907), a successful pianist, who did much good work as a teacher at Clifton, and wrote pianoforte pieces, etc., under the name of Jules du Vivral. W. B. S.

RÖLLIG, JOHANN GEORG (b. Berg-Giechshübel, Saxony, 1710; d. Vienna, 1804), studied at Dresden, chiefly under Zelenka, becoming violoncellist in the court chapel at Zerbst, where he still was in 1761, as Konzertmeister, and as famous teacher. He composed church music, cantatas, etc. (Q.-L.; Riemann).

RÖLLIG, KARL LEOPOLD, from 1764-73 conductor of Ackermann's theatrical company at Hamburg, was an improver of and virtuoso on the glass-harmonica, and inventor of the orphica and Xanorphica (improved PF. and archi-PF.). In 1797 he was appointed at the Imperial Library, Vienna. He composed concertos and pieces for the above instruments; also interlude for orchestra, songs and theoretical works, etc. (Q.-L.; Riemann).

RÖNTGEN, (1) ENGELBERT (b. Deventer, Holland, Sept. 30, 1829; d. Leipzig, Dec. 12, 1897), entered the Conservatorium at Leipzig in 1848, as a pupil of David for violin and of Hauptmann for theory. Upon graduating at the Conservatorium, Röntgen was engaged as a first violin both in the Opera orchestra and in the famous Gewandhaus orchestra. In 1869 he became professor of the violin at the Conservatorium: second Konzertmeister of the Gewandhaus orchestra, and, on the death of his illustrious master, David, in 1873 he was made first Konzertmeister in his place. Röntgen was a fine violinist although he never adopted the career of a virtuoso, and his careful editing of Beethoven's quartets proves him to have been a scholarly musician. He married a daughter of Moritz Klengel, Konzertmeister at the Gewandhaus.

RÖNTGEN, JULIUS (b. Leipzig, May 10, 1855), composer, the child of Dutch parents. His father was Engelbert Röntgen, leader of the Gewandhaus Orchestra, Leipzig. In 1877 Röntgen came to Amsterdam, where he lived till 1924, working as a pianist, teacher, conductor and, since 1914, director of the Conservatoire.

Röntgen is a very gifted and prolific composer, in the romantic style, and he has also made his mark through his arrangements and editions of old Dutch songs and dances. Amongst his compositions, his chamber works take the most important place. He has composed also several operas, songs, choral works and orchestral music, including a symphony, a pianoforte concerto, and a charming ballade based on a Norwegian folk-tune. He has published Brahms's Correspondence with Th. Engelmann (1918). His own interesting correspondence with his friend Edvard Grieg he has not yet made public.

ROGEL, JOSÉ (b. Orihuela, Alicante, Dec. 24, 1829; d. Cartagena, Feb. 25, 1901), Spanish conductor and composer, began music under Cascales, and Gil, organist and conductor of the cathedral, and made great progress, till sent to Valencia by his father to study law. Under the guidance of Pascual Perez, a musician of ability, he learned composition and other branches of practical music. After completing his legal course and taking his degree at Madrid, Rogel was able to indulge his taste, and acted as conductor and composer to several theatres. His earliest opera publicly performed was 'Los a la Libertad' (Madrid, 1854). Between this date and 1881 he wrote or collaborated in 81 theatrical works (mainly Zarzuelas), of which 'El joven Telémaco' was the most popular. In some he collaborated with BARBIERI (q.v.). The titles of his pieces are of all characters, ranging from 'Revista de un muerto' and 'Un viaje de mil demonios' to 'El General Bumbum.' G.; addns. J. B. T.

ROGER, ESTIENNE, an Amsterdam music publisher who was in a very extensive way of business from 1696 to 1722. His work is of the highest class of music printing and engraving, and is from copperplates. It is said that he was one of the first to introduce the practice of punching the notes on the copper as a substitute for engraving. Walsh and Hare are stated to have taken this idea from him and to have used pewter, a cheaper and a more ductile metal. He translated the Traité de la composition of de Nivers into Flemish (1697).

Among other works Roger issued, circa 1720, a fine edition of Corelli's four sets of sonatas, and also of the same composer's concertos. Several collections of miscellaneous works are mentioned in Q.-L.

Roger either died or gave up business about 1725 (his last dated publication is 1722), leaving as his successor Michel Charles Le Cène, who reissued many of his predecessor's publications.

ROGER, GUSTAVE HIPPOLITE (b. La Chapelle-Saint-Denis, Paris, Dec. 17, 1815; d. Paris, Sept. 12, 1879), eminent French singer. He entered the Conservatoire in 1836, and after studying for a year under Martin carried off the first prizes both for singing and opéra-comique. He obtained an immediate engagement, and made his début at the Opéra-Comique, Feb. 16, 1838, as Georges in 'L'Éclair.' To a charming voice and distinguished appearance he added great intelligence and stage tact, qualities which soon made him the favourite tenor of the Parisian world, and one of the best comedians of the day. Ambroise Thomas composed for him 'Le Perruquier de la Régence' and 'Mina,' Halévy gave him capital parts in 'Les Mousquetaires de la Reine' and 'Le Guitarero,' and Auber secured him for 'Le Domino noir,' 'La Part du Diable,' 'La Sirène' and 'Haydée.' Meyerbeer declared him to be the only French artist capable of creating the part of John of Leyden. In consequence, after ten years of uninterrupted success, Roger left the Opéra-Comique for the Opéra, where on Apr. 16, 1849, he created an immense sensation with Mme. Viardot, in 'Le Prophète.' During the next ten years he was invaluable at the Opéra, creating new parts in the 'Enfant prodigue,' the 'Juif errant' and many more. His best creation after John of Leyden, and his last part at the Opéra, was Hélios in David's 'Herculanum' (Mar. 4, 1859). In the following autumn he lost his right arm while shooting, by the bursting of a gun; he reappeared with a false one, but with all his skill and bravery he could not conceal his misfortune, and found himself compelled to bid farewell to the Opéra and to Paris.

He went once more to Germany, which he had been in the habit of visiting since 1850, and where he was invariably successful, partly owing to his unusual command of the language. After this he sang in the principal provincial theatres of France, and in 1862 reappeared at the Opéra-Comique in his best parts, especially that of Georges Brown in 'La Dame blanche,' but it was evident that the time for his retirement had arrived. He then took pupils for singing, and in 1868 accepted a professorship at the Conservatoire, which he held till his death.

Roger was the author of the French translation of Haydn's 'Seasons,' and of the words of several romances and German Lieders. His book, Le Carnet d'un ténor (Paris, Ollendorff, 1880), is a portion of his autobiography. It contains an account of his visits to England in 1847 (June) and 1848 (June-Nov.), when he sang at the Royal Italian Opera, and made an artistic tour in the provinces with Mlle. Jenny Lind and other artists. G. C.

ROGERS, BENJAMIN, Mus.D. (b. Windsor, 1614; d. June 1698), son of Peter Rogers, lay-clerk of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, was a chorister of St. George's under Dr. Giles, and afterwards a lay-clerk there. He succeeded Jewett in 1639 as organist of Christ Church, Dublin, where he continued until the rebellion in 1641, when he returned to Windsor and obtained a lay-clerk's place there; but on the breaking up of the choir in 1644 he taught music in Windsor and its neighbourhood, and obtained some compensation for the loss of his appointment. In 1653 he composed some airs in four parts for violins and organ, which were presented to the Archduke Leopold, afterwards Emperor of Germany, and favourably received by him. In 1658 he was admitted Mus.B. at Cambridge.¹ In 1660 he composed a 'Hymnus Eucharisticus' in four parts, to words by Dr. Nathaniel Ingelo, which was performed at GUILDHALL when Charles II. dined there on July 5.² About the same time he became organist of Eton College. On Oct. 21, 1662, he was reappointed a lay-clerk at St. George's, Windsor, his stipend being augmented by half the customary amount; and he also received out of the organist's salary £1 per month as deputy organist. On July 22, 1664, he was appointed Informator Choristarum and organist of Magdalen College, Oxford. On July 8, 1669, he proceeded Mus.D. at Oxford. In Jan. 1685 he was removed from his place at Magdalen College on account of irregularities,³ the College, however, assuring to him an annuity of £30 for life. He survived until June 1698, on the 21st of which month he was buried at St. Peter-le-Bailey. His widow, whom the College had pensioned with two-thirds of his annuity, survived him only seven months, and was laid by his side Jan. 5, 1699.

Rogers composed much church music; four services are printed in the collections of Boyce, Rimbault and Ouseley; another, an Evening Verse Service in G, is at Ely in MS. Some anthems were printed in 'Cantica sacra,' 1674, and by Boyce and Page; and many others are in MS. in the books of various cathedrals and college chapels. Four glees are contained in Playford's 'Musical Companion,' 1673, and many instrumental compositions in 'Courtly Masquing Ayres,' 1662. Some MS. organ compositions are in the R.C.M., and J. S. Bumpus possessed a volume in the handwriting of Dr. Philip Hayes, containing the whole of Rogers's compositions for the church. His 'Hymnus Eucharisticus' (the first stanza of which, beginning 'Te Deum Patrem colimus,' daily sung in Magdalen College Hall by way of grace after dinner, is printed in the Appendix to Hawkins's History) is sung annually on the top of Magdalen tower at five in the morning of May 1 in lieu of a Requiem which, before the Reformation, was performed in the same place for the soul of Henry VII. His service in D and some of his anthems, which are pleasing and melodious in character, are still sung in cathedrals. W. H. H.

ROGERS, JOHN (b. London; d. Aldersgate, London, c. 1663), a famous lutenist, was attached to the household of Charles II. in 1661-63. He lived near Aldersgate. W. H. H.

ROGERS, SIR JOHN LEMAN, Bart. (b. Apr. 18, 1780; d. Dec. 10, 1847), succeeded his father in the baronetcy in 1797. He became a member of the Madrigal Society in 1819, and in 1820 was elected its permanent president (being the first so appointed), and held the office until 1841, when he resigned on account of ill-health. He composed a cathedral service, chants, anthems, madrigals, glees and other vocal music. He was an ardent admirer of the compositions of Tallis, and by his exertions an annual service was held for several years in Westminster Abbey, the music being wholly that of Tallis. W. H. H.

ROGERS, ROLAND, Mus.D. (b. West Bromwich, Staffordshire, Nov. 17, 1847), was appointed organist of St. Peter's Church, West Bromwich, in 1858. He studied under S. Grosvenor, and in 1862 obtained by competition the post of organist at St. John's, Wolverhampton. In 1867 he similarly obtained the organistship of Tettenhall parish church, and in 1871 was appointed organist and choir-master of Bangor Cathedral, a post which he resigned at the end of 1891. He took the Oxford degree of Mus.B. in 1870, and that of Mus.D. in 1875. Dr. Rogers's published works are 'Prayer and Praise,' a cantata, a prize cantata, 'The Garden' (Llandudno, 1896), Evening Services in B \flat and D, anthems, part-songs, organ solos and songs; a symphony in A, a psalm 'De Profundis,' and several anthems and services are still in MS. W. B. S.

ROGIER, PHILIP (b. Arras, 1562/3 (?); d. Madrid, Feb. 29, 1596), first heard of as a choir-boy in Madrid (June 15, 1572); and a member of the Chapel Royal again from 1586. He was appointed maestro de capilla in 1587, vice-master of the singers in 1590. In 1609 he was succeeded by Mateo Romero, his pupil. His printed works include:

Miserere. Madrid 1598. (Madrid, Bibl. Nac., Toledo Cathedral; Milan, Cathedral, Tournaï Publ. Library)

This contains 5 masses by Rogier and one by his pupil, G. de Ghersem. In the Mass 'Philipus secundus Rex Hispaniae,' these words are sung by the tenor to the caro fermo throughout the work (cf. MORALES). MSS. of Philip Rogier are preserved in the Escorial and at the new cathedral (El Pilar), Saragossa. J. B. T.

ROGNONE-TAEGIO (ROGNONI), (1) RICCARDO, a 16th-century musician at Milan, composed Canzonette alla napolitana, a 3-4 v. (1586); passagi . . . nel diminuire (for playing divisions) (1592); pavane et balli, etc. (4-5 parts, 1603). His sons were (2) GIOVANNI DOMENICO, organist and Ducal maestro di cappella at Milan, c. 1620; composed organ canzonas (1605), 2 books of madrigals (1605, 1619), a Requiem Mass (1624). (3) FRANCESCA, an early 17th-century maestro di cappella of St. Ambrogio, Milan; composed masses, motets, madrigals, fauxbourdons, correnti e gagliarde, aggiunta dello scolare di violino, selva di varij passagi, etc. (embellishments in singing and playing), (between 1610-24) (Q.-L.; Riemann).

ROGUES' MARCH, THE, originally a military quickstep, which from some cause has become appropriate to use when offenders were drummed out of the army. When, from theft, or other crime, it was decided to expel a man from the regiment, the buttons bearing the regimental number, and other special decorations, were cut from his coat, and he was then marched, to the music of drums and fifes playing 'The Rogues' March,' to the barrack gates, and kicked or thrust out into the street.

The writer, though he has made diligent search, cannot find traces of the tune before the middle of the 18th century, although there can be but little doubt that the air, with its association, had been in use long before that time. About 1790, and later, a certain more vocal setting of the air was used for many popular humorous songs. 'Robinson Crusoe,' 'Abraham Newland' and the better-known 'Tight little Island,' are among these. The latter song, as 'The Island,' was written by Thomas Dibdin about 1797,¹ and sung by a singer named Davies at Sadler's Wells in that year.

It is found in many 18th-century collections of fife and flute music; the above copy is from 'The Compleat Tutor for the Fife,' London, printed for and sold by Thompson & Son, 8vo, circa 1759-60. F. K.

ROI DE LAHORE, LE, opera in 5 acts, text by Louis Gallet; music by Jules Massenet. Produced Opéra, Paris, Apr. 27, 1877; Covent Garden, June 28, 1879.

ROI DES VIOLONS—'king of the violins'—a title of great interest as illustrating the struggle between art and authority. On Sept. 14, 1321, the ménéstrers or fiddlers of France formed themselves into a regular corporation, with a code of laws in eleven sections, which was presented to the Prévôt of Paris, and by him registered at the Châtelet. The Confraternity, founded by thirty-seven jongleurs and jongleresses, whose names have been preserved, prospered so far as in 1330 to purchase a site and erect on it a hospital for poor musicians. The building was begun in 1331, finished in 1335, and dedicated to St. Julien and St. Genest. The superior of this 'Confrérie of St. Julien des ménestriers' was styled 'king,' and the following were 'Rois des ménestriers' in the 14th century: Robert Caveron, 1338; Copin du Brequin, 1349; Jean Caumez, 1387; and Jehan Portevin, 1392.

In 1407 the musicians, vocal and instrumental, separated themselves from the mountebanks and tumblers who had been associated with them by the statutes of 1321. The new constitution received the sanction of Charles VI., Apr. 24, 1407, and it was enacted that no musician might teach or exercise his profession without having passed an examination, and been declared suffisant by the 'Roi des ménestrels' or his deputies. These statutes continued in force down to the middle of the 17th century. History, however, tells but little about the new corporation. The only 'rois' whose names have been preserved in the charters are—Jehan Boissard, called Verdolet, 1420; Jehan Facien, the elder, and Claude de Bouchardon, oboes in the band of Henri III., 1675; Claude Nyon, 1690; Claude Nyon, called Lafont, 1600; François Rishomme, 1615; and Louis Constantin, 'roi' from 1624 to 1655. Constantin (d. Paris, 1657), was a distinguished artist, violinist to Louis XIII. and composer of pieces for strings in five and six parts, several of which are preserved in the valuable collection already named under PHILIDOR.

In 1514 the title was changed to 'roi des ménestrels du royaume.' All provincial musicians were compelled to acknowledge the authority of the corporation in Paris, and in the 16th century branches were established in the principal towns of France under the title of 'Confrérie de St. Julien des ménestriers.' In

Oct. 1658 Louis XIV. confirmed Constantin's successor, Guillaume Dumanoir I., in the post of 'Roi des violons, maîtres à danser, et joueurs d'instruments tant haut que bas,' ordaining at the same time that the 'Roi des violons' should have the sole privilege of conferring the mastership of the art throughout the kingdom; that no one should be admitted thereto without serving an apprenticeship of four years, and paying sixty livres to the 'roi,' and ten livres to the masters of the Confrérie; the masters themselves paying an annual sum of thirty sous to the corporation, with a further commission to the 'roi' for each pupil. The masters alone were privileged to play in taverns and other public places, and in case this rule were infringed the 'roi' could send the offender to prison and destroy his instruments. This formidable monopoly extended even to the king's band, the famous 'twenty-four violons,' who were admitted to office by the 'roi' alone on payment of his fee. (See VINGT-QUATRE VIOLONS.)

So jealously did Guillaume Dumanoir I. guard his rights that in 1662 he began an action against thirteen dancing-masters, who, with the view of throwing off the yoke of the corporation, had obtained from Louis XIV. permission to found an 'Académie de danse.' The struggle gave rise to various pamphlets,¹ and Dumanoir was beaten at all points. He bequeathed a difficult task to his son Michel Guillaume Dumanoir II., who succeeded him as 'roi' in 1668, and endeavoured to enforce his supremacy on the instrumentalists of the Opéra, but, as might have been expected, was overmatched by Lully. After his difficulties with the director of the Opéra, Dumanoir II., like his father, came into collision with the dancing-masters. In 1691 a royal proclamation was issued by which the elective committee was abolished, and its place filled by hereditary officials, aided by four others appointed by purchase. Against this decree the corporation and the thirteen members of the Académie de Danse protested, but the Treasury was in want of funds, and declined to refund the purchase money. Finding himself unequal to such assaults Dumanoir resigned in 1693, and died in Paris in 1697. He delegated his powers to the privileged committee of 1691, and thus threw on them the onus of supporting the claims of the Confrérie over the clavicinists and organists of the kingdom; a parliamentary decree of 1695, however, set free the composers and professors of music from all dependence on the corporation of the ménétriers. This struggle was several times renewed. When Pierre Guignon

(b. 1702; d. 1774), a good violinist, and a member of the King's chamber-music and of the Chapel Royal, attempted to reconstitute the Confrérie on a better footing, it became evident that the musicians as a body were determined to throw off the yoke of the association. Guignon was appointed 'Roi des violons' by letters patent, June 15, 1741, was installed in 1742, and in 1747 endeavoured to enforce certain new enactments, but a parliamentary decree of May 30, 1750, put an end to his pretended authority over clavicinists, organists and other serious musicians. The corporation was maintained, but its head was obliged to be content with the title of 'Roi et maître des ménestriers, joueurs d'instruments tant haut que bas, et hautbois, et communauté des maîtres à danser.' Roi Guignon still preserved the right of conferring on provincial musicians the title of 'lieutenants généraux et particuliers' to the 'roi des violons,' but even this was abrogated by a decree of the Conseil d'État, Feb. 13, 1773. The last 'roi des violons' at once resigned, and in the following month his office was abolished by an edict of the King dated from Versailles. a. c.

ROITZSCH, F. AROUST (b. Gruna, near Gortitz, Dec. 10, 1805; d. Leipzig, Feb. 4, 1889), won a high reputation as a careful editor of old music, and more especially of Bach's instrumental compositions, in the valuable cheap editions of the firm of Peters.

ROKITANSKY, (I) HANS, FREIHERR VON (b. Vienna, Mar. 8, 1835; d. Laubegg, Nov. 1909), eldest son of Carl Freiherr von Rokitsansky (1804-78), an eminent medical professor. He studied singing chiefly at Bologna and Milan, and first appeared in England at concerts in 1856. In 1862 he made his début at Prague in 'La Juive,' and fulfilled a very successful engagement there of two years. In 1863 he sang the same part at Vienna, in 1864 obtained an engagement there, and was a member of the opera company for many years, retiring in 1892. His voice was a basso-profondo of great compass and volume, very equal in all its range; he had a commanding presence, and was an excellent actor. On June 17, 1865, he reappeared in London at Her Majesty's as Marcel with very great success, and then sang there and at Drury Lane for four consecutive seasons, and was greatly esteemed. He returned for the seasons of 1876 and 1877 in some of his old parts, and played for the first time the King in 'Lohengrin,' and Giorgio in 'I Puritani.' He retired from public life at the end of 1894, and became a professor in the Vienna Conservatorium.

(2) VICTOR (b. July 9, 1836; d. Vienna, July 17, 1896), a younger brother of the above, and a fashionable singing-master at Vienna. From 1871-80 he filled the post of professor of singing at the Conservatorium of Vienna; he published Über Sänger und Singen in 1894.

ROLFE & CO., pianoforte-makers. William Rolfe was at 112 Cheapside in 1796 as a music-seller and publisher of minor musical works, also as maker of musical instruments. Before this date he was partner in a small music-publishing firm, Culliford, Rolfe, & Barrow, at the same address, about 1790. With Samuel Davis, Rolfe took out a patent for improvements in pianofortes on Jan. 31, 1797, and his pianofortes had some degree of reputation. His business continued until 1806, when the firm was William Rolfe & Sons, and in 1813 they had additional premises at 28 London Wall. Rolfe & Sons (or Co.) remained in Cheapside for many years. In 1850 the number had been changed to 61, and the London Wall premises to 31 and 32. They removed to 12 Great Marlborough Street (1869), and then (1878) to 11 Orchard Street. During the 'eighties their place of business was at 6 Lower Seymour Street, but after 1890 no traces of them can be found. F. K.

ROLL (Ger. Wirbel), the name given to a tremolo effect on the DRUM (q.v.).

ROLLA, (1) ALESSANDRO (b. Pavia, Apr. 22, 1757; d. Milan, Sept. 15, 1841), violinist and composer. He first studied the pianoforte, but soon exchanged it for the violin, which he learned under Renzi and Conti. He had also a great predilection for the viola, and wrote and performed in public concertos for that instrument. In 1782-1802 he was leader of the band at Parma, and it was there that PAGANINI (q.v.) was for some months his pupil. In 1802 he went to Milan as leader and conductor of the opera at La Scala, in which position he gained a great reputation. He became in 1805 a professor at the Conservatorio di Milan. His compositions had considerable success in their time; they consist of a large number of violin duets, some serenades, trios, quartets and quintets for stringed instruments, and concertos for the violin and for the viola, as well as songs. (See Q.-L.)

His son and pupil, (2) ANTONIO (b. Parma, Apr. 18, 1798; d. Dresden, May 19, 1837), was leader of the Italian Opera band at Dresden from 1823-35. He published concertos and other solo pieces for the violin. F. D.

ROLLAND, ROMAIN (b. Clamecy, Nièvre, Jan. 29, 1866), writer on music. He was a pupil at the École Normale Supérieure (1886-89), an agrégé in history, pupil at the École française at Rome (1889-91), chargé de mission in Italy (1892-93). He was made 'docteur ès lettres,' June 19, 1895, and presented a musical thesis (the first to follow that of Jules Combarieu)—Les Origines du théâtre lyrique moderne: histoire de l'opéra en Europe avant Lulli et Scarlatti. His Latin thesis was entitled: Cur ars picturæ apud Italos xvi. sæculi deciderit?

Rolland became president of the musical section of the École des Hautes-Études Sociales (1901), and gave a course of lectures on the history of music at the École Normale Supérieure; and in 1903 at the Sorbonne.¹ He resigned this instructional work for reasons of health, and has lived in Switzerland since 1913.

Rolland wrote for the Revue de Paris, Revue d'art dramatique, and Revue musicale of J. Combarieu, the S.I.M., the Encyclopédie musicale of Lavignac; and has published the following works: Beethoven (1903); Paris als Musikstadt (1905); Handel (1910); Des Études sur l'opéra au XVII^e siècle (Encyclopédie Lavignac). He has collected a certain number of studies in Musiciens d'aujourd'hui and Musiciens d'autrefois (2 vols. 1908; 2nd ed. 1925; Eng. transl. 1915), and in Voyage au pays du passé (1919; 2nd ed. 1920). The novel, Jean-Christophe (1904-12), in which the hero is a musician, must be included among the musical works of Rolland.

As a dramatist Rolland has produced or published between 1897 and 1925 a certain number of works collected together under the title Théâtre de la Révolution and Théâtre de l'âme. He has published in addition François Millet (London, 1902), Le Théâtre du peuple (1903), La Vie de Michel-Ange (1905), the Vie de Tolstoï (1911); also various novels of a philosophical and social nature: Colas Breugnot (1914; publ. 1918), Clérambault, L'Âme enchaînée, collections of articles (Au-dessus de la mêlée, 1917, etc.). Many of his works have been translated into other languages.

Rolland, whose works and ideas, of great individuality, have been much discussed since the war, is laureate of the French Académie

ROLL-CALL, see MILITARY SOUNDS AND SIGNALS.

ROLLE. A German musical family. The father, (1) CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH (d. Magdeburg, 1751), was town musician of Quedlinburg and of Magdeburg in 1721. Of his three sons, (2) CHRISTIAN CARL (b. Quedlinburg, 1714) was cantor of the Jerusalem Church, Berlin, about 1760. He had sons, of whom (3) FRIEDRICH HEINRICH left a biography of his father; while (4) CHRISTIAN CARL (the younger) succeeded him as cantor.

(5) JOHANN HEINRICH (b. Quedlinburg, Dec. 23, 1718; d. Magdeburg, Dec. 29, 1785), third son of Christian Friedrich (1) (the second son is unnamed) held the post of organist at St. Peter's, Magdeburg, in 1732 when only 14 years old (Q.-L.). He was at the Leipzig University in 1736, and migrated to Berlin in hopes of some legal post; but this failing he adopted music as his career, and about 1740 entered the court chapel of Frederick the Great as a chamber musician (viola-player). There he remained till 1746, and then took the organist's place at the Johanniskirche, Magdeburg, as town musician, and worked there with uncommon zeal and efficiency. His industry seems almost to have rivalled that of Bach himself. He left several complete annual series of church music for all the Sundays and Festivals; cantatas for Easter, Whitsuntide and Christmas, of which many are in the State Library at Berlin; five Passions, and at least sixty other large church compositions. Besides these there exist twenty-one large works of his, of a nature between oratorio and drama, such as 'Saul, or the power of Music,' 'Samson,' 'David and Jonathan,' 'The Labours of Hercules,' 'Orestes and Pylades,' 'Abraham on Moriah,' 'The Death of Abel,' etc. The last two were for many years performed annually at Berlin, and were so popular that the editions had to be renewed repeatedly. In addition to these he left many songs and compositions for organ, orchestra, and separate instruments. (See Q.-L. for list.) G.

ROLLI, PAOLO ANTONIO, an Italian poet, a Florentine, who was employed by the managers of the Italian opera to supply the libretti for several of the operas put before the English public in the early years of the 18th century. It is said that he was originally a pastry-cook, but, coming to England about 1718, his productions pleased the public, and he became much noticed. In 1727 he issued a small book of canzonets and cantatas, with the music, dedicated to the Countess of Pembroke. At a later date he set up as teacher of the Italian language, and left England for Italy in 1744. Two stanzas of his poem, 'Se tu m'ami,' were set by Pergolesi, and three by J. J. Rousseau; and his whole book of canzonets and cantatas was adapted to new music by William De Fesch about 1745-46, and published with a fresh dedication to Lady Frances Erskine.

ROMANCE (Ger. Romanze). A term of very vague signification, answering in music to the same term in poetry, where the characteristics are rather those of personal sentiment and expression than of precise form. The Romanze in Mozart's D minor PF. concerto differs (if it differs) from the slow movements of his other concertos in the extremely tender and delicate character of its expression; in its form there is nothing at all unusual: and the same may be said of Beethoven's two Romanzes for the violin and orchestra in G and F (opp. 40 and 50), and of Schumann's 'Drei Romanzen' (op. 28). Schumann has also affixed the title to three movements for oboe and PF. (op. 94), and to a well-known piece in D minor (op. 32, No. 3), just as he has used the similar title, 'in Legendenton.'

In vocal music the term is obviously derived from the character or title of the words. In English poetry we have few 'romances,' though such of Moore's melodies as 'She is far from the land where her young hero sleeps' might well bear the title. But in France they abound, and some composers (such as Puget and Panseron) have derived nine-tenths of their reputation from them. 'Partant pour la Syrie' may be named as a good example. Mendelssohn's 'Songs without Words' are called in France 'Romanzes sans paroles.' G.

ROMANI, FELICE (b. Genoa, Jan. 31, 1788; d. Monégia, Riviera, Jan. 28, 1865), a famous Italian littérateur, was educated for the law, but soon forsook it for more congenial pursuits, and was in early life appointed to the post of poet to the royal theatres, with a salary of 6000 lire. The fall of the French government in Italy drove him to his own resources. He began with a comedy, 'L'amante e l'impostore,' which was very successful, and the forerunner of many dramatic pieces. But his claim to notice in a dictionary of music rests on his opera-libretti, in which he was for long the favourite of the Italian composers (see LIBRETTO). For Simone Mayr he wrote 'Moda' (1812), 'La rosa bianca e la rosa rossa' and others; for Rossini, 'Aureliano in Palmira' and 'Il Turco in Italia'; for Bellini, 'Bianca e Faliero,' 'La straniera,' 'La son-nambula,' 'Il pirata,' 'Norma,' 'I Capuletti' and 'Beatrice di Tenda'; for Donizetti, 'Lucrezia,' 'Anna Bolena,' 'L'elisir d'amore' and 'Parisina'; for Mercadante, 'Il Conte d'Essex'; for Ricci, 'Un'avventura di Scaramuccia'; and many others, in all fully a hundred. As editor for many years of the Gazzetta Piemontese, he was a voluminous writer.

In the latter part of his life he became blind, and was pensioned by Government, and spent his last years in his family circle at Moneglia, on the Riviera. G.

ROMANTIC, the antithesis of CLASSICAL (q.v.). Both terms were taken from literature, and brought into musical æsthetics during the early years of the 19th century, and have remained in use as convenient labels for certain kinds of musical expression. Roughly speaking, by classical we mean Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn and Brahms; by romantic, Weber, Berlioz, Chopin, Schumann, Liszt and Wagner. Nowadays it is seen that it is not possible to draw a clean dividing line; all the composers named in the classical group can be shown to possess romantic qualities, but at the time the idea of the romanticists really meant no more than modernity, the spirit of unrest and desire for progress which appears at the close of every epoch. Pater says that Rousseau's statement 'I am different from all men I have seen. If I am not better, at least I am different' is representative of the whole movement. Beethoven's death closed the epoch which brought with it the solidification of structure. But he had opened the way to the expression of a strongly personal note, and the fact that the forms were settled left composers the freer to work in their own way. The point of view changed; it became possible to open up less elevated and simpler paths; in opera the subject drawn from Greek and Roman mythology gave way to the homely, the national and the fantastic; the SYMPHONIC POEM (q.v.) took the place of the symphony, while the range of musical expression through the means of the pianoforte became greatly widened in the hands of Chopin and Schumann. In effect music became more democratic, and the demands for more colour and variety, synchronising with improvements in certain musical instruments, notably the pianoforte and the brass instruments (see VALVE), had far-reaching results. ROMBERG, a German family of musicians. The founders were (1) ANTON and (2) HEINRICH, a pair of inseparable brothers, who dressed alike and lived together in Bonn. They were still alive in 1792. (3) ANTON (b. Westphalia, Mar. 6, 1742; d. Dec. 14, 1814), a bassoon-player, lived at Dinklage (Duchy of Oldenburg), gave concerts at Hamburg, and lived long enough to play a concerto for two bassoons with his youngest son, (4) ANTON (b. 1777).

(5) BERNHARD (b. Dinklage, Nov. 12, 1767; d. Hamburg, Aug. 13, 1841), eldest son of Anton (3) is regarded as head of the school of German violoncellists. When only 14 he attracted considerable attention in Paris during a visit there with his father: from 1790–1793 he was in the band of the Elector of Cologne at Bonn at the same time with Ferdinand Ries, Reicha and the two Beethovens. During the French invasion he occupied himself in a professional tour in Italy, Spain and Portugal, and was well received, especially in Madrid, where Ferdinand VII. accompanied him on the violin. His cousin Andreas went with him, and on their return through Vienna late in 1796 they gave a concert at which Beethoven played (Thayer, ii. 16). After his return Bernhard married Catherine Ramecke at Hamburg. From 1801–03 he was a professor in the Paris Conservatoire, and we next find him in the King's band at Berlin. Spohr (Autob. i. 78) met him there at the end of 1804, and played quartets with him. Perhaps the most remarkable fact he mentions is that after one of Beethoven's early quartets (op. 18) Romberg asked how Spohr could play 'such absurd stuff' (barockes Zeug). It is of a piece with the well-known anecdote of his tearing the copy of the first Rasoumowsky quartet from the stand and trampling on it.

The approach of the French forces in 1806 again drove Romberg on the world, and in 1807 he was travelling in South Russia, but returned to Berlin, and was court Kapellmeister 1815–19, when he retired into private life at Hamburg. In 1814 he visited England, giving a concert under the patronage of Prince Blücher and the Hetman of the Cossacks, at Willis's Rooms, June 27. In 1822 he went to Vienna, in 1825 to St. Petersburg and Moscow, to Frankfurt in 1836, and in 1839 to London¹ and Paris, where his Method for the Violoncello (Berlin, Trautwein, 1840) was adopted by the Conservatoire.

Bernhard Romberg materially extended the capabilities of the violoncello. His concertos may be said to contain implicitly a complete theory of violoncello-playing, and there are few passages known to modern players the type of which may not be found there. It may be gathered from the character of his compositions that his tone was not so full and powerful as that of artists who confine themselves more to the lower register of the instrument and to passages of less complication. As an indication that this view agrees with that which prevailed during his lifetime, we find him, for instance, spoken of as follows by a correspondent of the A.M.Z. for 1817, who had heard him play at Amsterdam :

'The visit of B. Romberg had long been eagerly looked for. The immense reputation which preceded him caused his first concert to be crowded to excess. He played a concerto ('Die Reise auf den Bernhardsberg') and a capriccio on Swedish national airs. In regard to the perfection and taste of his performance, to the complete ease and lightness of his playing, our great expectations were far exceeded—but not so in respect of tone—this, especially in difficult passages, we found much weaker than the powerful tone of our own Rauppe, and indeed scarcely to compare with it.'

At a second concert Romberg played his well-known Military Concerto, and the same view was reiterated.

Bernhard Romberg composed violoncello solos of various kinds; string quartets; PF. quartets; a funeral symphony for Queen Louise of Prussia; a concerto for two violoncellos (Breitkopf & Hartel), his last work; and operas—'Die wiedergefundene Statue,' words by Gozzi von Schwick (1790), and 'Der Schiffbruch' (1791, Bonn), 'Don Mendoza,' with his cousin Andreas (Paris), 'Alma,' 'Ulysses und Circe' (July 27, 1807) and 'Rittertreue,' three acts (Jan. 31, 1817, Berlin). His son (6) KARL, also a violoncellist (b. St. Petersburg, Jan. 17, 1811), played in the court band there from 1832-42, and afterwards lived at Vienna.

Anton Romberg (3), the father of Bernhard, had a brother (7) GERHARD HEINRICH (b. Aug. 8, 1745), a clarinet-player, and music director at Münster, who lived with him for some time at Bonn, and had several children, of whom the most celebrated was (8) ANDREAS JAKOB, a violinist (b. Vechta, near Münster, Apr. 27, 1767; d. Gotha, Nov. 10, 1821). When only 7 he played in public with his cousin Bernhard, with whom he remained throughout life on terms of the closest friendship. At 17 he excited great enthusiasm in Paris, and was engaged for the Concert Spirituel (1784). In 1790 he joined his cousin at Bonn, played the violin in the Elector's band, and accompanied him to Italy in 1793. In Rome they gave a concert at the Capitol (Feb. 17, 1796) under the patronage of Cardinal Rezzonico. Andreas then made some stay in Vienna, where Haydn showed great interest in his first quartet. In 1797 he went to Hamburg, and in 1798 made a tour alone. In 1800 he followed Bernhard to Paris, and composed with him 'Don Mendoza, ou le Tuteur portugais.' The opera failed, and the success of their concerts was but partial, so Andreas left for Hamburg, where he married, and remained for fifteen years. He next became court Kapellmeister at Gotha, where he died in very great destitution. Concerts were given in various towns for the benefit of his widow and children. The university of Kiel gave him a degree of Doctor of Music. He composed six symphonies, quartets, quintets and church music; a Te Deum, Psalms, a Dixit, Magnificat and Hallelujah, in four, five, eight and sixteen parts; several operas—'Das graue Ungeheuer' (1790, Bonn), 'Die Macht der Musik' (1791), 'Der Rabe,' operetta (1792), 'Die Grossmuth des Scipio' and 'Die Ruinen zu Paluzzi'—the two last not performed. His best-known work is the music for Schiller's 'Lay of the Bell' which kept its place in concert programmes for many years. 'The Transient and the Eternal,' 'The Harmony of the Spheres,' 'The Power of Song' and a Te Deum (in D), as well as 'The Lay of the Bell,' were all published with English words by Novello. His Toy-symphony is now and then played as an alternative to Haydn's, and was chosen for performance by an extraordinary company, embracing most of the great artists of London, May 14, 1880. Two sons, (9) CYPRIAN (b. Hamburg, Oct. 28, 1807; d. there, Oct. 14, 1865) and (10) HEINRICH are mentioned in the A.M.Z. The former, a violoncellist, pupil of his uncle, made concert-tours, became a member of the court orchestra of St. Petersburg, and published compositions for his instrument (Riemann). Andreas's brother, (11) BALTHASAR (b. 1775; d. 1792), was educated for a violoncellist. His sister (12) THERESE (b. 1781) had a considerable reputation as a pianist. F. G.; note by A. F. H.

ROME. The early music schools of Rome, from the time of St. Sylvester to that of Palestrina, were so closely connected with the papacy that their history may be read in the article SISTINE CHOIR. Whether or not Guido d' Arezzo founded a school of singing at Rome in the first half of the 11th century is only a matter of conjecture (see GUIDO D' AREZZO).

The Sistine Chapel was not the only one which had a school or college of music attached to it, though it was by far the earliest. In 1480 Sixtus IV. proposed the formation of a 'cappella musicale' in connexion with the Vatican, distinct from the Sistine; his idea was not, however, realised till the time of Julius II., when the 'Cappella Giulia' was founded (in 1513) for twelve singers, twelve scholars and two masters for music and grammar. Arcadelt was the first 'maestro de' Putti' (in 1539) and Palestrina the first 'maestro della cappella della basilica vaticana' (1551-54). Among celebrated 'maestri' in later days were Tommaso Bai (1713-15) and Domenico Scarlatti (1715-19). The 'Cappella musicale nella protobasilica di S. Giovanni in Laterano' was founded in 1535 by Cardinal de Cupis; one of the earliest 'maestri de' Putti' was Lasso (1541); Palestrina held the office of 'maestro di cappella' here after his exclusion from the Vatican Chapel (1555-61). The 'Cappella di musica nella basilica liberiana' (or Sta. Maria Maggiore) was founded about the same time as the Lateran Chapel, and numbers among its maestri Palestrina (1561-71), Giov. Maria Nanini (1571-75) and Alessandro Scarlatti (1703-09).

Besides these exclusively ecclesiastical schools, others were established by private individuals. The first man who is known to have kept a public music school at Rome was a certain Gaudio Mell, whose school is supposed to have been founded about the year 1539; and among his earliest pupils were Palestrina, Giovanni Animuccia and Giovanni Maria Nanini. In 1549 Nicola Vicentino, the would-be restorer of the ancient Greek modes, opened a small private school at Rome, into which a few select pupils were admitted. But it was not till a quarter of a century later that a public music school was opened by an Italian. Whether Nanini was inspired by his master's example, or was stirred by the musical agitation of the day, is of little importance; but it is certain that the year to which the opening of his school is attributed was the same which saw the foundation of the order of Oratorians, who in the person of their leader, St. Filippo Neri, were then doing so much for the promotion of music. Nanini soon induced his former fellow-pupil, Palestrina, to assist him in teaching, and he appears to have given finishing lessons. Among their best pupils were Felice Anerio and Gregorio Allegri. After Palestrina's death Nanini associated his younger brother Bernardino with him in the work of instruction, and it was probably for their scholars that they wrote jointly their treatise on counterpoint. Giovanni Maria dying in 1607 was succeeded by Bernardino, who was in his turn succeeded by his pupil and son-in-law Paolo Agostini. It must have been this school that produced the singers in the earliest operas and oratorios of Peri, Caccini, Monteverdi, Cavaliere, Gagliano, etc.

In the second quarter of the 17th century a rival school was set up by a pupil of B. Nanini, Domenico Mazzocchi, who, with his younger brother Virgilio, opened a music school which was soon in a very flourishing condition; this was due in a great measure to the fact that the masters were themselves both singers and composers. Their curriculum differed but slightly from that of the Nanini school. In the morning one hour was given daily to practising difficult passages, a second to the shake, a third to the study of literature, and another hour to singing with the master before a mirror; in the afternoon an hour was occupied in the study of the theory of music, another in writing exercises in counterpoint, and another in literature; the remainder of the day (indoors) was employed in practising the harpsichord and in composition. Outside the school the pupils used sometimes to give their services at neighbouring churches. In 1662 Pompeo Natale kept a music school, at which Giuseppe Ottavio Pitoni, the reputed master of Durante and Leo, learnt singing and counterpoint. G. A. Angelini-Buontempi, a pupil of the Mazzochis, writing in 1695, says that Fedi, a celebrated singer, had opened the first school exclusively for singing at Rome. His example was soon followed by Giuseppe Amadori, with equal success; the latter was a pupil of P. Agostini and no doubt had not entirely forgotten the teachings of the old school; but by the end of the 17th century its traditions were gradually dying out, to be replaced by the virtuosity of the 18th century.

We must now retrace our steps and give some account of the most important musical institution at Rome of past or present time—the 'Congregazione dei Musici di Roma sotto l'invocazione di Sta. Cecilia.' It was founded by Pius V. in 1566, but its existence is usually dated from 1584, when its charter was confirmed by Gregory XIII.; almost all the masters and pupils of the Palestrina-Nanini school enrolled their names on its books, and their example has been since followed by over 4000 others, including every Italian of note, and in the 19th century many illustrious foreigners, such as John Field, Wagner, Liszt, Gounod, etc. etc.

The officers originally appointed were a Cardinal Protector, a 'Primicerio' or president, usually a person of high position, a 'Consiglio dirigente' of four members (representing the four sections—composition, the organ, singing and instrumental music), a secretary, a chancellor, twelve counsellors, two prefects, etc.; there were also professors for almost every branch of music; Corelli was head of the instrumental section in 1700. Those qualified for admission into the institution were maestri di cappelle, organists, public singers and well-known instrumentalists. By a papal decree of 1689 all musicians were bound to observe the statutes of the Academy; and by a later decree (1709) it was ordained that its licence was necessary for exercising the profession. Soon after this the Congregation began to suffer from an opposition, which, though covert, was none the less keenly felt; and in 1716 a papal decree unfavourable to the institution was passed. In 1762 it was flourishing again, for in that year we find that a faculty was granted to the Cardinal Protector to have the general direction of all ecclesiastical music at Rome. By another decree of 1764 it was enacted that none but those skilled in music should be in future admitted as members. The entrance-fee was, as it has continued to be, a very small one. The demands made upon members were also very slight. At first they were only expected to assist, by their compositions or performances, in the grand annual festival in honour of the patron saint. Towards the close of the 17th century were added one or two annual services in memory of benefactors; in 1700 a festival in honour of St. Anna; and in 1771 a 'piccola festa di Sta. Cecilia.'

The Congregation originally took up its quarters at the College of Barnabites (afterwards Palazzo Chigi) in the Piazza Colonna, where they remained for nearly a century; thence they moved to the Convent of Sta. Maria Maddalena, and again to another college of Barnabites dedicated to San Carlo a Catinari. Here they resided for the greater part of two centuries, and, after the temporary occupation of premises in the Via Ripetta, finally, in 1876, settled at their present quarters, formerly a convent of Ursuline nuns, in the Via dei Greci. Besides the hostility which the Congregation had to undergo at the beginning of the 18th century—which was repeated in another form as late as 1836—it has had its financial vicissitudes. Indeed at the end of the 18th century the funds were at a very low ebb, from which they have been gradually recovering. The institution was dignified with the title of Academy of Gregory XVI. in 1839. Two years later Rossini's Nabat Mater was performed for the first time in Italy in its entirety by the members of the Academy. Pius IX., who became Pope in 1846, though he founded several other schools for singing, such as that of 'S. Salvatore in Lauro,' did little more for the Academy than to bestow upon it the epithet 'Pontificia.'

A. H. H.

During the early years of his reign two attempts were made to found a Liceo Musicale or music school in connexion with the Accademia. The first, in 1847, received encouragement and sympathy from the pontiff, but efforts to obtain a Government subsidy for the purpose failed owing to the political disturbances of 1848-49. Another endeavour by Professor Filippo Borgia in 1857 had no better result. It was not until 1869, when two young associates of the institute, Giovanni Sgambati and Ettore Pinelli, opened gratuitous classes for pianoforte and violin on the premises of the Accademia that a practical start was made in this direction. In the following year the two professors sought and obtained from Cardinal Di Pietro, Protector of the Accademia, official sanction for their venture. This was given in a decree, dated May 23, 1870, establishing the classes on a recognised footing as belonging to and dependent upon the institution. The fresh departure received further impetus later in the same year. Soon after the fall of the pontifical government in September the associates of the Accademia, now a 'Royal' institution, expressed in general assembly unanimous approval of the classes and entrusted a provisional committee, with Professor Borgia at its head, with the task of formally constituting a Liceo Musicale.

From this period the energies of the Accademia, which until now had been little more than a body of examiners and licentiates, became centred in the new development, and its history identified with that of the daughter-institute of which the classes formed by Sgambati and Pinelli were the nucleus, and of which, therefore, they are rightly considered the founders. Meanwhile the music school had been rapidly growing. Sgambati had engaged three assistants for pianoforte teaching. Alessandro Orsini with a sub-professor had opened classes for singing, and violoncello and brass instruments were being taught. At length after seven years of careful preparation the Liceo Musicale was formally constituted under the direction of a 'Commissione disciplinare' and a 'Comitato tecnico,' with a staff of twenty-nine professors. The new institute was launched on March 3, 1877, in the presence of the Crown Prince and Princess (Umberto and Margherita) of Italy.

The Accademia now occupied itself with the compilation of a statute for the Liceo, and in accordance with the wishes of the Government the 'Commissione disciplinare' was substituted, in 1886, by an administrative council. On this the Government, the Province of Rome and the Municipality, as contributors to the maintenance of the Liceo, were represented, while its director was nominated by the Accademia itself.

Every branch of practice and theory is taught, besides Italian literature and the history of music.

To its premises in the Via dei Greci the Accademia, assisted by contributions from the Government and Queen Margherita, has added a spacious concert-hall with an organ, opened in 1895. Here, during winter and spring, public orchestral and chamber concerts are given.

The Library also constitutes an increasingly important branch of its influence. Originally small, the collection of books and MSS. was increased by the musical library of Gregory XVI. bequeathed in 1846. It was still further enriched in 1875 by the Orsini collection, and later by the musical works which had formerly belonged to the dissolved monasteries. In 1882 were added copies of all modern musical publications since 1500 (see LIBRARIES).

Quite apart from the Accademia, which with its Liceo is the musical centre of Rome, much has been done for the improvement of the popular taste in music. Orchestral concerts are given frequently at the Augusteo Hall, where all the most celebrated European conductors have appeared and have familiarised the Roman public with classical and modern works. As an operatic centre, however, Rome lacks the prestige of Milan and Naples, the chief theatres of opera being the Argentina and the Costanzi. Puccini's 'Tosca' and 'Trittico' were produced for the first time at the Costanzi Theatre. H. A. W.; rev., with addns., F. B.

ROMER, EMMA (b. 1814; d. Margate, Apr. 14, 1868), soprano singer, pupil of Sir George Smart, made her first appearance at Covent Garden, Oct. 16, 1830, as Clara in 'The Duenna'. She met with a favourable reception, and for several years filled the position of prima donna at Covent Garden, the English Opera-House, and Drury Lane, with great credit. In 1852 she took the management of the Surrey Theatre, with a company containing Miss Poole and other good singers, and brought out a series of operas in English. Miss Romer was rarely heard in the concert-room, but appeared at the Westminster Abbey Festival in 1834. She was the original singer of the title-parts in Barnett's 'Mountain Sylph' and 'Fair Rosamond'. Her performance of Aminu in the English version of Bellini's 'Sonambula' was much admired. She married a Mr. Almond.

ROMERO, MATEO ('MAESTRO CAPITAN') (d. Madrid, May 10, 1647). Born in Flanders, or of Flemish origin (his name is said to have been originally 'Rosmarin'), he joined the Chapel Royal, Madrid, in 1594 as cantor, becoming maestro in 1598. There were at that time two choirs, the Spanish and the Flemish, Capilla Española and C. Flamenca. Romero belonged to the latter and was a pupil of Philip ROGIER (q.v.). His name appears again in a list dated 1604; in 1609 he succeeded Rogier and was ordained priest, being appointed to a chaplaincy (capellania) at Toledo (Capilla de los Reyes Nuevos) in 1624. In 1633 he retired on a pension, being succeeded in the choir-mastership by PATIÑO, while in 1638 he was sent, rather against his will, on a musical mission to the Duke of Braganza in Portugal. The duke, on his accession to the throne of Portugal in 1640, rewarded him with the title of Capellán cantor de la Corona, and mentioned him (after his death) in his Defence of Modern Music, published in 1649.

Romero ('El Maestro Capitan,' as he was usually called) had an immense reputation in the Peninsula. The 'Cancionero de Sablonara' (MS. Munich and a copy at Madrid) contains 22 compositions by him for 3 and 4 v., including settings of poems by the great dramatist Lope de Vega. Other works by him are included in the 'Libro de tonos humanos', collected by Diego Pizarro (Madrid, Bibl. Nac., M. 1262), while church-music by him is preserved at Saragossa, Seville and other cathedrals. A motet ('Libera me') for 2 choirs was printed by Esalava (v. Mitjana, Rev. de Filol. españ., 1919, vi. 241 ff.

RONALD, SIR LANDON (b. London, June 7, 1873), conductor and composer, has been Principal of the GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC (q.v.) since Nov. 1910.

The son of Henry RUSSELL (q.v.), Landon Ronald was educated at St. Marylebone and All Souls Grammar School and also at Margate. At the early age of 11 (1884) he entered the R.C.M. as a student, where his teachers during the next five years included Hubert Parry (composition), Franklin Taylor (piano) and Henry Holmes (violin). He had left the R.C.M. when it 1891 he attracted attention by his skilful performance of the piano solo music to the much-discussed wordless play, 'L'Enfant prodigue' (see WORMSER). He went on tour in the provinces with this play. Mancinelli, then conductor at Covent Garden, next secured him an engagement with Augustus Harris as maestro al piano for the season of 1891, and his work there with the famous singers of the day and under Mancinelli gave him a thorough education in the traditions of opera, which in any other country but England would have determined his subsequent career as an operatic conductor. Ronald toured as conductor with Harris's Italian Opera Company through two seasons, and subsequently directed some English opera performances at Drury Lane, maintaining, however, his close connexion with Covent Garden till after the death of Harris. He also during this period (1894) toured in America as piano accompanist to Mme. Melba. When he left Covent Garden the fact that this country offered practically no other opportunities for operatic conducting caused him to accept for a time a post as conductor of musical comedy at the Lyric Theatre, and it is a regrettable fact that the special experience gained by him in these formative years has never been used in any way commensurate with his powers.

Ronald, however, was a man to make his own opportunities. He turned to concert work, accepted a summer engagement for orchestral concerts at Blackpool and there decisively proved his power of handling an orchestra. The formation of the LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA (q.v.) in 1904 brought him before the London public in symphonic work, and his position was consolidated by an invitation to Berlin. His brilliant performance with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, by gaining him the applause of the foreigner, increased the respect of his countrymen. In Vienna, Leipzig, Bremen and ultimately in Rome, where (1909) he gave the first performance there of Elgar's first symphony at a concert of the Academy of St. Cecilia, Ronald won the applause of continental audiences. At home his work was continued in several seasons at Blackpool, in promenade concerts at Birmingham and in the north with the SCOTTISH ORCHESTRA (q.v.). In 1909 he became permanent conductor of the New Symphony Orchestra, now the ROYAL ALBERT HALL ORCHESTRA (q.v.), and his Sunday Concerts at the Albert Hall and the series of symphony concerts at Queen's Hall were a regular feature of the London season until 1914. In spite of the mass of educational and executive work which his appointment at the G.S.M. necessarily entails, Ronald has continued his connexion with the Royal Albert Hall Orchestra, and has also frequently undertaken single concerts of the Royal Philharmonic Society.

The most conspicuous characteristic of Ronald's art as a conductor is the completeness and care with which he controls his forces. Everything is accomplished with the utmost deftness, and in concerto work with soloists he is the ideal accompanist. His most distinguished interpretations are in the symphonic work of Elgar, with whose music he displays a peculiar sympathy founded on a long personal friendship with the composer. Ronald's compositions are numerous, but must be regarded as a secondary activity in his career. They include Incidental music to The Garden of Allah (Drury Lane, 1921).

An Orchestral Suite from the same.
'A Birthday Overture' for orch.
Scena, 'Adieu' (Shelley), voice and orch.
Scena, 'The Lament of Shah Jehan', voice and orch.
Many songs and FF. pieces.

His songs have been highly successful with a wide public; one of them, 'Down in the forest,' having attained that almost embarrassing popularity which falls to the lot of the fluent writer, generally when he least expects it. Ronald was knighted in 1922; in the autumn of that year he published a book of reminiscences, Variations on a Personal Theme. In 1924 he was made F.R.C.M. c.

RONCONI, (1) DOMENICO (b. Lendinara-di-Polesine, Venice, July 11, 1772; d. St. Petersburg, Apr. 13, 1836). He first appeared on the stage in 1797 at La Fenice, Venice, and obtained great renown both as a singer and actor there and in other Italian cities, sang in Italian opera at St. Petersburg (1801-05), was director of the Italian opera in Vienna in 1809, sang in Paris in 1810, and was engaged at Munich in 1819-29, becoming a teacher of singing there. He founded a vocal school in 1829 at Milan. Of his three sons,

(2) FELICE (b. Venice, 1811; d. St. Petersburg, Sept. 10, 1875), under the direction of his father, devoted himself to instruction in singing, and became a professor in 1837 at Wurzburg, at Frankfurt, and, in 1844-48, at Milan. He was similarly engaged for some years in London, and finally at St. Petersburg. He was the author of a method of teaching singing and of several songs. His elder brother,

(3) GIORGIO (b. Milan, Aug. 6, 1810; d. Madrid, Jan. 8, 1890), celebrated baritone, received instruction in singing from his father, and began his dramatic career in 1831, at Pavia, as Arturo in 'La Straniera.' He played in some of the small Italian cities, then at Rome, where Donizetti wrote for him 'Il furioso,' 'Torquato Tasso' and 'Maria di Rohan,' in which last, as the Duc de Chevreuse, he obtained one of his greatest triumphs—also at Turin, Florence and Naples, where on Oct. 8, 1837, he married Signorina Elguerra Giannoni, who, according to some accounts, had recently sung with success at the Lyceum and King's Theatres, London. He began his career in England at Her Majesty's, Apr. 9, 1842, as Enrico in 'Lucia,' and was well received during the season in that character and in those of Filippo ('Beatrice di Tenda'), Belcore ('L'elisir'), Basilio, Riccardo ('Puritani'), Tasso, etc. In the last opera his wife played with him, but neither then, nor five years later as Maria di Rohan, did she make the least impression on the English public. He then made a provincial tour with her, Thalberg and John Parry. In the winter he played at the Italiens, Paris, with such success that he was engaged there for several subsequent seasons, and at one time was manager of the theatre, and was also engaged at Vienna, Pest, Madrid (where he was manager), Barcelona and Naples. He reappeared in England, Apr. 13, 1847, at Covent Garden, as Enrico, and also played Figaro ('Barbiero'), May 8, De Chevreuse on the production in England of 'Maria di Rohan,' and the Doge on the production of Verdi's 'I due Foscari,' June 19, in which 'by his dignity and force he saved the opera . . . from utter condemnation.'¹ He sang at the Italian Opera every season until 1866 inclusive, excepting in 1855 and 1862. His Rigoletto was unrivalled, but his Don Juan was a disappointment. He sang in America (1866-74) with great success, and on his return to Europe he became a teacher of singing at the Conservatorio at Madrid. In 1863 he founded a school of singing at Granada. A warm appreciation of his powers appears in Santley's Student and Singer.

(4) SEBASTIANO (b. Venice, May 1814), the other son, also a baritone, received instruction from his father and the elder Romani, and made his first appearance in 1836, at the Teatro Pantera, Lucca, as Torquato Tasso, in which part throughout his career he made one of his greatest successes. He enjoyed considerable popularity in his own country, at Vienna, and in Spain, Portugal and America, as an able artist in the same line of parts as his brother—unlike him in personal appearance, being a tall thin man, but like him in the capability of his face for great variety of expression. He appeared in England on Dec. 17, 1836, at the Lyceum, as Cardenio in Donizetti's 'Furioso,' and also sang for a few nights at the King's Theatre, as well as at the Philharmonic, Feb. 27, 1837. He reappeared in 1860 at Her Majesty's, as Rigoletto, Masetto and Grileto ('Prova d'un opera seria'). He retired from public life after a career of thirty-five years, and settled in Milan as a teacher of singing.² A. C.

RONDEAU, a French name for a short poem of six or eight lines, containing but two rhymes, and so contrived that the opening and closing lines were identical, thus forming as it were a circle or round. The name has come to be used in music for a movement constructed on a somewhat corresponding plan. (See RONDO.) G.

² He supplied much of the above information with regard to his family. The date of his death is unknown.

RONDEÑA, see FANDANGO; and SONG, subsection SPAIN (4).

RONDINE, LA, comic opera on a libretto of Wilner translated by Adami; music by Puccini. Produced (in French) Monte Carlo, M.r. 27, 1917; Buenos Ayres, the same year; (in Italian), San Carlo, Naples, Feb. 26, 1918.

RONDO (Fr. rondeau), a piece of music having one principal subject, to which a return is always made after the introduction of other matter, so as to give a symmetrical or rounded form to the whole.

From the simplicity and obviousness of this idea it will be readily understood that the rondo-form was the earliest and most frequent definite mould for musical construction. For a full tracing of this point see FORM. Later on there grew out of the free section a second subject in a related key, and still later a third, which allowed the second to be repeated in the tonic. This variety closely resembles the first-movement form, the third subject taking the place of the development of subjects, which is rare in a rondo. The chief difference lies in the return to the first subject immediately after the second, which is the invariable characteristic of the rondo. The fully developed rondo-form of Beethoven and the modern composers may be thus tabulated: 1st sub. (domt.-1st sub. 3rd sub. 1st sub. 2nd sub. Coda.

nant). (tonic).

In the case of a rondo in a minor key, the second subject would naturally be in the relative major instead of in the dominant. The finale of Beethoven's 'Sonate pathétique' (op. 13) affords an exceptionally clear instance of this use of rondo form.

Beethoven's rondos will all be found to present but slight modifications of the above form. Sometimes a 'working-out' or development of the second subject will take the place of the third subject, as in the sonata in E minor (op. 90), but in every case the principal subject will be presented in its entirety at least three times. But as this was apt to lead to monotony—especially in the case of a long subject like that in the sonata just quoted—Beethoven introduced the plan of varying the theme slightly on each repetition, or of breaking off in the middle. In the rondo of the sonata in E \flat (op. 7) again, we find the main subject cut short on its second appearance, while on its final repetition all sorts of liberties are taken with it; it is played an octave higher than its normal place, a free variation is made on it, and at last we are startled by its being thrust into a distant key—E \sharp . RONG, WILHELM FERDINAND (b. circa 1720; d. after 1821), chamber musician of Prince Henry of Prussia, after whose death he settled at Berlin as teacher of singing, piano, violin and guitar, and lecturer on musical theory. He invented a kind of lyre which he called 'Appolina pour les Dames.' According to his own statement he was 80 years old in 1800 (Ledebur, Berliner Tonkünstlerlexikon, p. 479), which makes it all the more wonderful that he still wrote songs to celebrate the delivery of his country from the French in 1815 and 1816. He composed a Mass and other church music, a duo-drama in 1 act, and a number of secular songs, wrote several books on the elements of music and musical theory, and invented some musical games to teach these subjects (Ledebur; Q.-L.; Riemann). ROOKE, WILLIAM MICHAEL (b. South Great George's Street, Dublin, Sept. 29, 1794; d. Oct. 14, 1847), son of John Rourke, or O'Rourke, a Dublin tradesman, studied, almost unaided, so assiduously that in 1813 he took to music as a profession (having altered the form of his name), learned counterpoint under Dr. Cogan, a Dublin professor, and became a teacher of the violin and pianoforte. Among his pupils on the former instrument was Balfe, then a boy. In 1817 he was appointed chorus-master and deputy leader at the theatre in Crow Street, Dublin, and soon afterwards composed a polacca, 'Oh Glory, in thy brightest hour,' which was sung by Braham, and met with great approbation. In 1818 he composed his first opera, 'Amilie,' and in 1821 he removed to England, where he became chorus-master at Drury Lane Theatre, under Tom Cooke, and, in 1830-33, leader at Vauxhall, under Sir Henry Bishop. In 1826 he was leading oratorios at Birmingham, and in the same year came to London, and sought the appointment of chorus-master at Drury Lane, and established himself as a teacher of singing. His opera, 'Amilie, or The Love Test,' was at last brought out at Covent Garden, Dec. 2, 1837, with decided success. He immediately began the composition of a second opera, and on May 2, 1839, produced at Covent Garden 'Henrique, or, The Love Pilgrim,' which, although most favourably received, was withdrawn after five performances on account of a misunderstanding with the manager. He composed two more entitled 'Cagliostro' and 'The Valkyrie,' which have never been performed. He was buried in Brompton Cemetery.

ROOT, a term much used by 19th-century theorists as an aid to harmonic classification. The system which employed it postulated (a) that all chords were derived from triads (major and minor); (b) that triads in a key were those which had as bass note one contained in the diatonic scale of that key.

Hence the root of every chord would be the bass note of the triad from which the chord was derived, and the discovery of the root would be an indication of the key of the music at the moment at which the chord was used. The system became inadequate from the moment at which chords not referable to a triad in a key became current in the musical vocabulary. (See HARMONY.) C.

ROOT, GEORGE FREDERICK (b. Sheffield, Mass., U.S.A., Aug. 30, 1820; d. Bailey's Island, Maine, Aug. 6, 1895), American popular composer. He studied under Webb of Boston and afterward in Paris. In 1859-71 he was a music-publisher in Chicago. With Lowell Mason he was active in popularising music in American public schools. He wrote numerous cantatas, but he is known and remembered as the composer of certain songs much sung during and after the American Civil War, in particular, 'The Battle Cry of Freedom'; 'Just Before the Battle, Mother'; and the spirited 'Tramp, Tramp, Tramp, the Boys are Marching,' also known as 'God Save Ireland.'

ROOTHAM, (1) DANIEL WILBERFORCE (b. Cambridge, Aug. 15, 1837; d. Bristol, Mar. 1922), the son of a bass singer in the choirs of Trinity and St. John's Colleges, Cambridge (1815 till his death in 1852), himself sang as a chorister in the same choirs from the age of 8, and from 1850 for four years studied the piano, organ and harmony under T. A. Walmisley. On the death of his father he removed to Bristol, where his elder brother was a lay-clerk in the cathedral; he soon got a similar position, and also studied singing in London under Schira. In 1865 he succeeded J. D. Corfe, the cathedral organist, as conductor of the Bristol Madrigal Society. The former post he retained till 1877, and held the post of organist at St. Peter's, Clifton Wood, from 1866 for 27 years. The conductorship of the Madrigal Society he retained till his retirement in 1915. He did important work for the furtherance of music in BRISTOL (q.v.). His son,

(2) CYRIL BRADLEY, Mus.D. (b. Bristol, Oct. 5, 1875), was educated at Bristol Grammar School and Clifton College. Winning scholarships and various honours, he went to St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1894, and graduated in the Classical Tripos in 1897; he took the Mus.B. degree at Cambridge in 1900 and the M.A. degree in 1901. In his third year at Cambridge he undertook all Dr. Garrett's musical duties; on leaving Cambridge he went to the R.C.M., studying under Stanford, Parratt, Barton and others. In 1898 he succeeded Walford Davies as organist of Christ Church, Hampstead, in 1901 was made organist of St. Asaph Cathedral, and in the same year returned to St. John's College, Cambridge, as organist and musical director. This post he still (1927) holds. His career has been not only personally distinguished but important to the musical life of the university, which has been much advanced by his many activities. He conducted the performance of 'The Magic Flute' in 1911 (see DENT, E. J., and CAREY, Clive), became conductor of the Cambridge University Musical Society (1912), University Lecturer in Music (1913) and was made a Fellow of St. John's (1914).

He has composed much, and his opera 'The Two Sisters' (3 acts), text by Marjorio Fausset, founded on the ballad 'The Two Sisters o' Binnorie,' was performed at Cambridge in Feb. 1922. His works of concerted chamber music, including three string quartets (one in C was produced by the Philharmonic String Quartet in 1915) and a string quintet in D, have qualities of refined scholarship and charm, but it is by several short choral works with orchestra that he has made his chief mark. These include 'Andromeda' for soli, choir and orchestra (Bristol Festival, 1908), 'Coronach' for baritone solo, choir and orchestra, 'For the Fallen,' a setting of Binyon's poem, somewhat overshadowed by Elgar's more famous one (published 1914, first performed Cambridge, 1919) and 'Brown Earth' (published in Carnegie Collection). This last, a setting of a poem by Thomas Moulton, was first performed at the Albert Hall, London (Mar. 14, 1923), at a concert given by the combined musical societies of Oxford and Cambridge Universities. Rootham has further produced from time to time several works in the smaller forms for orchestra alone, but in the choral works, and especially in 'Brown Earth,' the stimulus of words brings out the more delicate and poetic qualities of his mind and gives distinction to his music.

ROOY, ANTONIUS MARIA JOSEPHUS VAN, known as ANTON (b. Rotterdam, Jan. 1, 1870). According to Baker, he sang treble in a church choir, but after mutation his voice became a fine baritone, on account of which he left a cigar business and studied singing with Stockhausen at Frankfurt. After singing in concerts he was engaged at Bayreuth in 1897, through the recommendation of Frau Wagner's daughter Frau Prof. Thode, who had heard him sing very finely at a concert 'Wotan's Farewell.' At Bayreuth he made an instant success as Wotan in the three parts of the Trilogy, on account of his commanding presence, his sonorous voice and his dignified acting. In the winter he sang these parts at Berlin, and on May 11, 1898, he made his debut at Covent Garden as Wotan in 'Die Walkure' with great success. Subsequently he sang at that theatre almost every season until 1913, being identified with the Wagner parts, Wolfram, Kurwenal, Hans Sachs, etc. For many years he sang these parts also in America, besides Escamillo and Valentine. Van Rooy was also an admirable Lieder singer, and in 1899 and 1900 gave two recitals at St. James's Hall with Carl Friedberg the pianist, when he sang the entire 'Dichterliebe' of Schumann, and songs ranging from Haydn to Richard Strauss and Hugo Wolf.

ROPARTZ, JOSEPH GUY MARIE (b. Guingamp, Côtes du Nord, June 15, 1884), came of an old Breton family. His studies, diligently pursued at Rennes, Vannes and Angers, would have qualified him to follow a literary career, but he preferred music. He was a pupil of Th. Dubois (2d 'accessit' in harmony) and of Massenet in the Paris Conservatoire, afterwards of César Franck, who has strongly influenced him. Though his life has been devoted to composition, he has directed, since 1894, the Conservatoire of Nancy with great success and gave a strong impulse to the symphonic concerts of that town. He has occupied the same position at Strassburg since 1919, and also that of director of the Conservatoire. Like his master, César Franck, he is a teacher. He has composed dramatic and so-called absolute music. His dramatic production includes: 'Le Diable couturier' (1894); 'Marguerite d'Ecosse' (both in one act); incidental music to 'Pêcheur d'Islande' (1891) (Loti and Tiercelin), played in Paris in 1893; and to 'Edipe à Colonne'; 'Le Miracle de Saint-Nicolas,' a legend in two parts (1905). 'Le Pays,' a musical drama in 3 acts (1908-10), (poem by Charles Le Goffic), performed at Nancy, Feb. 1913, and at Paris (Opéra-Comique), Apr. 15 of the same year, his chief dramatic work, aroused the greatest interest. Of French inspiration solely, its musical conception is characteristic of the composer's manner. 'The music,' writes E. Burlingame Hill, 'is tensively dramatic, effective stylistically and strongly original. The orchestra reinforces the stage situation admirably by its varied and highly coloured sonority.' But J. G. Ropartz is, as V. d'Indy has termed it, a born symphonic musician.

RORE, CIPRIANO DE (b. Mechlin or Antwerp, c. 1516; d. Parma, end of 1565), composer of the Venetian school. He studied under Willaert,¹ maestro di cappella of St. Mark's, Venice, and was probably in early life a singer in that cathedral. In 1542 he brought out his first book of madrigals a 5, and in 1550 his first book a 4 appeared, a work long held in favour,² and for the next seven or eight years published continually.³ About 1550 he appears to have left Venice for the court of Hercules II., Duke of Ferrara, and for some years we hear nothing of him.⁴ In 1558 he was given leave of absence to visit his parents at Antwerp, and soon afterwards visited the court of Margaret of Austria, Governess of the Netherlands, whose husband, Duke Ottavio Farnese, engaged him as his maestro di cappella at Parma. On the death of Willaert he was appointed his successor, Oct. 18, 1563. He resigned this position almost immediately, and returned to the court of Parma in July 1564, where he died, in the autumn of 1565. He was buried in the cathedral of that city, and the following epitaph gives an authentic sketch of his life:

² The Petis library at Brussels contains important copies of three editions, 1552, 1559 and 1562. The edition in the B.M. is 1575.

Motets Bk. I, a 5, Venice, 1544 (B.M.); bk. II, a 4 and 5, Venice, 1547 (Petis, Biogr.), bk. III, a 5, Venice, 1549 (Eitner)
Madrigals Bk. I, a 5, Venice, 1542; bk. II, a 5, Venice, 1544 (B.M.); Q.-L. gives 1552 as the first edition; bk. III, a 5, Venice, 1544. The 1562 edition in B.M., bks. IV and V, (1557 and 1566). The fifth book contains an ode to the Duke of Parma, and from the events of the composer's life we may assume this volume to be one of his latest publications. For the first book of madrigals a 4, see above. The second was printed in 1557, and in 1565 came out a selection of the four- and five-part madrigals, as 'Le vive flamme,' etc. A large number of the four-part madrigals were brought out in score in 1577.

Chromatic madrigals Bk. I, a 5, 1544 (B.M.); the word 'ritampato' on title-page shows that this is not the first edition. The first book was reprinted as late as 1593 (Petis library). Burney has inserted one number in his History.

The position to which Rore attained at St. Mark's, and the rank as a musician which contemporary writers assigned him, point to his having been something of an innovator, and a really original composer. His sacred and secular compositions were frequently reprinted,⁶ and were included in many collections of the time.⁷ (See Q.-L. for these and for MS. copies.) We know that they were held in high esteem in the court chapel at Munich, and were constantly performed there under Lassus's direction.⁸ Duke Albert of Bavaria caused a superb copy of Rore's motets to be made for his library, where it remains to this day, with a portrait of the composer on the last page, by the court painter Michael.

ROSA (ROSE), CARL AUGUST NICOLAS (b. Hamburg, Mar. 22, 1842; d. Paris, Apr. 30, 1889), was educated as a violin-player and made such progress as to be sent to the Leipzig Conservatorium, which he entered in 1859. He afterwards studied at the Paris Conservatoire, and obtained the post of Konzertmeister at Hamburg in 1863. In 1866 he came to England and appeared as a solo player at the Crystal Palace on Mar. 10. After a short stay in London he joined Bateman in a concert-tour in the United States, and there met Madame Parepa (see PAREPA-ROSA), whom he married at New York, in Feb. 1867. His wife's success on the stage led to the formation of a company under the management and conductorship of Rose, which, during its early campaigns could boast such names as Parepa, Wachtel, Santley, Ronconi and Formes among its artists.

Early in 1871 Rose—who by this time had changed his name to Rosa to avoid mistakes in pronunciation—returned to England with his wife, and then made a lengthened visit to Egypt for health. After this they again returned to London, but Madame Parepa-Rosa died almost immediately, Jan. 21, 1874. Rosa, however, was resolved to test the fortunes of English opera in London, and on Sept. 11, 1875, he opened the Princess's Theatre with a company including Miss Rose Hersee as prima donna, Santley and other good singers.

G.

Rosa's subsequent career was bound up with the fortunes of the opera company which he directed till his death (see CARL ROSA OPERA COMPANY).

ROSA, SALVATORE (b. Arenella, near Naples, July 21, 1615; d. Rome, Mar. 15, 1673). His father Vito Antonio de Rosa sent him to be educated at the college of the padri Somaschi. He soon began to study music, and became an expert player of the lute, improvising accompaniments and interludes to his own verses. His ambition to go to Rome and devote himself seriously to painting seemed on the point of being fulfilled in 1635, when he visited Rome for the first time. But becoming ill, he returned to Naples at the end of six months, and there became a pupil of the painter, Aniello Falcone, until 1637. Then again he went to Rome, and accompanied a friend, Mercurio, in the service of the Cardinal Brancaccio, to Viterbo, where he received a commission to paint an altar-piece.

⁶ His collected madrigals a 4 were published in score, Venice, 1677.

After a visit to Naples, he was again in Rome in 1638 until Sept. 1640, when he went to Florence to take an appointment as painter to the court of the Medici, a post he held for nearly nine years. During this time he met Filippo Lippi, poet and painter, and Cesti, the musician, and wrote La strega, to which Cesti composed the music, and Il lamento, later on set to music by Bandini. It was probably towards the end of 1640 that he wrote the satire La musica, a violent attack on the depraved taste shown in Italian church music. It was not published till some years after Rosa's death, and evidently caused much agitation. It was answered with a bitterness almost equal to its own by Mattheson in his Mithridat wider den Gift einer welschen Satyre, genannt la Musica, Hamburg, 1749; in which a German translation of the satire is given, with pages of comments and annotations. The six satires, La Musica, La Poesia, La Pittura, La Guerra, La Babilonia and L' Invidia, written by Rosa between 1640 and 1669, were probably first published in Rome in 1695; the title-page, without date, and with Amsterdam falsely indicated as the printing place, is as follows: Satire de Salvator Rosa dedicate a settano. In Amsterdam presso Severo Prothomastix, 12mo, p. 161. It was followed by numberless unauthorised editions. The first dated edition of 186 pages was printed in Amsterdam by J. F. Bernard in 1719, the second edition is dated 1781, and the third 1790. In 1770 there was an edition Con note di A. M. Salvini, printed at Florence, but with Amsterdam on the title page; this was reprinted in 1781, 1784 and 1787.

Rosa on leaving Florence was in Volterra for a time, and then returned to Rome in Feb. 1649. The year 1647 was certainly passed peaceably in Tuscany, in spite of the legend which has it that Rosa was at Naples during the insurrection in July 1647, and was one of the 'compagnia della morte' under the leadership of the painter Falcone. To begin with, no such company existed, and secondly, there are letters preserved, written by Rosa to his friend Maffei, one from Pisa, on Jan. 9, 1647, and another from Florence, on Sept. 26, 1647, in which the tumults at Naples are not even alluded to (Cesareo, Poesie e lettere, 1892, p. 55). In 1650 Rosa again visited Florence, Pisa and Siena, returning to Rome in December, where he worked at his painting, finding relaxation in writing songs to which either he or his friend Cavelli, then in Rome, composed the airs.

Rosa was buried in the church of Santa Maria degli Angioli alle Terme di Diocleziano. Little of his music is known, with the exception of the songs published in the 'Gemma d' antichità' and other modern collections. His position, however, was one of some musical interest. A personal friend of some of the leading composers of the time—Cavalli, Cesti, Bandini and others—he was so far in touch with the new ideas just germinating, as to adopt the method of writing for a single voice with basso continuo accompaniment.

In 1770 Dr. Burney acquired from a great-grand-daughter of Rosa, occupying the same house on the Monte Santa Trinità in Rome in which he had lived and died, a musical manuscript in Rosa's handwriting, containing, besides airs and cantatas by Cesti, Rossi, etc., eight cantatas written and composed by Rosa himself. The airs are melodious and vivacious, and have a good deal of charm. Burney (Hist. of Music, iv. pp. 165-8) gives the music of a certain number of them; they were also included by N. d' Arienzo in his paper on Rosa in the R.M.I., 1894, i. 389.

The better-known airs are 'Vado ben spesso,' printed by Dr. Crotch in Specimens of Various Styles, 1808. Edited by H. Bishop in 'Gemma d' antichità,' No. 26, and in La scuola antica, No. 24, also in Marx's Gluck und die Oper, 1863. Beilage, No. 2. 'Star vicino,' edited by W. H. Calcott, 'Gemma,' No. 27. And 'Selve voi che,' edited by J. Pittmann, London, 1878. A manuscript copy of the latter is in the Vienna Imperial Library, No. 19,242 in Mantuani's catalogue. c. s.

ROSALIA. This name has been given to the identical repetition of a melody a tone higher, keeping the exact intervals of the notes. It comes from an old popular song, 'Rosalia, mia cara,' which begins:

etc.

The objection to this is that at the third bar the key changes abruptly from G to A, with an effect of—

etc.

thus suggesting consecutive fifths between the 1st and 3rd, and consecutive octaves between the 2nd and 4th bars, at the distance, at which they most matter, of a whole tone.

There are some SEQUENCES (q.v.) which, without being exactly rosalias, have almost as repellent an effect. A slight change in the melody and harmony just saves Schumann's Arabeske; a slight change in the harmony fails to save 'Salve, dimora.'

ROSAMUNDE FÜRSTIN VON CYPERN ('Rosamund, Princess of Cyprus), romantic play in 4 acts; written by Wilhelmine Christine von Chezy, the overture and incidental music by Schubert (op. 26). Produced Theater an der-Wien, Vienna, Dec. 20, 1823, and only performed twice. The overture (in C), known as the 'Overture to Rosamunde' (op. 26) was composed for the melodrama of the 'Zauberharfe,' or Magic Harp. See SCHUBERT.

ROSE or KNOT (Fr. rosace; Fr. and Ger. Rosette; Ital. rosa), the ornamental device or scutcheon inserted in the sound-hole of the table of stringed instruments, such as the lute, guitar, mandoline, dulcimer or harpsichord, serving not only a decorative purpose, but—in the Netherlands especially—as the maker's 'trade mark.' In the harpsichord and spinet there was usually but one sound-hole with its rose; but owing to the origin of these keyboard instruments from the psaltery, their analogy with the lute, and the fact of the Roman lutes having three, several sound-holes were sometimes perforated. In fact, a harpsichord dated 1531 was seen in Italy by the eminent art critic, T. J. Gullick, which possessed no less than five, each with a rose inserted. From the analogy above referred to, the old Italian harpsichord makers named the bottom of the instrument 'cassa armonica' (sound-chest); as if its office were like that of the back of the lute or viol, while the belly was the 'piano armonico' (sound-flat).¹ The Flemings, retaining the sound-hole, doubtless adhered more or less to this erroneous notion of a sound-chest. The Hitchcocks in England (1620 and later) appear to have been the first to abandon it; no roses are seen in their instruments. Kirkman in the next century still adhered to the rose and trade scutcheon, but Shudi did not. In the Giornale de' Letterati d' Italia (Venice, 1711, tom. v.), Scipione Maffei, referring to Cristofori, who had recently invented the pianoforte, approves of his retention of the principle of the rose in his ordinary harpsichords, although contemporary makers for the most part had abandoned it. But Cristofori, instead of a large rose, to further, as he thought, the resonance, used two small apertures in the front. Under the head RUCKERS will be found illustrations of the rose or rosace, as used by those great makers.

ROSÉ, ARNOLD JOSEF (b. Oct. 24, 1863), a distinguished violinist, who, in 1881, became Konzertmeister to the Vienna court orchestra. He founded the Rosé Quartet (with R. C. Fischer, A. Ruzitska, F. Buxbaum), and has led its consistently fine performances in many European tours. J. Walther became violoncellist of the Quartet in 1921.

ROSE, JOHANN HEINRICH VIKTOR (b. Quedlinburg, Dec. 7, 1743; d. there, Mar. 9, 1820). After studying several instruments with his father, a town-musician (waits), 1756, the Princess Amalia of Prussia took him to Berlin to study the violoncello under Mara and Graul; in 1763 he became chamber musician to the Prince of Anhalt-Bernburg, and in 1772, through the influence of Princess Amalia, organist at Quedlinburg Cathedral. He was an excellent teacher and composed 3 sonatas for violoncello, op. 1, and melodies for the Quedlinburg Hymn Book (1791).

ROSEINGRAVE (ROSEINGRAVE), (1) DANIEL (d. Golden Lane, Dublin, May 1727), church musician and organist. He received his early musical education as one of the children of the Chapel Royal; though whether before 1660, under Captain Cook, or after that date, under Pelham Humfrey, is uncertain. He is stated subsequently to have studied under Dr. John Blow and Henry Purcell. He was organist of Gloucester Cathedral from 1679–81, of Winchester Cathedral from 1682–92, of Salisbury Cathedral from 1692–98, was appointed organist and vicar-choral of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, in 1698, and organist and stipendiary of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, in the same year. Hawkins said that he retired from the organistship of St. Patrick's in 1719 in favour of his son Ralph, but remained organist of Christ Church until his death. This is inaccurate; he made an application to the Chapter to this effect, but instead Ralph was appointed vicar and probably did duty for his father.² He married Ann, daughter of the Rev. Thomas Washbourne, D.D., who survived him, and by whom he had several children, including his sons Thomas and Ralph, who were also distinguished musicians. There appear to have been Roseingraves in Ireland before Daniel Roseingrave's time, as mention is made in the Chapter Acts of Christ Church of a lease from the Dean and Chapter to one Ralph Roseingrave in 1661.

Daniel Roseingrave succeeded Robert Hodge as organist of St. Patrick's. Hodge, who resigned the post of organist, was thereupon appointed 'Master of the song to the Quire,' apparently as a solatium for losing the post of organist. The arrangement does not appear to have been a happy one, for in 1699 we find a Chapter Act in the following words:

¹ In modern Italian we more frequently meet with 'tompagno,' tavola armonica, and 'fondo,' meaning 'belly,' or 'sound-board.'

'The said Dean and Chapter having received information that Mr. Hodge and Mr. Roseingrave, two of the Vicars-choral, gave each other very scurrilous language in Christ Church, Dublin, and after went together to the tavern and there fought, upon which the said Hodge and Roseingrave were ordered to appear before the said Dean and Chapter to answer in their places touching such their misdemeanours. And upon hearing what they could severally say for themselves touching the matter. And it thereupon appearing to the said Dean and Chapter that Mr. Roseingrave was ye first and chief aggressor, and that also the said Mr. Hodge was to blame. It was thereupon ordered by the aforesaid Dean and Chapter that the said Mr. Daniell Roseingrave should forthwith pay into the hands of ye steward of the said Vicars choralls the sum of three pounds and the said Mr. Hodge the sum of 20s. sterling for a penall mulct for such their offences, the same to be disposed of as the said Dean shall think fite, and that the said Mr. Roseingrave should then and there beg publick pardon of the said Mr. Hodge for the scurrilous language hee gave him as aforesaid, which was accordingly done in the presence of the said Dean and Chapter.'

Robert Hodge, it may be mentioned, had previously, when organist of Wells Cathedral (1688), been corrected and admonished for breaking windows.

At Christ Church Cathedral Roseingrave appears to have been equally combative. By a Chapter Act in 1700 the Dean and Chapter, on hearing the Petition of Daniel Roseingrave complaining of assault by Mr. Thomas Finell,

'ordered on hearing the Petition of Daniel Roseingrave and examination of several witnesses that the said Daniel Roseingrave and Thomas Finell be and are hereby suspended ab officio et beneficio ; and further ordered 'that from henceforth no Vicar or Stipendiary of this Church do wear a sword under the penalty of expulsion.'

This suspension was subsequently removed on payment of 'mulets' by the offending parties.

By his will, dated Oct. 21, 1724, Daniel Roseingrave left the house in Peter Street, Dublin, in which he then dwelt, to his 'second son Ralph,'¹ to whom he also left the residue of his property, subject to his providing an annuity of £20 for his (Daniel's) wife, the said Ann Roseingrave. To his 'eldest son Thomas' he only left five shillings. Daniel Roseingrave died at Golden Lane (the same street where, fifty-five years later, John Field was born), and was buried in the churchyard of St. Bride's Church. His widow died in 1732-33, and was buried in the old churchyard in St. Patrick's Cathedral.

Although Daniel Roseingrave seems to have written a great deal of church music, and is highly spoken of as a composer by Burney and Hawkins, very little of his music is now extant. One of his anthems, 'Lord, Thou art become gracious,' is preserved in manuscript in the library of Christ Church, Oxford, and another, 'Haste Thee, O Lord,' in the Bodleian Library. J. S. Bumpus had autograph scores of four other anthems of his.

By a Chapter Act of Christ Church, Dublin, dated Dec. 15, 1699, it is ordered 'that the Proctor do pay unto Mr. Daniel Roseingrave three pounds as a gratuity for his writing three services and two Creds for the use of the Church.' Unfortunately all traces of these compositions have long since disappeared.

(2) THOMAS (b. Winchester, 1690; d. Dunleary, June 23, 1766), second son of Daniel Roseingrave. At the age of 7 he came with his father to Dublin, and from him received his early education in music. Thomas Roseingrave entered Trinity College, Dublin, in 1707, and his then age is given in the College Register as 16. He did not, however, proceed to his degree in Arts.

In a Chapter Act of St. Patrick's Cathedral, dated Dec. 14, 1709, it is ordered by the Dean and Chapter

'that whenever Thomas Roseingrave sonn of Daniell Roseingrave, the present organist of the said Cathedral, being nunded to travell beyond seas to improve himself in the art of music, and that hereafter he may be useful and serviceable to the said Cathedral, ty tenne guineas be by the Proctor of the said Canoury given him as a gift from the said Canoury towards bearing his charges'

He went to Italy in 1710, and at Venice made the acquaintance of the Scarlattis, Alessandro and Domenico. For the latter he appears to have formed a great admiration. Burney² says that he 'followed him to Rome and Naples, and hardly ever quitted him while he remained in Italy, which was not till after the Peace of Utrecht [1713], as appears by an anthem which he composed at Venice in 1713, "Arise, shine, for thy light is come."'

The manuscript of this anthem, which he wrote with orchestral accompaniment, is preserved in the Tudway collection (Harl. MS. 7342). Burney says of it, 'There is much fire in the introductory symphony, which is of a very modern cast.' How long he continued abroad is not exactly known, but in 1720 we find him in London, where he produced, at the Haymarket Theatre, Domenico Scarlatti's opera, 'Narciso,' with two additional songs and two duets of Roseingrave's own composition.

As a composer and organist he appears to have been held in high estimation, his powers of reading at sight and of improvising being especially dwelt on by his contemporaries.

In 1725 he was appointed the first organist of St. George's, Hanover Square. There were seven other competitors, all of whom had to give a performance on the organ before Dr

¹ Although in his will Daniel describes Ralph as his 'second son,' his eldest son was DANIEL, JUNIOR (b. Winchester 1688, d. before 1734), entered Trinity College, Dublin, in 1702, obtained a scholarship in 1705, and took out his B.A. degree in 1707. He was doubtless the 'young Roseingrave' who appears by the College Register to have been appointed organist of Trinity College Chapel in 1708, as in that year Thomas was only fourteen, and Ralph still younger. In 1707 he was given leave of absence for one year, 'in order to improve himself in music.' He had probably died some years before 1724, the date of his father's will.

Greene, Dr. Pepusch and Calliard, who acted as judges. Burney says that Roseingrave's performance of the set pieces was by no means good, but that when he was asked to improvise on given themes, he 'treated the subjects with such science and dexterity, inverting the order of notes, augmenting and diminishing their value, introducing counter subjects, and treating the themes to so many ingenious purposes, that the judges were unanimous in declaring him the victorious candidate.'

Archdeacon Coxo, in his Anecdotes of George Frederick Handel and John Christopher Smith, speaking of Roseingrave at this time, says:

'His reputation was at this period so high that on commencing teaching he might have gained one thousand pounds a year, but an unfortunate event reduced him to extreme distress. Among Roseingrave's scholars was a young lady to whom he was greatly attached, and whose affections he had gained, but her father, who intended to give her a large fortune, did not approve of her marrying a musician, and forbade Roseingrave his house. This disappointment affected his brain, and he never entirely recovered the shock. He neglected his scholars and lost his business. He lived upon fifty pounds per annum, which his place produced, and was often in indigence. He was perfectly rational upon every subject but the one nearest his heart; whenever that was mentioned he was quite insane.'

In 1737-38 he was compelled to give up the organ-ship, and lived for some time at Hampstead. Thence he removed¹ to Dublin, where he probably lived with his nephew, William Roseingrave (b. 1725), a son of RALPH (3), who at this time (1753) held the office of Chief Chamberlain of the Exchequer Court.

Mrs. Delany, in her memoirs, under date Jan. 12, 1753, writes:

'Mr. Roseingrave, who was sent away from St. George's Church on account of his mad fits, is now in Ireland, and at times can play very well on the harpsichord.'

Faulkner's Dublin Journal of Feb. 3, 1753, contains an announcement that 'the celebrated Opera of "Phaëdra and Hippolytus," composed by Mr. Roseingrave lately arrived from London, will be performed at the Great Music Hall in Fishamble Street, and conducted by himself on Tuesday the 6th of March. Between the acts Mr. Roseingrave will perform Scarlatti's "Lessons on the Harpsichord," with his own additions, and will conclude with his celebrated "Almand."

And in the same Journal of Feb. 27, we read:

'Yesterday there was a public rehearsal of Mr. Roseingrave's Opera of "Phaëdra and Hippolytus" at the great Music Hall in Fishamble Street, to a numerous audience, which met the highest applause, the connoisseurs allowing it to exceed any musical performance ever exhibited here, in variety, taste, and number of good songs.'

One wonders if the writer of this notice had been at the production of the 'Messiah' in the same hall eleven years earlier.

Two anthems of Thomas Roseingrave ('Great is the Lord' and 'One Generation') are included in the manuscript collection of anthems in the R.C.M. He was an enthusiastic admirer of Palestrina, and is said to have adorned the walls of his bedroom with scraps of paper containing extracts from the works of that master.

He was buried on June 26, 1766, in the churchyard of St. Patrick's Cathedral, in the same grave with his brother Ralph. The inscription on the tombstone adds that he died in the 78th year of his age, 'a most celebrated musician and accomplished man.' Although an inscription added to this tombstone at a later date (1802) states that his wife, Mrs. Jane Roseingrave, is also buried there, this is incorrect, as the Jane Roseingrave in question was the wife of the before-mentioned William Roseingrave, who died in 1780, and is buried in an adjoining grave. Thomas Roseingrave does not appear to have been married.

The most important of his published compositions are: Fifteen voluntaries and fugues for the organ or harpsichord; six double fugues for the organ or harpsichord; the opera 'Phaëdra and Hippolytus'; eight suits of lessons for the harpsichord or spinet; six cantatas (Italian words); the additional songs and duets sung with Scarlatti's opera 'Narciso'; and twelve solos for the German flute with thorough-bass for the harpsichord. He edited the 'Forty-Two Suits of Lessons for the Harpsichord by Domenico Scarlatti,' prefixing an introductory movement in G minor.

(3) RALPH (b. Salisbury, c. 1695, d. 1747), the youngest son of Daniel Roseingrave, received his musical education from his father. In 1718-19 Daniel Roseingrave petitioned the Dean and Chapter of St. Patrick's Cathedral, Dublin, to allow him to resign the post of organist in favour of his son Ralph, who appears to have been forthwith appointed vicar-choral, but did not formally succeed his father as organist until 1726. On his father's death in 1727 he also succeeded him as organist of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, at a salary of fifty pounds per annum. He appears to have written a good deal of church music. Eight of his anthems and two Services in C and F are preserved at Christ Church, and some of them are still sung there. Another anthem of his, 'O God of Truth,' is published in Hullah's Part Music, and an old organ book in the possession of J. S. Bumpus contains a Service of his in F with a setting of the Benedicite. He is buried in the churchyard of St. Patrick's Cathedral. The headstone mentions that his wife Sarah, who died in 1746, and four of their children, are buried with him, as are also his mother Ann Roseingrave, and his brother Thomas. Ralph Roseingrave is sometimes mentioned as having taken part as a soloist in the production of the 'Messiah' on Apr. 13, 1742, but Dr. J. C. Culwick, in his pamphlet on the original Word Book of Handel's 'Messiah' (1891), points out the improbability of his having done so.

ROSELLEN, HENRI (b. Paris, Oct. 13, 1811; d. there, Mar. 18, 1876), son of a PF. maker, took a second PF. prize at the Conservatoire, 1827, and a first harmony prize, 1828. He was a pupil and imitator of Herz. He published nearly 200 works for PF., including a 'Méthode de piano' (Heugel), a collection of progressive exercises entitled 'Manuel des pianistes' (Ibid.), a trio for piano and strings, and many separate pieces of drawing-room character, one of which, a Réverie (op. 32, No. 1), enjoyed an extraordinary popularity for many years over the whole of Europe. a.

ROSENHAIN, JACOB (b. Mannheim, Dec. 2, 1813; d. Baden-Baden, Mar. 21, 1894), eldest son of a banker. His teachers were Jacob Schmitt, Kalliwoda and Schnyder von Wartensee. His first appearance as a pianoforte-player was in 1823 at Frankfort, where his success induced him to take up his residence. A one-act piece of his, 'Der Besuch im Irrenhause,' was produced at Frankfort, Dec. 29, 1834, with great success; his second, 'Liswenna,' three acts, was never performed in its original form. In 1837 he came to London, played at the Philharmonic, Apr. 17, and was much heard in the concerts of the day. After this he took up his abode in Paris, where he became very prominent, giving chamber concerts in combination with Alard, Ernst and other eminent players, and carrying on a school of pianoforte-playing in conjunction with J. B. Cramer. His early opera 'Liswenna' was provided with a new libretto (by Bayard and Arago), and brought out at the Opéra as 'Le Démon de la nuit,' Mar. 17, 1851. It had, however, but a moderate success, and was withdrawn after four representations, though it was afterwards occasionally played in Germany. Another one-act piece, 'Volage et jaloux,' produced at Baden-Baden, Aug. 3, 1863, completes the list of his works for the stage. In instrumental music he was much more prolific. He composed three symphonies—in G minor (op. 42), played at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, under Mendelssohn's direction, Jan. 31, 1846; in F minor (op. 43), played at Brussels, and at the Philharmonic, London, Apr. 24, 1854; 'Im Frühling,' in F major (op. 61), rehearsed at the Conservatoire, and played at a Concert Populaire; four trios for PF. and strings; one PF. concerto; three string quartets; two violoncello sonatas; twelve characteristic studies (op. 17) and twenty-four 'Études mélodiques' (op. 20), both for PF. solo; a PF. concerto, op. 73; sonata, op. 74; do. PF. and violoncello, op. 98; 'Am Abend' for quartet, op. 99. Also various pieces for piano entitled 'Poèmes,' 'Réveries,' etc.; a biblical cantata, and various songs, etc. Schumann criticised several of his pieces with kindness and liberality. a.

ROSENMÜLLER, JOHANN (b. Pelsnitz, Vogtland of Saxony, c. 1619; d. Wolfenbützel, Sept. 10 or 11, 1684). In spite of the poverty of his parents the arrangements of the time enabled him to obtain a good general education, and in 1640 his name appears inscribed in the Matriculation-book of the University of Leipzig. In 1642 he became collaborator or assistant-master at the Thomasschule. In musical matters he would appear to have been mainly a pupil of Tobias Michael, who then held the important office of cantor at the school. In 1645 Rosenmüller published his first work, a work for instruments entitled 'Paduanen, Alemanden, Couranten, Balletten, Sarabanden mit 3 Stimmen und ihrem Basso pro Organo.' A more important work was his 'Kernsprüche,' published in two parts, 1648 and 1652-53, each part consisting of twenty Latin and German motets on Scripture and other church texts for three to seven voices, mostly with accompaniment of two violins, and also occasionally trombones and other instruments with basso continuo. When Tobias Michael became too infirm to discharge adequately his duties as cantor, Rosenmüller acted as his deputy, and in this position gave such satisfaction to the city council as to obtain the promise of succession to the cantorship. In 1651 he also held the post of organist at the Nikolaikirche. But in May 1655 his prospects of further promotion were blighted by an accusation made against him of some grave moral offence, for which he was temporarily imprisoned. He succeeded in effecting his escape, and betook himself for a time to Hamburg. From Hamburg he is said to have addressed a 'Supplication' to the Elector of Saxony, Johann Georg I., along with a setting of the Hymn of Albinus, 'Straf mich nicht in deinem Zorn.' This would almost seem to be an admission of his guilt, although Winterfeld in his Evangelischer Kirchengesang endeavours to prove him innocent of the charge made against him. However the case may be, Rosenmüller did not feel himself safe in Hamburg, but fled to Italy, and settled in Venice as a teacher of music for a considerable number of years.

Of his stay in Venice little would have been known if Johann Philipp Krieger, who was afterwards Kapellmeister at Weissenfels, had not sought him out and become his pupil in composition. A large number of works existing only in MS., consisting of Latin motets, Vesper Psalms, Lamentations, and various parts of the Mass, must be referred to this Venetian stay. The only work published in Venice was one for instruments, entitled 'Sonate da camera cioè Sinfonie, Alemande, Correnti, Balletti, Sarabande da suonare con 5 strom. da arco et altri' . . . 1670. This work was dedicated to Duke Johann Friedrich of Brunswick, who became acquainted with the composer on the occasion of one of his visits to Venice. It has been republished, D.D.T. vol. xviii., where also in his introduction the editor, Karl Nef, traces the influence of the Venetian operasymphonies upon Rosenmüller's style of instrumental composition. The acquaintance with Duke Johann Friedrich had important consequences for Rosenmüller. It led to his recall to Germany. Duke Johann Friedrich recommended him to his brother the reigning Duke Anton Ulrich, who was an enlightened patron of literature and music, and himself a hymn-writer of some reputation. In 1674 Duke Anton Ulrich appointed Rosenmüller Kapellmeister at Wolfenbüttel, where he remained for the rest of his life. Only one other work was published in this later period of his life, 'Sonato a 2, 3, 4, e 5 stromenti da arco et altri' . . . Nuremberg, 1682, dedicated to his patron Duke Anton Ulrich. A large number of German motets and cantatas belonging to this time remained unpublished. None of Rosenmüller's vocal works has yet been republished in modern editions, with the exception of two Choral-tunes and settings—'Straf mich nicht in deinem Zorn' and 'Welt ade, ich bin dein müde.' The former of these tunes indeed seems far less suitable to its original German words than to those of the Easter hymns to which it has been so successfully adapted in English hymn-books, 'Christ the Lord is risen again.' Of Rosenmüller's 5-voice setting of 'Welt ade' it would appear that Sebastian Bach thought so highly that he took it over bodily from Vopelius' 'Leipziger Gesangbuch,' 1682, to incorporate it into his own church-cantata of 1731, 'Wer weiss, wie nahe mir mein Ende.' This led to both tune and setting being afterwards ascribed to Bach in earlier editions of his 'Choral-gesänge.'

ROSENTHAL, MORIZ (b. Lemberg, Dec. 18, 1862), pianist. His father was a professor in the chief Academy at Lemberg. From him Rosenthal obtained the solid foundation of the philosophical turn of mind which early in his career became very fully developed. At 8 years of age the boy began the study of the pianoforte under a certain Galoth. In 1872 Carl Mikuli, then director of the Lemberg Conservatorium, took charge of Rosenthal's education, and within the same year played in public with him Chopin's rondo in C for two pianos. When, in 1875, the family moved to Vienna, Rosenthal became a pupil of Joseffy, who set to work systematically to ground the boy on Tausig's method. The results were astonishing enough, since in 1876 Rosenthal played at his first public recital Beethoven's thirty-two variations, Chopin's F minor concerto, and some Liszt and Mendelssohn. Promptly a tour followed through Roumania, where at Bucharest the king created the 14-year-old lad court pianist. In the next year Liszt came into Rosenthal's life, and henceforth played a great part therein, and in 1878 and subsequently they were together in Weimar and Rome. As Liszt's pupil Rosenthal then appeared in Paris, St. Petersburg and elsewhere.

Meanwhile the philosophical studies were by no means neglected, for in 1880 Rosenthal qualified at the Staatsgymnasium in Vienna to take the philosophical course at the University, where he studied with Zimmermann, Brentano and Hanslick (musical aesthetics). Six years elapsed before he resumed public pianoforte-playing. Then there followed in quick succession, after a triumph in the Liszt Verein at Leipzig, a long series of concert tours, in America and elsewhere, which brought him ultimately to England in 1895 and to America again later. As a master of technique Rosenthal is not surpassed by any pianist of his time, while as an interpreter, especially of music of the modern composers and of Schubert, he earned a prodigious reputation. To his great technical accomplishment he adds a beautiful touch, and to those who know him personally he is a musician of unquestionable distinction.

ROSIERS (ROZIERS), ANDRÉ DE, SIEUR DE BEAULIEU, a 17th-century French composer of 16 books, 'Les libertez de . . . à 4 parties' (dessus, haute-contre, taille, basse-contre), published between 1634 and 1672; 'Alphabet de chanson pour danser et pour boire,' book iv., Paris, 1646.

ROSIIERS, CHARLES, a 17th-century violinist, afterwards vice-Kapellmeister of the Elector of Cologne, at Bonn; composed a book of motets (1688); 'Pièces choisies à la manière italienne,' for flute, violin and other instruments (1691); 14 'Sonate per le violino et le hautbois,' à 6 parties (2 dessus, haut-contre, bassus, basso continuo et trompette), and a guitar tutor (1699); symphonies by him were advertised at Amsterdam in 1691.

ROSIN (RESIN) (Fr. colophane), a preparation applied to the hair of the violin bow to give it the necessary 'bite' upon the strings. Rosin is the residuary gum of turpentine after distillation. The ordinary rosin of commerce is a coarse, hard substance, quite useless to the fiddler, for whom the rough material undergoes a process of refinement. The ancient English recipe was to boil rough rosin down in vinegar, a process no longer in vogue, as excellent French rosin is now to be had at a very trifling cost. It is prepared by dissolving the rough article in a glazed earthen vessel over a slow charcoal fire. As it melts, it is strained through coarse canvas into a second vessel also kept at a moderate heat, from which it is poured into pasteboard or metal moulds. Some players affect to prefer the rosin of Gland, others that of Vuillaume, but both are made of the same material and at the same factory. Rosin should be transparent, of a darkish yellow colour in the mass, and quite white when pulverised: it ought to fall from the bow, when first applied to the strings, in a very fine white dust: when crushed between the fingers it ought not to feel sticky. The best rosin is made from Venetian turpentine. The same sort of rosin serves for the violin, viola and violoncello. The double-bass bow requires a stiffer preparation than pure rosin, and accordingly double-bass rosin is made of ordinary rosin and white pitch in equal proportions. Emery powder and other matters are sometimes added in the composition of rosin, but are quite unnecessary, and even injurious to the tone. A liquid rosin, applied to the bow with a camel's-hair brush, has its advocates. (See COLOPHANE.)

ROSINA, an English ballad opera, of the 18th century, which attained an extraordinary degree of popularity, holding the boards, as a stock piece, for nearly half a century. The libretto, written by Mrs. Brooke, is founded on the Scriptural story of Ruth and Boaz; or of Palemon and Lavina, in Thomson's 'Seasons,' a subject which has inspired numbers of theatrical pieces.

The opera was first produced at Covent Garden in 1783, and its music was written, selected and arranged by William Shield. Miss Harper took the title-rôle; Mrs. Martyr, Phœbe; and Mrs. Kennedy the hero, William, while the rest of the male characters were taken by Banister, Brett and Davies.

ROSKOŠNÝ, JOSEF RICHARD (b. Prague, Sept. 21, 1833; d. there, 1913), a Czech composer. He was a successful pianist, touring in Austria-Hungary, Italy, Serbia and Roumania, and composed a good deal of brilliant music for his instrument, as well as many songs in a light folk style. It was, however, as a composer of popular operas that he made a more lasting reputation. The influence of Smetana somewhat strengthened his earlier style, which was coloured by the eroticism of Gounod and the facile side of Mendelssohn. Later in his career the Italian realists came in for a share of his admiration, and the result was his opera 'Stoja,' unique in this respect. His agreeable eclecticism proves that he had no great independence of thought; but his operatic music tells effectively, thanks to his sense of stagecraft. 'Popelka' (Cinderella) continues to keep its place in the repertory of Czech opera. The admirable libretto is by Otakar Hostinský (q.v.), and the music echoes the popular style with a grace not unworthy of a disciple of Smetana.

Operas: 'Mikuláš' (Nicholas), 1870; 'Rvátolanské proudy' (The Rapids of St. John), 1871; 'Popelka' (Cinderella), 1880; 'Stoja,' 1894; 'Satanella,' 1898; 'Černé jezero' (The Black Lake), 1905. Pianoistic pieces and songs.

ROSLAVETZ, NIKOLAI ANDREIVICH (b. Surai, Government of Chernigov, Dec. 24, 1880, O.S.), composer, of peasant origin. He received his musical education at the Moscow Conservatoire, where he won a silver medal for a cantata 'Heaven and Earth' (after Byron). His compositions include:

A symphony (1922); two symphonic poems, a quintet for harp, oboe, two violas and violoncello, 5 string quartets, 2 FF trios, 5 violin sonatas; 2 violoncello sonatas, songs.

ROSS, JOHN (b. Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Oct. 12, 1763; d. Aberdeen, July 28, 1837), was placed in his 11th year under Hawdon, organist of St. Nicholas Church, a disciple of Charles Avison, with whom he studied for seven years. In 1783 he was appointed organist of St. Paul's Chapel, Aberdeen, where he remained until his death. He composed 'An Ode to Charity,' pianoforte concertos and sonatas, songs, canzonets, hymns, waltzes, etc.

ROSSELLI (ROSSELLI, ROSSELLO, ROUSSEL, RUSSELLO), FRANCESCO, maestro di cappella at St. Peter's, Rome, in 1548, and master of the boys of the cappella Giulia. He retired in 1550. He composed motets and other church music, all in MS.; 2 books of madrigals, 5 v. (1562-63); 1 book madrigals, 4 v. (1565); chansons nouvelles, 4-6 v. (Paris, 1577); also chansons and madrigals in collective volumes (Q.-L.).

ROSSETER, PHILIP (b. circa 1575, d. London, May 6, 1623), lutenist and song-writer. In 1601 was published:

'A Booke of Ayres, set fourth to be song to the Lute, Orpherian and Base Violl, by Philip Rosseter Lutenist. And are to be sold at his house in Fleetstreet neere to the Grayhound. At London [sic] Printed by Peter Short, by the assent of Thomas Morley.' (Eng. Sch. of Lutenist Song-writers)

This book differs from all the other song-books of the English lutenists in that it really consists of two separate books of twenty-one songs each; the first by Campian and the second by Rosseter. There is only one title-page, and the dedication to Sir Thomas Monson and the Address to the Reader are Rosseter's. In the first section the words as well as the music are admittedly by Campian; there is no positive evidence that Campian also wrote the words of Rosseter's songs, but it is commonly assumed that he did so. All the songs in the volume were written as solo-songs without an alternative version for four voices. All Rosseter's songs are simple in construction, but they are very melodious and admirably vocal. In the Address to the Reader Rosseter says some interesting things about song, and he was evidently one of those who did not approve of the complexity of contrapuntal writing.

In 1609 he published a set of

'Lessons for the Consort' made by sundrie excellent Authors and set to sixe several Instruments

Rosseter's association with Kingham, Reeve and Robert Jones for training 'the Children of the Revels to the Queen' is described in the article on Robert JONES, q.v. Campian seems to have been the life-long friend of Rosseter; lying in 1620, he bequeathed him all his property, amounting to about £20, expressing a wish 'that it had bin farr more.' Rosseter died in Fetter Lane, and was buried on May 7, at St. Dunstan's in the West, where Campian also was buried. He left a widow and two sons; his brother Hugh is also mentioned in his will (P.C.C., 41 Swann). E. H. F.

ROSSETTO (ROSETO, ROSETUS), STEFFANO (b. Nice), lived in 1565 in Florence. In 1567 he was musician of Cardinal de Medici there; 1579-80 organist of Munich court chapel; and, according to Riemann, maestro di cappella at Novara. He composed 1 book madrigals, 4 v. (1560); 2 books madrigals, 5 v. (1560, 1566); 1 book madrigals, 6 v. (1566); a madrigal cycle, 'Il lamento di Olimpia,' with 1 canzona, 5-10 v. (1567). All these were published at Venice. 1 book motets, 5-6 v., so contrived that they may be used for all manner of instruments (Nuremberg, 1573), dedicated to Archduke Ferdinand of Austria. Eitner in Q.-L. says that his name in the documents of the Munich court chapel appears once as Joseph N. Roseto, and in another place as Steffan Roseto; this appears rather to suggest two different people.

cians of this name are enumerated in Q.-L., and as there are motets and other works in various libraries attributed to 'Rossi' without further identification, there is still a large field open for careful research before the facts can be absolutely ascertained. Of these older bearers of the name there are seven who may be distinguished as important: (1) SALOMONE, a Jewish musician, was at the court of Mantua from 1587-1628, when he appears to have died. He enjoyed such high favour with two successive dukes that he was privileged to dispense with the yellow badge that all Jews were ordered to wear. He issued madrigals and canzonets in 1589, 1600, 1602, 1603, 1610, 1614 and 1628, but his most important works were instrumental, being contained in four books, called 'Sinfonie e gagliardo' and 'Sonate' (1607, 1608, 1623 and 1636). He wrote 28 compositions (a 4-8) to Hebrew psalms, published in two editions, in Hebrew and Italian, in 1623. The authority for his life is Birnbaum's Judische Musiker am Hofe zu Mantua. A selection from his vocal music was published in 1877 by S. Naumburg and Vincent d'Indy, and examples of his instrumental music are included in Riemann's 'Alte Kammermusik.'

(2) GIOVANNI BATTISTA (b. Genoa), a monk, who published in 1618 at Venice a book on mensural notation, Organo de cantori per intendere da se steno ogni passo difficile, etc., containing cantilene a 2-5, and a book of four-part masses in the same year. M.

(3) MICHAEL ANGELO, a Roman musician of the earlier part of the 17th century, was a pupil of Frescobaldi for organ-playing. He is known as the composer of an opera entitled 'Erminia sul Giordano,'¹ which in 1635 or 1637² was performed with all stage accessories in the Palace of Taddeo Barberini, Prefect of Rome and Prince of Palestrina. It was published in 1637, and dedicated to the Signora Anna Colonna Barberina, the Princess of Palestrina. A full account of the opera, the libretto of which is based on an episode in Tasso's Gerusalemme liberata, is given in H. Goldschmidt's Studien zur Geschichte der italienischen Oper, with some specimens of the music. Like most of the Roman operas of the period, the music would appear to be utterly wanting in any dramatic power; the form of the drama is merely an excuse for scenic decorations and occasional graceful pastoral music. Rossi is better known as a composer for clavier. He published a collection of Toccate e Correnti for organ or cembalo (second edition, Rome, 1657, first edition without date). These are now generally accessible in Torchi's 'L'arte musicale in Italia,' vol. iii. They are modelled on the style of the pieces of the same name by Frescobaldi, but show no advance either in technique or treatment, though the correnti are melodious enough. Previous to this republication by Torchi, there used to appear in various modern collections of older music, such as L. Köhler's 'Maitres du clavecin,' Pauer's 'Alte Meister' and others, an Andantino and Allegro ascribed to Rossi, which have now been proved to be spurious,¹ their whole style showing them to belong to the following century.

(4) LUIGI (b. Torre Maggiore, 1598; d. Rome, Feb. 19, 1653), was, about 1620, in the service of Cardinal Barberini in Rome as a singer. Through Mazarin's influence he was invited to Paris, where on Mar. 2, 1647, his opera 'Le Mariage d'Orphée et Euridice' was given, being the first Italian opera performed in Paris. Five years before he had composed a dramatic work, 'Il palagio d' Atlante,' to words by G. Rospighosi (a copy in the R.C.M. has the title 'Il pallazzo incantato'). Gevaert edited a selection of thirteen cantatas by him. Some of his compositions are in the Bibliothèque Nationale: 'Recueil d'airs italiens.' He was buried at Santa Maria in the Via Lata at Rome.²

(5) FRANCESCO, an Abbate, a native of Apulia (Fétis gives Bari as his birthplace), who brought out several operas in Venice between 1686 and 1689, viz. 'Il Sejoano moderno' (1686), 'La Clorilda' and 'La pena degli occhi' in 1688, and 'Mitrane' in 1689. The last work contains the beautiful air, 'Ah! rendimi quel core,' by which alone his name is known in the present day. An oratorio, 'La caduta dei Giganti,' is in MS.

(6) GIUSEPPE (d. Rome, c. 1719) was successively maestro di cappella at the Castle of St. Angelo, Rome, Pistoia and San Loreto, Rome. A Mass in 12 parts, divided into three choirs, and two settings of Dixit Dominus for 12 and 16 voices respectively, are preserved at Bologna, where the latter are ascribed to the later Giuseppe Rossi.

(7) GIUSEPPE, maestro in the cathedral of Terni, and the composer of an opera, 'La sposa in Livorno,' given in Rome in 1807. He published a treatise, Alli intendenti di contrapunto, in 1809, and several of his motets are at Bologna.

M.

There are, furthermore, three later opera-composers of the name, as follows:

(8) LAURO (b. Macerata, Feb. 19, 1810; d. Cremona, May 5, 1885), a pupil of Crescentini, Furno and Zingarelli at Naples. He began to write at once, and at 18 had his first two operas—'Le contesse villane' and

'La villana contessa'—performed at the Fenice and Nuovo Theatres of Naples respectively. Other pieces followed: one of them, 'Costanza ed Oringaldo,' being written expressly for the San Carlo at the request of Barbaja. On the recommendation of Donizotti, Rossi was engaged for the Teatro Valle at Rome, and there he remained for 1832 and 1833, and composed four operas and an oratorio. In 1834 he moved to Milan, and brought out 'La casa disabitata' (or 'I falsi monetari'), which, though but moderately successful at La Scala, was afterwards considered his chef-d'œuvre, and spoken of as 'Rossi's Barbieri di Siviglia.' It pleased Malibran so much that she induced Barbaja to bespeak another opera from Rossi for the San Carlo, in which she should appear. The opera was composed, and was named 'Amelia' (produced at Naples, Dec. 4, 1834); but owing to her caprice was a failure. She insisted on having a pas de deux inserted for her and Mathis. The theatre was crowded to the ceiling to see the great singer dance; but her dancing did not please the public, and the piece was damned. This disappointment, though somewhat alleviated by the success of his 'Locadia' (1834) seems to have disgusted Rossi with Italy; he accepted an engagement from Mexico, left Europe, Oct. 15, 1835, and arrived at Vera Cruz the 6th of the following January. From Mexico he went to the Havannah, New Orleans and Madras; married in 1841, and returned to Europe, landing at Cadiz, Feb. 3, 1843. He began again at once to compose—'Cellini a Parigi' (Turin, 1845), etc., but with very varying success. In 1846 he reappeared at La Scala at Milan with 'Azema di Granata,' 'Il borgomastro di Schiedam,' and three or four other operas in following years. His great success, however, appears to have been made with 'Il domino nero,' at the Teatro Canobbiana, Sept. 1849. In 1850 he was called to be director of the Conservatorio at Milan. For this institution he published a Guida di armonia pratica orale (Ricordi, 1858), and between 1850 and 1859 composed a great many operas, and detached pieces for voices and for instruments. After the death of Mercadante in 1870, Rossi succeeded him as head of the Conservatorio at Naples. This office he resigned in 1878, and he went to Cremona in 1880, dying there on May 5, 1885. Lists of his works are given by Florimo (Cenni Storici, pp. 948-962), Riemann and Pougin. They comprise 29 operas, a Mass, and a dozen miscellaneous compositions, including six fugues for strings, two sets of vocal exercises, and the Guida to Harmony, already mentioned. His best works are 'Cellini a Parigi,' 'I falsi monetari,' 'La contessa di Mons' and 'Il domino nero.' One of his operas, 'La figlia di Figaro,' is said to have been produced at the Kärnthnerthor theatre.

Vienna, Apr. 17, 1846; and another, 'Biorn,' was announced for performance at the Queen's Theatre, London, Jan. 17, 1877—English libretto by Frank Marshall; but no notice of either performance can be found. An oratorio, 'Saul,' elegies on Bellini and Mercadante, a Mass and other works, are mentioned by Riemann. G.

(9) GIOVANNI GAETANO (b. Borgo San Donnino, Parma, Aug. 5, 1828; d. Parma, Mar. 30, 1886) studied at the Milan Conservatorio, was leader of the orchestra in the theatre at Parma, and organist of the court chapel there, from 1852–73, and director of the Parma Conservatorio in 1864–73. In 1873 he became conductor at the Teatro Carlo Felice, Genoa, until 1879. His operas were: 'Elena di Taranto' (Parma, 1852), 'Giovanni Giscale' (Parma, 1855), 'Niccolò de' Lupi' (Ancona, 1865), 'La contessa d'Altemberg' (Borgo San Donnino, 1872) and 'Maria Sanz' (Bergamo, 1895). A symphony, 'Saul,' won a prize in Paris in 1878, and Rossi wrote besides three masses, an oratorio and a requiem.

(10) CESARE (b. Rivarolo, near Mantua, Jan. 20, 1858) has won success as a teacher of the piano, as director of the music school and conductor at Trent, and as a composer in many branches of art, his opera 'Nadeja' having been received with much favour at Prague in 1903 (Riemann, etc.). M.

ROSSIGNOL, LE, opera in 3 acts, by Igor Stravinsky, founded on a Hans Andersen story. Produced Paris, 1914; Drury Lane, June 18, 1914; in English (Beecham), Covent Garden, Nov. 12, 1919.

ROSSINI, GIOACCHINO ANTONIO (b. Pesaro, Feb. 29, 1792; d. Passy, Nov. 13, 1868), was the only child of Giuseppe Rossini, town-trumpeter (trombadore) of Lugo and inspector of slaughter-houses. In the political struggles of 1796 the father declared himself for the French and for republican government, and was sent to gaol. His wife was thus driven to turn her voice to account and went with her little Gioacchino to Bologna, making her début as 'prima donna buffa' with such success as to procure her engagements in various theatres of the Romagna during the Carnival. Meantime the trombadore had regained his liberty and was engaged as horn-player in the bands of the theatres in which his wife sang. The child was left at Bologna in the charge of a pork butcher, where he acquired a little musical knowledge from a certain Prinetti of Novara, who gave him harpsichord lessons for three years, and later from Angelo Tesoi, a clever master, able to make singing and practical harmony interesting to his pupil. In a few months Rossini learned to read, to accompany and to sing well enough to take solos in church at the modest price of three pauls per service. He was thus able, at the age of 10, to assist his parents, who, owing to a sudden change in his mother's voice, were again in misfortune.

At the age of 13 Rossini was a sufficiently good singer to be well received at the theatre; he also played the horn by his father's side, and had a fair reputation as accompanist. At this time the Chevalier Giusti, commanding engineer at Bologna, took a great affection for the lad, read and explained the Italian poets to him, and opened his fresh and intelligent mind to the comprehension of the ideal; and it was to the efforts of this distinguished man that he owed the start of his genius, and such general knowledge as he afterwards possessed. After three years with Tesoi he put himself under a veteran tenor named Babbini to improve his singing. On Mar. 20, 1807, he was admitted to the counterpoint class of Padre Mattei at the Liceo Comunale of Bologna, and soon after to that of Cavedagni for the violoncello.

Before he entered Mattei's class he had composed a variety of things—little pieces for two horns, songs of Zambini, and even an opera, called 'Demetrio,' for his friends the Mombellis. Mattei, who was a pedant, saw no reason for modifying his usual slow mechanical system to suit the convenience of an able scholar, and after a few months of discouraging labour Gioacchino began to look to instinct and practice for the philosophy, or at least the rhetoric, of this art. It is said that when Mattei explained that the amount of counterpoint which his pupil had already acquired was sufficient for a composer in the 'free style' but that for church-music much severer studies were required, the boy cried, 'What, do you mean that I know enough to write operas?' 'Certainly,' was the reply. 'Then I want nothing more, for operas are all that I desire to write.' Meantime it was necessary that he and his parents should live, and he therefore dropped counterpoint and returned to his old trade of accompanist, gave lessons, and conducted performances of chamber-music.

At the end of his first year at the Liceo his cantata 'Il pianto d'armonia per la morte d'Orfeo' was not only rewarded with the prize, but was performed in public, Aug. 8, 1808. It was followed, not by a symphony, as is sometimes said, but by an overture in the fugued style, in imitation of that to 'Die Zauberflöte,' but so weak, that after hearing it played he destroyed it. The same fate probably attended some pieces for double bass and strings, and a Mass, both written at the instance of an amateur of the double bass.

VENICE AND MILAN.—Through the Marquis Cavalli, who had promised him his interest whenever it should be wanted, Rossini received an invitation to compose an opera from the manager of the San Mosè theatre at Venice, and 'La cambiale di matrimonio' or the 'Matrimonial market,' an opera-buffa in one act, was produced there in the autumn of 1810 and sung by Morandi, Ricci, De Grecis and Raffanelli. Returning to Bologna, he composed for Esther Mombelli's benefit a cantata called 'Didone abbandonata,' and in 1811 he wrote for the Teatro del Corso an opera-buffa in two acts, 'L' equivoco stravagante.'

'Demetrio e Polibio' was brought out at the Teatro Valle by his old friends the Mombellis in 1811. Early in 1812 he produced at the San Mosè theatre, Venice, two buffa operas—'L' inganno felice,' and 'L' occasione fa il ladro, ossia il Canubio della valigia.' After the Carnival he went to Ferrara, and there composed an oratorio, 'Ciro in Babilonia,' which was brought out during Lent and proved a fiasco.¹ Another failure was 'La scala di seta,' an opera-buffa in one act, produced at Venice in the course of the spring. While the Mombellis were engaged on his serious opera, he flew off to Milan to fulfil an engagement which Marcolini had procured for him, by writing, for her, Galli, Bonoldi and Palamagni, a comic piece in two acts called 'La pietra del paragone,' which was produced at La Scala during the autumn of 1812 with immense success. It was his first appearance at this renowned house, and the piece is underlined in the list as 'musica nuova di Gioacchino Rossini, di Pesaro.' It has a finale which is memorable as the first occasion of his employing the crescendo, which he was ultimately to use and abuse so copiously. Mosca has accused Rossini of having borrowed this famous effect from his 'Pretendenti delusi,' produced at La Scala the preceding autumn, forgetting that Mosca himself had learned it from Generali and other composers. Such accusations, however, were of little or no importance to Rossini, who had already made up his mind to adopt whatever pleased him, whosoever he might find it. In the meantime he took advantage of his success to pass a few days at Bologna with his parents, en route for Venice; and thus ended the year 1812, in which he had produced no less than six pieces for the theatre.

The year 1813 began with a joke. He had accepted a commission of 500 francs for a serious opera for the Grand Theatre at Venice, but the manager of San Mosè, furious at his desertion, in pursuance of some former agreement, forced on him a libretto for that theatre, 'I due Bruschini, o il figlio per azzardo,' which, if treated as intended, would inevitably have been the death of the music. From this dilemma Rossini ingeniously extricated himself by reversing the situations and introducing all kinds of tricks. The second violins mark each bar in the overture by a stroke of the bow on the lamp shade; the bass sings at the top of his register and the soprano at the bottom of hers; a funeral march intrudes itself into one of the most comical scenes; and in the finale the words 'son pentito' are so arranged that nothing is heard but 'tito, tito, tito.' Those of the audience who had been taken into the secret were in roars of laughter, but the strangers who had paid for their places in good faith were naturally annoyed and hissed loudly. But no complaints were of any avail with Rossini, he only laughed at the success of his joke. 'I due Bruschini' disappeared after the first night, and the remembrance of it was very shortly wiped out by the appearance of 'Tancredi' produced at the Fenice during the Carnival, and sung by Manfredini, Malanotte, Todran and Bianchi. This work, full of spirit and melody, was received with enthusiasm, and nobody had time to notice various plagiarisms from Paisiello and Paër. All Venice, and very soon all Italy, was singing or humming 'Mi rivedrai, ti rivedro.' One must read the accounts of the day to understand the madness—for it was nothing else—which 'Tancredi' excited among the Venetians. 'I fancied,' said Rossini, with his usual gaiety, 'that after hearing my opera they would put me into a mad-house—on the contrary, they were madder than I.' Henceforward he was as much fêted for his social qualities as for his music.

His next work was 'L' Italiana in Algeri,' an opera-buffa produced at the San Benedetto theatre, Venice, in the summer of 1813. 'Aureliano in Palmira' and 'Il Turco in Italia' were both brought out at La Scala, Milan, the first in Dec. 1813, the second in Aug. 1814, before an audience somewhat more critical than that at Venice. 'Aureliano,' though it contains some fine things, which were afterwards utilised in 'Elisabetta' and the 'Barbiere,' was a fiasco. The 'Turco,' too, was not received with the applause which it afterwards commanded. Rossini, however, was greatly fêted during his stay in Milan, and among his 'amiable protectresses'—to use the expression of Stendhal—was the Princess Belgiojoso, for whom he composed a cantata entitled 'Egle ed Irene.' After the production of his next opera, 'Sigismondo,' written for the Fenice at Venice, in the Carnival of 1815, Rossini returned to his home at Bologna. There he encountered Barbaja, who from being a waiter at a coffee-house had become the farmer of the public gaming-tables and impresario of the Naples theatre, and engaged with him to take the musical direction of the San Carlo and D.J. Fondo theatres at Naples, and to compose annually an opera for each. For this he was to receive 200 ducats (about £35) per month, with a small share in the gaming-tables, amounting in addition to some 1000 ducats per annum, for which, however, he obtained no compensation after the tables were abolished in 1820.

cantata in favour of Italian independence, but politics were not his line, and he arrived in Naples fully conscious of this, and resolved that nothing should induce him to repeat the experiment. The arrival of a young composer with so great a reputation for originality was not altogether pleasing to Zingarelli, the chief of the Conservatorio, or to the aged Paisiello. But no intrigues could prevent the brilliant success of 'Elisabetta, regina d'Inghilterra,' which was produced before the court for the opening of the autumn season, 1815, in which Mlle. Colbran, Dardanelli, Manuel Garcia and Nozzari took the principal parts. The libretto was by a certain Schmidt, and it is a curious fact that some of its incidents anticipate those of 'Kenilworth,' which was not published till January 1821. 'Elisabetta' is the first opera in which Rossini so far distrusted his singers as to write in the ornaments of the airs; and it is also the first in which he replaced the recitativo secco by a recitativo accompanied by the string quartet. The overture and the finale to the first act of 'Elisabetta' are taken from 'Aureliano.'

Shortly before Christmas Rossini left Naples for Rome to write and bring out two works for which he was under engagement. The first of these, 'Torvaldo e Dorliska,' produced at the Teatro Valle, Dec. 26, 1815, was coldly received, but the second, 'Almaviva, ossia l' inutile precauzione,' founded on Beaumarchais' 'Barbier de Séville,' by Sterbini, which made its first appearance at the Argentina, Feb. 5, 1816, was unmistakably damned. The cause of this was the predilection of the Romans for Paisiello, and their determination to make an example of an innovator who had dared to resot a libretto already treated by their old favourite. Rossini, with excellent taste and feeling, had inquired of Paisiello, before adopting the subject, whether doing so would annoy the veteran, whose 'Barbiere' had been for a quarter of a century the favourite of Europe, and not unnaturally believed that after this step he was secure from the ill-will of Paisiello's friends and admirers.¹ However, although hissed on the first night, 'Almaviva' was listened to with patience on the second, and ended by becoming, under the title of 'Il barbiere di Siviglia,' one of the most popular comic operas ever composed. The cast was as follows:

Rosina . . .	Giorgi-Righetti.
Berta . . .	Rossi.
Figaro . . .	Zamboni.
Almaviva . . .	Garcia.
Bartolo . . .	Botticelli.
Basilio . . .	Vitarcelli.

The opening of the cavatina 'Ecco ridente' is borrowed from the opening of the first chorus in 'Aureliano.' The air of Berta 'Il vecchietto cerca moglie' was suggested by a Russian tune, and the eight opening bars of the trio 'Zitti, zitti' are notoriously taken note for note from Simon's air in Haydn's 'Seasons.'

On his return to Naples after the Carnival of 1816, and the gradual success of the 'Barbiere,' Rossini composed a grand cantata entitled 'Teti e Peleo' for the marriage of the Duchesse de Berry, and then dashed off a two-act comic opera entitled 'La gazzetta' to a libretto by Tottola, which was produced at the Teatro dei Fiorentini, Naples, with Chambrand, Pellegrini and Casaccia in the cast. 'Otello' was brought out at the Teatro del Fondo, Naples, Dec. 4, 1816, with Isabella Colbran, Nozzari, Davide, Cicimarra and Benedetti as its interpreters, but the tragic termination of the whole was very distasteful to the public, and when the opera was taken to Rome it was found necessary to invent a happy ending.

The machinery and power of rapidly changing the scenes were at that time so very imperfect in the smaller Italian theatres that Rossini would only accept the subject of Cinderella, when proposed to him by the manager of the Teatro Valle at Rome, on condition that the supernatural element was entirely omitted. A new comic piece was therefore written by Ferretti under the title of 'Cenerentola, ossia la bontà in trionfo'; Rossini undertook it, and it was produced at the Carnival of 1817 with unmistakable success. In the profusion and charm of its ideas this delicious work is probably equal to the 'Barbiere,' but it is inferior in unity of style. No doubt this is partly owing to the fact that many of the pieces appeared originally in other works such as 'La pietra del paragone,' 'La gazzetta' and 'Turco in Italia.' Such repetitions answered their purpose at the moment, but while thus extemporising his operas Rossini forgot that a day would arrive when they would all be published, and when such discoveries as those we have mentioned, and the identity of the principal motif of the duet of the letter in 'Otello' with the agitato of an air from 'Torvaldo e Dorliska,' would inevitably be made. As he himself confessed in a letter about this time, he thought he had a perfect right to rescue any of his earlier airs from operas which had either failed at the time or become forgotten since. Whatever force there may be in this defence, the fact remains that 'Cenerentola' and the 'Barbiere' share between them the glory of being Rossini's chefs-d'œuvre in comic opera.

From Rome he went to Milan, to enjoy the triumph of the 'Gazza ladra'—libretto by Gherardini,—which was brought out on May 31, 1817, at La Scala. The Milanese found no difference between the really fine parts of the opera and those which are mere padding—of which the 'Gazza ladra' has several.

From Milan he returned to Naples, and produced 'Armida' during the autumn season, a grand opera in three acts, with ballet, which was mounted with great splendour, and enjoyed the advantage of very good singers. This work had hardly made its appearance before Rossini had to dash off two more—'Adelaide di Borgogna,' sometimes known as 'Ottone Rè d'Italia,' and an oratorio—'Mosè in Egitto.' 'Adelaide' was produced at the Argentina at Rome, in the Carnival of 1818, was well sung and warmly received. 'Mosè' was written for the San Carlo at Naples, which Barbaja had rebuilt after the fire of 1816, and brought out there in Lent with Isabella Colbran, Benedetti, Porto and Nozzari. Here for the first time Rossini was so much pressed as to be compelled to call in assistance, and employed his old and tried friend Carafa in the recitatives and in Pharaoh's air 'Aspettar mi.'¹

As some relaxation after this serious effort, he undertook, in the summer of 1818, a one-act piece 'Adina, o il Califo di Bagdad,' for the San Carlos Theatre, Lisbon; and immediately after, 'Ricciardo o Zoraide' for San Carlo, Naples, which was sung to perfection at the autumn season there by Isabella Colbran, Pisaroni, Nozzari, Davide and Cicmarra.

'Ricciardo' was extraordinarily full of ornament, but 'Ermione,' which was produced at San Carlo in the Lent of 1819, went quite in the opposite direction, and affected an unusual plainness and severity. Though splendidly sung, 'Ermione' did not please, and the single number applauded was the one air in which there was any ornamentation. An equally poor reception was given to a cantata written for the re-establishment of the health of the King of Naples, and sung at the San Carlo, Feb. 20, 1819. It consisted of a cavatina for Isabella Colbran, and an air with variations, which was afterwards utilised in the ballet of the 'Viaggio a Reims.' The piece was hastily thrown off, and was probably of no more value in the eyes of its author than was an opera called 'Edoardo e Cristina' which was brought out at the San Benedetto, Venice, this same spring, and was in reality a mere pasticcio of pieces from 'Ermione,' 'Ricciardo' and other operas hitherto unheard in Venice, attached to a libretto imitated from Scribe. Fortunately the opera pleased the audience, and sent Rossini back to Naples in good spirits, ready to compose a new cantata for the visit of the Emperor of Austria. The new work was performed on May 9, 1819, at the San Carlo, and was sung by Colbran, Davide and Rubini, to the accompaniment of a military band. This Rossini probably accepted as a useful experience for his next new opera, the 'Donna del lago,' in the march of which we hear the results of his experiments in writing for a wind band.

The production on Oct. 4, 1819, with Colbran, Pisaroni, Nozzari, Davide and Benedetti, was simply one long torture of disappointment to the composer, who was possibly not aware that the storm of disapprobation was directed not against him so much as against Barbaja the manager, and Colbran his favourite.

On the following evening the hisses became bravas, but of this Rossini knew nothing, as by that time he was on his road to Milan. La Scala opened on Dec. 26, 1819, for the Carnival season with 'Bianca e Faliero,' libretto by Romani, which was admirably sung by Camporese and others. No trace of it, however, now remains except a duet and quartet, which were afterwards introduced in the 'Donna del lago,' and became very popular at concerts.

His engagement at Milan over, he hurried back to Naples to produce the opera of 'Maometto secondo,' before the close of the Carnival. It had been composed in great haste, but was admirably interpreted by Colbran, Chaumel (afterwards Madame Rubini), Nozzari, Cicmarra, Benedetti and F. Galli. It was the last opera that Rossini was destined to give at Naples before the revolt of July 20, 1820, of the Carbonari, under Pepe, which obliged the King to abandon his capital, ruined Barbaja by depriving him at once of a powerful patron and of the monopoly of the gambling-houses, and drove Rossini to make important changes in his life. Having for the moment no engagement for La Scala, he undertook to write 'Matilda di Cibrao' ('Mathilde di Shabran') for Rome. Torlonia the banker had bought the Teatro Tordinone, and was converting it into the Apollo; and it was for the inauguration of this splendid new house that Rossini's opera was intended. The opening took place on the first night of the Carnival of 1821. The company, though large, contained no first-rate artists, and Rossini was therefore especially careful of the ensemble pieces. The first night was stormy, but Rossini's friends were in the ascendancy, Paganini conducted in splendid style, and the result was a distinct success.

On his return to Naples, Rossini learned from Barbaja his intention of visiting Austria, and taking his company of singers to Vienna. Rossini's next opera, 'Zelmira,' was therefore to be submitted to a more critical audience than those of Italy, and with this in view he applied himself to make the recitatives and harmonies interesting, and to throw as much variety as possible into the form of the movements. He produced the opera at the San Carlo before leaving, in the middle of Dec. 1821. It was sung by Colbran, Cecconi, Davide, Nozzari, Ambrosi and Benedetti. On the 27th of the same month he took his benefit, for which he had composed a special cantata entitled 'La riconoscenza'; and the day after left for the north. He was accompanied by Isabella Colbran, with whom he had been in love for years, whose influence over him had been so great as to make him forsake comedy for tragedy, and to whom he was married on his arrival at Bologna. The wedding took place in the chapel of the Archbishop's palace, and was celebrated by Cardinal Opizzoni. Rossini has been accused of marrying for money, and it is certain that Colbran had a villa and £500 a year of her own, that she was seven years older than her husband, and that her reputation as a singer was on the decline.

VIENNA.—After a month's holiday the couple started for Vienna, where they arrived about the end of Feb. 1822. He seems to have made his début before the Vienna public on Mar. 30 as the conductor of his 'Cenerentola,' in the German version, as 'Aschenbrodel,' and his tempi were found somewhat too fast for the 'heavy German language.' 'Zelmira' was given at the Karntnertor opera-house on Apr. 13, with a success equal to that which it obtained at Naples. Rossini was not without violent opponents in Vienna, but they gave him no anxiety, friends and enemies alike were received with a smile, and his only retort was a good-humoured joke. He is said to have visited Beethoven, and to have been much distressed by the condition in which he found the great master. The impression which he made on the Viennese may be gathered from a paragraph in the Leipzig A.M.Z.,¹ of the day, in which he is described as 'highly accomplished, of agreeable manners and pleasant appearance, full of wit and fun, cheerful, obliging, courteous and most accessible. He is much in society, and charms every one by his simple, unassuming style.' After the close of the Vienna season the Rossinis returned to Bologna, where his parents had resided since 1798. There, at the end of September, he received a flattering invitation from Prince Metternich, entreating him to come to Verona, and he accordingly arrived at the Congress in time for its opening, Oct. 20, 1822. Rossini's contribution to the Congress was a series of cantatas, which he poured forth without stint or difficulty. The best known of these is 'Il vero omaggio'; others are 'L'augurio felice,' 'La sacra alleanza' and 'Il bardo.'

The Congress at an end, he began to work at 'Semiramide,' which was brought out at the Fenice, Venice, Feb. 3, 1823, with Madama Rossini, the two Marianis, Galli and Sinclair the English tenor, for whom there were two airs. The opera was probably written with more care than any of those which had preceded it; and possibly for this very reason was somewhat coldly received.

PARIS AND LONDON.—Rossini was not unnaturally much disappointed at the result of his labour, and resolved to write no more for the theatres of his native country. The resolution was hardly formed when he received a visit from the manager of the King's Theatre, London (Benelli), and a proposal to write an opera for that house, to be called 'La figlia dell'aria,' for the sum of £240—£40 more than he had received for 'Semiramide,' a sum at the time considered enormous. The offer was promptly accepted, and the Rossinis started for England without delay, naturally taking Paris in their road, and reaching it Nov. 9, 1823. Paris, like Vienna, was then divided into two hostile camps on the subject of the composer. Berton always spoke of him as 'M. Crescendo,' and he was caricatured on the stage as 'M. Vaccarmmi'; but the author of the 'Barbiere' could afford to laugh at such satire, and his respectful behaviour to Cherubini, Lesueur and Reicha, as the heads of the Conservatoire, his graceful reception of the leaders of the French School, his imperturbable good temper and good spirits, soon conciliated every one. A serenade, a public banquet, triumphant receptions at the opera-house, a special vaudeville ('Rossini à Paris, ou le Grand Dîner')—everything in short that could soothe the pride of a stranger—was lavished upon him from the first. On Dec. 13, 1823, Rossini and his wife arrived in London. They were visited immediately by the Russian ambassador, M. de Lieven, who gave the composer barely time to recover from the fatigues of the journey before he carried him off to Brighton and presented him to the King. George IV. received Rossini in the most flattering manner. 'Zelmira' was brought out at the Opera on Jan. 24, 1824; and the royal favour naturally brought with it that of the aristocracy, and a solid result in the shape of two grand concerts at Almack's, at two guineas admission. The singers on these occasions were Mme. Rossini, Mme. Catalani, Mme. Pasta and other first-rate artists, but the novelty, the attraction, was to hear Rossini himself sing the solos² in a cantata (or 'ottavino') which he had composed for the occasion, under the title of 'Il pianto delle Muse in morte di Lord Byron.' He also took part with Catalani in a duet from Cimarosa's 'Matrimonio' which was so successful as to be encored three times. He appeared at the so-called 'Cambridge Festival' again with Catalani, in July 1824. The opera manager was unable to finish the season, and became bankrupt before discharging his engagements with Rossini. Nor was this all. Not only did he not produce the 'Figlia dell'aria,' but the music of the first act unaccountably vanished, and has never since been found. It was in vain for Rossini to sue the manager; he failed to obtain either his MS. or a single penny of the advantages guaranteed to him by the contract. True, he enjoyed a considerable set-off to the loss just mentioned in the profits of the countless soirées at which he acted as accompanist at a fee of £50. At the end of five months he found himself in possession of £7000; and just before his departure was honoured by receiving the marked compliments of the King at a concert at the Duke of Wellington's, for which His Majesty had expressly come up from Brighton.¹ He left England on July 26.

Through the Prince de Polignac, French ambassador in England, Rossini had already concluded an agreement for the musical direction of the Théâtre Italien, Paris, for eighteen months at a salary of £800 per annum. In order to be near his work he took a lodging at No. 28 Rue Taubout, and at once set about getting younger singers for his company. Knowing that Paër was his enemy, and would take any opportunity of injuring him, he was careful to retain him in his old post of maestro al cembalo; but at the same time he engaged Hérold (then a young man of 25) as chorus-master, and as a check on the pretensions of Madame Pasta he brought to Paris Esther Mombelli, Schiassetti, Donzelli and Rubini, successively. To those who sneered at his music he replied by playing it as it was written, and by bringing out some of his operas which had not yet made their appearance in Paris, such as 'La donna del lago' (Sept. 7, 1824), 'Semiramide' (Dec. 8, 1825), and 'Zelmira' (Mar. 14, 1826). And he gave much éclat to his direction by introducing Meyerbeer's 'Crociato'—the first work of Meyerbeer heard in Paris—and by composing a new opera, 'Il viaggio a Reims, ossia l'Albergo del giglio d'oro,' which he produced on June 19, 1825, during the fêtes at the coronation of Charles X. This work, in one act, and three parts, was written for fourteen voices, and was sung by Mmes. Pasta, Schiassetti, Mombelli, Cinti, Amigo, Dotti and Rossi; and by Levasseur, Zucchelli, Pellegrini, Graziani, Auletta, Donzelli, Bordogni and Scudo—a truly magnificent assemblage. In the ballet he introduced an air with variations for two clarinets, borrowed from his Naples cantata of 1819, and played by Gambaro (a passionate admirer of his) and by F. Berr. In the hunting scene he brought in a fanfare of horns, and the piece winds up with 'God save the King,' 'Vive Henri Quatre,' and other national airs, all newly harmonised and accompanied. After the Revolution of 1848 the words were suitably modified by H. Dupin, and the piece appeared in two acts at the Théâtre-Italien as 'Andremo noi a Parigi' on Oct. 26 of that year.²

posts of 'Premier Compositeur du Roi' and 'Inspecteur Général du Chant en France,' with an annual income of 20,000 francs, possibly in the hope that he might settle permanently at Paris, and in time write operas expressly for the French stage. This was also an act of justice, since in the then absence of any law of international³ copyright his pieces were public property, and at the disposal not only of a translator like Castil-Blaze, but of any manager or publisher in the length and breadth of France who chose to avail himself of them. The step was justified by the event. The opera of 'Mometto'—originally written by the Duke of Ventagnano, and produced at Naples in 1820—had never been heard in France. Rossini employed Soumet and Balocchi to give the libretto a French dress; he revised the music, and considerably extended it; and on Oct. 9, 1826, it was produced at the Opéra as 'Le Siège de Corinthe,' with a cast which included Nourrit and Mlle. Cinti, and with great success. For the new opera Rossini received 6000 francs from Troupéas.

After this feat Rossini turned to another of his earlier works, as not only sure of success but eminently suited to the vast space and splendid mise en scène of the Opéra. This was 'Mosè.' He put the revision of the libretto into the hands of Étienne Jouy and Balocchi, and arranged for Cinti, Nourrit and Levasseur to be in the cast. 'Moïse' was produced Mar. 25, 1827, and created a profound impression. True, it had been heard in its original form at the Italiens five years before, but the recollection of this only served to bring out more strongly the many improvements and additions in the new version—such as the introduction to the first act; the quartet and chorus; the chorus 'La Douce Aurore'; the march and chorus, etc. The airs du ballet were largely borrowed from 'Armida' (1817) and 'Ciro in Babilonia' (1812). This work gave Rossini a sort of imperial position in Paris. But it was necessary to justify this, and he therefore resolved to try a work of a different character. With this view he employed Scribe and Poirson to develop a vaudeville which they had written in 1816 to the old legend of 'Le Comte Ory,' adapting to that lively piece some of his favourite music in the 'Viaggio a Reims.' 'Le Comte Ory' was produced at the Opéra, Aug. 20, 1828, and the principal characters were taken by Mme. Damoreau-Cinti, Mlles. Jawurek and Mori, Adolphe Nourrit, Lovasseur and Dabadie. The introduction is based on the old song which gives its name to the piece. The best thing in the second act is borrowed from the Allegretto scherzando of Beethoven's eighth symphony. Rossini was at that time actually engaged with Habeneck, the founder of the Concerts du Conservatoire, and his intimate friend, in studying the symphonies of Beethoven.

The study of Beethoven was at any rate not a bad preparation for the very serious piece of work which was next to engage him, and for a great portion of which he retired to the château of his friend Aguado the banker at Petit-Bourg. Schuller had recently been brought into notice in France by the translation of de Barante; and Rossini, partly attracted by the grandeur of the subject, partly inspired by the liberal ideas at that moment floating through Europe, was induced to choose the liberator of the Swiss Cantons as his next subject. He accepted a libretto offered him by Etienne Jouy, Sponcini's old librettist, who in this case was associated with Hippolyte Bis. Their words, however, were so unmusical and unrhymical that Rossini had recourse to Armand Marrast, at that time Aguado's secretary, and the whole scene of the meeting of the conspirators was rewritten by him.

'Guillaume Tell' was produced at the Opéra on Aug. 3, 1829, with the following cast:

Arnold . . .	Nourrit.
Walter Furst . . .	Levasseur.
Tell . . .	Dabadie.
Ruoli . . .	A. Dupont.
Rodolphe . . .	Masol.
Gessler . . .	Prévost.
Lentold . . .	Prévot.
Mathilde . . .	Danoreau-Cinti.
Jemmy . . .	Dabadie.
Hedwige . . .	Mori.

It was to have been the first of a series of five operas, for, being anxious to visit once more the city in which his mother died in 1827, and where his father, who had soon tired of Paris, was awaiting him, he had resigned his office as inspector of singing in France, and made an arrangement with the Government of Charles X., dating from the beginning of 1829, by which he bound himself for ten years to compose for no other stage but that of France, and to write and bring out an opera every two years, receiving for each such opera the sum of 15,000 francs. In the event of the Government failing to carry out the arrangement he was to receive a retiring pension of 6000 francs. But political and domestic circumstances prevented this plan from being carried out. Having left Paris for Bologna he was considering the subject of 'Faust,' with a view to his next work, when he received the sudden news of the abdication of Charles X. and the revolution of July 1830. The blow shattered his plans and dissipated his fondest hopes.

He flattered himself that he had regenerated the art of singing in France. What would become of it again under a king who could tolerate no operas but those of Grétry? Anxious to know if his friend Lubbert was still at the head of the Académie de Musique, and if the new Intendant of the Civil List would acknowledge the engagements of his predecessor, he returned to Paris in Nov. 1830; and, intending only to make a short stay, took up his quarters in the upper story of the Théâtre des Italiens, of which his friend Severini was then director. Here, however, he was destined to remain till Nov. 1836. The new Government repudiated the agreement of its predecessor, and Rossini had to carry his claim into the law-courts. Had his lawsuit alone occupied him, it would not have been necessary to stay quite so long, for it was decided in his favour in Dec. 1835. But there was another reason for his remaining in Paris, and that was his desire to hear 'The Huguenots' and ascertain how far Meyerbeer's star was likely to eclipse his own. It is impossible to believe that a mere money question could have detained him so long at a time when almost every day must have brought fresh annoyances. After reducing 'Guillaume Tell' from five acts to three, the management carried love of compression so far as to give only one act at a time, as a leçon de rideau, or accompaniment to the ballet. This was indeed adding insult to injury. 'I hope you won't be annoyed,' said the director of the Opéra to him one day on the boulevard, 'but to-night we play the second act of "Tell." 'The whole of it?' was the reply. How much bitter disappointment must have been hidden under that reply! During the whole of this unhappy interval he only once resumed his pen, namely in 1832 for the 'Stabat Mater,' at the request of his friend Aguado, who was anxious to serve the Spanish minister Señor Valera. He composed at that time only the first six numbers, and the other four were supplied by Tadolchini. The work was dedicated to Valera, with an express stipulation that it should never leave his hands. In 1834 he allowed Troupenas to publish the 'Soirées musicales,' twelve vocal pieces, several of which have still retained their charm.

The rehearsals of 'The Huguenots' lingered on, and it was not till Feb. 29, 1836, that Rossini could hear the work of his new rival. He returned to Bologna shortly after, taking Frankfort in his way, and meeting Mendelssohn.¹ He had not been long in Bologna before he heard of the prodigious success of Duprez in the revival of 'Guillaume Tell' (Apr. 17). Such a triumph might well have nerved him to fresh exertions. But it came a year too late; he had already taken an irrevocable resolution never again to break silence. It would be very wrong to conclude from this that he had lost his interest in music. The care which he bestowed on the Liceo of Bologna, of which he was honorary director, shows that the art still exercised all its claims on him. He was especially anxious to improve the singing of the pupils, and among those who are indebted to his care Marietta Alboni held the first rank.

Rossini's father died Apr. 29, 1839, and he soon afterwards learned to his disgust that the MS. of the 'Stabat' had been sold by the heirs of Señor Valera, and acquired by a Paris publisher for 2000 francs. He at once gave Troupenas full power to stop both publication and performance, and at the same time completed the work by composing the last four movements, which, as we have already said, were originally added by Tadolini. The first six movements were produced at the Salle Herz, Paris, Oct. 31, 1841, amidst very great applause. Troupenas¹ bought the entire score for 6000 francs. He sold the right of performance in Paris during three months to the Escudiers for 8000, which they again disposed of to the director of the Théâtre Italien for 20,000. Thus three persons were enriched by this single work. It was performed complete for the first time at the Salle Ventadour, Jan. 7, 1842, by Grisi, Albertazzi, Mario and Tamburini.

But at the very moment that the 'Stabat' was making its triumphant progress round the world, Rossini began to suffer tortures from the stone, which increased to such an extent as to force him, in May 1843, to Paris, where he underwent an operation which proved perfectly satisfactory. We next find him writing a chorus to words by Marchetti for the anniversary festival of Tasso at Turin, on Mar. 13, 1844. On the 2nd of the following September 'Othello' was produced in French at the Opéra with Duprez, Barroillet, Levasseur and Mme. Stoltz. Rossini, however, had nothing to do with this adaptation, and the divertissement was arranged entirely by Bonoist from airs in 'Mathilde de Sabran' and 'Armida.' While 'Othello' was thus on the boards of the opera, Troupenas brought out 'La Foi, l'Espérance et la Charité' (Faith, Hope and Charity), three choruses for women's voices, the first two composed many years previously for an opera on the subject of Edipus. These choruses are hardly worthy of Rossini. They justify Berlioz's sarcasm—'his Hope has deceived ours; his Faith will never remove mountains; his Charity will never ruin him.' It is fair to say that Louis Engel, in his book From Mozart to Mario, states that Rossini repudiated them. Troupenas also brought out a few songs hitherto unpublished, and these re-attracted the attention of the public in some degree to the composer. His statue was executed in marble² by Etex, and was inaugurated at the Académie de Musique, June 9, 1846. A few months later (Dec. 30), by his permission, a pasticcio adapted by Niedermeyer to portions of the 'Donna del lago,' 'Zelmira' and 'Armida,' and entitled 'Robert Bruce,' was put on the stage of the Opéra, but it was not successful, and Mme. Stoltz was even hissed. From his seclusion at Bologna Rossini kept a watchful eye upon the movements of the musical world, and during his long residence there he only broke his vow of silence for the 'Inno popolare a Pio IX.' The beginning of this was adapted to an air from 'La donna del lago,' and its peroration was borrowed from 'Robert Bruce,' which gives ground for supposing that he himself was concerned in the arrangement of that opera, and explains his annoyance at its failure.

The political disturbances which agitated the Romagna at the end of 1847 compelled Rossini to leave Bologna. He quitted the town in much irritation. After the death of his wife (Oct. 7, 1845), he married (in 1847) Olympe Pélissier, with whom he had become connected in Paris at a time when she was greatly in public favour, and when she sat to Vernet for his picture of 'Judith and Holofernes.' In fact at this time the musician had to a great extent disappeared in the voluptuary. From Bologna he removed to Florence, and there it was that this writer visited him in 1852. He lived in the Via Larga, in a house which bore upon its front the words Ad votum. In the course of a long conversation he spoke of his works with no pretended indifference, but as being well aware of their worth, and knowing the force and scope of his genius better than any one else. He made no secret of his dislike to the violent antivoluc element in modern music, or of the pleasure he would feel when 'the Jews had finished their Sabbath.' It was also evident that he had no affection for the capital of Tuscany, the climate of which did not suit him.

At length, in 1855, he crossed the Alps and returned to Paris, never again to leave it. His reception there went far to calm the nervous irritability that had tormented him at Florence, and with the homage which he received from Auber and the rest of the French artists his health returned. His house, No. 2 in the Rue Chaussée d'Antin, and, at a later date, his villa at Passy, were crowded by the most illustrious representatives of literature and art, to such an extent that even during his lifetime he seemed to assist at his own apotheosis. Was it then mere idleness which made him thus bury himself in the Capua of his past successes? No one who, like the present writer, observed him coolly, could be taken in by the comedy of indifference and modesty that it pleased him to keep up. We have already said that, after Meyerbeer's great success, Rossini had taken the resolution of writing no more for the Académie de Musique and keeping silence.

The latter part of this resolution he did not, however, fully maintain. Thus he authorised the production of 'Bruschio' at the Bouffes Parisiens on Dec. 28, 1857, though he would not be present at the first representation. 'I have given my permission,' said he, 'but do not ask me to be an accomplice.' The discovery of the piece—which is nothing else but his early farce of 'Il figlio per azzardo' (Venice, 1813)—was due to Prince Poniatowski, and some clever librettist was found to adapt it to the French taste. A year or two later Méry with difficulty obtained his permission to transform 'Sémiramide' into 'Sémiramis,' and in its new garb it was produced at the Opéra, July 9, 1860, with Carlotta Marchisio as Semiramis, her sister Barbara as Arsace, and Obin as Assur. In this transformation Rossini took no ostensible part. Carafa at his request arranged the recitatives, and wrote the ballet music. These were mere revivals. Not so the sacred work which he brought out at the house of Pillet-Will the banker on Mar. 14, 1864, and at the rehearsals of which he presided in person; this was the 'Petite messe solennelle,' which though so called with a touch of Rossinian pleasantry is a Mass of full dimensions, lasting nearly two hours in performance. This work, comprising soli and choruses, was written with the accompaniment of a harmonium and two pianos. On this occasion it was sung by the two Marchisios, Gardoni and Agnesi, and was much applauded. Rossini afterwards scored it with slight alterations for the full orchestra, and in this shape it was performed for the first time in public at the Théâtre-Italien, on the evening of Sunday, Feb. 28, 1869 on the seventy-eighth anniversary of the composer's birth as nearly as that could be, seeing that he was born in a leap year on Feb. 29.

In the last years of his life Rossini affected the piano, spoke of himself as a fourth-rate pianist, and composed little else but pianoforte pieces, most of which were in some sense or other jeux d'esprit. For the Exposition Universelle of 1867, however, he wrote a cantata, which was performed for the first time at the ceremony of awarding the prizes on July 1, and was also executed at the Opéra at the free performances on Aug. 15, 1867 and 1868. It opens with a hymn in a broad style, but winds up with a vulgar quick-step. The title, which we give from the autograph, seems to show that Rossini was quite aware of the character of the finale of his last work.

The final touch is quite enough to show that Rossini to the last had more gaiety than propriety, more wit than dignity, more love of independence than good taste. He preferred the society of artists to any other, and was never so happy as when giving free scope to his caustic wit or his Rabelaisian humour. His bons mots were abundant, and it is surprising that no one has yet attempted to collect them. One or two may find place here. One day, in a fit of the spleen, he cried out, 'I am miserable; my nerves are wrong, and every one offers me string instead.' D'Ortigue, the author of the Dictionnaire liturgique, had been very severe on him in an article in the Correspondant on 'Musical royalties,' and an enthusiastic admirer of the Italian School having replied somewhat angrily, Rossini wrote to him, 'I am much obliged to you for your vigorous treatment (lavement) of the tonsure of my friend the Curé d'Ortigue.' A number of friends were disputing as to which was his best opera, and appealed to him. 'You want to know which of my works I like best? "Don Giovanni"! ' He took extreme delight in his summer villa at Passy, which stood in the Avenue Ingres, and had a fine garden of about three acres attached to it. In that house he died on Friday Nov. 13, 1868, at 9 p.m., after a long day of agony. His funeral was magnificent. As Foreign Associate of the Institute (1833); Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour (1864), and the orders of St. Maurice and St. Lazare; commander of many foreign orders, and honorary member of a great number of Academies and musical institutions—Rossini had a right to every posthumous honour possible. The funeral took place at the Church of the Trinité on Saturday Nov. 21; it was gorgeous, and was attended by several deputations from Italy. Tamburini, Duprez, Gardoni, Bonnehée, Faure, Capoul, Belval Obin, Delle Sedie, Jules Lefort, Agnesi, Albani, Adelina Patti, Nilsson, Krauss, Carvalho, Bloch and Grossi, with the pupils of the Conservatoire, sang the Prayer from 'Moïse.' Nilsson gave a fine movement from the 'Stabat' of Pergolesi, but the most impressive part of the ceremony was the singing of the 'Quis est homo' from Rossini's own 'Stabat Mater' by Patti and Albani.

Rossini bequeathed to the Bologna Institute an annual sum of 6000 francs (£240) for a competition both in dramatic poetry and composition, specifying particularly that the object of the prize should be to encourage composers with a turn for melody. The greater part of his property Rossini devoted to the foundation and endowment of a Conservatorio di Music at his native town Pesaro, of which A. Bazzini and Mascagni were successively directors.

In order to complete this sketch it is necessary to give as complete a list as possible of his works. N.B.—In the column after the names, (1) signifies that the score has been engraved; (2) that it is published for voices and piano; (3) that it is still in manuscript.

Various other airs and pieces, thirty or forty in number, will be found in the catalogues of Ricordi, Lucca, Brandus (Troupenas), and Escudier, which it is hardly necessary to enumerate here. Probably no composer ever wrote so much in albums as did Rossini. The number of these pieces which he threw off while in London alone is prodigious. They are usually composed to some lines of Metastasio's, beginning 'Mi lagnerà tacendo della sorte amara,' which he is said to have set more than a hundred times. The famous aria, 'Pietà, Signore,' which credulous amateurs still regard as Strudella's, was, according to Piatti, written as a joke by Rossini.

We have stated that during the latter years of his life Rossini composed a great quantity of music for the PF. solo, both serious and comic. These pieces were sold by his widow en masse to Baron Grant for the sum of £4000. After a time the whole was put up to auction in London and purchased by Ricordi of Milan, Paul Dalloz, proprietor of a periodical entitled La Musique, at Paris, and other persons.

V. INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC

Le Rendezvous de chaise. A fanfare for 4 trumpets, composed at Compigne in 1828 for M. Schickler, and dedicated to him	March (Pas redoublé) composed for H. M. the Sultan Abdul Medjid. Arranged for PF solo (Benedict) and 4 mams.
3 Marches for the marriage of H. R. H. the Duke of Orleans. Arranged for PF. 4 mams	5 String quartets, arranged as sonatas for the PF by Muckwitz (Brickkopf & Härtel).

To enumerate and elucidate all the biographical and critical notices of Rossini would require a volume; we shall therefore confine ourselves to mentioning these of importance either from their authority, their ability, or the special nature of their contents; and for greater convenience of reference we have arranged them according to country and date.

Portraits of Rossini are frequent at all periods of his life. Marchetti's statue, in which he is represented sitting, was erected in his native town in 1864. There is a good bust by Bartolini of Florence. In the 'foyer' of the old opera-house in the Rue Le Pelotier, Paris (now destroyed), there was a medallion of Rossini by Chevalier; a duplicate of this is in the possession of the editor of the Ménestrel. The front of the present opera-house has a bronze-gilt bust by Eyraud. A good early engraving of him is that from an oil-painting by Mayer of Vienna (1820). Of later ones may be mentioned that by Thévenin after Ary Scheffer (1843): still later, a full-length drawn and engraved by Masson, and a photograph by Erwig, engraved as frontispiece to the FF. score of 'Sémiramis' (Heugel). A drawing by L. Dupré is reproduced on PLATE XLIX. Among the lithographs the best is that of Grévedon; and of caricatures the only one deserving mention is that by Dantan.

ROSTH (ROSTHIUS), JOHANN KASPAR NIKOLAUS (b. Weimar, latter 16th century), studied theology and music at Torgau, was in the Electoral Chapel, Heidelberg, 1583; Kapellmeister at the court of Altenburg, 1593; discantist at Weimar, 1594; and pastor at Cosmenz, Altenburg, 1606. He composed 1 book of motets, 6 and 8 v. (1613); 1 book of songs ('Frolche ne, we teutsche gewang'), sacred and secular, 4, 5, 6 v. (1583); 2 books, xxx. newer hebblicher Gahardt (4-part songs), 1st part, 1593, 2nd part, 1594; 'A Resurrection' and other sacred music in MS. (Q.-L.).

(2) The name rota is applied to the famous round, 'Sumer is Icomen in' (q.v.), and may have been a generic name for what we now call ROUND.

M.

ROTA, ANDREA (b. Bologna, c. 1553; d. 1597), was appointed, in 1583, choir-master to the church of San Petronio in that city. His publications consist of three books of madrigals, two a 5 (Venice, 1579-89), one a 4 (1592); two books of motets a 5-10 (1584, 1595); and one book of masses a 4-6 (1595). A very pleasing madrigal a 5 is republished in Torchi's 'L'arte musicale in Italia,' vol. 1.; also an Agnus Dei a 7 with double canon, and a Dixit Dominus a 8. Padre Martini's Esemplare contains a Da Pacem by Rota, and Paolucci's 'L'arte pratica,' a motet a 10.

J. B. M.

ROTE (ROTE), a form of the ancient lyre prevalent in Northern Europe from pre-Christian to medieval times. Diodorus Siculus (c. 25 B.C.) states that the Celtic bards accompanied their songs upon instruments 'like lyres.' Amongst the Britons it was known as the 'Crot' (see CRUTH). And Venantius Fortunatus (c. A.D. 600) alludes to it under the latinised form Chrotta, for which Rotta is substituted in one of the versions of his poem.

It was apparently derived—like the Greek and Roman lyres—from the early home of the Aryan race on the plains of Western Asia. Illustrations are found on the Irish crosses of the 8th and 9th centuries, and in a manuscript of the 12th or 13th century found by Abbot Gerbert in the monastery of S. Blasius it is depicted under the title Cythara testonica as a lyre with rounded angles, slightly incurved sides and seven strings.

In the 8th century an English abbot, writing to the Archbishop of Mainz, asked him to send to him a musician 'who can play upon the instrument (cithara) that we call a Rotte, because I have an instrument but I have no performer.'

An actual specimen of the Rotte of this period was discovered in the Black Forest in the grave of a German warrior and is now preserved in the Ethnographical Museum at Berlin. It is about 30 ins. in length (PLATES XXXI. and LXVI.).

In English manuscripts from the 8th to the 11th centuries the Rotte is frequently illustrated, as for instance in the British Museum MS. Vesp. A. i.: the Anglo-Saxon name seems to have been Cytere. Chaucer spells the name as Rote, in which he is followed by Spenser, though probably by the end of the 16th century the word was but a poetical fancy. Owing to this later spelling confusion has been caused with the word Rota, a name given by Latin writers to the Organistrum or Hurdy-gurdy, which was played by turning a wheel (rota) and thus setting the strings in vibration (see HURDY-GURDY).

ROUART-LEROLLE, publishers. This house, of great importance in the movement of French contemporary music, dates from 1905. It was in this year that Alexis Rouart (1869-1921) acquired the publications of Meuriot and Baudoux. He went into partnership, in 1908, with Jacques Lerolle (b. 1880), son of the painter and nephew of Ernest Chausson, the composer, who brought publications of Gregh, dating from 1840, into the partnership. Under the management of Rouart and Lerolle, the old stock chiefly composed of light music and of monologues, gave place to a series of works of very different nature, either great classics, or the works of the most modern composers.

Since the death of A. Rouart (1921) the firm has been under the direction of J. Lerolle, with Mme. Rouart (the widow) as partner, and with François Hepp (b. 1887), son-in-law of A. Rouart, as co-director.

ROUGET DE LISLE, CLAUDE JOSEPH (b. Montaignu, near Lons-le-Saulnier, May 10, 1760; d. Choisy-le-Roy, June 26-7, 1836), author of the 'Marseillaise.' He entered the School of Royal Engineers ('École Royale du Génie') at Mézières in 1782, and left it two years later with the rank of 'aspirant-lieutenant.' Early in 1789 he was made second lieutenant, and in 1790 he rose to be first lieutenant, and was moved to Strassburg, May 1, 1791, where he soon became very popular in the triple capacity of poet, violin-player and singer. His hymn, 'à la Liberté,' composed by Ignace Pleyel, was sung at Strassburg at the fête of Sept. 25, 1791. While there he wrote three pieces for the theatre, one of which, 'Bayard en Bresse,' was produced at Paris, Feb. 21, 1791, but without success. In Apr. 1792 he wrote the 'MARSEILLAISE' (q.v.). As the son of royalist parents, and himself belonging to the constitutional party, Rouget de Lisle refused to take the oath to the constitution abolishing the crown; he was therefore stripped of his military rank, denounced and imprisoned, only to escape after the fall of Robespierre in 1794, an event he celebrated in a 'Hymne dithyrambique,' etc. 'Le Chant des vengeances' (1798) and 'Le Chant des combats' (1800) (poem and music by Rouget de Lisle) were performed at the Théâtre de la République et des Arts, 1798 and 1800. He also wrote a 'Hymne à la Raison,' a 'Hymne du 9 Thermidor,' and 'Les Héros du Vengeur.' He re-entered the army, and made the campaign of La Vendée under General Hoche; was wounded, and at length, under the Consulate, returned to private life at Montaignu, where he remained in the depth of solitude and of poverty till the second Restoration. His brother then sold the little family property, and Rouget was driven to Paris; and there would have starved but for a small pension granted by Louis XVIII. and continued by Louis Philippe, and for the care of his friends Béranger, David d'Angers, and especially M. and Mme. Volart, in whose house, at Choisy-le-Roi, he died.

Besides the works already mentioned, he published in 1797 a volume of Essais en vers et en prose (Paris, F. Didot, 5th year of the Republic), dedicated to Méhul, and now extremely rare; so also is his 'Cinquante chants français' (1825, 4to), with PF. accompaniment. One of these songs, 'Roland à Roncevaux,' was written in 1792, and its refrain—was borrowed by the authors of the 'Chant des Girondins,' which was set to music by Varney, and played a distinguished part in the Revolution of 1848. He wrote another set of twenty-five romances with violin obligato, and two opera-libretti, 'Jacquet, ou l'école des mères' for Della Maria, and 'Macbeth' for Chelard, produced in 1827. His 'Relation du désastre de Quiberon' is in vol. ii. of the Mémoires de tous.

'Mourir pour la patrie,

C'est le sort le plus beau, le plus digne d'envie'—

There exists a fine medallion of Rouget by David d'Angers, which is engraved in a pamphlet by his nephew, entitled La Vérité sur la paternité de la Marseillaise (Paris, 1865).

ROUND. (1) 'A species of canon in the unison, so called because the performers begin the melody at regular rhythmical periods, and return from its conclusion to its beginning, so that it continually passes round and round from one to another of them.'¹ Rounds and Catches, the most characteristic forms of English music, differ from canons in only being sung at the unison or octave, and also in being rhythmical in form. Originating at a period of which we have but few musical records, these compositions have been written and sung in England with unvarying popularity until the present day. The earliest extant example of a round is the well-known 'SUMER IS ICOMEN IN' (q.v.). Amongst early writers on music, the terms 'round' and 'catch' were synonymous, but at the present day the latter is generally understood to be what Hawkins (vol. ii.) defines as that species of round a form of humour which easily adapted itself to the coarse tastes of the Restoration, at which period rounds and catches reached their highest popularity. That catches were immensely popular with the lower classes is proved by the numerous allusions to 'alehouse catches' and the like in the dramas of the 16th and 17th centuries. According to Drayton (Legend of Thomas Cromwell, Stanza 29) they were introduced into Italy by the Earl of Essex in 1510.

'wherein, to humour some conceit in the words, the melody is broken, and the sense interrupted in one part, and caught again or supplied by another,'

The first printed collection of rounds was that edited by Thomas Ravenscroft, and published in 1609 under the title of 'Pammelia. Musickes Miscellane.' For full title and list of subsequent publications see CATCH. This interesting collection contains many English, French and Latin rounds, etc., some of which are still popular. Amongst them there is also a curious 'Round of three Country Dances in one' for four voices, which is in reality a Quodlibet on the country-dance tunes 'Robin Hood,' 'Now foot it' and 'The Crampe is in my purse.' 'Pammelia' was followed by two other collections brought out by Ravenscroft, 'Deuteromelia' in 1609, and 'Melismata' in 1611, and the numerous publications of the Playfords, the most celebrated of which is 'Catch that catch can, or the Musical Companion' (1667), which passed through many editions. The most complete collection of rounds and catches is that published by Warren in thirty-two monthly and yearly numbers, from 1763-94, which contains over 800 compositions, including many admirable specimens by Purcell, Blow and other masters of the English school. It is to be regretted that they are too often disfigured by an obscenity of so gross a nature as to make them now utterly unfit for performance. A good specimen of the round proper is Hayes's 'Wind, gentle evergreen.' The Round has never been much cultivated by foreign composers. One or two examples are, however, well known, amongst them may be mentioned Cherubini's 'Perfida Clori.'

(2) Any dance in which the dancers stood in a circle was formerly called a round or roundel.² The first edition of the 'Dancing Master' (1651) has thirteen rounds, for six, eight or 'as many as will.' Subsequent editions of the same book have also a dance called 'Cheshire Rounds,' and Part II. of Walsh's 'Compleat Country Dancing Master' (1719) has Irish and Shropshire rounds. These latter dances are, however, not danced in a ring, but 'longways,' i.e. like 'Sir Roger de Coverley.' In Jeremiah Clarke's 'Choice Lessons for the Harpsichord or Spinett' (1711), and similar contemporary publications, the word rondo is curiously corrupted into 'Round O.' w. b. s.

ROUND, CATCH AND CANON CLUB (1843-1911). A society founded in London in 1843, by Enoch Hawkins, for the purpose of singing the new compositions of the professional members and others, written in the form of Round, Catch and Canon; hence the title of the Club. Among the original members were Enoch Hawkins, Hobbs, Bradbury, Handel Gear, Henry Phillips, Addison, D'Almaine and F. W. Collard. The meetings were originally held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern whence the Club removed to the Freemasons' Tavern, thence to the Thatched House, again to Freemasons' Tavern, and to St. James's Hall, where, until the demolition of the building, it assembled every fortnight from the first Saturday in November until the end of March, ten meetings being held in each season. Its meetings were subsequently held in the Criterion Restaurant, and took place on Monday evenings instead of Saturdays. In the earlier years of its existence the number both of professional and non-professional members at each dinner rarely exceeded eighteen, but in the later years of the Club's prosperity from sixty to seventy dined together. The management of the Club was in the hands of the officers, who were the proprietors, and each of whom in turn took the chair, and was alone responsible for the entertainment. The musical programmes latterly consisted mainly of glees, although an occasional catch was introduced. The last session of the Club was that which ended in March 1911. c. m., addns.

ROUSSEAU, JEAN, a late 17th-century viol da gambist in Paris; pupil of Sainte-Colombe. Fétis mentions 2 books of 'Pièces de viole,' by him, but does not say where they are to be found. His Traité de la viole (1687) is well known as a book of great interest with regard to the history as well as the technique of the instrument; he wrote also a 'Méthode claire, certaine et facile, pour apprendre à chanter la musique,' etc. (1691). E. V. D. S.

ROUSSEAU, JEAN JACQUES (b. Geneva, June 28, 1712; d. Ermenonville, near Paris, July 3, 1778). The details of his life are given in his Confessions; we shall here confine ourselves to his compositions, and his writings on music.

Rousseau studied music with a maître de chapelle from 1727-30 but remained to the end a poor reader and an indifferent harmonist, though he exercised a great influence on French music. He contributed an air to the Mercur de France (June 1737). He is found as a musician at Chambéry between 1735 and 1737.¹ Immediately after his arrival in Paris he read a paper before the Académie des Sciences (Aug. 22, 1742) on a new system of musical notation, which he afterwards extended and published under the title of Dissertation sur la musique moderne (Paris, 1743, 8vo). His method of representing the notes of the scale by figures—1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7—had been already proposed by Souhaitty, but Rousseau's combinations, and especially his signs of duration, are so totally different as entirely to redeem them from the charge of plagiarism. A detailed analysis and refutation of the system may be found in Raymond's Des principaux systèmes de notation musicale (Turin, 1824, 8vo), to which the reader is referred.

Copying music had been Rousseau's means of livelihood, and this led him to believe that the best way to learn an art is to practise it; at any rate he composed an opera, 'Les Muses galantes' (1747), which was produced at the house of La Popelinière, when Rameau, who was present, declared that some pieces showed the hand of a master, and others the ignorance of a schoolboy. Not being able to obtain access to any of the theatres, Rousseau undertook to write the articles on music for the Encyclopédie, a task which he accomplished in three months, and afterwards acknowledged to have been done hastily and unsatisfactorily. We have mentioned in the article RAMEAU, the exposé by that great musician of the errors in the musical articles of the Encyclopédie; Rousseau's reply was not published till after his death, but it is included in his complete works.

Three months after the arrival in Paris of the Italian company who popularised the 'Serva padrona' in France, Rousseau produced 'Le Devin du village' before the King at Fontainebleau, on Oct. 18 and 24, 1752. The piece, of which both words and music were his own, pleased the court, and was quickly reproduced in Paris. The first representation at the Opéra took place Mar. 1, 1753, and the last in 1829, after more than 400 performances, when some wag² threw an immense powdered peruke on the stage and gave it its death blow. It is curious that the representations of this simple pastoral should have coincided so exactly with the vehement discussions to which the performances of Italian opera gave rise. We cannot enter here upon the literary quarrel known as the 'Guerre des Bouffons,' or enumerate the host of pamphlets to which it gave rise,³ but it is a strange fact, only to be accounted for on the principle that man is a mass of contradictions, that Rousseau, the author of the 'Devin du village,' pronounced at once in favour of Italian music.

His Lettre sur la musique française (1753) raised a storm of indignation, and not unnaturally, since it pronounces French music to have neither rhythm nor melody, the language not being susceptible of either; French singing to be but a prolonged barking, absolutely insupportable to an unprejudiced ear: French harmony to be crude, devoid of expression, and full of mere padding; French airs not airs, and French recitative not recitative. 'From which I conclude,' he continues, 'that the French have no music, and never will have any; or that if they ever should, it will be so much the worse for them.' To this pamphlet the actors and musicians of the Opéra replied by hanging and burning its author in effigy. His revenge for this absurdity, and for many other attacks, was the witty Lettre d'un symphoniste de l'Académie royale de musique à ses camarades de l'orchestre (1753), which may still be read with pleasure. The æsthetic part of the Dictionnaire de musique which he finished in 1764 at Motiers-Travers, is admirable both for matter and style. He obtained the privilege of printing it in Paris, Apr. 15, 1765, but did not make use of the privilege till 1768; the Geneva edition, also in one vol. 4to, came out in 1767. In spite of mistakes in the didactic, and serious omissions in the technical portions, the work became very popular, and was translated into several languages; the English edition (London, 1770, 8vo) being by William Warin (see DICTIONARIES OF MUSIC).

² It has been generally supposed that the 'Serva padrona' was not heard in Paris before 1752; this, however, is a mistake; it had been played so far back as Oct. 4, 1746, but the Italian company who performed it was not satisfactory, and it passed almost unnoticed.

Rousseau's other writings on music are: Lettre à M. Grimm, au sujet des remarques ajoutées à sa Lettre sur Omphale (1752), belonging to the early stage of the 'Guerre des Bouffons'; Essai sur l'origine des langues, etc. (1753), containing chapters on harmony, on the supposed analogy between sound and colour and on the music of the Greeks; Lettre à M. l'Abbé Raynal au sujet d'un nouveau mode de musique inventé par M. Blainville, dated May 30, 1754, and first printed in the Mercur de France; Lettre à M. Burney sur la musique, avec des fragments d'observations sur l'Alceste italien de M. le chevalier Gluck, an analysis of 'Alceste' written at the request of Gluck himself; and Extrait d'une réponse du Petit Faiseur à son Prête-Nom, sur un morceau de l'Orphée de M. le chevalier Gluck, dealing principally with a particular modulation in 'Orphée.' From the last two it is clear that Rousseau heartily admired Gluck, and that he had by this time abandoned the exaggerated opinions advanced in the Lettre sur la musique française. The first of the above was issued in 1752, the rest not till after his death; they are now only to be found in his complete works.

On Oct. 30, 1775, Rousseau produced his 'Pygmalion' at the Comédie-Française; it is a lyric piece in one act, and caused some sensation owing to its novelty. Singing there was none, and the only music consisted of orchestral pieces in the intervals of the declamation. He also left fragments of an opera 'Daphnis et Chloé' (published in score, Paris, 1780, folio), and a collection of about a hundred romances and detached pieces, to which he gave the title 'Consolations des misères de ma vie' (Paris, 1781, 8vo); in the latter collection are the graceful 'Rosier,' often reprinted, and a charming setting of Rolli's 'Se tu m'ami.' Rousseau was accused of having stolen the 'Devin du village' from a musician of Lyons named Granet, and the greater part of 'Pygmalion' from another Lyonnais named Coigniet. Among his most persistent detractors was Castil-Blaze (see Molière musicien, ii. 409), but he says not a word of the 'Consolations.' Now any one honestly comparing these romances with the 'Devin du village,' will inevitably arrive at the conviction that airs at once so simple, natural and full of expression, and so incorrect as regards harmony, not only may, but must have proceeded from the same author. There is no doubt, however, that the instrumentation of the 'Devin' was touched up, or perhaps wholly re-written, by Francœur, on whose advice, as well as on that of Jelyotte the tenor singer, Rousseau was much in the habit of relying. An air ('de trois notes') and a duettino, melodious and pretty but of the simplest style, are given in the Musical Library, vol. iii. G. C.

ROUSSEAU, (1) SAMUEL ALEXANDRE (b. Neuve-Maison, Aisne, June 11, 1853; d. Paris, Oct. 1, 1904), studied at the Paris Conservatoire, where he gained successively the first organ prize in 1877, in César Franck's class, and the Grand Prix de Rome in 1878 with 'La Fille de Jephthé.' In the latter year the Prix Cressent was awarded to his opéra-comique, 'Dianora,' which was produced at the Opéra-Comique, Dec. 22, 1879. Works sent from Rome, and executed at the Conservatoire, were 'Salinius' (1880), 'Kaddir' (1881), 'La Florentine' (1882). He was for some years maître de chapelle in Sainte-Clotilde, and chorus-master of the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire. He wrote a great quantity of church music, two Masses, motets, organ pieces, etc.; secular choral works, pieces for piano, harmonium, violin, small orchestra, etc. and songs. He was president of the Société des Compositeurs, and vice-president of the Association de la critique musicale et dramatique. His most famous work was the opera, 'La Cloche du Rhin,' in three acts, brought out at the Paris Opéra, June 8, 1898; another three-act opera, 'Mérowig,' was crowned by the City of Paris in 1891, and was first performed in concert-form at the Grand Théâtre, Paris (Salle de l'Eden), Dec. 12, 1892. His lyrical drama, in four acts, 'Leone,' to a libretto by George Montorgueil, was produced posthumously at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, Mar. 7, 1910. G. F.; rev. M. L. P.

His son (2) MARCEL AUGUSTE LOUIS, called Marcel Samuel Rousseau (second Grand Prix de Rome in 1905, harmony professor at the Conservatoire), has composed: 'Berenice,' incidental music; 'Le Roi Arthur,' lyric poem (1903); 'Tarass-Boulba,' musical drama, performed in Paris at the Théâtre Lyrique du Vaudeville in 1919; 'Le Hulla,' conte lyrique, performed at the Opéra-Comique, Paris, March 9, 1923, also piano compositions.

ROUSSEAU'S DREAM, a very favourite air in England in the early part of the 19th century. Its first appearance under that name is presumably as 'an Air with Variations for the Pianoforte, composed and dedicated to the Rt. Hon. the Countess of Delaware, by J. B. Cramer. London, Chappell,' 1812.

But it is found (with very slight changes) a quarter of a century earlier, under the title of 'Melissa. The words by Charles James, Esq., adapted to the Pianoforte, Harp, or Guitar. London, J. Dale, 1788.' The melody occurs in the 'Pantomime' in Scene 8 of the 'Devin du village,' where its form is as follows:

The tune, no doubt, made its way in England through the adaptation of the opera by Dr. Burney, as 'The Cunning Man,' in 1766. It seems to have been first adapted to a hymn in Thomas Walker's 'Companion to Dr. Rippon's Tunes' (1825), and after its appearance in 'Sacred Melodies' (1843), with the name 'Rousseau' attached to it, became widely popular as a hymn-tune. The origin of the title 'Dream' is not forthcoming.

ROUSSEL, ALBERT (b. Tourcoing, Dept. Nord, Apr. 5, 1869), composer, lost his parents at the age of 7, and was brought up by his grandfather, who was Mayor of Tourcoing. Later on he was sent to the Collège Stanislas in Paris, where he prepared himself for the Naval School, and made a special study of mathematics. At the same time he took piano lessons from the organist of St. Ambroise, Stolz. In 1887 he joined the training ship Borda off Brest. Having afterwards served on various ships, he sailed to French Indo-China on the Stydz. On his return to France he received a commission on the Melpomène, where he composed his first tentative work, a fantasia for violin and piano. Later, on board the Victorieuse, he essayed a piece for violin, viola, violoncello and organ, but so small was his technical knowledge that he wrote the viola part in the treble clef. It was in 1893 that his fellow-officer, Calvé, a brother of the famous singer, induced him to submit a 'Marche nuptiale' to Édouard Colonne. While on leave the following year, he showed his music to Koszul, the director of the Conservatoire of Roubaix, who saw in it enough promise to encourage him to study systematically. Roussel resigned from the Navy, and began to work seriously under Gigout in Paris. On being introduced to Vincent d'Indy in 1896, he became one of that master's first pupils at the then newly-founded Schola Cantorum.

In 1898, 2 madrigals for four voices were performed and gained the prize of the Société des Compositeurs. The first published work of Roussel's, 'Des heures passent,' for piano, belongs to the same year. After six years of study, he became professor at the Schola in Oct. 1902. The same year saw the composition of the trio (op. 2), and in 1903 followed the orchestral prelude inspired by Tolstoy's 'Resurrection' (op. 4). Between 1904-06 the first Symphony, 'Le Poème de la forêt,' was written. Although separate movements were occasionally heard in Paris, the work was not given in its complete form until 1908, in Brussels. Paris followed suit the next year. The incidental music to G. Jean-Aubry's 'Le Marchand de sable qui passe' was composed in 1908 and performed at Havre in December.

Roussel revisited Cochín China and saw India in 1909, and the outcome of his impressions was the composition of the 'Évocations,' three symphonic poems written in 1910-11. 'Le Festin de l'araignée,' a ballet with a scenario by Gilbert de Voisins based on the 'Souvenirs entomologiques' of Henri Fabre, was written in 1912, and produced at the Théâtre des Arts on Apr. 3, 1913.

Another work inspired by the visit to India is the opera-ballet, 'Padmāvatī,' on a libretto by Louis Laloy, which was begun in 1914 but not finished until after the war, in which Roussel was anxious to take an active part. His health not having permitted his remaining in the naval reserves, he tried to join the army, but was rejected for the same reason. He served, however, with the Red Cross, and carried medicaments and cash to the hospitals at the front during the battle of the Marne. Afterwards he joined the motor transport service with a commission corresponding to his old naval degree and went through the siege of Verdun and the battle of the Somme. In Jan. 1918, with his health completely undermined, he was discharged and retired to Perros-Guirec in Brittany, where he finished 'Padmāvatī,' which was produced at the Paris Opéra on June 1, 1923. The orchestral piece 'Pour une fête de printemps' (op. 22) and the second Symphony (op. 23) were composed in 1919-20, and the latter was first performed at the Pasdeloup Concerts on Mar. 4, 1922. A work for the stage, 'La Naissance de la lyre,' to a libretto by Théodore Reinach based on Sophocles was written between 1921-23.

As a composer Roussel possesses almost every quality but that of spontaneous invention; his work is fastidious and distinctive, full of colour, poetry and decorative refinement, but seldom inspired in a purely musical sense. He conjures up images which appeal by their delicacy and individuality to the hearer's aesthetic perception rather than to his ear. Roussel is an artist first and a musician afterwards. He might equally well have developed into a poet or painter. In the latter case he would have been an artist for whom colour is of vastly greater importance than design.

Nevertheless, a great perception of form, as distinct from formality, is discernible in Roussel's work from the beginning. In the early chamber music he adored loosely, but in his own way logically, to the cyclic form of the Franck school. In the later works he gains a feeling of symmetry by placing various sections or movements next to each other in a definitely planned order. To make this mode of construction completely successful, each section would, however, have to be a homogeneous musical unity, and this Roussel does not fully achieve. His gift of building up musical continuity is limited to the expedient of repeating his thematic material in new keys and with varied instrumental treatment, and to that of carrying his music forward by means of new matter which has no organic affinity with what has gone before.

In his treatment of Eastern subjects Roussel is extraordinarily successful. In spite of his occasional use of Oriental material, the 'Évocations' and 'Padmâvati' record a European's impressions of the East in his own native terms. They are not photographic reproductions of things seen, but a recreation of the experiences and feelings, an evocation (no better title could have been found for the 3 symphonic poems) of dreams and memories of the Orient.

In the songs Roussel compensates for his lack of melodic inspiration by a faithful adherence to the poetic declamation and by highly interesting and illuminating piano parts; but he is rarely quite convincing in this branch of his art.

His later works, notably the second symphony, show a certain hardness and angularity which point to the influence of Stravinsky, but, as is the case with all influences which have claimed a passing tribute from him, he has merely taken possession of certain of Stravinsky's idiomatic devices as a new asset and absorbed them into his own personality. He is entirely without any settled method or system, and could undergo even Debussy's strong influence without falling a victim to that master's mannerisms.

ROUX, GASPARD LE (b. Paris, c. 1660; d. circa 1705-10). Practically nothing is known of the life of this Parisian composer, who won fame but who disappeared quite young, leaving only one large work in manuscript. He was, says Sébastien de Brossard, a celebrated master of the clavecin and an excellent musician.

The career of Gaspard Le Roux appears to have been at the earliest from 1685 to 1710 at the latest. In 1690 the Mercur published an 'Air spirituel' in which the basso continuo is indicated as having been written by 'M. le Roux, fameux maître de musique.' In 1692 his name appears amongst the Parisian professors of the clavecin in the 'Livre d'adresses' of Blegny du Pradel. In 1693, in the list of organists and clavecinists established for taxation, he appears to hold a good position, for he is taxed at the highest rate. He paid 15 livres like Couperin, Garnier, Marchand, Le Bègue and some others.

In 1701 he published in the collection of 'Airs sérieux et à boire' (Ballard) an 'Air sérieux' of delicate grace, written in a key more instrumental than vocal (F# minor). In 1705 he took a copyright of ten years (Apr. 21), for the impression and the rights of sale of his principal work: a collection of his 'Pièces de clavecin' which appeared in that year, and which did not pass unnoticed, for the book was soon pirated by a Dutch editor. In his preface the author gives no details about himself. He announces that he will include 'd'autres morceaux de musique plus grands et plus relevés,' probably his motets, of which some are preserved in Brossard's copies. The promise was not kept, and after the appearance of the 'livre de clavecin' no trace of Le Roux's existence is to be found.

This clavecinist did not merit the oblivion into which he fell immediately after his death. If, in their traditional form, his pieces belong to the first school of French clavecin music, the school of Chambonnières, and Le Bègue, they show by certain signs of style that they are the work of a contemporary of Couperin who knew and appreciated the Italian sonatas.

The melodic themes, on the other hand, suggest a personal style; they show a fine sensibility and are quite modern at times. Keys rare at that time are employed for choice. The harmonies are subtle and have racial characteristics. The book of Gaspard Le Roux, in some ways in advance of his time, is certainly one of the best which appeared in France between those of Chambonnières and those of Couperin.

It should be noted that Le Roux's pieces can be played, following his own indications, in three different ways: (1) On the clavocin alone; (2) on two clavecins, an arrangement which Couperin also advocated; (3) as instrumental trios (violins and bass) in which the three separate parts are usually printed at the foot of the pages, below the clavocin version.

Le Roux's motets, in the classic French style inaugurated by Du Mont and Lully, and illustrated by Lulande, are also works of value, to judge by the three specimens in the Brossard Collection. Those for two or three voices with single basso continuo are brilliantly and expressively written.

ROVELLI, a family of eminent Italian musicians. (1) GIOVANNI BATTISTA was first violin in the orchestra of the church of S. Maria Maggiore of Bergamo, at the beginning of the 19th century.

(2) GIUSEPPE (b. Bergamo, 1753; d. Parma, Nov. 12, 1806), his son, was a violoncellist.

(3) ALESSANDRO was at one time director of the orchestra at Weimar, and was the father of—

(4) PIETRO (b. Bergamo, Feb. 6, 1793; d. there, Sept. 8, 1838), who received his first lessons, both in violin-playing and the general science of music, from his grandfather. By an influential patron he was sent to Paris to study under R. Kreutzer, and his playing attracted much attention there. On his father's appointment to Weimar he joined him for a time. At the end of 1814 we find him at Munich, playing with great applause. He remained there for some years, and was made 'Royal Bavarian chamber-musician' and 'first concerto-player.' In Feb. 1817 he was playing at Vienna; there he married Micheline, daughter of E. A. Förster, and a fine PF.-player, and in 1819 went on to Bergamo, took the place once occupied by his grandfather, and seems to have remained there, suffering much from bad health, till his death. (See A.M.Z., Dec. 26, 1838.) G.

ROVESCIO, AL, a term used, in instrumental music, to express two different things. (1) An imitation by contrary motion, in which every descending interval in the leading part is imitated by an ascending one, and vice versa; see Moscheles's étude 'La forza,' op. 51.

(2) A phrase or piece which may be played backwards throughout. It is then synonymous with CANCRIZANS. An interesting example occurs in the minuet of a sonata for PF. and violin by Haydn, in which, on the repetition after the trio, the minuet is played backwards, so as to end on the first note, Haydn's indication being Minuetto D.C. wird zurückgespielt. (See RCTF ET RETRO.) F. T.

ROVETTA, PRETE GIOVANNI (b. Venice, end of 16th cent.; d. there, Aug. 1668), was first a choirboy at St. Mark's, Venice, where he was appointed as bass, Dec. 17, 1623; then priest at San Fantino and S. Silvestro; Nov. 22, 1627, vice-maestro di cappella; and after Monteverdi's death, Feb. 21, 1644, first maestro. He wrote a large number of masses, psalms, motets, etc., and 3 books of madrigals, 2-8 parts, of which the first book, op. 2, appeared in four editions; he composed also some operas; a list is given in Q.-L. (more particulars in Mendel). A number of his madrigals (a 2, 3 and 4) are in MS. (possibly autograph) at St. Michael's College, Tenbury

ROWE, WALTER, a 16th-17th-century English viol da gamba and viola bastarda player, before 1614 at Hamburg; 1614-21 in the court chapel, Berlin, where a 'Walter Rowe, Junior' appears in the latter year, who was still there in 1641, and was teacher of the Princesses Louise Charlotte and Hedwig Sophia. One W. Rowe died 1671 at Berlin, probably the younger, whom Heinrich Albert mentions as a 'famous musician' and Chrysander as having been engaged at the court of Güstrow. Some gamba pieces probably by the elder Rowe are preserved in collective MS. vols. in various German libraries (Q.-L.).

He worked with the types of Le Bé (out in 1540), as Attaignant had done before him with those of Hautin. Fétis states that he worked by himself for some time, but cites no evidence. In 1551 Le Roy married the sister of R. Ballard, who was already occupying himself with music printing, and was attached to the court; they joined partnership and obtained a patent, dated Feb. 16, 1552, as sole printers of music to Henri II. In 1571 he received Orlando Lasso as his guest, and published a volume of 'modul' for him, with a dedication to Charles IX. (See LASSUS.) Le Roy's name disappears from the publications of the firm in 1589, and it may be inferred that he died then. His instruction 'book for the lute, 1557, was translated into English in two different versions, one by Alford, London, 1568, and one by 'F. K. Gentleman' (Ib. 1574). A second work of his was a short and easy instruction book for the 'Guiterne,' or guitar (1578); and a third is a book of 'airs de cour' for the lute, 1571, in the dedication of which he says that such airs were formerly known as 'voix de ville.' Besides these the firm published, between 1551 and 1568, twenty books of 'Chansons' for four voices. (See BALLARD.) G.

ROY, BARTHOLOMEU LE, musician at Rome, 1582, maestro di cappella to the Viceroy of Naples, 1585. A Mass of his was published, together with one by Palestrina (Venice, 1585). He wrote also madrigals, songs, and an instrumental movement. (See Q.-L.)

ROY, RENÉ LE (b. Maisons-Laffitte, Seine-et-Oise, Mar. 4, 1898), flautist. At 9 years of age he began to study the flute with Hennebains, entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1916, in Laffurance's class, and took a brilliant first-class prize in 1918. He then became a pupil of Philippe Gaubert, whom he succeeded as soloist in the Société des Instruments à Vent, founded by Taffanel. He has since founded a new group, the Quintette Instrumentale de Paris. Both alone and with this group he has made numerous concert tours through Europe with a growing success. A number of pieces have been heard for the first time played by him, of which the last in date is the 'Sérénade' dedicated to him by Albert Roussel (1925). M. F.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC, 1720-28, see HANDEL.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC. The original plan for this institution was proposed by Lord Westmorland (then Lord Burghersh) at a meeting of noblemen and gentlemen held at the Thatched House Tavern, London, on July 5, 1822. The proposal meeting with approval, at a second meeting, July 12, rules and regulations were drawn up, and a committee was appointed to carry out the undertaking. According to the rules adopted, the constitution of the new Academy was to be modelled upon the British Institution. The King was announced as the principal Patron, the government was to consist of a committee of twenty-five directors and a sub-committee of nine subscribers, and the school was to be supported by subscriptions and donations. There was also to be a Board, consisting of the Principal and four professors, and the number of pupils was not to exceed forty boys and forty girls, to be admitted between the ages of 10 and 15, and all to be boarded in the establishment. A sub-committee, the members of which were Lord Burghersh, Sir Gore Ouseley, Count St. Antonio, Sir Andrew Bernard, Sir John Murray and the Hon. A. Macdonald, was empowered to form the Institution. Dr. Crotch was appointed the first Principal, and by September 1 the sum of £4312:10s. had been collected, including an annual subscription of 100 guineas from George IV., which was continued by his successors, William IV. and Queen Victoria. In November the house, No. 4 Tenterden Street, Hanover Square, was taken for the new school, but the opening was deferred until Mar. 1823, on the 24th of which month the first lesson was given by Cipriani Potter to Kellow Pye.

The Academy began its labours with the following staff: Head Master—Rev. John Miles, Governess—Mrs. Wade. Principal—Dr. Crotch. Board of Professors—Attwood, Greatorex, Shield and Sir George Smart. Supplementary members of the Board—Horsley and J. B. Cramer. Professors—Anfossi, Andrew, Bishop, Bochsá, Crivelli, F. Cramer, Clementi, Coccia, Cerruti, Dragonetti, Dizi, Griesbach, Hawes, Ireland, C. Kramer, Liverati, Lindley, Loder, Mori, Macintosh, Nicholson, Cipriani Potter,

Puzzi, Ries, H. Smart, Spagnoletti, Watts, Willmann and Caravita.¹

The Foundation students who were first elected were the following: Girls—M. E. Lawson, C. Smith, M. Chancellor, S. Collier, E. Jenkyns, M. A. Jay, C. Bromley, H. Little, J. Palmer, C. Porter. Boys—W. H. Holmes, H. A. M. Cooke,² A. Greateux, T. M. Mudie, H. G. Blagrove, Kellow J. Pye, W. H. Phipps, A. Devaux, C. Seymour, E. J. Neilson and C. S. Packer. The pupils were divided into two classes, those on the foundation paying ten guineas per annum, while extra students paid twenty guineas, or if they lodged and boarded in the establishment, thirty-eight guineas. Although the first report of the Committee (June 2, 1823) was satisfactory, yet financial difficulties soon made themselves felt. In Mar. 1824 the Committee reported a deficiency for the current year of £1600, if the institution were conducted on the same plan as before. To meet this, the difference between the students' payments was abolished, and the fees were fixed for all at £40, the professors at the same time giving their instruction gratis for three months. Lord Burghersh also applied to the Government for a grant, but without effect. In 1825 further alterations were made as to the admission of students, by which the numbers amounted in four months' time to a hundred, and Lord Burghersh made another appeal for a Government grant. In spite of this, the year's accounts still showed an unsatisfactory financial condition. During the latter part of the year Moscheles was included among the staff of professors. Early in 1826 the increased number of students compelled the Academy to enlarge its premises, the lease³ of No. 5 Tenterden Street was bought, and the two houses were thrown into one. In February the Government were petitioned for a charter. In reply it was stated that though unwilling to give a grant, they were ready to defray the cost of a charter. In 1827 the financial condition of the Academy was so disastrous that it was proposed to close the institution; but a final appeal to the public procured a loan of £1400, beside further donations, enabling the directors to carry on the undertaking on a reduced scale and with increased fees. Henceforward the state of things began to mend. The charter was granted on June 23, 1830. By this document the members of the Academy and their successors were incorporated and declared to be, and for ever hereafter to continue to be by the name of the 'Royal Academy of Music,' under the government of a Board of Directors, consisting of thirty members, with power to make rules and regulations; a Committee of Management, with full power over the funds and both students and professors; and a Treasurer.

In 1832 Dr. Crotch resigned his post of Principal, and was succeeded by Cipriani Potter, who retained office until his resignation in 1859. The financial position of the Academy, although not prosperous, remained on a tolerably secure footing. In 1834 William IV. directed that a quarter of the proceeds of the Musical Festival held in Westminster Abbey should be handed over to the institution. This sum, amounting to £2250, was devoted by the Committee to the foundation of four King's Scholarships, to be competed for by two male and two female students. Instead, however, of being invested separately, the fund was merged in the general property of the Academy, a mistake which eventually led to the discontinuance of the scholarships. For the next ten years the financial condition of the Academy continued to fluctuate. In July 1853 the Committee of Management (which was totally unprofessional in its constitution) summoned the professors, revealed to them the decline of the funded property, and asked their counsel as to the remedies to be adopted. The professors advised that the management should be made entirely professional. This course was so far adopted that a Board of Professors was appointed to advise the Committee.

The first act of this Board (Sept. 1853) was to recommend the discontinuance of the practice of students lodging and boarding on the premises. This recommendation was adopted, and since that time the Academy only receives day students. The Board formed in 1853 was disbanded by Lord Westmorland in 1856, but after his death in 1859 a new Board was formed; this, however, found itself obliged to resign in 1864. Before its resignation it drew up a memorial to Government, praying for an annual grant. After a conference with a deputation of professors, Mr. Gladstone, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, inserted in the estimates for the year a sum of £500 'to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending Mar. 31, 1865, for enabling the Directors of the Royal Academy of Music to provide accommodation for the Institution.' In 1866, upon the change of Administration, suggestions were made to the Committee on the part of the Government, and were renewed personally in 1867 by the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, in consequence of which the Committee was induced to expend the whole of its funds, in order to accommodate the institution to the designs in which it was invited to participate. In 1867, Lord Beaconsfield (then Mr. Disraeli), in reply to a question as to the grant, announced in the House of Commons that 'the Government were of opinion that they would not be authorised in recommending any enlargement of the grant, the results of the institution not being in fact of a satisfactory character.' This was followed by the total withdrawal of the grant, in order (to quote from an official letter addressed to Sir W. Sterndale Bennett) 'simply to give effect to the opinion that it was not so expedient to subsidise a central and quasi-independent association, as to establish a system of musical instruction under the direct control of some Department of Government.' In this emergency the Committee decided to close the establishment. The funds (including the sum devoted to the King's Scholarships) were totally exhausted. The professors met in 1868 to consider what could be done, and generously offered to accept a payment pro rata. It was then, however, announced that the Committee had resigned the Charter into the hands of the Queen. Upon this the professors obtained a legal opinion, to the effect that the Charter could not be resigned without the consent of every member of the Academy. As many of the members protested at the time against the resignation of the Charter, it was returned, and by great exertions on the part of the professors, a new Board of Directors was formed under the presidency of the Earl of Dudley, who appointed a new Committee of Management, in which the professional element formed an important ingredient.

From the time of this change the institution has continued to prosper. In 1868, on the return to office of the Liberal Ministry, Mr. Gladstone restored the annual grant of £500. In 1876 the number of pupils had so increased that the lease of the house adjoining the premises in Tenterden Street, No. 5, had to be repurchased out of the savings of the institution. This house was joined on to the original premises, and a concert-room was formed out of part of the two houses, which though small proved a great boon not only to the students for their regular concerts, but to many concert-givers for whose purposes the more extensive rooms of St. James's Hall, Exeter Hall, etc., were too large. In July 1880 William Shakespeare was appointed conductor of the Students' concerts, vice Walter Macfarren. He was succeeded in 1886 by Barnby, by Mackenzie in 1888 and by Henry Wood in 1923. It was since the appointment of Mackenzie as Principal in Feb. 1888 that the real tide of prosperity for the institution set in, 6 Tenterden Street and 12 and 13 Dering Street being added to the premises in 1892 and 1898 respectively, and in 1903 the upper part of 3 Tenterden Street, to meet the increase of accommodation required.

In 1911 the lease expired and the Academy moved to its present site, York Gate, Marylebone Road, the new buildings being formally opened¹ on June 22, 1912. A junior department was opened in 1914.

In 1922 there came the centenary celebrations, lasting from July 10 to July 22, during which at the Queen's, Adlon and Duke's Halls, a large amount of music by past and present Academy students was performed, including revivals of Goring Thomas's 'Nadeshda,' Sullivan's 'Yeomen of the Guard' and Mackenzie's 'Cricket on the Hearth.'

The Duke's Hall, it may be added, is the Academy's own concert-hall, with a seating capacity of 800 and an organ by Norman & Beard which was presented by Mrs. Thomas Threlfall as a memorial to her husband, who for many years was a patron of the institution and chairman of the committee of management.

In 1924, on the retirement of Mackenzie at the end of 30 years of office, J. B. McEwen became Principal.

The following have been the Principals of the Academy from its foundation to the present time:

Crotch (1823-32), Chrysant Potter (1832-50), Charles Lucas (1859-66), William Sterndale Bennett (1866-75), George Alexander Macfarren (1875-87), Alexander Campbell Mackenzie (1888-1924), John Blackwood McEwen (1924).

The Academy is supported by the Government grant, subscriptions, donations and fees from students. It is under the direction of a President (H.R.H. the Duke of Connaught and Strathearn, K.G.), four vice-presidents, about twenty directors, and a Committee of Management, consisting partly of professors of the institution and partly of well-known business men who are so good as to place their powers at the service of the institution. It was Mackenzie's wish that his office as Principal and that of Chairman of this Committee should be separate functions, and accordingly since 1890 this has been the case. Thomas Threlfall was elected to the latter post in 1890, and filled it with zeal and distinguished success till his death in February 1907, when his place was taken by P. L. Agnew. A staff of professors and sub-professors (students) gives instruction in every branch of music, besides which there are classes for languages, diction, elocution, opera, dancing, drama, fencing, and deportment. Students cannot enter for less than a year, nor for a single subject; the normal course is three years, and all pupils receive an all-round musical training. The library of the institution has been noticed under LIBRARIES.

There are between 60 and 70 scholarships and exhibitions open to competition (not all awarded annually); but mention should be made of the noble foundation, by the late Mrs. Ada Lewis Hill, of the fifteen scholarships bearing her name, five of which are awarded each year and tenable for three years. Deserving but indigent musical ability is also assisted by the Students' Aid Fund, of which the interest is appropriated, at the Committee's discretion, towards the reduction of the fees of talented pupils.

Public performances have been given by the pupils of the R.A.M. at various intervals from the date of its foundation. Their locality was sometimes in the Hanover Square Rooms and sometimes at Tentorden Street. The present custom is to have fortnightly concerts of chamber and organ music in the Duke's Hall, and one chamber concert and one orchestral concert at the Queen's Hall every term. Public operatic and dramatic performances are also given from time to time, these being sometimes of works by the students themselves.

For many years the R.A.M. held Local Examinations throughout the kingdom. In 1889 it combined with the R.C.M. for this purpose. See ASSOCIATED BOARD.

The R.A.M. continues its own separate Examination in London (independent of Academy Teaching) of music teachers and performers. This is known as the 'Metropolitan Examination.' Successful candidates at this Examination, which increases annually in popular estimation, receive diplomas certifying to their proficiency, and are created by the directors, Licentiates of the Royal Academy of Music, L.R.A.M.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL. This hall originated in a scheme laid before the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 for the erection of a suitable building for the purposes of art and science and to serve as a completion of the memorial to the Prince Consort. The Commissioners gave the site and a guarantee towards the cost of building, which was raised in the main by public subscription. It was formally opened on Mar. 29, 1871. In June of that year a choral concert was given to inaugurate the opening of the International Exhibition held on adjacent ground. This was conducted by Gounod, who had come to England as a consequence of the Franco-Prussian war, and the choir then formed shortly became the ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY (q.v.). Further musical performances of various kinds were given during and in connexion with the exhibition of 1873. In 1874 an important series of choral and orchestral concerts took place, given in conjunction with Messrs. Novello, at which an attempt was made to popularise the best music. For a short time these were given daily and, amongst other things, did a good deal towards making known the music of Wagner. They came to an end with the production in England of Verdi's 'Requiem' in 1875. Another notable event was the series of 8 Wagner concerts in 1877. Meanwhile the hall was gradually being used for other purposes than music, and in 1878 an exhibition of fine arts was held. The year 1880 saw the beginning of the 'benefit' concert and the suitability of the large auditorium for recitals of artists of the greatest public renown, and in 1881 Sims Reeves gave a series of 'farewell' oratorio concerts.

By raising temporarily the level of the arena, balls on a large scale became practicable, and the hall has been greatly used for these and such things as, in later days, cinema exhibitions and boxing-matches. In 1926 C. B. Cochran undertook the management of the hall.

In 1885, in connexion with the Inventions Exhibition, an important display of musical instruments was on view, the largest and most extensive known. Various 'farewell' concerts may be mentioned : Prosper Santon, 1883 ; Christine Nilsson, 1888 ; Sims Reeves, 1891 ; Edward Lloyd, 1900 ; Patti, 1906 ; Santley, 1907 ; and Albani, 1911. The jubilee of the opening of the hall was celebrated by a special concert, attended by the King and Queen, on May 7, 1921. The seating capacity of the hall is about 10,000 ; its inside measurements are : length, 264 ft., and width, 231 ft., while the height of the dome from the floor of the arena is 132 ft. 6 in. The fine organ is by Willis. (See article by H. Klein in Mus. T., Apr., May and June 1921.) N. C. G.

ROYAL ALBERT HALL ORCHESTRA. This organisation was formed under the title of New Symphony Orchestra in 1905 by John Saunders, who acted as leader, Eli Hudson, a prominent flautist of the day, and Charles Draper, the clarinettist, and made its first appearance at a series of Sunday afternoon concerts at the Coronet Theatre, Notting Hill Gate, beginning Oct. 29, and under the conductorship of E. Howard Jones. In 1906 Beecham became conductor, and concerts were given at the Queen's Hall and in many provincial cities, at which numerous British works were produced. In Nov. 1907, the orchestra was incorporated as a limited company, and a provincial tour was made with Kubelik, Landon Ronald conducting. At the close of this, Ronald was appointed permanent conductor, and in March 1909 a series of symphony concerts was begun at the Queen's Hall, which lasted till 1914. In Oct. 1909 the first series of Sunday afternoon concerts was given at the Royal Albert Hall, the last of these being that of the season 1918-19. A short series of Promenade concerts at the Royal Albert Hall, conducted by Beecham and Ronald, May-June 1915, may be mentioned. On Oct. 30, 1920, four more series of Sunday concerts were given by the orchestra at the same hall, but under the title it now bears. For official purposes the original title remains unchanged.

ROYAL AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL SOCIETY, THE, was established in 1872 by

J.R.H. the Duke of Edinburgh (late Duke of Coburg), who was the first president and leader of the orchestra for many years. J. R. Gow was honorary secretary, and George Mount acted as conductor for the first twenty-six years of the Society's existence, retiring in 1897, when Ernest Ford was appointed. Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted the first concert in 1873, and took a lifelong interest in the institution, which has done much to raise the standard of amateur proficiency in London. M.

ROYAL ARTILLERY BAND. The band of the Royal Regiment of Artillery was formed in 1762, and may thus claim to be the oldest permanent musical organisation in the country. Antony Rocca appears to have been the first bandmaster, succeeded on his death in 1774 by Georg Kehler (later known as George Kealor). In 1777 Frederick Wiele was appointed, and O. Schnuphass in 1802, George McKenzie, 1805, William G. Collins, 1845, James Smyth, 1854, Cavaliere Ladislao Zavertal, 1881, and E. C. Stretton, the present bandmaster, 1907. The band is maintained by the officers of the Royal Artillery and has, from its inception, been double-banded, that is, a string and military band. In strength it has risen from the modest eight players of 1762 to the full symphony orchestra, or military band, of 107 of the present day. A regular series of vocal, chamber and orchestral concerts was instituted in 1810, at which the performance of classical music was undertaken. These concerts took place at Woolwich. In 1889 there was started the system of giving symphony concerts in London in addition to those at Woolwich, and from Jan. 1895 to May 1905 the band appeared regularly at the Royal Albert Hall on Sunday afternoons. Concerts are now also given from time to time at various R.A. stations. In 1913-14 the band represented British military music at the Auckland Exhibition, and also at the Gothenburg Exhibition of 1924.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY. This choir grew out of the one organised by Gounod on the opening of the Royal Albert Hall in 1871, being taken over in the following year by Barnby (who amalgamated with it his own choir), and giving its first concert on Feb. 12, 1873, a performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion.' It was known at first as the 'Royal Albert Hall Choral Society,' the name being changed to the present title by consent of Queen Victoria in 1888. The repertory of the choir has necessarily been confined in the main to works of great public appeal: 'Messiah,' performed regularly twice annually, formerly three times, 'Elijah,' Berlioz's 'Faust,' Sullivan's 'Golden Legend,' for some years a very popular work, and, in later days, Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' and Elgar's 'Dream of Gerontius.' But during a period of over fifty years many notable choral works have been revived, and some heard either for the first time, or for the first time in London. Mention may be made of Bach's B minor Mass, Beethoven's Mass in D and 'Choral' symphony, Brahms's 'Requiem,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha,' first performed in complete form, Dvořák's 'Stabat Mater,' Elgar's 'Apostles,' 'Kingdom' and 'Dream of Gerontius,' Gounod's 'Redemption,' once a great favourite, many oratorios of Handel and Mendelssohn, Parry's 'Job,' 'King Saul,' 'War and Peace,' 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' and other works, Rossini's 'Stabat Mater,' Saint-Saëns's 'Samson and Delilah,' Smyth's Mass, Stanford's 'Revenge,' 'Voyage of Maeldund,' etc., Vaughan-Williams's 'Sea Symphony,' Verdi's 'Requiem,' (given under the composer's direction at one of the concerts organised in the hall by Messrs. Novello in 1875), and Wagner, 'Parsifal,' the whole work in concert form in 1884, and various operatic selections. Barnby was succeeded on his death in 1896 by Frederick Bridge, who held the post till his retirement in 1922. He was succeeded in turn by H. L. Balfour, who had for some years acted as chorus-master. His appointment was that of general conductor to the society, guest conductors being invited to take charge of a certain proportion of the concerts in each season.

The orchestra employed for the society's concerts was at first composed of the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society augmented by professional players. Difficulties over rehearsals led to the engagement of a professional band only, composed of London's chief instrumentalists.

When the society was first formed the management was largely controlled by the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851, through whose instrumentality the hall was built (see ROYAL ALBERT HALL); in the autumn of 1875 an independent committee was formed, with the Duke of Edinburgh as its first president. The present governing body consists of amateurs and professional musicians under the presidency of the Duke of Connaught. (See an article on the Royal Albert Hall and Choral Society, by H. Klein, Mus. T., Apr., May and June 1921.)

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC. For information as to the inception of this institution, see NATIONAL TRAINING SCHOOL FOR MUSIC. The R.C.M. was founded by the Prince of Wales at a meeting held at St. James's Palace, Feb. 28, 1882, and was opened by the Prince himself on May 7 of the following year. Negotiations took place with the R.A.M. with the object of uniting the two institutions, but the project came to nothing. The object of the foundation may best be described in the words of the Royal Charter, by which it was incorporated May 23, 1883:

'First, the advancement of the Art of Music by means of a central working and examining body charged with the duty of providing musical instruction of the highest class, and of rewarding with academical degrees and certificates of proficiency and otherwise persons whether educated or not at the College, who on examination may prove themselves worthy of such distinctions and evidences of attainment;

'Secondly, the promotion and supervision of such musical instruction in schools and elsewhere as may be thought most conducive to the cultivation and dissemination of the Art of Music in the United Kingdom;

'Lastly, generally the encouragement and promotion of the cultivation of Music as an Art throughout our dominions.'

Like its predecessor, the R.C.M. rests on the basis of endowed scholarships lasting normally three years with the possibility of extension. The funds for these are provided by the interest of money subscribed throughout the country and permanently invested. The College opened with 50 scholars elected by competition, 15 of whom received a maintenance grant in addition to their free musical education. The number of scholarships has been considerably enlarged since. A large number of Council Exhibitions and other valuable prizes are competed for annually. The first number of paying students was 42; in 1925 the number was about 600. The Government of the R.C.M., of which the King is Patron, consists of a Council presided over by the Prince of Wales. King Edward VII. as Prince of Wales was the first President; the Council is divided into Finance and Executive Committees. The Executive head of the R.C.M. is termed Director. The first staff consisted of:

Director: Sir George Grove, D.C.L.; Board of Professors: J. F. Bridge, Mus.D., H. C. Denon, Henry Holmes, Mme. Lind Goldschmidt (Jenny Lind), Walter Parratt, C. Hubert H. Parry, Mus.D., Ernest Parer, C. V. Stanford, Mus.D., Franklin Taylor, A. Visetti. Other principal teachers: Mme. A. Goddard, J. F. Barnett, G. C. Martin, Mus.D., R. Gompertz, O. H. Howell, F. E. Gladstone, Mus.D., J. Higgs, Mus.B., G. Garcia. Registrar: G. Watson, jun.

In 1894, on the resignation of Grove, Parry was appointed Director and filled the post with great distinction until his death in 1918, when Hugh P. Allen, Mus.D. (the present, 1927, Director), was appointed. Other officials of the R.C.M. at this date are George A. Macmillan, D.Litt. (Hon. Secretary), Claude L. C. Aveling, M.A. (Registrar), E. J. N. Polkinhorne, Hon. R.C.M. (Bursar), and Miss Beatrix Darnell (Lady Superintendent).

When the accommodation in the original building, now occupied by the ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS (q.v.), became insufficient a new site was granted in Prince Consort Road, and the first stone of the new building was laid on July 8, 1890. The structure, erected by the generosity of the late Mr. Samson Fox, M.I.C.E., was formally opened on May 2, 1894. To this a large concert-room was subsequently added and opened on June 13, 1901. It contains a fine organ, the gift of Sir Hubert Parry. Other important acquisitions to the property of the R.C.M. are the Library of the SACRED HAR-MONIC SOCIETY (q.v.), acquired through the exertions of Sir P. Cunliffe Owen, and that of the CONCERTS OF ANCIENT MUSIC, given by Queen Victoria (see LIBRARIES). In 1894 Sir George Donaldson presented a large collection of musical instruments, preserved as the Donaldson Museum. (See COLLECTIONS OF MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS.) In 1903 Sir S. Ernest Palmer founded the PATRON'S FUND (q.v.). Other endowments from the same source are the Berkshire Scholarship, and in 1924 the Ernest Palmer Opera Study Fund. Two memorials of Sir Hubert Parry's directorship have been added: the Parry Opera Theatre (Council's memorial) and the Parry Room, a reading-room for students and others in the library, the memorial of members of the College. Both were opened in 1921.

From 1885-1914 the Opera Class gave annual performances in London theatres, which included revivals of several important works. In the earlier years of the R.C.M.'s history numerous orchestral concerts were given in the public concert halls of London and elsewhere. Both these activities were undertaken as a means of fulfilling the last of the three objects named in the Charter. In recent years the performances, both of opera and concert, have been given within the building, and more as a part of the education of the students than as an appeal to the general public. The growth of the R.C.M. itself, as well as changes in general conditions of the art in England, have induced a more intensive policy.

In 1889 the R.C.M. joined with the R.A.M. in forming the ASSOCIATED BOARD (q.v.) for the purpose of conducting local examinations throughout the Empire. The degrees and diplomas conferred by the R.C.M. independently are as follows: G.R.C.M. (Graduate) is granted to pupils of the College of at least three years' standing, who have attained high honours in certain branches of the Associateship examination. A.R.C.M. (Associate) is conferred by examination on candidates from all sources in various branches of the art. F.R.C.M. (Fellow) is conferred by the Council to mark appreciation of services rendered to the art of music and to the College; the number is limited to 50. Hon. R.C.M. is similarly conferred. The Council has power to create degrees, Doctor and Bachelor of Music. (See DEGREES IN MUSIC.)

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS, an association founded in 1864 on the initiative of R. D. Limpus, with a view (1) to provide a central organisation in London of the profession of organist; (2) to provide a system of examinations and certificates for the better definition and protection of the profession, and to secure competent organists for the service of the Church; (3) to provide opportunities for intercourse amongst members of the profession and the discussion of professional topics ; (4) to encourage the composition and study of sacred music.

A council was chosen, and the College was opened at Queen Square, Bloomsbury, and afterwards was located successively at 95 Great Russell Street, Hart Street, Bloomsbury, and Kensington Gore, when, after the opening of the new building of the R.C.M., the old building of that school passed into the tenure of the R.C.O. The College is incorporated under the Companies' Acts ; it consists of a President, Vice-Presidents, Musical Examiners, Hon. Treasurer, Hon. Secretary, Hon. Librarian, Hon. Auditors (two), Fellows, Associates, Hon. Members and Ordinary Members. The Archbishops of Canterbury and York and the Bishop of London are Patrons of the College, and the names of some notable musicians appear among the office-bearers from the beginning up to the present time. A council of not less than 30 Fellows, with the Hon. Secretary and Hon. Treasurer, hold the reins of government, retiring annually ; two-thirds of the number are re-elected with other Fellows who have not served during the preceding year. At the general meeting every July the retiring council present their report on the state of the College.

Arrangements are made for the half-yearly holding of examinations in organ-playing, general knowledge of the organ, harmony, counterpoint, composition, sight-reading and general musical knowledge, after passing which a candidate is entitled to a diploma admitting him to a fellowship in the College. This examination is only open to candidates who have previously been examined for and obtained the certificate of associatship, and to musical graduates of the English Universities. To Dr. E. H. TURPIN (q.v.), for many years Hon. Secretary, was due the proposal to establish a Pension Fund for organists incapacitated by age or illness. Other features of the College work are the Organists' Register, and the prizes for composition. The College was incorporated by Royal Charter in 1893.

The Calendar of the Royal College of Organists, issued annually, contains a short history of the College with full information as to its current activities and particularly the regulations for its examinations. L. M. M., rev.

ROYAL MILITARY SCHOOL OF MUSIC,
Whitton, Twickenham. Kneller Hall is established on the site of the original mansion of Sir Godfrey Kneller, one time court painter.

Before 1857 bands in the army were not officially recognised, and the bands that then existed were financed and controlled entirely by their own officers. Units competed with one another in the appearance of the band, (dressing their bandmen in multi-coloured uniforms), and in the number of instruments and capable musicians each possessed. The result of this was that army bands were in a state of chaos, and massed band performances were impossible owing to the different instrumentation and various pitches of these bands. (See FITCH.)

British army bands compared most unfavourably with continental bands at this period, and attention was drawn to the very poor pay given to our bandmen and the absence of any opportunity to advance their position, which caused bandmen to purchase their discharge as soon as they acquired a fair proficiency on an instrument, so that they could obtain more lucrative positions in civil life. Musicians obtained the interest of the Duke of Cambridge in military bands. They represented that a bandsman's pay should be increased and that he was capable of being trained as a bandmaster. (At this time bandmasters were, with few exceptions, foreigners.)

The result of these representations was the official recognition of army bands and the establishment of the Royal Military School of Music (1857), to train instrumentalists and bandmasters for army bands.

The institution began in a modest way with four professors, including Herr Schallehn, the Principal or Resident Instructor, and was open 'to the sons of sailors and soldiers who are intended for either service and have shown musical aptitude.'

Later in 1875 the institution was formally taken over by the Government—accommodation was provided for more pupils and the staff of professors increased. The official head of the institution is the Commandant, whose tenure of office is four years, who has a small military staff, including the Director of Music, Lieut. H. E. Adkins, Mus.Bac., L.R.A.M., A.R.C.M. (who is the permanent musical head), and a teaching staff of sixteen professors. The establishment provides for 36 students for training as bandmasters and 144 pupils for training as soloists.

Pupils sent to Kneller Hall must be in possession of an Army Second-Class Certificate of Education, and be good performers on their instruments. In addition to their training on a wind instrument, pupils may be taught a string instrument or the pianoforte. Instruction is also given in the elements of music, elementary harmony, aural training, and an elementary knowledge of military band instrumentation. The pupil's course is for one year.

Candidates for a student's course must be N.C.O.'s, soloists on their instruments, in possession of a First-Class Army Certificate of Education, and be strongly recommended by their Commanding Officers. Candidates have to pass a qualifying examination in the elements of music, elementary harmony, free counterpoint, musical history and elementary band instrumentation.

A successful candidate on joining Kneller Hall serves a probationary period of six months, and if he proves in any way unsuitable he is returned to his unit. He is first prepared for examination in advanced harmony, free counterpoint, canon and fugue, military band instrumentation and aural training. This examination is conducted by representatives of the War Office, R.A.M. and R.C.M.

When the student qualifies in this examination he turns his attention to conducting, the training and rehearsing of a military band, orchestral concert work, training of a male voice choir, church services, and advanced arranging of compositions for the military band and orchestra.

Each student has to compose a Quick March for a military band, church voluntaries for the orchestra, and a short choral work for male voices. In addition, students attend a comprehensive course which includes an outline of world history, advanced English, correspondence, accounts, the preparation and delivery of lectures, and lessons on musical subjects, and the pronunciation of the names of composers, musical works, and musical terms in German, Italian and French, under the Education Instructor.

During his course at Kneller Hall the student studies in succession the technique of every instrument in the military band.

He is expected to be a fair performer on each, so that he can give elementary instruction in these instruments.

At the end of this course, which lasts about three years, the qualified students are appointed bandmasters to army bands as vacancies occur.

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY, see PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS OF GREAT BRITAIN. This Society was founded by the exertions of FESTING (q.v.), and Wiedemann the flautist, who were struck by the appearance of two little boys driving milch asses, who proved to be orphans of a deceased oboe-player named Kytch. They immediately raised subscriptions to relieve the family, and feeling that some permanent establishment was required to meet similar cases, induced the most eminent music-professors of the day to associate themselves together as a Society for that purpose. This excellent work was formally accomplished on April 19, 1738, and amongst its first members were Handel, Boyce, Arne, Christopher Smith, Carey, Cooke, Edward Purcell, Leveridge, Greene, Reading, Hayes, Pepusch and Travers.

In 1739 the members of the Society executed a 'deed of trust,' which was duly enrolled in the Court of Chancery; the signatures of the members, 226 in number, include the most eminent professors of music of the time. The deed recites the rules and regulations for membership and for the distribution of the funds, and provides for regular monthly meetings at the sign of Saint Martin, in St. Martin's Lane. Handel took an especial and active interest in the welfare of the Society, composing concertos and giving concerts for the benefit of its funds, and at his death bequeathing to it a legacy of £1000. The Handel Commemoration held in Westminster Abbey in 1784 brought a further addition of £6000. In 1789 George III. granted the Society a charter, by virtue of which its management is vested in the hands of the 'Governors' and 'Court of Assistants.' In 1804 the funds of the Society not being in a flourishing condition, the king gave a donation of 500 guineas. Considerable sums have been given or bequeathed to the Society by members of the music profession, amongst them being Signora Storace £1000, Crosdill £1000, Begrez £1000, Schulz £1000, Thomas Molineux, a Manchester bassoon and double-bass player, 1000 guineas.

The Society pays away annually a considerable sum to relieve distress, which amount is provided by donations from the public, subscriptions and donations of members of the Society, and interest on the Society's funded property.

Members of the Society must be professional musicians, and are now of both sexes. The Royal Society of Female Musicians was established in 1839 by several ladies of distinction in the musical profession, amongst others Mrs. Anderson, Miss Birch, Miss Dolby and Miss Mounsey (Mrs. Bartholomew), in consequence of the Royal Society of Musicians having made no provision in their laws for the admission of female members. The two societies were amalgamated in 1886.

There is, says Dr. Burney, 'no lucrative employment belonging to this Society, excepting small salaries to the secretary and collector, so that the whole produce of benefits and subscriptions is net, and clear of all deductions or drawbacks.' The large staff of physicians, surgeons, counsel, solicitors, give their gratuitous services to the Society. The present (1926) secretary is J. F. C. Bennett. The Society's rooms are at No. 12 Lisle Street, Leicester Square, and contain some interesting memorials of music, as well as a collection of portraits, including Handel, two portraits by Hudson and Van der Myn (?); Haydn; Corelli, by Howard; Geminiani, by Hudson; Purcell, by Closterman; C. E. Horn, by Pocock; John Parry, the elder; Sir W. Parsons; J. Sinclair, by Harlowe; Gaetano Crivelli, by Partridge;

Domenico Francesco Maria Crivelli; J. S. Bach, by Clark of Eton; Beethoven, a print with autograph presenting it to C. Neate; W. Dance, a drawing by his brother; a life-size painting of George III. by Gainsborough; W. H. Cummings, George Smart and various less distinguished members of the Society, and a plaster bust of Gounod by A. Gilbert, R.A.

ROYER, JOSEPH NICOLAS PANCRACE (b. Bourgogne, c. 1700; d. Paris, Jan. 11, 1755), of noble family, settled in Paris in 1725 as teacher of the harpsichord. He became a musician-in-ordinary to the king, and in 1753 bought from B. de Bury the place of Maître de musique de la chambre du Roy. In 1741 he became conductor at the Opéra, in 1743 inspector and in 1748 director and lessee of the concert spirituel. He composed several operas and ballets, 1 book of sonatas (1740), and 1 book of pièces de clavecin, 1^{er} livre (1746).

ROZE, MARIE HIPPOLYTE, née PONSIN (b. Paris, Mar. 2, 1846; d. near Paris, June 21, 1926), received instruction in singing from Mocker at the Conservatoire, and in 1865 gained first prizes in singing and comic opera. She made her début Aug. 16 of that year at the Opéra-Comique as Marie, in Hérold's opera of that name, and at once concluded an engagement for the next three years there. She created the part of Djelma in 'Le Premier jour de Bonheur' of Auber, at his request, on Feb. 15, 1868. After further instruction from Wartel she appeared at the Opéra as Marguerite in 'Faust' (Jan. 2, 1870), returned to the Opéra-Comique to create the part of Jeanne in Flotow's 'L'Ombre,' July 7, 1870. After the war she sang for a season at Brussels and elsewhere, and on Apr. 30, 1872, first appeared in England at the Italian Opera, Drury Lane, as Marguerite, and as Marcelline in 'Les Deux Journées,' on its production (for one night only), June 20, 1872. The ensuing seasons, until 1881 (except 1878 and 1880) she sang at that theatre or at Her Majesty's, becoming a great favourite. In 1874 she married an American bass singer, Julius Edson Perkins, who died in the following year at Manchester. In the winter of 1877 she made a highly successful visit to America, returning in 1879 to Her Majesty's Theatre. After singing at the Birmingham Festival of 1882 with great success, she joined the Carl Rosa Company from 1883-89; in that time she added to her repertory Fidelio and Elsa, and was the first representative in England of Manon Lescaut in Massenet's opera of that name. Her impersonation of Carmen was her greatest success, as it was full of delicate detail, and presented Bizet's music in an ideal way. She sang the part first in Italian in 1879 in America and afterwards in London. Scarcely less effective was her Manon in Massenet's opera, first sung by her in English at Liverpool, Jan. 17, 1885, and at Drury Lane on May 7. In 1890 she settled in Paris as a teacher of singing, re-appearing at long intervals in London and the English provinces in concerts. She made a farewell tour in 1894; her last appearance in London was as late as 1903, when she sang at a concert given by one of her pupils. A. C.

RUBATO The word means 'robbed' (time), and the thing may be defined as the effect of pitch upon duration, a definition which holds also if we extend pitch to mean a cluster of pitches, in counterpoint, harmony or orchestration. In music everything is relative; no element enters in without modifying, however slightly, other elements. A note held for a certain length at one pitch does not affect us in the same way as when held at another, and this difference of affection is expressed by altering slightly the duration. This alteration is a matter of nice judgment, and the act of rubato is a golden opportunity for the exercise of economy, without which it is apt to defeat its own end.

The term has suffered from a misconception. The rule has been given and repeated indiscriminately that the 'robbed' time must be 'paid back' within the bar. That is absurd, because the bar line is a notational, not a musical, matter (see BAR). But there is no necessity to pay back even within the phrase: it is the metaphor that is wrong. Rubato is the free element in time, and the more it recognises the norm the freer it is. The law which it has to recognise is the course of the music as a whole; not a bar but a page, not a page but a movement. If it does not do this it becomes spasmodic and unmeaning, like correspondence which is too much underlined.

RUBEBE (RYBYBE), a mediæval instrument of the viol family. It was larger than the REBEC (q.v.) but, like it, came into England from Southern Europe, having been in use under Moorish influence in Spain from the 10th century. It was doubtless evolved from the Arabian Robaba. During performance the instrument was usually rested on the knee or between the knees, as shown in the Norman carvings of the 12th century, but in the early 14th century we find it played at the shoulder. The body was oval—not pear-shaped like the Rebec—and without the incurvations or waist found in the viol or 'Fithel,' popular at the same period. Jerome of Moravia (c. 1260) has left us instructions as to its tuning and fingering: the strings, four in number, were arranged in two pairs and tuned in fifths (tenor G and C): the compass was an octave and one note, shifts being unknown. A dance tune of the late 13th century (Bodl. Donce, 139) was no doubt originally written for this instrument. Before the Middle Ages closed it was merged into the Viol. (q.v.). F. W. G.

RUBINELLI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (b. Brescia, 1753; d. there, 1829), celebrated singer, made his first appearance on the stage at the age of 18, at Stuttgart, in Sacchini's 'Calliroe.' For some years he was attached to the Duke of Wurtemberg's chapel, but in 1774 he sang at Modena in Paisiello's 'Alessandro nelle Indie' and Anfossi's 'Demofonte.' During the next few years he performed at all the principal theatres in Italy, and in 1786 he came to London. He made a successful début in a pasticcio called 'Virginia,' his own part in which was chiefly composed by Tarchi. He next sang with Mara, in 'Armida,' and in Handel's 'Giulio Cesare,' revived for him, with several interpolations from Handel's other works. These are said to have been most admirably sung by Rubinelli.

After his season in London he returned to Italy, where he had enormous success at Vicenza and Verona, in 1791 and 1792, in 'La morte di Cleopatra' of Nasolini, and 'Agesilao' of Andreozzi. In 1800 he left the stage, and settled at Brescia. F. A. M.

RUBINI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (b. Romano, near Bergamo, Apr. 7, 1795; d. there, Mar. 2, 1854), one of the most celebrated tenor singers.

After a period of youthful discouragements he got a small engagement at Pavia, then another at Brescia for the Carnival; he next appeared at the San Moisè theatre at Venice, and lastly at Naples, where the director, Barbaja (according to Escudier), engaged him to sing with Pellegrini and Nozzari, in two operas written for him by Fioravanti. (The name of one of these operas, 'Adelson e Salvini,' is identical with that of an early work of Bellini's, produced about this time.) With the public Rubini was successful, but so little does Barbaja appear to have foreseen his future greatness that he wished to part with him at the end of the first year's engagement, and only consented to retain his services at a reduced salary. Rubini preferred making some sacrifice to leaving Naples, where he was taking lessons of Nozzari, and he acceded to Barbaja's conditions, which very soon, however, had to be rescinded, owing to Rubini's brilliant successes at Rome (in 'La gazza ladra') and at Palermo. Some time in 1819 he married Mlle. Chomel, known at Naples as La Comelli, a singer of some contemporary celebrity, a Frenchwoman by birth, and pupil of the Paris Conservatoire.

His first appearance at Paris was on Oct. 6, 1825, in the 'Cenerentola,' and was followed by others in 'Otello' and 'La donna del lago.' He was hailed unanimously as 'King of Tenors,' but he was still bound by his engagement with Barbaja, who only yielded him for six months to the Théâtre-Italien, claiming him back at the end of that time to sing at Naples, then at Milan and at Vienna.

Up to this time his laurels had been won in Rossini's music, on which his style was first formed, but Rubini was the foundation and raison d'être of the whole phase of Italian opera that succeeded the Rossinian period. He and Bellini were said to have been born for one another. During the whole composition of 'Il pirata,' Rubini stayed with Bellini, singing each song as it was finished. Donizetti, again, achieved no great success until the production of 'Anna Bolena,' his thirty-second opera, in which the tenor part was written expressly for Rubini, who achieved in it some of his greatest triumphs. It was followed by 'Lucia,' 'Lucrezia,' 'Marino Faliero' and others, in which a like inspiration was followed by the same result.

Rubini first came to England in 1831, when freed from his engagement with Barbaja, and from that time till 1843 he divided each year between Paris and this country, singing much at concerts and provincial festivals, as well as at the Opera, and creating a furor wherever he went.

In 1843 he started with Liszt on a tour through Holland and Germany, but the two separated at Berlin, and Rubini went on alone to St. Petersburg, where he created an enthusiasm verging on frenzy. By his first concert alone he realised 54,000 francs. The Emperor Nicholas made him 'Director of Singing' in the Russian dominions, and a colonel into the bargain.

In the summer of this year Rubini went to Italy, giving some representations at Vienna by the way. He returned to Russia in the winter of 1844, but finding his voice permanently affected by the climate resolved to retire from public life. He bought a property near Romano, where he died.

Rubini's voice extended from E of the bass clef to B of the treble, in chest notes, besides commanding a falsetto register as far as F or even G above that. A master of every kind of florid execution, and delighting at times in its display, no one seems ever to have equalled him when he turned these powers into the channel of emotional vocal expression, nor to have produced so magical an effect by the singing of a simple, pathetic melody, without ornament of any kind. He indulged too much in the use of head-voice: some of his greatest effects were produced by an excessive use of strong contrasts between piano and forte, and he was the earliest to use that thrill of the voice known as the vibrato. To him, too, was originally due that species of musical sob produced by the repercussion of a prolonged note before the final cadence, which, electrifying at first as a new effect, has become one of the commonest of vocal vulgarisms. But such was his perfection of finish, such the beauty of his expression, such his thorough identification of himself, not with his dramatic impersonations but with his songs, that his hold on the public remained unweakened to the last, even when his voice was a wreck and his peculiarities had become mannerisms.

RUBINI, NICOLÒ, of Modena, pupil of Orazio Vecchi, from 1607-25 cornettist in Modena court chapel. He wrote a book on counterpoint; composed 2 books of madrigals (1610, 2 v., 1615, 5 v., 1 book motets, 4-10 v. 1606), and 1 book canzone, 3 v. (1613) (Q.-L.).

RUBINSTEIN, (1) ANTON GREGOR (b. Wechwoytnez, Volhynia, Russia, Nov. 28, 1830¹; d. Peterhof, Nov. 20, 1894), an eminent composer of Jewish parentage, and one of the greatest pianists the world has ever seen. He received his first musical instruction from his mother, and afterwards from a pianoforte-teacher in Moscow named Villoing. As early as 1839 he made his first public appearance in Moscow, and in the following year undertook a concert-tour with his teacher, journeying to Paris, where he made the acquaintance of Liszt, who was then teaching in that city, and under whose advice he there pursued his studies. A year later he made a more extended tour, going to England (1842), and thence to Holland, Germany and Sweden. In 1845 he went to study composition with Dehn in Berlin. From 1846-48 he passed in Vienna and Pressburg, teaching on his own account. In 1848 he returned to Russia, where the Grand Duchess Helen nominated him Kammervirtuos. After studying diligently in St. Petersburg for eight years he appeared as a fully-fledged artist with piles of original compositions, first in Hamburg and then all over Germany, where he found enthusiastic audiences and willing publishers. His early operas, to Russian words, were performed as follows: 'Dimitri Donskoi,' 1852; 'Die sibirischen Jäger,' 1852; 'Toms der Narr,' 1853, and 'Hadji-Abrek' were not performed. From this time his fame as a pianist and composer spread rapidly over Europe and America. He again visited England in 1857, and made his first appearance at the Philharmonic on May 18. In 1858 he returned home again, gave brilliant concerts in St. Petersburg, Moscow, etc., and settled in the former city. At this period he was appointed imperial concert-director, with a life-pension. Thenceforward he worked in conjunction with his friend Carl Schuberth for the advancement of music in Russia, and had the merit of being the founder of the St. Petersburg Conservatorium in 1862, remaining its principal until 1867.

On leaving Russia he made another triumphant tour through the greater part of Europe, which lasted till the spring of 1870. When in his native country, in 1869, the Emperor decorated him with the Vladimir Order, which raised him to noble rank. In 1870 he rested awhile, and expressed the intention of retiring from public life; but it was not likely that this desire could be fulfilled. He held the directorship of the Philharmonic Concerts and Choral Society in Vienna for the next year or two, and this was followed by fresh concert tours. In 1872-73 he toured in America. Every year the same threat of retirement was made, but the entreaties of the public, and, probably, the desire of providing for his wife and family, brought the gifted genius before us again and again. He gave a set of farewell recitals all over Europe in 1885-1887, and in 1887-90 he again undertook the direction of the St. Petersburg Conservatorium, and from the latter year lived for a time in Dresden. In 1889 he celebrated his artistic jubilee and published an Autobiography.

We have said that Rubinstein's first visit to London was in 1842. He was then only just 12. Mendelssohn and Thalberg were both there, and the Philharmonic was thus already occupied. Mention of him is to be found in Moscheles's Diary for 1842 (Leben, ii. 90), where he is spoken of as 'a rival to Thalberg . . . a Russian boy whose fingers are as light as feathers, and yet as strong as a man's.' In the Musical and Dramatic Review of May 28, 1842, he is mentioned. He did not return to this country till 1857, when he appeared at the Philharmonic on May 18, playing his own concerto in G. He came back in the following year, played again at the Philharmonic on June 7, and at the Musical Union, May 11. In 1869 he came a fourth time, and played at the Musical Union only (May 18, June 1). In 1876 he made his fifth visit, played at the Philharmonic, May 1, and gave four recitals in St. James's Hall. In 1877 he again gave recitals, and conducted his 'Ocean' symphony (six movements) at the Crystal Palace, Apr. 21; he conducted his 'Dramatic' symphony, and played Beethoven's concerto in G, at the Crystal Palace on June 4. In 1881 he gave another series of recitals at St. James's Hall: his opera 'The Demon' was brought out in Italian at Covent Garden on June 21, and his 'Tower of Babel,' with other music, at the Crystal Palace on June 11. In May and June 1886, he gave a final set of seven historical recitals in St. James's Hall.

Rubinstein's playing was not only remarkable for the absolute perfection of technique, in which he was the only rival Liszt ever had, but there was the fire and soul which only a true and genial composer can possess. He could play a simple piece of Haydn or Mozart so as positively to bring tears into the eyes of his hearers, but, on the other hand, he would sometimes fall a prey to a strange excitement which caused him to play in the wildest fashion. An example (though hardly a commendable one) of his perfect mastery over tone is to be found in his performance of the Funeral March of Chopin's sonata in B♭ minor. Regardless of the composer's intentions, he began it ppp, proceeding crescendo, with perfect gradation, up to the trio, after which he began again ff and with an equally long and subtle diminuendo ended as softly as he began.

The compositions of Rubinstein may be considered as the legitimate outcome of Mendelssohn; they contain a fine broad vein of melody supported by true and natural harmony, and thorough technical skill. But they show also the fatal gift of fluency, and the consequent lack of self-criticism and self-restraint. Rubinstein wrote in every department of music, but his songs and chamber music are all that can be called really popular, although his 'Ocean Symphony' was during his life known all over the world.¹ This is undoubtedly one of his best works, the ideas throughout being vivid and interesting, while the workmanship shows unusual care. From the composer's having added an extra Adagio and Scherzo after the first appearance of this symphony we may presume he had a particular regard for it, though to risk wearying an audience by inordinate length is scarcely the way to recommend a work to their favour. The 'Dramatic' symphony (op. 95) was formerly admired. His pianoforte concertos are very brilliant and effective, especially that in G (op. 45); his violin concerto (op. 46) is a fine work, though but little known. The Persian Songs (op. 34) are perhaps the most popular of his vocal works, but there are many very striking and successful specimens among his other songs—'Es blinkt der Thau' and 'Die Waldhexe' for instance—and the duets are full of beauty and passion. The numerous drawing-room pieces which he wrote for the piano are far superior to most of their class, his writing for the instrument being invariably most brilliant, as is but natural in so great a pianist. In his chamber-music he was apt to give the piano an undue prominence; the quintet in F (op. 55) is almost a pianoforte concerto in disguise. His operas and oratorios met with qualified success; he had a preference for sacred subjects, which are but ill fitted for the stage.

(2) NICHOLAS, his younger brother (b. Moscow, June 2, 1835; d. Paris, Mar. 23, 1881), was also a fine pianist and no mean composer, though overshadowed by the fame of his great brother. He studied under Kullak and Dehn in Berlin during 1844-46. In 1859 he founded at Moscow the Russian Musical Society, which gave twenty concerts each year; and in 1864 the Conservatorium, and was head of both till his death. He it was who brought forward Tchaikovsky's early compositions and the latter's trio was dedicated to his memory (see TCHAIKOVSKY). In 1861 he visited England, and played twice at the Musical Union (June 4, 18). In 1878 he gave four orchestral concerts of Russian music in the Trocadéro at Paris with great success. He died of consumption on his way to Nice for his health. Among his most famous pupils were

TANEIEV, SILOTI and SAUER. The Musical Society gave annual concerts in his memory, on the anniversaries of his birth and death.¹

RUBINSTEIN, JOSEPH—no relation of the foregoing (b. Staro Konstantinov, Russia, Feb. 8, 1847; d. Lucerne, Sept. 15, 1884)—acquired some fame as a pianist and composer of drawing-room music. He also obtained an unenviable notoriety through certain newspaper articles in the Bayreuther Blätter signed with his name, and attacking Schumann and Brahms in a most offensive and vindictive manner. He made some good pianoforte transcriptions of the works of Wagner, of whom he was an ardent if not very judicious propagandist. He committed suicide.

F. C.

RUCKERS, harpsichord-makers of Antwerp, who were working as masters between 1579 and 1667 or later, the first of whom, Hans Ruckers, is always credited with great improvements in keyboard instruments. It is certain that the tone of the Ruckers harpsichords has never been surpassed for purity and beauty of tone-colour, and from this quality they remained in use in England, as well as in France and the Netherlands, until harpsichords and spinets were superseded, at the end of the 18th century, by the pianoforte. The art of harpsichord-making, as exemplified in London by Kirkman and Shuck, was directly derived from Antwerp and the Ruckers. Time seemed to have no effect with the Ruckers instruments. They were decorated with costly paintings in this country and France, when a hundred years old and more. New keys and new jacks replaced the old ones; so long as the sound-board has stood, the 'silvery sweet' tone has lasted. As a record we have catalogued all the existing instruments we have seen or can hear of, appending the list to this notice.

In John Broadwood's books, 1772-73, are several entries concerning the hiring of Rucker, Rooker and Rouker harpsichords to his customers; to the Duchess of Richmond, Lady Pembroke, Lady Catherine Murray, etc. etc. In 1790 Lord Camden bought a 'double Rucker': in 1792 Mr. Williams bought another, the price charged for each being twenty-five guineas. These entries corroborate the statement of James Broadwood (Some Notes, 1838, printed privately 1862) that many Ruckers harpsichords were extant and in excellent condition fifty years before he wrote. He specially refers to one that was twenty years before in possession of Mr. Preston, the publisher, reputed to have been Queen Elizabeth's, and sold when Nonsuch Palace was demolished. To have been hers Hans Ruckers the elder must be credited with having made it.

If the tone caused, as we have said, the long preservation of the Ruckers clavecins, on the other hand the paintings which adorned them not unfrequently caused their destruction. A case in point is the instrument of the Parisian organist, Balbâtre, whom Burney visited when on his famous tour. Burney says it was painted inside and out with as much delicacy as the finest coach or snuff-box he had ever seen. Inside the cover was the story of Rameau's 'Castor and Pollux,' the composer, whom Burney had seen some years before, being depicted crowned with a wreath. He describes the tone as delicate rather than powerful (he would be accustomed in London to the sonorous pompous Kirkmans, which he so much admired), and the touch, in accordance with the French practice of quilling, as very light. This instrument was then more than a hundred years old, perhaps more than a hundred and fifty. On the front board above the keys is inscribed a complete piece of clavecin music, 'Pastorale par Mr. Balbâtre, le 6 Aoust, 1767,' beginning:

The stand for this instrument is rococo, and gilt. We learn more of its fate from Rimbault,¹ who tells us that it became the property of Mr. Goding, of London, who sacrificed Ruckers's work to display the paintings by Boucher and Le Prince that had adorned it on a new grand piano made for the purpose by Zeitter. This maker showed respect for his predecessor by preserving the sound-board, which he converted into a music-box, the inscription 'Joannes Ruckers me fecit Antverpiae' being transferred to the back. This box ultimately became Rimbault's; the piano was sold at Goding's sale by Christie & Manson in 1857. In the same house (Carlton House Terrace), and sold by auction at the same time for £290, was an Andries Ruckers harpsichord that had also been made into a pianoforte by Zeitter. In this instrument the original sound-board, dated 1628, was preserved. The sound-hole contained the rose (No. 6) of this maker. The present compass of the piano is five octaves F—F. Inside the top is a landscape with figures, and outside, figures with musical instruments on a gold ground. Round the case on gold are dogs and birds, a serpent and birds, etc. All this decoration is 18th-century work. The instrument is on a Louis Quinze gilt stand.

It was this intimate combination of the decorative arts with music that led to the clavecin and clavichord makers of Antwerp becoming members of the artists' guild of St. Luke in that city. They were enrolled in the first instance as painters or sculptors. We must however, go farther back than Hans Ruckers and his sons to estimate truly their position and services as clavecin makers. For this retrospect the pamphlet of the Chevalier Léon de Burbure—Recherches sur les facteurs de clavecins et les luthiers d'Anvers (Brussels, 1863), supplies valuable information. We learn that at the end of the 15th and beginning of the 16th centuries, precisely as in England and Scotland at the same period, the clavichord was in greater vogue than the clavecin; possibly because clavecins were then always long and sometimes trapeze-shaped. It must be remembered that the names Clavicordio in Spain, Clavicordo in Italy and Clavicorde in France, have been always applied to the quilled instruments. We are not, therefore, sure whether old references to the clavichord are to be taken as describing a plectrum or a tangent keyboard instrument. About the year 1500 the clavecin had been made in the clavichord shape in Venice, and called spinet. (See SPINET.) This new form must have soon travelled to the Low Countries, and have superseded the clavichord as it did in England and France about the same epoch.

A clavecin maker named Josse Carest was admitted in 1523 to the St. Luke's guild as a sculptor and painter of clavichords (literally 'Joos Kerrest, clavecordmaker, snyt en scildert').² Another Carest had been accepted in 1519 as an apprentice painter of clavecins ('Goosen Kareest, schilder en Klavecimbelmaker, gheleert by Peeter Mathys'). This is an earlier instance of the name Clavecin than that quoted by M. de Burbure as the oldest he had found in Belgium, viz. a house in the parish of Notre Dame, Antwerp, which, in 1532, bore the sign of 'de Clavizimble.' No doubt at that time both clavecins and clavichords were in use in Antwerp, but in a few years we hear of the latter no more; and the clavecin soon became so important that, in 1557, Josse Carest headed a petition of the clavecin-makers to be admitted to the privileges of the guild as such, and not, in a side way, merely as painters and sculptors of their instruments. Their prayer was granted and the ten petitioners were exempted from the production of 'masterworks,' but their pupils and all who were to come after them³ were bound to exhibit masterworks, being clavecins, oblong or with bent sides ('viercante oft gehoecte clavisimbale,' square or grand as we should say), of five feet long or more; made in the workshops of master experts, of whom two were annually elected; and to have the mark, design or seuteheon, proper to each maker (syn cygen mark, teecken, oft wapene), that is, a recognised trade-mark on each instrument. We will give these trade-marks of the members of the Ruckers family from sketches kindly supplied by (the late) Abel Régibo, of Renaix in Belgium; three, belonging to Hans and his two sons, having been already published by Edmond van der Straeten in his monumental work La Musique aux Pays-Bas, vol. iii. (Brussels, 1875).¹ It is at once evident that such regulations tended to sound work. The trade-marks we have more particularly described under ROSE. They were usually made of lead, gilt, and were conspicuous in the sound-holes of the instruments.

In the Museum of the Conservatoire de Musique, Brussels, there is a spinet inscribed JOES KAREST DE COLONIA with the date 1548 (No. 1587). The case is in the trapeze shape of the Italian instruments, as in A 4 of Hans Ruckers the elder (1591).

² Later on, others also became members of the guild. For instance Michel Colyn, Clavecimbelmaker, in 1631-32, who was, however, the son of a member.

Some of the contemporary Italian keyboard-instruments might be taken to give a general idea of what the Antwerp ones were like prior to the improvements of Hans Ruckers the elder. In the preparation of the sound-boards the notion of the sound-chest of LUTE and PSALTERY prevailed. Ruckers adhered to this principle, but being a tuner and perhaps a builder of organs, he turned to the organ as a type for an improved clavecin, and while holding fast to timbre as the chief excellence and end of musical instrument making, introduced different tone colours and combined them after organ analogies and by organ contrivances of added keyboards and registers. It is doubtful what changes of construction Hans Ruckers made in the harpsichord—perhaps the octave strings only. Yet a clavicembalo by Domenico di Pesaro, dated 1590, in the Victoria and Albert Museum, has the octave strings with two stops. Ruckers's great service may after all have only been to improve what others had previously introduced. It is nearly certain that harpsichords with double keyboards and stops for different registers existed before his time, and their introduction may be attributed to the great favour the Claviorganum, or combined spinet and organ, was held in during the 16th century. The researches of M. Edmond van der Straeten² have done much to bring into prominence the great use of the Claviorganum at an early time; see Rabelais, who, before 1552, described Carêmeprenant as having toes like an 'épinette organisée.' The merit of Hans Ruckers,³ however, traditionally attributed to him, was his placing the octave as a fixture in the long clavecin, boldly attaching the strings to hitch-pins on the sound-board (strengthened beneath for the purpose) and by the addition of another keyboard, also a fixture, thus establishing a model which remained dominant for large instruments until the end of the clavecin manufacture.⁴

An interesting chapter is devoted to the Ruckers family by M. Edmond van der Straeten in the work already referred to (vol. iii. p. 325, etc.). He has gathered up the few documentary notices of the members of it discovered by MM. Rombouts and Van Lerius, by M. Génard and by M. Léon de Burbure, with some other facts that complete all that is known about them.

The name Ruckers, variously spelt Rukers, Rueckers, Ruyckers, Ruckaers, Rieckers and Rikaert, is really a contraction or corruption of the Flemish Ruckaerts or Ryckaertssoon, equivalent to the English Richardson. (1) HANS the elder was certainly of Flemish origin, being the son of Francis Ruckers of Mechlin. He can hardly have been born later than 1555. Married at Notre Dame (the cathedral), Antwerp, June 25, 1575, as Hans Ruckaerts, to Naenken Cnaeps, he was admitted as Hans Ruyckers, 'clavisinbalmakerre,' to the guild of St. Luke in 1575. It appears strange that he was not enrolled a citizen until 1594, but this may have been, as M. de Burbure suggests, a readmission, to repair the loss of a record burnt when the Spaniards sacked the Hôtel de Ville in 1576. In those troubled times there could have been but little to do in clavecin-making. May we see in this a reason for his acquiring that knowledge of the organ which was to lead ultimately to his remodelling the long clavecin? The date of his death will be dealt with in a special note at the end of the article.

He had four sons, Francis, Hans, Andries and Anthony. It is only with (2) HANS (baptized Jan. 15, 1578)⁵ and (3) ANDRIES (baptized August 30, 1579) that we are concerned, since they became clavecin-makers of equal reputation with their father. We learn that in 1591 Hans Ruckers the elder became tuner of the organ in the Virgin's chapel of the Cathedral, and that in 1593 he added fourteen or fifteen stops to the large organ in the same church. In 1598 and 1599 either he or his son Hans (the records do not specify which) had charge of the organs of St. Bavon, and from 1617-23 of St. Jacques. A Hans Ruckers died in 1642. We believe that this date refers to the son, as the latest clavecin we have met with of his make is the Countess of Dudley's beautiful instrument dated that year (list, B. 23); the latest certain date of the father's clavecins at present found being 1616.

Of the instruments catalogued below, it will be observed that twenty-three are probably by Hans the elder. The long ones are provided with the octave stop and, with a few exceptions, have the two keyboards identified with him as the inventor. But it is interesting to observe the expeditious agreeing with the statement of

Prætorius, that octave instruments¹ were employed with and in the oblong clavescins. These expedients doubtless originated before Hans Ruckers; indeed in the Museum at Nuremberg there is an oblong clavescin of Antwerp make, signed 'Martinus Vander Biest,' and dated 1580, that has on the right hand an octave spinet in it.² 'Merten' Vander Biest entered the Guild in Antwerp, as one of the ten clavescin makers, in 1558, and was a witness at Hans Ruckers's marriage in 1575. The first instrument recorded for Hans Ruckers (dated 1581) is also of this type, but the smaller instrument is to the left (see A. 1), as is found too in another double virginal bearing his mark (A. 18) now in America. In the Museum of the Conservatoire, Brussels, there is an oblong clavescin by Hans the elder (A. 8), wherein the octave spinet is above and not by the side of the fixed one—according to Victor Mahillon a later addition, though the work of the maker himself. This curious instrument formerly belonged to Fétis (who sold the paintings that adorned it), and is dated 1610. While on the subject of these removable octave spinets we will refer to two with keyboards side by side, made by Hans the younger (B. 3 and B. 6) and dated 1619 and 1623 respectively. Another long clavescin, also by Hans the younger (B. 31), not dated, now in the Hochschule, Berlin, has the octave spinet fixed in the angle side, precisely as in a more modern one, made by Coenen of Ruremonde, which may be seen in the Plantin Museum, Antwerp. The same construction is found in a harpsichord by Hans the elder (A. 5) and in one by his son (B. 32), with a two-keyboard clavescin and a spinet. A double virginal by Andreas Ruckers (C. 26) is in the Heyer Musikhistorisches Museum formerly at Cologne, now at Leipzig.

Hans Ruckers the younger—known to the Belgian and French 'musicologists' as Jean, because he used the initials I. R. in his rose, while the father, as far as we know, used H. R.—was, as we have said, the second son.

We have given the date of his baptism in the cathedral in 1578, but have no further details to record beyond the ascertained facts that he was married to Marie Waelrant, of the family of the musician Hubert Waelrant,³ in the cathedral, Nov. 14, 1604, and that he was employed to tune the organ of St. Jacques from 1631 until 1642. There is also evidence as to his having died in that year. Thirty-two instruments attributed to him as sole maker are listed below.

Van der Straeten has, however, brought us nearer Hans the younger, by reference to Sainsbury's collection of Original unpublished papers illustrative of the life of Sir Peter Paul Rubens (London, 1859, p. 208, etc.), wherein are several letters which passed in 1638 between the painter, Balthazar Gerbier, at that time at Brussels and the private secretary of Charles I., Sir F. Windebank. They relate to the purchase of a good virginal from Antwerp for the King of England. Be it remembered that up to this time, and even as late as the Restoration, all clavescins in England, long or square, were called virginals. (See VIRGINAL.) Gerbier saw one that had been made by Hans Ruckers, the younger ('Johannes Rickarts'), for the Infanta. He describes it as having a double keyboard placed at one end, and four stops; exactly what we should now call a double harpsichord. There were two paintings inside the cover, the one nearest the player by Rubens; the subject Cupid and Psyche. The dealer asked £30 for it, such instruments without paintings being priced at £15. After some correspondence it was bought and sent over. Arrived in London it was found to be wanting six or seven keys, and to be insufficient for the music,⁴ and Gerbier was requested to get it exchanged for one with larger compass. Referring to the maker, Gerbier was informed that he had not another on sale, and that the instrument could not be altered. So after this straightforward but rather gruff answer Gerbier was written to not to trouble himself further about it. Van der Straeten inquires what has become of this jewel? We agree with him that the preservation of the pictures has probably long since caused the destruction of the instrument. With such decoration it would hardly remain in a lumber-room. Van der Straeten himself possessed a Jean Ruckers single harpsichord (now in the Berlin Hochschule), restored by Ch. Moerens, of which he has given a heliotype illustration in his work. It is a splendid specimen of Hans the younger. (See B. 8, below.)

Andries Ruckers (the elder, to distinguish him from his son Andries), the third son of Hans, was, as we have said, baptized in 1579, and was a master in 1610–11.⁵ As a member of the Confraternity of the Holy Virgin in the cathedral he tuned the chapel organ gratuitously in 1644. His work, notwithstanding Burney's impression about the relative excellence of his larger instruments, was held in as great esteem as that of his father and brother. In 1671, Jean Cox, choirmaster of the cathedral, left by will, as a

precious object, an André Ruckers clavecin. Within the writer's recollection there have been three honoured witnesses in London to this maker's fame, viz. that said to be Handel's (C. 30), dated 1651, given by Messrs. Broadwood to the Victoria and Albert Museum (see PLATE XXXII. No. 2); Mr. Howard Head's (C. 4), dated 1614; and one belonging to the late Miss Twining, a single keyboard one (C. 25), dated 1640.¹ A tradition exists that Handel had also played upon both the last-named instruments. We do not know when Andries Ruckers the elder died. He was certainly living in 1651, since that date is on his harpsichord at South Kensington. Forty-four instruments are listed under his name.

Of (4) ANDRIES Ruckers the younger, the information is most meagre. Born in 1607, he probably became a master in 1637-38. The Christian name is wanting to the entry in the ledger, but as the son of a master, the son of Andries the elder is apparently indicated. The researches of Génard have proved the birth of a daughter to Hans the younger, but not that of a son. It might be Christopher, could we attribute to him a master for a father. Regarding him, however, as living earlier, we are content to believe that Andries the younger then became free of the Guild; but as his known instruments are of late date, it is possible that he worked much with his father. We know from a baptism in 1665 that the younger Andries had married Catherina de Vriese, perhaps of the family of Dirck or Thiorri de Vries, a clavecin-maker whose death is recorded in 1628. Fétis (Biog. univ., 2nd edit. vii. 346 b) says he had seen a fine clavecin made by Andries the younger, dated 1667. M. Régibo possessed undoubted instruments by him, and has supplied a copy of his rose. Five instruments of his make are recorded.

A virginal by a Christopher Ruckers is recorded and Van der Straeten refers to another in the Museum at Namur. We cannot determine Christopher's relationship to the other Ruckers, but he might have been the Her Christofel Ruckers, organist and clockmaker of Termonde, where he set up a carillon in 1549—possibly a priest; at least the title 'Her' would indicate a person regarded with veneration. The same writer, in the 5th vol. p. 393 of La Musique aux Pays-Bas, continues, 'who knows if this Christopher did not own a workshop for clavecin making? The priest was everything at that epoch, and a scholar, an organ or spinet-builder seems to us quite natural and normal.' More probably he was his son or grandson, his work appearing to be of the earlier part of the 17th century, c. 1620. Two instruments only

Upon reference to the following list² it will be observed that in Section A under the name of HANS RUCKERS many instruments have been included bearing the inscription of his son IOANNES (JEAN), in one case linked with the name of another son, ANDRÉAS or ANDRIËS. This opens up the debated question of the date of death of HANS RUCKERS the elder, which has been placed as early as 1593, though we find his trade mark with the initials H. R. upon instruments made as late as 1616. It is important to remember that, by the rules of the Guild of St. Luke, which regulated the craft, this mark was much more than the trade mark of a firm: it was a personal 'escutcheon' belonging solely to the 'free' maker who had been admitted to the Guild. Young makers were required to work under some such 'free' master, who was responsible for wood and tools etc., used, until such time as they themselves were admitted. Under these strict regulations it would have been impossible for the sons to have used for 18 years the personal mark of their deceased father: during that period they must have served as apprentices in his workshop. So, taking the dates of their instruments as recorded in the list, we find that Andries obtained the right to use his own 'free' maker's mark in 1610-11 (C. 1): and this date bears out the true meaning of the entry on the Rolls of the Guild for that period 'Hans Ruckers sone claversigmaker,' that is 'Hans Ruckers's son clavecinmaker,' the Christian name being omitted.³

On the other hand Jean Ruckers, who still worked with his father, did not seek admission or receive his 'free' maker's mark till 1617 (B. 1). Unfortunately no reference can be made to the Rolls, as they are lost from 1616 to 1629. In 1617 Hans Ruckers, the father, probably retired from active business and was appointed to the care of the organs at the collegiate Church of St. Jacques in Antwerp, a post which he held till 1623 when the engagement was terminated as stated in the church records. He must then have been about 70 years of age, and probably died soon afterwards, say, in 1625. It is interesting to notice that his name is inscribed on two existing instruments made in 1610 (A. 8 and 9), the year in which Andries his son was applying for admission to the Guild: it may have been required by the rules.¹ F. W. G.

* It was believed by MM. Snoeck, Van der Straeten, Régibo and V. Mahillon; that few of the Ruckers clavichords were of the original compass of keys. The statements of compass in this list and also in KEYBOARD should be qualified by this remark. The increase was, however, made long ago, and in some instances possibly by the maker himself. M. van der Straeten, p. 348, has a passage quoted from Van Blankenburg: 'This was at the time when clavichord had still a narrow keyboard. In the present day (1739 ?) it would be difficult to meet with one of this kind: all the keyboards having been lengthened.' Again, white naturals are believed to be original in the instruments. Upon very old alterations it is not easy to decide. We are of opinion that black naturals and ivory sharps were occasionally substituted when the paintings were done. In dealing with these questions, however, it is best to refrain from generalising; many errors having arisen from too hasty conclusions.

					too short for the case. Originally in the Steen Museum, it corresponds closely in size and compass to the virginal A. 11 now missing; but it is undated and bears the A. R. rose. In 1619 Andreas Ruckers made a large harpsichord for the Guild of St. Luke, and in 1638 a costly instrument for the Archduchess Isabella of Austria and the Netherlands. E. van der Straeten reported an instrument dated 1613 by this maker as in the Steen Museum, but it is now missing; and Kerr Kinsey considers that the small octave virginal, dated 1617, in the Musée du Conservatoire de Musique, Paris (No. 316), and labeled Italian, should be attributed to this maker. Blondel (Hist. anecdotique du piano) mentions a Ruckers clavecin painted by Gravelot. In the Brownsea Collection (Dorset) there is an Andreas (undated), now a piano.

RUDDIGORE; OR, THE WITCH'S CURSE (originally spelt RUDYDYGORE), comic opera in 2 acts; words by W. S. Gilbert, music by Sullivan. Produced Savoy Theatre, Jan. 22, 1887.

RUDERSDORFF, HERMINE (b. Ivanowsky, Ukraine, Dec. 12, 1822; d. Boston, Feb. 26, 1882). Her father, Joseph Rudersdorff, a distinguished violinist (afterwards of Hamburg), was then engaged at Ivanowsky. She learned singing at Paris from Bordogni, and at Milan from de Micherout, also master of Clara Novello, Catherine Hayes, etc. She first appeared in Germany in concerts, and sang the principal soprano music at the production of Mendelssohn's 'Lobgesang' at Leipzig, June 25, 1840. The next year she appeared on the stage at Carlsruhe with great success, and then at Frankfurt—where in 1844 she married Dr. Kuchenmeister, a professor of mathematics—and at Breslau, Berlin, etc. Her repertory was large, and included both dramatic and coloratura parts. On May 23, 1854, she first appeared in England in German opera at Drury Lane, as Donna Anna, and was fairly well received in that and her subsequent parts of Constance in Mozart's 'Entführung,' Agatha, Fidolio and Margaret of Valois, and in English as Elvira in 'Masaniello.' She took up her residence in England for several years, only occasionally visiting Germany for concerts and festivals. She sang at the Royal Italian Opera in 1855, also from 1861–65, as Donnas Anna and Elvira, Jemmy, Bertha, Natalia ('L'Étoile du nord'), etc.; and in English at St. James's Theatre for a few nights in Loder's opera, 'Raymond and Agnes.' But it was as a concert-singer that she was best appreciated, her very powerful voice (not always pleasing), combined with admirable powers of declamation, certainty of execution and thorough musicianship, having enabled her to take high rank as a singer of oratorio. She was engaged at the Boston Festivals of 1871 and 1872, and finally settled in that city, becoming a teacher of singing there. For the Birmingham Festival of 1873 she wrote the libretto of Randegger's cantata 'Fridolin,' founded on Schiller's 'Gang nach dem Eisenhammer.' She had previously introduced, in 1869, at the Gewandhaus concerts, Leipzig, the same composer's scena 'Medea,' which she sang also at the Crystal Palace and in 1872 at Boston. A. C.

RUDHALL, a family of bell-founders who carried on business in Bell Lane, Gloucester, from 1648 until late in the 18th century. Its successive members were Abraham, sen., Abraham, jun., Abel, Thomas and John. From catalogues published by them it appears that from 1648 to Lady Day, 1751, they had cast 2972 bells 'for sixteen cities' and other places 'in forty-four several counties,' and at Lady Day 1774 the number had increased to 3594. During the foundry's existence 4521 bells were cast. Up to 1774 the business prospered, but after this date it declined, and the foundry was closed in 1830. The principal metropolitan peals cast by them were those of St. Bride, St. Dunstan-in-the-East, and St. Martin-in-the-Fields. The Rudhalls cast no large bells; their largest is of 50 cwts. at Wells Cathedral, and their second largest at Bath Abbey, 38 cwts. With two exceptions, the tenors of all their peals are under 30 cwts. The most eminent member of the family was Abraham, jun. (b. 1657; d. Jan. 25, 1736). He was 'famed for his great skill, beloved and esteemed for his singular good nature and integrity,' and brought the art of bell-casting to great perfection. He was buried in Gloucester Cathedral. His daughter, Alicia, married William HINE, the cathedral organist. The last of the Rudhalls, the 3rd Abraham, a mercer, left the foundry to his daughter. She, in 1829, transferred her interest to Thomas MEARS, bell-founder of Whitechapel, into whose business it was merged.

W. H. H. and W. W. S.

RUDOLPH JOHANN JOSEPH RAINER, ARCHDUKE OF AUSTRIA (b. Florence, Jan. 8, 1788; d. Baden, Vienna, July 24, 1831), was the youngest child of Leopold of Tuscany and Maria Louisa of Spain. Music was hereditary in his family. His great-grandfather, Carl VI., so accompanied an opera by Fux that the composer exclaimed: 'Bravo! your Majesty might serve anywhere as chief Kapellmeister!' 'Not so fast, my dear chief Kapellmeister,' replied the Emperor; 'we are better off as we are!' His grandmother, the great Maria Theresa, was a fine singer; her children, from very early age, sang and performed cantatas and little dramas, to words by Metastasio, on birthdays and fêtes. His uncle, Max Franz, was Elector of Cologne, viola-player, and organiser of the splendid orchestra at Bonn, to which the Rombergs, Rieses, Reichas and Beethovens belonged. It was his father, Leopold, who, after the first performance of Cimarosa's 'Matrimonio segreto,' gave all those who took part in the production a supper, and then ordered the performance to be repeated; and it was his aunt, Marie Antoinette, who supported Gluck against Piccini at Paris.

Like the other children of the imperial family, Rudolph was instructed in music by Anton Teyber, and tradition says that as early as 12 or 14 he gave ample proof of more than ordinary musical talent and taste; as soon as he had liberty of choice he exchanged Teyber for Beethoven. The precise date and circumstances attending this change have eluded investigation; but it seems probable that the connexion between Rudolph, a youth of 16, and Beethoven, a man of 34, began in the winter of 1803–04.

Ries relates that Beethoven's breaches of court etiquette were a constant source of trouble to his pupil's chamberlains, who strove in vain to enforce its rules on him. He at last lost all patience, pushed his way into the young Archduke's presence, and, excessively angry, assured him that he had all due respect for his person, but that the punctilious observance of all the rules in which he was daily tutored was not his business. Rudolph laughed good-humouredly and gave orders that for the future he should be allowed to go his own way.

Beethoven's triple concerto, op. 56 (1804), though dedicated to Prince Lobkowitz, was written, says Schindler, for the Archduke, Seidler and Kraft. The work does not require great execution in the piano part, but a youth of 16 able to play it must be a very respectable performer.

The weakness of the Archduke's constitution is said to have been the cause of his entering the Church. The coadjutorship of Olmütz secured to him the succession; and the income of the position was probably not a bad one; for, though his allowance as Archduke in a family so very numerous was of necessity comparatively small, yet in the spring of 1809, just after completing his 21st year, he subscribed 1500 florins to Beethoven's annuity. In 1818 Beethoven determined to compose a Solemn Mass for the installation service of his pupil, a year or two later. On Sept. 28, 1819, the Cardinal's insignia arrived from the Pope, and the installation was at length fixed for Mar. 9,¹ 1820. But the Mass had assumed such gigantic proportions that the ceremony had passed nearly two years before it was completed.² Instead of it, the music performed was a Mass in B \flat , by Hummel; a Te Deum in C, by Preindl; 'Ecce Sacerdos magnus,' by a 'Herr P. v. R.'; and Haydn's Offertorium in D minor.

Apart from the annuity, Rudolph's purse was probably often opened to his master; but the strongest proofs of his respect and affection are to be found in his careful preservation of Beethoven's most insignificant letters; in the zeal with which he collected for his library everything published by him; in his purchase of the caligraphic copy of his works made by Haslinger³; and in his patience with him, often in trying circumstances. For Beethoven, notwithstanding all his obligations to his patron, chafed under the interference with his perfect liberty, which duty to the Archduke-Cardinal occasionally imposed. There are passages in his letters to Ries and others (suppressed in publication), as well as in the conversation-books, which show how galling even this light yoke was to Beethoven; and one feels in perusing those addressed to the Archduke how frivolous are some of the excuses for not attending him at the proper hour, and how hollow and insincere are the occasional compliments, as Rudolph must have felt. That Beethoven was pleased to find the Forty Variations dedicated to him by 'his pupil, R. E. H.' (Rudolph Erz-Herzog), was probably the fact; but it is doubtful whether his satisfaction warranted the superlatives in which his letter of thanks is couched. Other letters again breathe throughout nothing but a true and warm affection for his pupil. Kochel sensibly remarks that the trouble lay in Beethoven's 'aversion to the enforced performance of regular duties, especially to giving lessons and teaching the theory of music, in which it is well known his strength did not lie, and for which he had to prepare himself.'

When the untamed nature of Beethoven, and his deafness, are considered, together with his lack of worldly wisdom and his absolute need of a Maecenas, one feels deeply how fortunate he was to have attracted and retained the sympathy and affection of a man of such sweet and tender qualities as Archduke Rudolph.

We can hardly expect an Archduke-Cardinal to be a voluminous composer, but the Forty Variations already mentioned, and a sonata for PF. and clarinet, composed for Count Ferdinand Troyer, both published by Haslinger, are good specimens of his musical talents and acquisitions. There is also a set of Variations on a theme of Rossini, corrected by Beethoven in MS. He was for many years the 'protector' of the great Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde at Vienna, and bequeathed to it his very valuable musical library. An oil portrait in the possession of his son shows a rather intellectual face, of the Hapsburg type, but its peculiarities so softened as to be more than ordinarily pleasing, and even handsome.⁴

The Archduke's published works are the two alluded to above: Theme by L. van Beethoven, with Forty Variations—for PF. solo (Haslinger); Sonata for PF. and clarinet, op. 2, in A (Haslinger).

RUDORFF, ERNEST (b. Berlin, Jan. 18, 1840; d. there, Dec. 31, 1916), composer, pianist and teacher. His family was of Hanoverian extraction. At the age of 5 he received his first musical instruction from a god-daughter of C. M. von Weber, an excellent pianist and of a thoroughly poetical nature. From his 12th to his 17th year he was a pupil of Bargiel in PF. playing and composition. A song and a PF. piece composed at this period he afterwards thought worthy of publication (op. 2, No. 1; op. 10, No. 4). For a short time in 1858 he had the advantage of PF. lessons from Mme. Schumann, and from his 12th to his 14th year learned the violin under Louis Ries. In 1857 he entered the Friedrichs Gymnasium, whence in 1859 he passed to the Berlin university. During the whole of this time his thoughts were bent on the musical profession. When Joachim visited Berlin in 1852 Rudorff had played before him, and had made such a favourable impression that Joachim advised his being allowed to follow the profession of music. His father at length consented that he should go to Michaelmas, 1859, and attend the Conservatorium and the university at Leipzig. After two terms of theology and history he devoted himself exclusively to music, and on leaving the Conservatorium in 1861, continued his musical studies for a year under Hauptmann and Reinecke. Rudorff went to Stockhausen early in 1864, conducted those of the Choral Society's concerts in which Stockhausen himself sang, and finally made concert tours with him. In 1865 he became professor at the Cologne Conservatorium, and there in 1867 he founded the Bach Society, whose performance at their first concert in 1869 gave such satisfaction to Rudorff that he at first refused an appointment as professor in the new Hochschule at Berlin under Joachim's direction. He afterwards changed his mind, and from Oct. 1869 to 1910, when he retired, was first professor of PF.-playing and director of the piano classes in that institution, besides conducting part of the orchestral practices, and in Joachim's absence directing the public performances. In the summer of 1880, on Max Bruch's appointment as director of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, Rudorff succeeded him as conductor of the Stern Singing-Society in Berlin, but without resigning his post at the Hochschule. He retained the direction of this Society till 1890.

He had talent for piano-playing, though an unfortunate nervousness prevented him from exercising it much in public. His tone was beautiful, his conception poetical, and he possessed considerable power of execution, never degenerating into mere display. He was an excellent teacher; but his greatest gifts were shown in composition. His musical style was founded throughout upon the romantic school of Chopin, Mendelssohn and Schumann, and especially of Weber. His part-songs interest by their elegance and thoughtfulness, but few, if any, leave a pleasant impression on the mind. This is true also of his solo songs. He had an almost feminine horror of anything rough or common, and often carried this to such a pitch as seriously to interfere with simplicity and naturalness. He deeply imbibed the romantic charm of Weber's music, but the bold easy mirth which at times does not shrink from trivialities was unfortunately utterly strange to him. His early songs opp. 1 and 2 follow, it is true, closely in Schumann's steps, but they are among the most beautiful that have been written in his style.

Rudorff's works are for the most part of great technical difficulty, and many of them are over-elaborated, a fact which has kept his works from being as well known as they deserve. The following is a list of his principal works:

RUE, PIERRE DE LA, also known as Pierchon, Perisson, Pierçon, Pierzon, Pierozon and Potrus Platensis (b. Picardy, mid. 15th cent.; d. Courtrai, Nov. 20, 1518), fellow-pupil of Josquin des Prés in the school of Okeghom. Stato records prove that he was in the service of the court of Burgundy in the years 1477, 1492, 1496, 1499, 1500 and 1502. In 1501 he was a prebend of Courtrai, and later held a similar benefice at Namur, which he resigned in 1510. He was in the service of Charles V. until 1512, when he entered that of Margaret of Austria, 'gouvernante' of the Netherlands.

Writers on music have accorded him a position as a contrapuntal composer scarcely second to that of Josquin, and the magnificent copies of his masses made by order of the Princess Margaret of Austria, and now in the libraries of Vienna and Brussels, testify to the value set upon his works by those he served. Indeed, considering his great reputation, it is somewhat surprising that so little is known of the events of his life, and that so little of his music has been printed. Of the thirty-six masses now existing Petrucci printed five in the composer's lifetime ('Misse Petri de la Rue'; Venetiis, 1503), and a few more in later collections. Twenty-three remain in MS. Of motets, only twenty-five (though thirty-eight have been identified), and of secular pieces no more than ten, are to be found in the publications of the 16th century—a small result compared with the long catalogue of Josquin's printed works. Burney, Forkel and Kiese-wetter give short examples from Pierre de la Rue's compositions. (See Q.-L. for list of works in MS.) J. R. S. B., with addns.

RÜCKAUF, AXTON (b. Prague, Mar. 13, 1855; d. Schloss Alt-Erlaa, Sept. 19, 1903), was a pupil of Proksch, and studied at the same time at the Prague Organ School. He taught for a time at Proksch's Institute till he went, at the expense of the state, to further his studies in Vienna, where, advised by Brahms, he learnt counterpoint with Nottebohm, and with Navratil when Nottebohm died. His connexion with Gustav Walter, whose permanent accompanist he was, had a great influence over his development as a composer of songs. His compositions are of various sorts, including songs, 'Balladen,' settings to five Minnelieder of Walter con der Vogelweide, gipsy songs, duets, choral songs with PF. accompaniment and also a cappella, besides a violin sonata (op. 7), a PF. quintet (op. 13), some piano solos and duets, and an opera, 'Die Rosenthalerin,' which was produced at Dresden in 1897, and attracted a considerable amount of attention. RÜHLING, (1) HANS (b. Borna, Saxony, c. mid. 16th cent.), from 1572-75 organist at Geithain, Saxony; organist at Döbeln, c. 1572; and from c. 1582 at Groitzsch, near Leipzig. He wrote 'Tabulaturbuch auf Orgeln und Instrument,' etc. (1583), containing 86 German and Latin sacred songs, arranged in organ tablature, with names of the original composers.

His son, (2) SAMUEL (b. Groitzsch, c. 1586; d. Dresden, June 1626), was cantor at the Pauliner church, Leipzig, and from Sept. 17, 1612, at the 'Krouzkerche,' Dresden; also poet laureate and Archdean. He composed motets, 8, 9 v., which remained in MS.

RÜHLMANN, FRANS (b. Brussels, Jan. 11, 1868), conductor. He was a pupil at the Brussels Conservatoire, and took part in the orchestra of the Théâtre de la Monnaie for seven years. After conducting at Rouen, Liège, Antwerp, Brussels, etc., he was engaged at the Opéra-Comique, in place of Büsser, and conducted for the first time ('Carmen'), Sept. 6, 1905. He succeeded Lugini (d. July 29, 1906) as principal conductor, and has been conductor of the Paris Opéra since 1914. He is also principal conductor at the Concerts Colonne, and has conducted the popular concerts at Antwerp since 1920.

RUFFO, VINCENZO, a member of a noble Veronese family, who flourished as a composer in the 16th century. His name is included by Baini in his list of the 'good musicians' of his fourth epoch. Unless a fifth-part Magnificat, stated to have been published at Venice in 1539 and to exist at Lüneburg, be a genuine work, his first publication would seem to be a book of motets dated 1542, where he is described as 'musico' (i.e. castrato) in the service of the Marchese Alfonso d'Avalli. In 1554 he became maestro di cappella at the cathedral of Verona, and in 1563 was appointed to a similar post at the cathedral of Milan. In 1574-79 he was at Pistoia in the same capacity, and in 1580 we find him again at Milan. His last publication, a book of masses, dated 1592, contains no mention of any official post, and it is argued that he therefore held none in his latest years. The other masses appeared in 1557, 1574 and 1580; motets in 1542, 1555 and 1583; settings of the Magnificat in 1578, and psalms a 5 in 1574. His madrigals were published in 1545, 1554, 1555, 1556 and 1560. The psalms and a Mass were written for his patron Saint Carlo Borromeo in accordance with the decrees of the Council of Trent. An Adoramus is printed by Lück, and a madrigal, 'See from his ocean bed,' edited by Oliphant, is in Hullah's Part Music. Torchi, in his 'Arte musicale in Italia,' vol. i., gives two movements from masses, a motet and two madrigals. The libraries of Ch. Ch. and the R.C.M. contain specimens of his works in MS., and for others the article in Q.-L. and an interesting monograph by Luigi Torri in R.M.I. iii. 635, and iv. 233, should be consulted. M.

RUGGI, FRANCESCO (b. Naples, Oct. 21, 1767; d. there, Jan. 23, 1845), was a pupil of Fenaroli at Conservatorio S. Maria di Loreto; in 1795 deputy maestro di cappella of Naples; in 1825 successor of Tritto as professor of counterpoint and composition at the Conservatorio of S. Pietro a Majella, where Bellini and Carafa were among his pupils. He composed 5 operas, an oratorio, numerous masses and other church and secular music (Q.-L.; Mendel; Riemann).

RUGGIERI, the name of a celebrated family of violin-makers, who flourished at Cremona and Brescia. The eldest was (1) FRANCESCO, commonly known as 'Ruggieri il Per' (the father), whose instruments date from 1668-1720 or thereabouts; (2) GIOVANNI BAPTISTA (1700-25), and (3) PIETRO (1700-20), who form the second generation of the family, were probably his sons; Giovanni Baptista (2) (called 'il buono'), who was indisputably the best maker in the family, claims to have been a pupil of Nicolo Amati. Besides these, we hear of (4) GUIDO and (5) VINCENZO, both of Cremona, early in the 18th century. The instruments of the Ruggieri, though differing widely among themselves, bear a general resemblance to those of the Amati family.

RUIMONTE (RIMONTE), PEDRO (b. Saragossa), Spanish madrigalist, brought from Spain by the Infanta Isabella at the time of her marriage to the Archduke Albert, Governor of the Netherlands. From 1603-05 he was maestro musico de camera at the archducal court at Brussels. In 1614 he received a sum of money to enable him to return to Spain, but was apparently in Brussels once more in 1618. His madrigals, published in the same year, are the only examples of the later chromatic madrigal with Spanish words. He also set a few popular Spanish villancicos, with a verse of 2 or 3 v.; and refrain for 5 or 6 v. His printed works are as follows:

Cantiones sacre 4, 5, 6 et 7 v. et Hieronim Prophete Lamentationes 6 v. Antwerp, 1607. Phalèse. (Wolffensbüttel: tenor only.)
Missa, 6 v. Antwerp, 1614. Phalèse (B.M.).
Fernando Español de Madrigales y Villancos 4, 5 y 6. Antwerp, 1614. Phalèse. (Christ Church, Oxford, sextus missing. Bibl. Nat., Paris: Bibl. de la Diputación, Barcelona, quintus only. Two of the 6-part madrigals, without words, in B.M. Add. MSS 30,816-19.)

RUINS OF ATHENS, THE, dramatic piece (Nachspiel) written by Kotzebue, with an overture and eight numbers composed by Beethoven (op. 113) in 1811, for the opening of a new theatre at Pest, Feb. 9, 1812. The overture to 'The Ruins of Athens' and the Turkish March No. 4 were published in 1823, but the rest of the music remained in MS. till 1846.

RUIZ DE RIBAYAZ, LUCAS (b. near Burgos, 17th cent.), Spanish guitarist, prebendary of the Collegiate Church of Villafranca del Bierzo, who published a book of tablature entitled

Luz y Norte musical para caminar por las cifras de la Guitarra Española y Arpa. Madrid, 1677. (B.M.: Brussels, Conservatoire; Madrid, Bibl. Nac., Bibl. Medicea.)

It is of considerable interest owing to the number of 17th-century Spanish dances it contains.

RULE, BRITANNIA! Song composed by Arne for his masque of 'Alfred' (the words by Thomson and Mallet), and first performed at Cliefden House, Maidenhead, Aug. 1, 1740. Cliefden was then the residence of Frederick, Prince of Wales, and the occasion was to commemorate the accession of George I. and the birthday of Princess Augusta. The masque was repeated on the following night, and published by Millar, Aug. 19, 1740.

Dr. Arne afterwards altered the masque into an opera and it was so performed at the Smock Alley Theatre, Dublin, on Mar. 10, 1744. In the advertisement it is announced that 'Alfred' will conclude with a "favourable Ode in honour of Great Britain, beginning 'When Britain first at Heaven's command.'"

It was not heard in London till Mar. 20, 1745, when it was given at Drury Lane for the benefit of Mrs. Arne.

The year 1745, in which the opera was produced, is memorable for the Jacobite rising in the North, and in 1746 Handel produced his 'Occasional Oratorio,' in which he refers to its suppression, 'War shall cease, welcome Peace,' adapting those words to the opening bars of 'Rule, Britannia!'—in itself a great proof of the popularity of the air.¹

'Rule, Britannia!' was first published by Henry Weylett as an appendix (with another song) to Arne's 'Music in the Judgment of Paris.' The copyright privilege is dated Jan. 29, 1740-41. w. c. abridg'd; addns. F. K.

RUMFORD, ROBERT KENNERLEY (b. London, Sept. 2, 1870), a baritone singer who, after study with Henschel and Alfred Blume, made a successful first appearance at one of Henschel's symphony concerts at St. James's Hall, Feb. 16, 1893.

In 1894 he studied with Georges Sbriglia in Paris, and subsequently in England made his reputation in works of a serious kind, such as Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion' (Bach Festival at Queen's Hall, Apr. 6, 1897) and Brahms's 'Erste Gesänge' (St. James's Hall Popular Concert, Jan. 31, 1898). After his marriage with Clara BUTT (q.v.) his career changed its course, and he was associated with her in popular concerts of a different type from those of the old St. James's Hall. Their 'Grand Concerts' at the Albert Hall have been repeated in tours all over the English-speaking world, and were interrupted only by the war, when Rumford served in France (1914-17), and later in the Special Intelligence Department of the War Office.

RUMMEL, a German musical family.

(1) CHRISTIAN FRANZ LUDWIG FRIEDRICH ALEXANDER (b. Briesenstadt, Bavaria, Nov. 27, 1787; d. Wiesbaden, Feb. 13, 1849) was educated at Mannheim, and seems to have had instruction from the Abbé Vogler. In 1806 he took the post of bandmaster to the 2nd Nassau infantry, made the Peninsular Campaign, married in Spain, was taken prisoner, released, and served with his regiment at Waterloo. He was then employed by the Duke of Nassau to form and lead his court orchestra, which he did with great credit to himself till 1841, when it was dissolved. He was not only an able conductor and a composer of much ability and industry, but a fine clarinettist and a good pianist. His works are numerous, and embrace pieces for military band, concertos, quintets and other pieces for clarinet, many pianoforte compositions, especially a sonata for four hands (op. 20), waltzes, variations, etc., and a Method for the PF.

His son, (3) JOSEPH (b. Wiesbaden, Oct. 6, 1818; d. London, Mar. 25, 1880), was educated by his father in music generally, and in the clarinet and PF. in particular, on both of which he was a good player. He was for many years Kapellmeister to the Prince of Oldenburg, then residing at Wiesbaden—a post in which he was succeeded by Adolph Henselt. Up to 1842 he lived in Paris, and then removed to London for five years. In 1847 he returned to Paris, and remained there till driven back to London by the war in 1870; and in London he resided till his death. Joseph Rummel wrote no original music, but he was one of the most prolific arrangers of operas and operatic selections for the PF. that ever existed. For nearly forty years he worked incessantly for the houses of Schott and Escudier, publishing about 400 pieces with each house under his own name, besides a much larger number under noms de plume. His arrangements and transcriptions amount in all to fully 2000. He wrote also a series of exercises for Augener & Co., and for Escudier.

Joseph's sister, (4) FRANZISKA (b. Wiesbaden, Feb. 4, 1821), was educated by her father until she went to Paris to study singing under Bordogni, and afterwards to Lamperti at Milan. She became principal singer at the court of Wiesbaden, and at length married Peter Schott, the well-known music publisher at Brussels, who died in 1873.

Another son, (5) AUGUST (b. Wiesbaden, Jan. 14, 1824; d. London, Dec. 14, 1886), a capable pianist, became a merchant in London.

His son, (6) FRANZ (b. London, Jan. 11, 1853; d. Berlin, May 2, 1901), at the age of 14 went to Brussels to study the PF. under Brassin, first as a private pupil and afterwards in the Conservatoire. He took the first prize for PF. playing there in 1872, and afterwards became one of the staff of teachers. He made his first public appearance at Antwerp, Dec. 22, 1872, in Henselt's PF. concerto; in July 1873 played Schumann's concerto at the Albert Hall Concerts, London; and again at Brussels, before the King and Queen of the Belgians, with great distinction. He remained at the Conservatoire as professor till 1876, when on the advice of Rubinstein he threw up his post and began to travel, playing in the Rhine provinces, Holland and France. Early in 1877 he came to London, and played at the Crystal Palace on Apr. 7. Next year he went to America, where he met with great success, though interrupted by a serious accident. He returned in 1881, and played again at the Crystal Palace on Apr. 30. He was for a long time a teacher in the Stern Conservatorium at Berlin. He afterwards lived at Dessau.

RUMMEL, WALTER (b. Berlin, July 19, 1887), son of Franz Rummel, Anglo-German pianist, studied under Fabian in Washington, and went thence to Berlin, where he was trained by Godowski and Kaun. In 1908 he proceeded to Paris, where he belonged to the 'Inner Circle' of Debussy. As a pianist he has toured all countries of Europe, becoming well known by his cycles of 'one composer' recitals which he repeated in many capitals. He married (1912) the French pianist Thérèse Chaigneau, and appeared with her in recitals for two pianofortes in 1913. A pianist of strong creative power and fine artistry, he specialises in Bach, and has transcribed and arranged several cantatas by Bach, as well as many pieces by Bach's forerunners. As a composer Rummel combines the charm of Debussy with the romantic dreaminess of Schumann, and a strong influence of Wagner and César Franck.

WORKS.—'Invocation to Wagner' (vln. and orch.); 'Invocation to the God of the Earth' (alto and orch.); 'From the Depths' (str. quartet); 'To a Memory' (vln. sonata); 6 Nature Studies (PF.); Little Fairy Suite (PF.); Prelude in B, many old Troubadour songs; 'Blain a Song from the Immortal Hour' (Boughton, 2 fl. and str.); several Transcriptions and Arrangements of 'Old Masters'.

RUNGENHAGEN, CARL FRIEDRICH (b. Berlin, Sept. 27, 1778; d. there, Dec. 21, 1851), became in 1815 second director of the Singakademie, and in 1833 succeeded Zelter as first director. In 1843 he received the title of professor: he wrote four operas, three oratorios, a Mass, a Stabat Mater for female voices, a great deal of church music, many songs, and orchestral and chamber music, all of which is now forgotten. RUSSELL, (1) HENRY (b. Sheerness, Dec. 24, 1812; d. London, Dec. 8, 1900), went to Bologna in 1825 to study music, was for a time a pupil of Rossini in Naples, appeared as a singer at the Surrey Theatre in 1828, and went to Canada about 1833. He was organist of the Presbyterian church, Rochester, N.Y., and travelled in America till 1841, when he returned to England and gave entertainments by himself and in company with Charles Mackay. The first took place at the Hanover Square Rooms, Mar. 8, 1842. In his particular style he had no rival. His songs 'I'm afloat,' 'A life on the ocean wave' (which in 1889 was authorised as the march of the Royal Marines), 'Cheer, boys, cheer' (the only air played by the regimental drum and fife band when a regiment goes abroad), 'Woodman, spare that tree,' etc., are still familiar, and some of his dramatic songs, as 'The Dream of the Reveller,' 'The Maniac,' 'The Gambler's Wife,' etc., were immensely popular in their day. It may certainly be said that over 800 songs were either written or composed by him. At a time when Australia, Tasmania and New Zealand were almost unknown, Henry Russell was instrumental, through the Canadian government, in sending over thousands of poor people who are now wealthy. A memoir was published in 1846, and a book of reminiscences, Cheer, Boys, Cheer, in 1895. He retired from public life in 1865, and was fêted at a special concert given in his honour by Sir A. Harris in Covent Garden Theatre, Oct. 12, 1891. L' amico dei cantanti is a treatise on the art of singing. Two of his sons have attained distinction in music.

RUSSELL, WILLIAM, Mus.B. (b. London, Oct. 6, 1777; d. Nov. 21, 1813), son of an organ-builder and organist. He was successively a pupil of Cope, organist of St. Saviour's, Southwark, Shrubsole, of Spa Fields Chapel, and Groombridge, Hackney and St. Stephen's, Coleman Street. In 1789 he was appointed deputy to his father as organist of St. Mary, Aldermanbury, and continued so until 1793, when he obtained the post of organist at the chapel in Great Queen Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, which he held until 1798, when the chapel was disposed of to the Wesleyan body. In 1797 he became a pupil of Dr. Arnold, with whom he studied for about three years. In 1798 he was chosen organist of St. Ann's, Lambehuse. In 1800 he was engaged as pianist and composer at Sadler's Wells, where he continued about four years. In 1801 he was engaged as pianist at Covent Garden and appointed organist of the Foundling Hospital Chapel. He took his Mus.B. degree at Oxford in 1808. He composed three oratorios, 'The Deliverance of Israel,' 'The Redemption' and 'Job' (1826); a Mass in C minor, an 'Ode to Music,' an 'Ode to the Genius of Handel,' Christopher Smart's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day,' and an 'Ode to Harmony,' several glees, songs and organ voluntaries, and about twenty dramatic pieces, chiefly spectacles and pantomimes. He edited in 1809 'Psalms, Hymns and Anthems for the Foundling Chapel.' He was much esteemed both as pianist and organist.

RUSSIAN BASSOON (Fr. basson russe), an obsolete brass instrument similar in pattern to the BASS-HORN (q.v.). Its name was misleading as it has no connexion with the bassoon, although, like that instrument, its tube was doubled back on itself. RUST, a distinguished German musical family. (1) FRIEDRICH WILHELM (b. Wörlitz, Dessau, July 6, 1739; d. there, Mar. 28, 1796). His father was a person of eminence, and he received a first-rate education. He was taught music by his elder brother, Johann Ludwig Anton, who as an amateur had played the violin in J. S. Bach's orchestra at Leipzig; and at 13 he played the whole of the 'Wohltemperirtes Clavier' without book. Composition, organ and clavier he learned from Friedemann and Emanuel Bach, and the violin from Hockh and F. Benda; and in 1765, during a journey to Italy, from G. Benda, Tartini and Pugnani. In 1766 he returned to Dessau, and became the life and soul of the music there. On Sept. 24, 1774, a new theatre was opened through his exertions, to which he was soon after appointed music-director. He married his pupil, Henriette Niedhart, a fine singer, and thenceforward, with a few visits to Berlin, Dresden, etc., his life was confined to Dessau. His compositions include a Psalm for solo, chorus and orchestra; several large church cantatas; duodramas and monodramas; operas; music to plays; prologues and occasional pieces, etc.; odes and songs (2 collections); sonatas¹ and variations for the PF.,² solo—'4 dozen' of the former and many of the latter—concertos, fugues, etc. etc.; and three sonatas for violin solo. That in D minor was often played at the Monday Popular Concerts. His last composition was a violin sonata for the E string, thus anticipating Paganini. A list of his works, with every detail of his life, extending to 6½ large pages, is given in Mendel. A monograph on him, with list of works, etc., was published in 1882 by W. Hofaus, and Dr. E. Prieger published a pamphlet, F. W. Rust, ein Vorgänger Beethovens. His eldest son was drowned; the youngest,

(2) WILHELM KARL (b. Dessau, Apr. 29, 1787; d. there, Apr. 18, 1855) began music very early; and besides the teaching he naturally got at home, he learned thorough-bass with Türk while at Halle University. In Dec. 1807 he went to Vienna, and in time became intimate with Beethoven, who praised his playing of Bach, and recommended him strongly as a teacher. Amongst other pupils he had Baroness Ertmann and Maximilian Brentano. His letters to his sister on Beethoven are given by Thayer, iii. 35-6. He remained in Vienna till 1827, when he returned to his native place and lived there till his death.

(3) WILHELM (b. Dessau, Aug. 15, 1822; d. Leipzig, May 2, 1892), nephew of the foregoing and grandson of Friedrich Wilhelm (1), himself an advocate, and a fine amateur player on both violin and pianoforte, learned music from his uncle and F. Schneider. After a few years' wandering he settled in Berlin, where he soon joined the Singakademie. He played at the Philharmonic Society of Berlin, Dec. 5, 1849, and was soon much in request as a teacher. In Jan. 1861 he became organist of St. Luke's Church, and twelve months afterwards director of Vierling's Bach Society, which he conducted till 1874, performing a large number of fine works by Bach and other great composers, many of them for the first time. The list of occasional concerts conducted by him is also very large. In 1870 he undertook the department of counterpoint and composition in the Stern Conservatorium at Berlin, in 1878 was appointed organist of the Thomaskirche, Leipzig, and in 1880 succeeded E. F. E. Richter as cantor of the Thomasschule. He was connected with the Leipzig Bachgesellschaft from 1850, and edited vols. v., vii., ix.-xxiii. and xxv. His original works have reached op. 33, of which eight are for the PF. and the rest for voices. A biography appeared in the Musikal. Wochenblatt for 1890. G.

RUTHERFORD, DAVID, a Scotch music publisher in London who worked in St. Martin's Court, near Leicester Fields, 'at the sign of the Violin and German Flute,' about 1745. His publications consist principally of minor works for the violin or flute, such as country dances, minuets and books of airs. He republished in octavo William McGibbon's 'Scotch Airs,' and issued song-sheets, etc. He was publisher, and probably author, of several quaint instruction books, as

The Fiddle new model'd, or a useful introduction for the violin, exemplified with familiar dialogues, circa 1760, 8vo, and The art of playing on the violin, shewing how to stop every note exactly.

He was succeeded at the same address by John Rutherford, who issued a similar class of works, and who remained in business until 1783 or later. F. K.

RUTINI, (1) GIOVANNI MARCO (b. Florence, c. 1730; d. there, c. 1797), studied at the Conservatorio di S. Orefrio a Capuana, Naples; went to Germany in 1754 and resided at Vienna, Prague and Nuremberg, returning to Italy after a number of years. In 1766 he was maestro di cappella at the court of Modena, where his opera 'Gli sposi in maschera' was performed; afterwards he was maestro di cappella at the court of Tuscany. He wrote a number of operas, PF. sonatas and some church music. His son, (2) FERDINANDO (b. Modena, c. 1767; d. Florence, 1827), was maestro di cappella, after holding a similar position at Macerata, c. 1812. He composed operas and cantatas.¹

RUTINI, GIOVANNI PLACIDO, who is frequently confused with Giov. Marco, was in Prague about the same time (1756) as the latter, and went to St. Petersburg in Aug. 1758. Their distinct individuality is clearly proved by title-pages of their respective works, and Giov. Marco's letter of 1771 printed in his sonatas of 1765. Of Giov. Placido's work only cantatas, canzone, arie and PF. sonatas (three of which appeared in a modern edition by E. Pauer) are known. The arias appear to be taken from operas of his; but Eitner (Q.L.) thinks it doubtful whether the sonatas are his or Giov. Marco's. E. v. d. s.

RUTTER, (?) RICHARD (early 16th cent.), English composer of church music. B.M. Egerton MS. 2604/1 contains a record of a payment to a Richard Rutter as 'drumslade,' or drummer, to Henry VIII. in 1526. The Bodl. Mus. Sch. includes a Mass by Rutter; there is also an anthem by him, 'Blessed is the man that feareth,' at Durham Cathedral, the tenor cantor's part of which is in B.M. Add. MSS. 30,478-9. J. M².

RUY BLAS, an overture in C minor (op. 95) and a chorus for soprano voices and orchestra (op. 77, No. 3), composed by Mendelssohn to Victor Hugo's play. Produced Leipzig, Mar. 11, 1839. The overture produced in London, May 25, 1849. G.

RUYNEMAN, DANIEL (b. Amsterdam, Aug. 8, 1886), Dutch composer. He was originally intended for a commercial career and started the study of music comparatively late and without a teacher, what instruction he has received being of a desultory nature. This has resulted in a certain degree of awkwardness in some of his writing, though he has a strong personality and has made a number of very successful experiments. These experiments make, in fact, his strongest claim to notice, and although he has written a number of works in more or less classical form and of considerable beauty, his chief works are out of the ordinary in form, in the instruments employed and in psychological expression. He started in this direction with what he called three 'Pathematologies,' or studies in psychology, and his latest work he calls 'a psycho-symbolic play,' with music for a vocal and instrumental orchestra. The most notable, however, is a set of 'Hieroglyphs,' written for three flutes, harp, cup-bells, celesta, piano, 2 mandolines and two guitars. The cup-bells are his own invention, and give out a rich boom or tone that continues in a manner suggestive of the Eastern atmosphere which it may be presumed he wishes to achieve. The list of his works is as follows (published by Chester and by Noske, The Hague):

Sonata in G major for piano and violin.

Sonatina for piano.

3 Pathematologies for piano (1. Hallucination; 2. The Voice from the Past; 3. Impression).

2 Sacred Songs (words by Rabindranath Tagore).

Chinese Songs (two acts to ancient words).

Liederen, for voice and piano.

Wintersabend, for voice and piano.

Trois Mélodies, for voice and piano.

Hieroglyphs, for chamber orchestra.

Klaaglied van een slaaf, for viola and piano.

'The Clown,' a psycho-symbolic play with music for a vocal and instrumental orchestra.

RYAN, MICHAEL DESMOND (b. Kilkenny, Mar. 3, 1816; d. Dec. 8, 1868), dramatic and musical critic, son of Dr. Michael Ryan. On the completion of his academical education at an early age he entered the University of Edinburgh, early in the year 1832, for the purpose of studying medicine. He remained in Edinburgh for some three years, after which he determined to quit Edinburgh and try his fortune in London. Here he arrived in 1836, by chance met with J. W. Davison, and began an intimate and lifelong friendship. Ryan now entered upon his literary career in earnest, writing articles and poems for Harrison's Miscellany, etc., and producing verses for songs. A set of twelve sacred songs, versified from the Old Testament and set to music by Edward Loder (D'Almaine), may also be mentioned. The 'Songs of Ireland' (D'Almaine), in which, in conjunction with F. N. Crouch, new verses were fitted to old melodies, is another example of effective workmanship. In 1844 Ryan became a contributor to the Musical World, and two years later sub-editor, a post which he filled as long as he lived. For years he was a contributor to the Morning Post, Court Journal, Morning Chronicle and other periodicals. In 1849 he wrote the opera libretto of 'Charles II.' for G. A. Macfarren. The subject was taken from a well-known comedy by Howard Payne, rendered popular at Covent Garden by Charles Kemble's acting some quarter of a century before. A short time afterwards Ryan was commissioned by Julien to provide the libretto of a grand spectacular opera on the subject of Peter the Great—brought out at the Royal Italian Opera on Aug. 17, 1852, under the title of 'Pietro il Grande.' With the late Frank Mori, Ryan collaborated in an opera called 'Lambert Simnel,' originally intended for Sims Reeves, but never performed. In 1857 he formed his first association with the Morning Herald and its satellite the Standard, and became permanently connected with those journals in 1862 as musical and dramatic critic.

RYBNER, PETER MARTIN CORNELIUS (b. Copenhagen, Denmark, Oct. 26, 1855), Danish-American teacher and composer. He studied with Gade, Hartmann, Reincke and David, and later with von Bulow and Rubinstein. As a concert pianist he toured throughout Europe. In 1904 he succeeded MacDowell as head of the music department of Columbia University (New York); he retired from that position in 1919. His compositions include a symphonic poem; an overture and other orchestral pieces; a violin concerto; a three-act ballet, 'Prince Ador' (Karlsruhe, 1903); and many pieces in the smaller forms.

W. S. S.

SAAR, LOUIS VICTOR (b. Rotterdam, Dec. 10, 1868), Dutch-American composer and teacher. A graduate of the Strassburg Gymnasium and later of the Munich Conservatory, he came to New York in 1894 as accompanist at the Metropolitan Opera House; later he taught theory at various institutions in that city and elsewhere in the United States. His compositions include an orchestral suite, 'From the Kingdom of the Great Northwest,' 'Three Silhouettes' and other orchestral pieces; 'The 128th Psalm,' for solo, chorus and orchestra, and other choral pieces; chamber music, violin and pianoforte pieces and songs.

W. S. S.

SABANEIEV, LEONID LEONIDOVICH (b. Moscow, 1871), Russian composer and musical critic, studied under Serge TANEEV (q.v.) at the Moscow Conservatoire, and took his degree (mathematics) at the Moscow University (1908). He has made a special study of Scriabin's music and musical philosophy, and his book and numerous articles form the standard authorities on this composer.

SABATA, VICTOR DE (b. Trieste, 1892), son of the choirmaster at La Scala, entered the Milan Conservatoire in 1902, where he studied with M. Saladino (theory) and G. Orefice (composition). He left the Conservatoire in 1910, having won the first prize and a special endorsement for the composition of a suite for orchestra. He has since become known as composer and conductor. His compositions include an orchestral poem 'Juventus,' quartets and two operas: 'Lisistrata' and 'Il macigno.' The last was performed with some success at La Scala in 1916.

SABATIER, see UNGER, Caroline.

SABBATINI, GALEAZZO, of Pesaro, was probably maestro di cappella there for some years before 1626; this is indicated at any rate in the preface to the 'Sacrae laudes,' Venice, 1626.¹ On the title-pages of his works he is called maestro di cappella di camera to the Duke of Mirandola in 1630 and again in 1636. The dates of his publications range from 1625-40. In G. B. Doni's Annotazioni, published in 1640, the 'Discorso primo dell' inutile osservanza de tuoni' (p. 234) is dedicated to 'Signor Galeazzo Sabbatini a Bergamo.' Sabbatini is highly commended by Kircher² for his scientific knowledge of music:

'rarus musicus, qui tria genera novo ausu ad arithmeticas leges revocans, multo plura sanè inventi, quorum diversis in locis huius operis mentio fiet, et inter cœtera abacum novum ordinavit exactissimè quicquid in musica desiderari potest referentem, omnibus harmoniis exhibendis perfectissimum, etc.'

Sabbatini published one theoretical work, on the thorough-bass or basso continuo, which Burney³ criticises as inadequate because it only treats of common chords given to every note of the scale. The title is:

SABBATINI, LUIGI ANTONIO (b. Albano Laziale, near Rome, 1732; d. Padua, Jan. 29, 1809), was educated at Bologna in the Franciscan monastery of minori conventuali, where he studied music under Padre G. B. Martini. There is a manuscript in Sabbatini's handwriting in the Bologna Liceo Musicale, which contains the

'Regole per accompagnare del pre. G. B. Martini, min. conle. maestro di cappella di San Francesco in Bologna, 1761. Per uso di Fra Luigi Ant. Sabbatini, min. conle.'¹

He remained there eight years, according to a long and interesting letter which he wrote to Martini from Albano on Nov. 2, 1766, now preserved in the library of the Accademia filarmonica, Bologna.² He was afterwards in the Franciscan monastery at Padua, where Vallotti gave him lessons in composition. Eventually he was appointed maestro di cappella at the church of the SS. Apostoli in Rome; a letter in the Bologna collection, written to Martini from Rome, is dated July 17, 1776.³

Before Vallotti, maestro di cappella of S. Antonio, Padua, died in Jan. 1780, he expressed a wish that Sabbatini should be his successor. Sabbatini was offered the post, but, unwilling to leave Rome, he suggested that Agostino Ricci would be a suitable candidate. Ricci was therefore appointed on Apr. 26, 1780, and remained in Padua for six years; but when he left for Assisi, Sabbatini was persuaded to reconsider his decision, and was finally appointed to the post on Apr. 22, 1786, which he held until his death. During these twenty-three years of his life he enriched the archives of S. Antonio with many compositions, writes Gonzati,⁴ among which may be especially mentioned his Salmi di Terza, four masses, a vespero, and a Compieta breve, all composed for four voices.

Sabbatini was elected one of the eight members of the music section of the Accademia Italiana in May 1807. In 1887 a bust of Sabbatini was placed in the Piazza Feoli, Albano; this tribute to his memory was due to Signor Cesare de Sanctis, also an Albano musician.

The larger part of Sabbatini's church music remains in manuscript in the archives of S. Antonio,⁵ but Tebaldini, who gives a list of eighty-six compositions, has published some examples for four voices with orchestra, which he considers show that Sabbatini instinctively tried for new combinations, new effects, and that he sometimes lent his music quite an individual character by giving the canto fermo to the alto or soprano part instead of the tenor. Sabbatini was generally recognised as a sound and erudite theorist; Gervasoni⁶ testifies to his profound knowledge no less than to his great personal charm.

Some other manuscript compositions are in the Bologna Liceo Musicale; autograph scores of twelve pieces of sacred music for two and four voices with orchestral accompaniment, in one volume, and three Kyrie, two Gloria, two Credo and 'Qui habitat,' all for four voices with orchestral accompaniment, in another volume⁷; as well as twenty-one pieces of sacred music for four voices with figured bass; and 'Atto di contrizione' for two voices with basso continuo. The nineteenth volume of the Martini correspondence in the same library consists entirely of letters from Sabbatini.

In the Vienna Hofbibliothek in MS. 16,217 there is a Mass for four voices with organ accompaniment; and in MS. 19,103 a treatise on music:

* Trascritto ad litteram nell'anno 1781 Dal p. L. A. Sabbatini, min. con. maestro di capella nella sacra Basilica del Santo in Padova.⁸

The following theoretical works were published:

Elementi teorici della musica colla pratica de' madrigali, in duetti e terzetti a canone, ecc. di fra L. A. Sabbatini, min. con. già maestro di cappella nella Basilica Constantiniana de' SS. XII. Besides these works Sabbatini also published a life of Vallotti: Notizie sopra la vita e le opere del R. P. Fr. Ant. Vallotti (Padua, 1780), and edited a collection of Marcello's psalms which was published at Venice in 1801. (Fatis.) C. S.

SABBATINI, PIETRO PAOLO, was a native of Rome. The dates of his published works range from 1628-57, and from their title-pages it is to be gathered that in 1628 he was maestro di cappella dell' Archiconfraternità della morte et oratione di Roma; 1630-31 maestro di cappella di S. Luigi de' francesi, Rome; and in 1650 professore di musica. SACCHETTI, LIBERIO ANTONOVICH (b. Kenzar, near Tambov, Aug. 30, 1852; d. circa 1912-13), an authority on musical history and æsthetics. His father—of Italian descent—was a music teacher at Kenzar. In 1866 Sacchetti began to study the violoncello under C. Davidov in St. Petersburg. From 1868-74 he continued his studies at the Conservatoire, still making the violoncello his first consideration. Later on he turned his attention to musical theory and entered Rimsky-Korsakov's class. In 1886 he was the first to fill the newly created chair of Musical History and Æsthetics in the St. Petersburg Conservatorium. These lectures proved so popular that he was requested to give similar courses to the students of the Academy of Arts (1889-94). Sacchetti was appointed assistant to Vladimir Stassov, director of the Art Department of the Imperial Public Library, in 1895. He was sent as delegate of the Imperial Russian Musical Society to the musical exhibition at Bologna in 1888; and was also chosen to read a paper at the Paris exhibition of 1900 upon 'Russian Church Music.' His most popular works are: A Sketch for a Universal History of Music (St. Petersburg, 1883, 3rd edition, 1900); A Short Historical Chrestomathy of Music (1906, 3rd edition, 1900); From the Spheres of Æsthetics and Music (collected essays, 1896). SACCHI, BARNABITE GIOVENALE (b. Milan, 1726?; d. there, Sept. 27, 1789), a learned member of the congregation of St. Paul called Barnabites, whence he took the additional name of Barnabite. He was a member of several societies and academies of science and art, and a copious writer on music. A list of his works appears in Q.-L., including his biographies of Carlo Broschi and Benedetto Marcello. E. v. d. s.

SACCHINI, ANTONIO MARIA GASPERE (b. Pozzuoli, near Naples, July 23, 1734; d. Paris, Oct. 7, 1786). This 'graceful, elegant and judicious composer,' as Burney calls him, who enjoyed great contemporary fame and was very popular in this country, was the son of poor fisher people who had no idea of bringing him up to any life but their own. It chanced, however, that Durante heard the boy sing some popular airs, and was so much struck with his voice and talent that he got him admitted into the Conservatorio of San Onofrio at Naples. Here he learned the violin from Niccolò Forenza, and acquired a considerable mastery over the instrument, which he subsequently turned to good account in his orchestral writing. He studied singing with Gennaro Manna; harmony and counterpoint with Durante himself, who esteemed him highly, holding him up to his other pupils, among whom were Jommelli, Piccinni and Guglielmi, as their most formidable rival. Durante died in 1755, and in the following year Sacchini left the Conservatorio, but not until he had produced an intermezzo in two parts, 'Fra Donato,' very successfully performed by the pupils of the institution. For some years he supported himself by teaching singing and writing little pieces for minor theatres, till, in 1762, he wrote a serious opera, 'Semiramide,' for the Argentina theatre at Rome. This was so well received that he remained for seven years attached to the theatre as composer, writing operas not only for Rome but many other towns. Among these, 'Alessandro nelle Indie,' played at Venice in 1768, was especially successful, and obtained for its composer, in 1769, the directorship of the Ospedaletto school of music there. He seems to have held this office for little more than a year, but during that time formed some excellent pupils, among whom may be mentioned Gabrieli, Canti and Pasquali.

Before 1770 he left Venice, and proceeded by way of Munich, Stuttgart and other German towns to England, arriving in London in Apr. 1772. For Munich he wrote 'Scipione in Cartagena' and 'L'eroe cinese' in 1770, and for Stuttgart 'Calliroë.' His continental fame had preceded him to this country, and a beautiful air of his, 'Care luci,' introduced by Guarducci into the pasticcio of 'Tigrane' as early as 1767, had, by its popularity, paved the way for his music. True, a strong clique existed against the new composer, but he soon got the better of it.

In addition to the 'Cid' and 'Tamerlano,' mentioned by Burney, he produced here 'Lucio Vero' and 'Niteti e Perseo' (1773-74). His perfect comprehension of the art of writing for the voice, and the skill with which he adapted his songs to their respective exponents, contributed an important element to the success of his music, even indifferent singers being made to appear to advantage. His popularity, however, was undermined, after a time, from a variety of causes. Jealousy led to attacks against him. He would probably have lived down calumny, prompted by personal spite, but his idle and dissolute habits estranged his friends, impaired his health and got him deeply into debt, the consequence of which was that he left this country and settled in Paris—Burney says in 1784; Fétis in 1782. It seems probable that this last date is correct, as several of his operas were produced in the French capital during 1783-84. He had been there on a visit in 1781, when his 'Isola d' Amore,' translated by Framéry and adapted to the French stage, was played there successfully, having been played under the name of 'La Colonie' in 1775. His 'Olimpiade' had been given in 1777. Burney says that in Paris Sacchini was almost adored. He started with an apparent advantage in the patronage of Joseph II. of Austria, who was in Paris at the time, and recommended the composer to the protection of his sister, Marie Antoinette. Thanks to this, he obtained a hearing for his 'Rinaldo' (rearranged and partly rewritten for the French stage as 'Renaud') and for 'Il gran Cid,' which, under the name of 'Chimène,' was performed before the court at Fontainebleau. Both of these works contained great beauties, but neither had more than a limited success. 'Dardanus,' a French opera, was not more fortunate in 1784. 'Œdipe à Colone' was finished early in 1785, and performed at Versailles, Apr. 4, 1786. This, his masterpiece, brought him his bitterest disappointment. The Queen had promised that 'Œdipe' should be the first opera at the royal theatre during the court's next residence at Fontainebleau. The time was approaching, but nothing was said about it, and Sacchini remarked with anxiety that the Queen avoided him and seemed uneasy in his presence. Suspense became intolerable, and he sought an audience, when the Queen unwillingly and hesitatingly confessed the truth:

'My dear Sacchini, I am accused of showing too much favour to foreigners. I have been so much pressed to command a performance of M. Lemoine's "Phèdre" instead of your "Œdipe" that I cannot refuse. You see the situation; forgive me.'

Poor Sacchini controlled himself at the moment, but on arriving at home gave way to despair. The Queen's favour lost, he believed his only chance gone. He took to his bed then and there, and died three months afterwards.

It is very difficult to form a just estimate of this composer, whose merits were great, yet whose importance to the history of Art seems now so small. Among the second-rate writers of this transition period, Sacchini must rank first. A little more force, perhaps a little less facility, and he might have been a great, instead of a clever or a 'graceful, elegant and judicious' composer. In his later works the influence of Gluck's spirit is unmistakable. There is a wide gulf between such early Italian operas as 'L'isola d'Amore,' consisting of the usual detached series of songs, duets and concerted pieces, and the 'Œdipe à Colone,' where each number leads into the next, and where vigorous accompanied recitative and well-contrasted dialogued choruses carry on and illustrate the action of the drama, while keeping alive the interest of the hearer. Burney remarks that Sacchini,

'observing how fond the English were of Handel's oratorio choruses, introduced solemn and elaborate choruses into some of his operas; but, though excellent in their kind, they never had a good effect; the mixture of English singers with the Italian, as well as the awkward figure they cut as actors, joined to the difficulty of getting their parts by heart, rendered these compositions ridiculous which in still life would have been admirable.'

In Paris they managed these things better, for in all the operas of Sacchini which were composed or arranged for the French stage, choruses are used largely and with admirable effect, while in 'Œdipe' they are the principal feature. The 'Œdipe' was continuously on the boards of the Opéra for fifty-seven years (from 1787-1844). During this time it had 583 representations. It was revived in July 1843, and was performed six times in that year and once in May 1844.

Sacchini understood orchestral as well as choral effect. His scores are small, oboes, horns and sometimes trumpets and bassoons being the only additions to the string quartet, but the treatment is as effective as it is simple. His part-writing is pure and good, while the care and finish evident in his scores are hard to reconcile with the accounts of his idle and irregular ways. The same technical qualities are shown in his compositions for the church, which in other ways are less distinguished than his operas from contemporary works of a similar kind.

Much of Sacchini's music is lost. Four oratorios, a Mass and various motets, etc., are mentioned in Q.-L.; Fétis gives a list of twenty-one sacred compositions, and the names of forty-one operas, the chief of which have been mentioned here; but Burney puts the number of these much higher (twenty-seven are given as still extant in Q.-L.). The last of them, 'Arviro et Evelina,' was left unfinished. It was completed by J. B. Rey, and performed with success after the composer's death (Apr. 29, 1788). He also left two symphonies in D, six trios for two violins and bass; six quartets for two violins, tenor and bass; and two sets, each of six harpsichord sonatas, with violin, as well as twelve sonatas (opp. 3 and 4) for clavier solo. These were all published in London. One of the sonatas, in F, was included in Pauer's 'Alto Meister.' A couple of cavatinas are given by Gevaert in his 'Gloires d'Italie,' and an antiphon for two voices by Choron in his 'Journal de Chant.'

SACKBUT, an early name for the trombone, probably derived from the Spanish sacabucha ('draw-tube'), i.e. sacar 'to draw,' and bucha 'a pipe,' originally of boxwood (cf. Portuguese sacabuxa), the name being also given to a form of pump. In Egypt the Arabic bdq is still used to denote a kind of trumpet. Other derivations, however, are from O.F. sauquier-boter ('to pull and to push') or Sp. sacar del buche ('to exhaust the chest'). The form first appears in Spanish literature of the 14th century, the trombone having been evolved from the trumpet about the year 1300. At the beginning of the next century the French form saqueboute is found, and at the close of the same century, when the instrument was introduced into England, it was known as the shakbushe and subsequently as the saykebud, sackbut or sagbut. One of the earliest uses of the word in English literature occurs in Hawes's Passeytyme of Pleasure (1506). The so-called representation of a 9th-century sackbut in the Boulogne Psalter (MS. No. 20) is an error, the instrument depicted being a fanciful delineation of the sambuke, an ancient four-stringed lyre. The phrase 'tuba ductilis,' applied in later times to the Sackbut, originally meant a trumpet of metal beaten or drawn out by the hammer, i.e. not cast (PLATE LXVIII, No. 4). For details of the instrument see TROMBONE.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY (1832-1882). This Society was originated by Thomas Brewer, Joseph Hart, W. Jeffreys, Joseph Surman and Cockerell, who first met, with a view to its establishment, on Aug. 21, 1832. Its practical operations did not, however, begin until Nov. 20 following. Its first meetings were held in the chapel in Gate Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, where the first concert was given on Tuesday evening, Jan. 15, 1833. The programme comprised selections from Handel's 'Messiah' and 'Funeral Anthem,' and from Perry's 'Fall of Jerusalem' and 'Death of Abel,' with Attwood's coronation anthem 'O Lord, grant the king a long life,' and the hymn 'Adeste fideles.' The names of the principal singers were not published: Thomas Harper was engaged as solo trumpeter. The then officers of the Society were John Newman Harrison, president; Thomas Brewer, secretary; J. G. Moginie, treasurer; Joseph Surman, conductor; George Perry, leader of the band; and F. C. Walker, organist. In Nov. 1833, the permission to meet in the chapel being suddenly withdrawn, the Society removed to a chapel in Henrietta Street, Brunswick Square, and shortly afterwards to a room belonging to the Scottish Hospital in Fleur de Lys Court, Fleet Street; but at Midsummer 1834 it migrated to Exeter Hall, which was its home until Michaelmas 1880. The concerts were for the first two years given in the minor hall, and consisted principally of selections, in which a few short complete works were occasionally introduced, such as Handel's 'Dettingen Te Deum,' Haydn's 'Mass,' No. 1. The Society having on June 28, 1836, given a concert in the large hall in aid of a charity, with very great success, was shortly afterwards induced to give its own concerts there, and at the same time an important change in its policy was effected—the abandonment of miscellaneous selections for complete oratorios. Up to that period, even at the provincial festivals, it was very rarely that any complete oratorio, except Handel's 'Messiah,' was performed, whilst the programmes of the so-called 'Oratorios' at the two patent theatres on the Wednesdays and Fridays in Lent were a mongrel mixture of oratorio songs and choruses, secular songs of all kinds, and instrumental solos. The first concert given in the large hall on the Society's own account was Handel's 'Messiah,' on Dec. 20, 1836, with about 300 performers. In 1837 Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' (Mar. 7) was given for the first time in London. On Sept. 12 another performance of 'St. Paul' was given, in the composer's presence (see MENDELSSOHN). During the year the number of performers was increased to 500. In the same year the formation of a musical library was begun, and Robert Kanzow Bowley appointed honorary librarian. During the seasons 1838-41 various revivals of Handel oratorios took place. A new organ, built for the Society by Walker, was opened Jan. 23, 1840, with a performance by Thomas Adams. In 1843 Spohr's 'Fall of Babylon' was produced, conducted by the composer, who was then on a visit to England; Mendelssohn's 'Hymn of Praise' was introduced, and also Handel's 'Deborah.' In 1844 the season was chiefly distinguished by two performances of Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul,' conducted by the composer. The year 1847 was an important epoch in the Society's annals with a revival of Handel's 'Belshazzar' and the production for the first time in its improved form of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah,' under his own personal direction. Subsequently Spohr visited this country at the invitation of the Society and conducted two performances of his 'Fall of Babylon' and one of his 'Christian's Prayer' and 'Last Judgment' (the last for the only time in England under his direction), and produced his '84th Psalm, Milton's version,' composed expressly for the occasion. In this year dissatisfaction with the conductor Joseph Surman led to the appointment of Costa in 1848; pending this appointment the remaining concerts of the season were conducted by Perry. Costa strengthened and improved both band and chorus, the number of performers being augmented to nearly 700. The performances of the season consisted principally of more effective renderings of the stock pieces, but Mendelssohn's music for 'Athalia' was introduced with great success. In 1850 nothing new was given but Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion' in an English dress. The year 1851 was chiefly remarkable for the number of concerts given—thirty-one; 'Messiah,' 'Elijah' and the 'Creation' having been performed alternately, one in each week, from May to September for the gratification of visitors to the Great Exhibition in Hyde Park. Later in the year Haydn's 'Seasons' was introduced for the first time. In 1852 Spohr's 'Calvary' and the fragments of Mendelssohn's 'Christus' were introduced. In 1853 some changes took place in the officers of the Society; R. K. Bowley became treasurer, and W. H. Husk succeeded him as librarian : Mozart's Requiem was first brought forward this year. The year 1854 was distinguished by two performances of Beethoven's Mass in D, and the Society undertook the performance of the music at the opening of the Crystal Palace on May 10. In 1856 Costa's 'Eli' was performed for the first time in London. In 1857 Rossini's Stabat Mater was introduced, and the Society undertook the musical arrangements for the first Handel Festival at the Crystal Palace. (See HANDEL FESTIVAL.) In 1862 Beethoven's 'Mount of Olives' was given with its proper libretto. In 1870 Beethoven's Mass in D was again performed. The Society sustained the loss, by death, of three of its principal officers : J. N. Harrison, president ; R. K. Bowley, treasurer ; and T. Brewer, secretary and, for a few weeks, president. They were replaced by D. Hill, president ; W. H. Withall, treasurer ; and J. F. Puttick, secretary. In 1873 the last-named died, and E. H. Mannering was appointed in his stead. Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion' was given for the first time. Mozart's Litany in B \flat , in an English dress, was introduced in 1877. In 1878 Rossini's 'Moses in Egypt' was restored to its original position as an oratorio. Owing to a change in the proprietorship of Exeter Hall, the Society had to quit that building, and the concerts of the season 1880-81 were given in St. James's Hall, the number of performers being reduced, on account of the limited space of the orchestra, to about 300. The first concert was on Dec. 3. Sullivan's 'Martyr of Antioch' (first time in London) and Cherubini's Requiem in C minor were brought out during the season.

The Society's library was the largest collection of music and musical literature ever gathered together by a musical body in England. A printed catalogue was issued in 1872. It was acquired for the R.C.M. at the dissolution of the original Society. (See LIBRARIES.) The Society also possessed some interesting original portraits, statuary and autograph letters. It was in constitution an essentially amateur body, none but amateurs being eligible for membership, and the governing committee being chosen by and from the members. The most eminent professors were engaged as principal vocalists and instrumentalists, the rest of the band and the whole of the chorus being amateurs. The members were comparatively few in number, the majority of the amateurs being assistants, who gave their gratuitous services, but paid no subscription. The subscription of members, originally £1, was afterwards £2 : 2s. per annum. The original Society was dissolved in 1882, its last concert being a performance of 'Solomon' on Apr. 28 of that year. Some members of the committee determined to resuscitate the Society, and the new institution was incorporated in 1882. Charles Hallé was appointed conductor, and in 1885 was succeeded by W. H. Cummings, who had, up to that time, acted as assistant conductor. In the autumn of 1888 the new Society ceased to exist.

The Benevolent Fund of the Society was instituted Mar. 14, 1855, for the aid of necessitous persons who had at any time been connected with the Sacred Harmonic Society. The management of the fund was entrusted to an independent committee, chosen by the governors of the fund from the members of the Sacred Harmonic Society. W. H. H.

SADKO, 'legendary' opera in 7 tableaux. Composed by Rimsky-Korsakov. Produced Moscow, Dec. 1897.

SADLER'S WELLS, a place of entertainment near the New River Head, Pentonville, much associated with music from the end of the 17th century.

In a garden belonging to a person named Sadler an ancient well was discovered in 1683. The water of the well was chalybeate and ferruginous, and Sadler, who owned a sort of tavern, having attached a wooden Music House, exploited the medicinal qualities in rivalry of the waters at Tunbridge and at Epsom. He laid out the grounds and engaged tumblers and musicians, and the place was much frequented for its open-air concerts. In 1699 James Miles and a Francis Forcer, the latter a musician, were proprietors, and the place became known also as 'Miles's Music House.' Miles having died in 1724, Francis Forcer, junior, increased the attractions, and Forcer dying in 1743, the gardens passed into the hands of one Rosoman, who made many alterations, rebuilding the Music House in brick. This brick structure, erected in 1765, formed part of Sadler's Wells theatre until late in the 19th century. Mrs. Lampe, Thomas Lowe and other vocalists of repute sang at Sadler's Wells, and at a later date Miss Romanzini (Mrs. Bland) and Braham were among the performers engaged there. Mrs. Mountain, the singer, whose parents were engaged at Sadler's Wells, was named after Rosoman the proprietor. Charles Dibdin the elder, and his sons Thomas and Charles, were all more or less closely connected with Sadler's Wells, writing plays and musical pantomimes for production there. The younger Dibbins were proprietors and managers. Grimaldi's connexion with this theatre, and that of other pantomimists, tumblers, rope-dancers and actors, do not concern the musical records of it. The theatre has seen many changes, and became a music-hall.¹

ŞAFÎ ED-DÎN, 'ABD EL-MÛMIN AL-BAGHDÂDÎ (13th cent.), a celebrated Arab musician who flourished at Baghdad during the reign of the last 'Abbâsîd caliph, al-Musta'îm (1242-1258). He was a talented performer on the lute, and during the sack of Baghdad in 1258 his skill saved him; Hulâgû Khân, the Mongol leader, hearing him play, gave orders that he, his family and his goods should be spared. He had been tutor to the son of a vizier; and to his pupil he dedicated an important treatise on the theory of music (Bibl. Nat., Paris), which has been translated into French by Carra de Vaux.² It is a shortened and simplified version of the work of AL-FÂRÂBÎ, clearer than the original and differing from it in certain points. On the difference of sound from noise, for example, al-Fârâbî had written: 'Musical sound is a simple noise, persisting during an appreciable time in the body in which it is produced.' Avicenna had proposed the definition: 'Sound is noise which has an appreciable duration and a certain pitch.' Şafi ed-Dîn, observing that noise also has pitch as well as duration, explained the difference thus: 'Noises have the character of sounds when it is possible to measure the relations between their respective pitches.' The Arabs, following the traditions of Pythagoras and Euclid, determined pitch from the length of a vibrating string. The other works of Şafi ed-Dîn include an Epistle on music (Paris; Vienna) and a treatise on rhythm, The Book of the Periods (Brit. Mus.). J. B. T.

SAFONOV, VASSILY ILICH (b. Itsyoursky, Terek, Northern Caucasus, Feb. 6—O.S. Jan. 25—1852; d. Mar. 1918), the son of a Cossack general living in the village of Itsyoursky, in the district of Terek in the northern Caucasus, on the banks of the romantic river Terek, sung by the poets Poushkin and Lermontov. His education was carried on at the Alexandrovsky Lycée in St. Petersburg, and during this time he took pianoforte lessons from Leschetizky. On completing his course in the above institution he decided to devote himself entirely to music, and entered the Conservatorium in 1878, where he became a pupil of Sieke and Zarembo for theory, and continued his pianoforte studies under Louis Brassin. He left the Conservatorium, a gold medallist, in 1880, and began his career as a pianist by a long tour in northern Europe, Austria and Hungary, in company with the famous violoncellist Carl Davidov. On his return he held a sub-professorship for a short time in the St. Petersburg Conservatorium, but was soon called to fill a more important post in the sister institution in Moscow. He eventually succeeded Taneiev as director of the Moscow Conservatorium in 1889. Here he did some admirable work in reorganisation; while his indomitable energy still found an outlet in teaching, and the orchestral, choral and ensemble classes remained under his personal supervision.

He first became known as a conductor in 1889, when he organised a series of local concerts at popular prices for the townsfolk, and in 1890 he was appointed to the Moscow branch of the Russian Musical Society in this capacity. Safonov first visited England in Feb. 1906, when he conducted one of the concerts of the London Symphony Orchestra. After a brilliant success in Vienna, he visited New York, where he was offered the conductorship of the Philharmonic Orchestra, and made his first appearance in that capacity on Mar. 5, 1904. He held this position till Mar. 1909. In October of that year he made his first appearance at an English provincial festival, conducting most of the concerts of the first Musical Festival held at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. Safonov was occasionally spoken of as 'the batonless conductor.' Having on one occasion forgotten to take it to a rehearsal, he became convinced that its use was unnecessary and resolved henceforward to direct his players by the movements of his hands alone. Far more important from the artistic point of view than this innovation are the great services he rendered to Russian music; particularly to that of Tchaikovsky, by his intimate and impressive readings of his symphonies. Safonov was not, however, merely a Slavonic specialist. His interpretations of Haydn, Beethoven and Brahms showed him to be a conductor of many sympathies, with a decided leaning to the classic.

The fact that he was once known as a pianist of exceptional ability is likely to be forgotten in the brilliant success of his later career, but he numbered among his pupils several artists who continued the traditions of his peculiarly finished and delicate style.

SAINT ANNE'S TUNE, a famous hymn tune,¹ first found in 'A Supplement to the New Version of the Psalms,' sixth edition, much enlarged, 1708. Dr. Croft's name is not mentioned in the work, but he is believed to have been the musical editor of this edition of the 'Supplement'; the name of the tune is probably derived from that of the parish, St. Anne's, Westminster, of which church he was then organist, and the tune itself is directly ascribed to him by his contemporaries,² viz. Philip Hart in 'Melodies proper to be sung to any of y^e Versions of y^e Psalms of David,' 1719, and John Church in his 'Introduction to Psalmody,' 1723. The tune appears in the 'Supplement' in the following form :

Psalm lxxiii. St. Anne's Tune.

A 2 voc.

Some doubt has been thrown on the authorship of the tune from its having been found in Abraham Barber's 'Book of Psalm Tunes,' a Yorkshire collection, of which the licence bears date Feb. 14, 1687, when Croft was but ten years of age. Here the tune appears under the name of 'Leeds,' and is ascribed to 'Mr. Denby,' whose name some editors of hymnals have too hastily substituted for that of Croft. The edition, however, of Barber's Psalms which contains the tune is the seventh, dated 1715, or seven years after the publication of the 'Supplement' already mentioned. This edition contains, besides tunes for canticles, psalms, etc., twenty-eight hymn tunes arranged in four parts, with the melody in the tenor. Of these tunes three only have a composer's name prefixed, and these three, which bear the names of northern towns ('Liverpool,' 'Hallifax' and 'Leeds'), are all ascribed to 'Mr. Denby.' It may be observed that while the melody of 'Leeds' is identical with that of St. Anne's in the 'Supplement,' the modulation at the end of the third strain is different.

² See Mus. T. 1900, p. 650, where the tune is given in facsimile and Croft's authorship discussed.

Leeds Tune.

MR. DENBY.

The supposition that 'Leeds' was originally in Barber's Psalm-book was disproved by the discovery of a copy of an early edition of the collection, which from the evidence of the preface appears to be either the third or fourth, and to have been published about 1696.³ The title-page is unfortunately missing. This volume, a smaller book than the edition of 1715, contains but twelve hymn tunes arranged in two parts, and neither the tune in question nor Denby's name occurs in it. Until, therefore, an edition of Barber's Psalms is found containing 'Leeds,' and of earlier date than 1708, Denby must be regarded as merely the author of a rearrangement of Croft's tune.

That some confusion existed respecting the authorship may perhaps be inferred from the fact that Dr. Miller, organist of Doncaster Parish Church, in his 'Psalms of David,' 1790, gives 'St. Ann's, Dr. Croft' on one page, and opposite to it 'Leeds, Denby,' in triple time and as a different tune. On the other hand, it may be noticed that in another Yorkshire collection, John and James Green's 'Collection of choice Psalm Tunes' (Sheffield, 3rd ed., 1715), St. Anne's tune is quoted under that name.

SAINT-AUBIN, (1) JEANNE CHARLOTTE SCHRÖDER (b. Paris, Dec. 9, 1764; d. there, Sept. 11, 1850), a remarkable opera singer. She was daughter of a theatrical manager, began to act as a mere child, and, when only 9 charmed Louis XV. by her precocious talent. In 1782 she married Saint-Aubin, an actor in Mlle. Montansier's company, and in 1786 made her first appearance at the Opéra in 'Colinette à la cour,' but perceiving that she was not qualified for so large a stage, had the good sense to transfer herself to the Comédie-Italienne. There her expressive face, graceful acting and good singing could be properly appreciated, and she speedily became a favourite. She sang romances with great charm, and became the acknowledged star of the company and its most profitable member.

At her farewell benefit (Apr. 2, 1808) she took the part of Mme. Belmont in this work, leaving Rosine, her own creation, to her second daughter, Alexandrine. Her modest pension of 1800 francs was increased by Louis XVIII. to 3000. She took her final farewell, assisted by her elder daughter, Mme. Duret, on Nov. 7, 1818, in 'Une heure de mariage,' and was as much applauded as ever.

Three of her children distinguished themselves; the son, (2) JEAN DENIS (b. Lyons, 1783; d. Paris, 1810), was a violinist and composer of great promise.

The elder daughter, (3) CÉCILE (b. Lyons, 1785), a pupil of Garat, made her début in 1805 at the Opéra-Comique in 'Le Concert interrompu,' but went back to the Conservatoire to study, and did not reappear till 1808. Under the name of Mme. Duret she rose for a short time to distinction as the favourite singer of Nicolo Isouard, who composed several important and difficult parts for her. Her best creations were in 'Le Billet de loterie' and 'Jeannot et Colin.' She retired in 1820.

Her sister, (4) ALEXANDRINE (b. Paris, 1793), made a brilliant début at the Théâtre Feydeau in 1809, and in the following year excited great enthusiasm in Isouard's 'Cendrillon.' This was, however, the only original part in which she distinguished herself, and on her marriage with an actor at the Vaudeville in 1812 she retired from the stage.

SAINT-GEORGES, JULES HENRI VERNON, MARQUIS DE (b. Paris, Nov. 7, 1801; d. there, Dec. 23, 1875)—not to be confounded with the notorious Chevalier de Saint-Georges (b. 1739; d. 1799)—writer of novels, and author of numerous librettos for operas and opéras-comiques, was the favourite collaborator of Halévy. Among his 120 librettos we need only specify those for Donizetti's 'Fille du régiment'; Adolphe Adam's 'La Marquise,' 'Cagliostro,' 'Le Bijou perdu,' operas; and 'Giselle,' 'La Jolie Fille de Gand' and 'Le Corsaire,' ballets; Auber's 'L'Ambassadrice,' 'Zanetta' and 'Les Diamants de la couronne,' with Scribe; Grisar's 'Lady Melvil,' 'Le Carillon de Bruges' and 'Les Amours du diable'; Clapisson's 'La Fanchonnette'; and Halévy's 'L'Eclair,' 'Les Mousquetaires de la reine,' 'Le Val d'Andorre,' 'La Fée aux roses,' 'Le Juif errant,' 'Le Nabab' and 'Jaguarita l'Indienne.'

From this list it will appear that Saint-Georges was the most prolific, as he was the ablest, of all French contemporary librettists. after Scribe.

SAINT-HUBERTY,¹ ANTOINETTE CÉCILE (b. Toul, c. 1756; d. Barnes, near Richmond, July 22, 1812), an eminent French operatic actress whose real surname was Clavel. Her father, who had previously served in the army, became stage manager to a French opera company at Mannheim, and afterwards at Warsaw, where she studied for four years with Lemoyne, conductor of the orchestra. Her first public appearance was in an opera of his, 'Le Bouquet de Colette.' She then went to Berlin, and is said to have been married there to a certain Chevalier de Croisy, of whom, however, nothing is heard in her subsequent history. For three years she sang at Strassburg as Mlle. Clavel, and thence went to Paris and made her début at the Opéra as 'un démon, un plaisir' in the first performance of Gluck's 'Armide' (Sept. 23, 1777). For a considerable time she only played in subordinate parts. Her first great success was as Angélique in Piccinni's 'Roland,' and was followed by others in Floquet's 'Le Seigneur Bienfaisant,' Gossec's 'Thésée' (Mar. 1, 1782) and Edelmänn's 'Ariane' (Sept. 24, 1782), all tragic parts; while as Rosette in Grétry's 'L'Embaras des richesses' (Nov. 26, 1782) she showed all the versatility and vivacity necessary for comedy. As Armide (in Sacchini's 'Renaud'), in 'Didon,' 'Chimène,' 'Les Danaïdes,' 'Alceste' and 'Phédre' she had a succession of triumphs. 'Didon,' Piccinni's masterpiece, made no impression till she undertook the title rôle, and the composer declared that, without her, his opera was 'without Dido.' On her first appearance in that part (Jan. 16, 1784) she was crowned upon the stage.

In 1785 she made a journey to Marseilles which resembled a royal progress, but on her return to Paris she found new rivals to dispute her sway. She failed, too, as Clytemnestra, a part altogether unsuited to her. It ended four years later by her marrying the Comte d'Entraigues, of strong royalist sympathies, in which she participated warmly. In 1790 he had emigrated to Lausanne, and there their marriage took place, at the end of that year. It was only acknowledged, however, in 1797, after the Count, imprisoned at Milan by Bonaparte, had been released by his wife, who found means of enabling him to escape and of preserving his portfolio, full of political papers. For this service she was rewarded by Louis XVIII. with the Order of St. Michel and, it seems, by her husband with the recognition of their marriage.

The Count afterwards entered the Russian diplomatic service and was employed on secret missions. The peace of Tilis changed his tactics. He possessed himself in some manner of a copy of the secret articles of the Treaty, and hastened with them to England to communicate them to the Government. For this he is said to have received a pension. He established himself, with his wife, at Barnes, near Richmond, where they were assassinated by their servant, who stabbed them as they were getting into their carriage, and blow out his own brains afterwards.

SAINT JAMES'S HALL CONCERT ROOMS (1858-1905) were erected, at the cost of a company with limited liability, from designs by Owen Jones. Messrs. Lucas were the builders.

The project was taken up by two of the music-publishing firms, Beale & Chappell of Regent Street, and Chappell & Co. of New Bond Street; and the company was formed mainly by them, and among their friends. T. F. Beale and W. Chappell became the tenants of the Crown for the land, holding it in trust for the company. The capital was fixed at £40,000, because the original estimate for the new building was £23,000 and the remainder was supposed to be an ample sum for compensations, working expenses, etc. It was then unknown that between Regent Street and Piccadilly was the ancient boundary of Thorney Island with its quicksand, but this was encountered in the course of the building, and had to be saturated with concrete at great cost, in order to make a sure foundation. Other demands raised the cost of the building to beyond £70,000. The great hall was opened to the public on Mar. 25, 1858, with a concert for the benefit of the Middlesex Hospital, given in presence of the Prince Consort.

The principal entrance to the great hall was originally from Regent Street, and that to the minor hall from Piccadilly. The dimensions of the great hall were 139 feet in length, 60 in height and 60 in breadth. It seated on the ground floor 1100; in the balcony 517; in the gallery 210; in the orchestra 300; total 2127. Under the platform end of the great hall was the minor hall, 60 feet by 57, having also a gallery, an orchestra and a small room. This was occupied for many years by the Christy (Moore & Burgess) Minstrels. Under the Regent Street end of the great hall was one of the dining-rooms, 60 feet by 60, and on the Regent Street level was another dining-room, 40 feet by 40, with a large banquetting-room on the floor above, etc.

In 1860 alterations and additions were made to the restaurant attached to the concert-rooms, at a further outlay of £5000. The company was eventually enabled to pay these charges, through the uncovenanted liberality of some of the directors in accepting personal responsibility to mortgagees and bankers, while they diminished the debt annually through the receipts of the hall. Many concerts were given for the express purpose of engaging the hall on off nights, especially the Monday Popular Concerts (see POPULAR CONCERTS), which were originally started by Chappell & Co. to bring together a new public to fill the hall on Monday nights. In 1874 three more houses in Piccadilly were purchased to add to the restaurant. The rebuilding of these entailed a further expenditure of £45,000, so that the total cost exceeded £120,000

W. C.

In much later days important alterations were made in the approaches to the hall, a fine marble staircase leading direct from the Piccadilly entrance. In spite of these, there was an element of danger from the presence of kitchens and the Christy Minstrels' hall below, and in spite of the beautiful acoustics of the great hall and its wonderful artistic associations, it was not wholly a misfortune when it was determined to pull it down and use the site for a hotel. The last concert took place on Feb. 11, 1905.

SAINT JOHN'S EVE, opera in one act; text by Eleanor Farjeon; music by MacKenzie. Produced (British National Opera Co.) Liverpool, Apr. 16, 1924.

SAINT-LAMBERT, MICHEL DE, lived in Paris at the end of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th centuries. Nothing is known of the life of this clavecinist. The name of Michel, even, is only given here in accordance with Fétis, and there is reason to believe that it may not have been his real Christian name.

As far as we can judge from his two didactic works published in the first years of the 18th century, Saint-Lambert appears to have been a competent professor of the clavecin, having a good method of teaching and a very open mind, more cultivated than the majority of musicians of that epoch. There is extant a set of well-turned verses written in praise of Marchand, which appears at the beginning of the 2nd volume of Marchand's clavecin pieces, who must have been among his friends.

He enunciates in his Principes the first rules of music, and his method of playing the clavecin is remarkably apt and well directed. His chapter on 'Ornaments' will be specially useful to modern clavecinists. He relies in this exposition on the only three French masters whose books of pieces existed in his time: Chambonnières, Le Bègue and d'Anglebert. He also makes use of the organ pieces of Nivers, and does not hesitate to vary some of the ornaments, or even to invent them anew, like that which he calls 'aspiration,'

Written. Played.

 and which has nothing in common with the ornament of the same name invented by Couperin.

His Traité de l'accompagnement is also remarkably clear. The harmonic theory of the period is set out more simply than it is by d'Andrieu. But because of the accuracy of his commentaries Saint-Lambert remains as valuable for historians of actual music as he was for the students of accompaniment in his own day. His two sagacious propositions of reform also show him to have been in advance of his time. One, explained in his Principes (and adopted by Montéclair), relates to the reduction of the number of clefs, of which several had become useless and worrying to teach. Saint-Lambert proposed to reduce them to three, placing always the same note on each line of the staff but in different octaves. This simplification of clefs was realised little by little in practice, with less logic, and it is permissible to regret it. The other proposition, which he expounds in the preface to his Traité, passed rapidly into practice. Saint-Lambert noticed that, in his time, the usual sharps and flats of the minor tones always included a flat less than they ought to hold. He declares (and he offers an example in his book) that 'tout ton qui a le mode mineur a la sixième de sa finale essentiellement mineure.'

and that he would

'mettre le bémol à la clef, et non pas dans le courant de l'air comme accidentel, ainsi qu'il se pratique ordinairement; ce qui est une erreur considérable qui n'a pas été reconnue jusqu'à présent.'

Italian translations of some works exist in MS. in the library of the Liceo Musicale at Bologna. Fétis thinks that these were only second editions; that the first of the Principes would be dated 1697, and of the Traité, 1680. No example can be shown to bear these dates, and Fétis's assertion would appear to be contradicted by many passages in Saint-Lambert's prefaces.

SAINT-LÉON, (1) CHARLES VICTOR ARTHUR (real name MICHEL) (b. Paris, Apr. 17, 1821; d. there, Sept. 2 or 5, 1870), violinist, composer, dancer and French choregraphist, son of a ballet-master at the Theatre Royal of Stuttgart. He was a pupil of Paganini and Mayesder, making his début at the age of 14 at Munich as dancer and violinist. He toured from 1838, and gave a performance in Italy of 'La Vivandière et le postillon' (1843), when he danced with Fanny Cerrito, whom he married in 1845 at Paris. He made his first appearance at the Paris Opéra in 1846, and gave there performances of 'La Fille de marbre,' which he danced with his wife (Oct. 20, 1847), 'La Vivandière' (Oct. 20, 1848), 'Le Violon du diable,' ballet fantastique, which he played on the violin (Jan. 19, 1849), 'Stella' (Feb. 22, 1850) (the music of all these by Pugnî), 'Pâquerette' (libretto by Théophile Gautier, music by Benoit, Jan. 15, 1851), 'Les Nations' (ode by Théodore de Banville, music by Ad. Adam for the delegates of the Great Exhibition in London). He appeared later, as author, violinist and dancer, at the Théâtre-Lyrique in 'Le Lutin de la vallée' (Jan. 22, 1853), 'Le Danseur du roi' (Oct. 22, 1853; music by Eug. Gautier). He reappeared at the Opéra in 1853, travelled in England, Germany (1853), Russia (1854, 1864), and directed the dancing at the Royal Theatre at Lisbon. From 1864-1870 he again directed, at the Paris Opéra, the following ballets of Minkous and Delibes, in which it is said he collaborated in the music: 'Némée' (1864), 'La Source' (1866), 'Coppélia' (1870). Marie Louise, Archduchess of Parma, created Saint-Léon chamber violinist in 1844.

He was an artist of unusual intelligence, speaking fluently several languages. H. Quittard said of him: Saint-Léon, 'a contribué à rendre les pas de ballet moins solennels peut-être, mais plus vivants et plus pittoresques qu'ils ne l'étaient avant lui.'

His wife, (2) FRANCESCA (called FANNY) CERRITO (b. Naples, Mar. 11, 1821; still living in 1895), known as 'quatrième Grâce,' an Italian dancer, made her début at the San Carlo Theatre in 1835, appeared in Rome, Florence, Turin, Milan (1838), Vienna (1838-1840), London (1840-45) and Paris, where she took the leading parts in her husband's ballets. Her success in London was considerable: she danced a pas de quatre with Marie Taglioni, Carlotta Grisi and Lucie Graban, reappearing to make herself a name beside those dance celebrities of the 19th century. Having separated from her husband about 1850, she was re-engaged at the Opéra in 1852, leaving it the following year. She lived from that time in Paris. In 1854 she collaborated with Théophile Gautier in the ballet 'Gemma' (music by Count Gabrielli), in which she also danced.

SAINTON, PROSPER PHILIPPE CATHERINE (b. Toulouse, June 5, 1813; d. Oct. 17, 1890), an eminent violin-player whose father was a merchant at Toulouse. He received his education at the College of Toulouse and was destined for the law, but in Dec. 1831 he entered the Conservatoire at Paris and studied the violin under Habeneck, taking the first prize in 1834. For two years after this he was a member of the orchestra of the Société des Concerts, and the Opéra; and then made an extended tour through Italy, Germany, Russia, Finland, Sweden, Denmark and Spain, with great success. In 1840 he was appointed professor of the violin in the Conservatoire of his native city. In 1844 he made his first visit to England, and played at the Philharmonic on June 10 and July 8 of that memorable season, under the baton of Mendelssohn. The following year he returned, was appointed professor at the R.A.M., and settled in London. He took the first and second violin alternately with Sivori, Ernst, Molique and Vieuxtemps, at the performances of Beethoven's quartets at the house of ALSAGER (q.v.) in 1845 and 1846, which resulted in the 'Beethoven Quartet Society.' He was also a constant leader at the performances of the Musical Union, the Quartet Association, the Monday Popular Concerts, etc. etc. On the establishment of the Royal Italian Opera at Covent Garden, Apr. 6, 1847, Sain-ton became leader of the orchestra, a post which he held until 1871, when he accompanied Sir Michael Costa to the rival house and remained there till 1880. He was leader of the Philharmonic band from 1846-54 inclusive, and of the Sacred Harmonic Society from 1848, conducting the performances of the latter society in the absence of his chief, as he did those of the Opera. He was also for many years leader of the Birmingham Festivals and other provincial musical performances. From 1848-55 he was conductor of the State band and violin solo to the Queen, resigning the post of his own accord. At the opening of the International Exhibition of 1862 Sain-ton conducted the performance of Sterndale Bennett's Ode (to Tennyson's words), and was presented by the composer with the autograph of the work as a token of his gratitude and consideration. Among the many pupils whom he formed during his long career as professor of the violin at the R.A.M. may be mentioned H. Weist-Hill, F. Amor, A. C. Mackenzie, A. Burnett, Gabrielle Vaillant, W. Sutton. His works comprise two concertos for the violin with orchestra; a solo do concert; a rondo mazurka; three romances; several airs with variations; and numerous fantasias on operas. In 1860 Sain-ton married Miss Dolby (see SAINTON-DOLBY). His farewell concert took place at the Albert Hall on June 25, 1883. G.

SAINTON-DOLBY, CHARLOTTE HELEN (b. London, May 17, 1821; d. there, Feb. 18, 1885), contralto singer.

Her earliest instructress was a Mrs. Montague, from whom she received pianoforte lessons. On the death of her father Miss Dolby determined to adopt the musical profession, and in Jan. 1834 entered the R.A.M., where she first studied under J. Bennett and Elliott, and then under Crivelli. In 1837 she was elected a King's Scholar. She remained at the Academy for three years. She made her first appearance at the Philharmonic in a quartet, June 14, 1841, and in a solo, Apr. 14, 1842. In the winter of 1845-46 Mendelssohn, who had been delighted by her singing in 'St.

Paul,' obtained for her an engagement at the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig, where her first appearance took place Oct. 25, 1845, and on Dec. 6 she sang in a duet with Jenny Lind. About this time Mendelssohn dedicated to her his Six Songs¹ (op. 57), besides writing the contralto music in 'Elijah' with the special view to her singing it. Her success in Leipzig was followed by several concert tours in France and Holland, in both of which countries Miss Dolby established her reputation as a singer of the first rank. In 1860 she married Prosper SAINTON (q.v.), and ten years later she retired from public life. In 1872 Mme. Sain-ton opened her Vocal Academy, at which she successfully trained many excellent artists in the admirable school of pure vocalisation, of which she was herself so distinguished an example. Mme. Fanny Moody was her most eminent pupil. Mme. Sain-ton also appeared before the world as a composer. Her cantatas 'The Legend of St. Dorothea' and 'The Story of the Faithful Soul,' produced respectively at St. James's Hall on June 14, 1876, and Steinway Hall on June 19, 1879, have been performed in the provinces and the colonies with unvaried success. A fairy cantata for female voices, 'Florimel,' was published after her death, which took place at 71 Gloucester Place, Hyde Park, London. She was buried at Highgate Cemetery, the great concourse of persons assembled testifying to the estimation in which the singer was held. The R.A.M. founded, shortly after her death, a scholarship in her memory. W. B. S.

SAINT-SAËNS, CHARLES CAMILLE (b. Paris, Oct. 9, 1835: d. Algiers, Dec. 16, 1921). His father (d. Dec. 1835) was of peasant origin, his mother of a bourgeois family. It was from her and from her great-aunt, Charlotte Maasson, that he received, during his earliest infancy, his first musical lessons. From the outset he displayed a great fondness for music, an uncommon ability in piano-playing, a sensitive ear, great musical memory and an unerring sense of pitch. Nature, indeed, was generous with him, endowing him not only with intellect and talent, but also with energy, buoyancy and an inexhaustible capacity for work. At the age of 7 he became a pupil of Stamaty for the piano, and of Pierre Maleden (himself a pupil of Gottfried Weber) for harmony. At that time he had already begun to compose; and in 1840 he performed before an audience, with the Belgian violinist Bessems, one of Beethoven's violin sonatas. In 1846 he gave his first piano recital at the Salle Pleyel; in 1848 he entered Eugène Benoit's organ class at the Paris Conservatoire, in which he obtained the second prize the following year and the first in 1851, after which he passed into Halévy's composition class. It was at this period that he first met Liszt, whose music was to exercise so great an influence upon him.

In 1852 he entered the competition for the Prix de Rome, but without success. The same year his 'Ode à Sainte Cécile' won the first prize at a competition opened by the Société Sainte-Cécile of Paris. This work was performed in Dec. 1852 and again in 1854.

In 1853 he was appointed organist of the Church Saint Merry; he occupied this post until Dec. 1857, when he was appointed organist of the Madeleine. His first symphony (published in 1855) was performed by the Société Sainte-Cécile in 1853, and again in 1856 and 1857.

In 1856 he wrote his second symphony for a competition opened by the Société Sainte-Cécile of Bordeaux. This work took the first prize, and was performed at Paris the following February. In 1861 he was appointed piano professor at the École Niedermeyer. He held this post four years. This was the only period of his life devoted to teaching. Fauré, Gigout and Messager were among his pupils.

During all this early period of his career he composed sedulously and achieved fame as a virtuoso. His playing was, and always remained, remarkable for purity, perspicuity and ease; the only qualities not displayed by him were poetic intensity and fervour.

Soon his ambition to write for the theatre began to assert itself. But he found no encouragement with directors. So he resolved again to compete for the Prix de Rome (1864), but failed a second time in the attempt. Soon afterwards Auber persuaded Carvalho, the director of the Théâtre Lyrique, to try him with a libretto. And so he wrote (1864-65) his first opera, 'Le Timbre d'argent,' which was to be produced only in 1877—the year when the most popular of his dramatic works, 'Samson et Dalila,' was first performed at Weimar.

His early operas, beginning with 'La Princesse Jaune' (Paris, 1872), were not very successful at the outset. Even 'Samson et Dalila' was rejected by the Paris directors—a fate shared by his 'Étienne Marcel' (produced at Lyons, 1879).

He had sowed the seed of suspicion through enlisting among the champions of modern art. In 1871, to protest against the almost universal antipathy evinced towards living French composers—and especially those who wrote instrumental music—he joined Romain Bussine as a founder of the Société Nationale de Musique, whose object was to produce new works of the French school.

Despite the hostility manifested in certain quarters, he was not long in finding recognition as a writer of instrumental music. His four symphonic poems, in which he skillfully followed Liszt's lead without imitating him slavishly ('Le Rouet d'Omphale,' 1871; 'Phaëton,' 1873; 'La Danse macabre,' 1874; 'La Jeunesse d'Hercule,' 1877); his chamber music (quintet, 1858; first trio, 1863; piano quartet, 1875), confirmed the favourable impression created by his early symphonies and his first religious compositions—among which is the Mass op. 4, written in 1856. Other works of special interest from the point of view of form are the concertos, and especially the piano concertos, of which Saint-Saëns wrote five: the first was first performed at Leipzig in 1865; the second at Paris, Rubinstein conducting, in 1868; the third at Leipzig (Gewandhaus) in 1869; the fourth at Paris (Concerts Colonne) in 1875; and the fifth at Paris in 1896, at a special concert commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of the composer's début. On all these occasions the composer played the piano part himself.

The first performance of the first violin concerto took place at Paris in 1873 (soloist, Sarasate); that of the second violin concerto in the same city, 1880 (soloist, Marsick); that of the violoncello concerto in 1873 (Paris Conservatoire; soloist, Tolbecq).

Indeed, from the middle 'sixties onwards, his career was one of almost uninterrupted progress and success. In 1871 he visited London for the first time, giving organ recitals at the Albert Hall; in 1875 he began a series of triumphant tours, visiting, among other countries, Russia and Austria. As early as 1868 he had received the order of the Legion of Honour, the first of the many official distinctions, French and foreign, which came to him in the course of his career. In 1881 he was elected a member of the French Institut, and thenceforward all the Paris theatres were opened to his works. 'Henri VIII' was produced at the Opéra in 1883. Then came 'Proserpine' (Opéra-Comique, 1887); 'Ascanio' (Opéra, 1890); 'Les Barbares' (Opéra, 1901); 'Parysatis' (Béziers, 1902); 'Hélène' (Monte Carlo, 1905); 'L'Anacréon' (Monte Carlo, 1906); 'Déjanire' (Opéra, 1911). In 1892 he received the honorary degree of Mus.D. from the University of Cambridge.

He left hardly any branch of musical art untouched. The catalogue of his output comprises piano and organ music, symphonic and chamber music of all descriptions, cantatas, oratorios, songs and choral works, incidental music, operettas, operas, a ballet, transcriptions and arrangements. He was the general editor of Rameau's complete works published by Durand, Paris; he also edited the score of Gluck's 'Écho et Narcisse,' and Marc Antoine Charpentier's incidental music to Molière's Le Malade imaginaire.

He was fond of dabbling in literature and science. He wrote a book of poems, a few farces, and various papers on scientific topics. Part of his many essays on music and the theatre appeared in book form (Harmonie et mélodie, 1885; Portraits et souvenirs, 1899).

His place among French composers of his time was from the outset unique in several respects; and unique it remained, after a fashion, until the end of his long and active career. His greatest merit is to have been a pioneer of progress and a champion of instrumental music at a moment when musical France stood in great need of the influence which he exerted so powerfully. With Berlioz, Gounod and Lalo he stands out as a promoter of the wonderful revival of French music; and when further headway was made under the influence of Franck, Fauré and Chabrier, his influence continued to carry weight, although it ceased to predominate as it had done during the first stages of the revival.

No composer played so great a part in the formation and towards the recognition of the modern French school of symphony: for his music set high standards in form, style and workmanship; his output was abundant and regular; his combative activity was uncompromising and tireless. But although—sharing the fate of the other leaders of the French school—he was often denounced as an anarchist, he was essentially classical and moderate in tastes and tendencies. This idiosyncrasy accounts for the curious fact that he gradually passed from the leadership of the progressive party to that of the conservative. He remained strictly faithful to his ideals, and was at the close of his career exactly what he was at the outset. As early as 1874 he foretold (in the Nouvelle Revue) that a new and fertile era was opening for music, following upon the breaking-up of the major-minor tonal system; but although since then French music progressed exactly as he had foretold, he became more and more dissatisfied with the way in which things were moving around him, and was wont to express his hostility most forcibly. He exercised a sound moderating influence at a time when Wagner's music was threatening to sweep many French composers and a great fraction of the French public off their feet. He stood for the maintenance of French measure and French perspicuity. As early as 1888 one of his admirers, Hughes Imbert, described him as 'holding his own among the independent and intelligent spirits who did not fear to confront new ideas, but were not daring enough to attempt capital reforms.' Later,

Romain Rolland (in Musiciens d'aujourd'hui) wrote:

'He is tormented by no passions, and nothing perturbs the lucidity of his mind. At times, his music seems to carry us back to Mendelssohn, to Spontini, to the school of Gluck. He brings into the midst of our present restlessness something of the sweetness and clarity of past periods, something that seems like fragments of a vanished world.'

So far as regards skill and technical knowledge, Saint-Saëns ranks remarkably high. His command of orchestration is supreme; and the same may be said of his sense of form—exemplified at its best in the symphonic poems and in the third symphony (first performed at the Royal Philharmonic Society in May 1886), his instrumental masterpiece. It has often been remarked that his music is more brilliant than moving, and characterised by a certain coldness; and that he remained indifferent to the quality of his ideas. Indeed, his imagination asserts itself far more in the treatment of his materials than in actual invention. It is perhaps chiefly for this reason that only a small proportion of his big output survives. M. D. C.

SALA, NICOLA (b. near Benevento, Naples, 1701; d. 1800), was brought up in the Conservatorio della Pietà de' Turchini under Fago, Abos and Leo. He devoted the whole of a long life to his Conservatorio, in which he succeeded Fago as second master about 1764, and Cafaro in 1787, as first master. The great work to which all his energies were devoted was his Regole del contrappunto pratico in three large volumes, containing methodical instruction in the composition of fugues, canons, etc., which was published in 1794. During the disturbances in Italy the engraved plates vanished for a time and were supposed to be lost. Choron then reprinted the work (Paris, 1808), but the plates were afterwards discovered. Both editions are in the R.C.M. Sala wrote little besides this work. Three operas, 'Vologeso,' 1737; 'Zenobia,' 1761; and 'Merope,' 1769; an oratorio, 'Giuditta,' 1780; three 'Prologues' on the births of kings of Naples; a Mass, a Litany and a few smaller pieces are mentioned by Florimo (Cenno storico, p. 562). g.

SALAMAN, CHARLES KENSINGTON ¹ (b. London, Mar. 3, 1814; d. there, June 23, 1901), began music early—violin, PF. and composition. In 1824 he became a student of the R.A.M., but soon left it and studied under Charles Neate, the friend of Beethoven. He made his first public appearance at Blackheath, in 1828, as a PF.-player; then went to Paris and took lessons of Herz, and in the following summer returned to London and began teaching, playing and writing.

In 1830 he played a 'rondeau brillant' of his own in London, and composed an ode for the Shakespeare commemoration, which was performed at Stratford-on-Avon, Apr. 23, and was repeated in London. From 1833–37 he gave annual orchestral concerts in London, at one of which he played Mendelssohn's G minor concerto for the third time in England—the former two performances having been by the composer himself. In 1835 he instituted, with Henry Blagrove and others, the Concerti da Camera. He was an associate of the Philharmonic Society from 1837–55. In 1840, 1847 and 1848 he resided at Rome, and while conducting Beethoven's symphony No. 2 (for the first time in Rome), the concert was interrupted by the news of Louis Philippe's flight from Paris. He was made a member of the Academy of St. Cecilia in 1847. He founded an amateur choral society in London in 1849. On Mar. 18, 1850, he played at the Philharmonic. In 1855 he began a series of lectures on the history of the pianoforte and other musical subjects, which he continued both in London and the country for several years. In 1858 he was one of the founders of the MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON, and acted as its honorary secretary until 1865. He was one of the founders of the MUSICAL ASSOCIATION, and its secretary until 1877. Besides the popular 'I arise from dreams of thee,' he composed many songs, some to Hebrew, Greek and Latin words; psalms (the 84th, 29th); anthems, choral works, in Hebrew for the service of the synagogue, and various PF. pieces. He contributed to various musical journals. An interesting obituary notice appeared in Mus. T., 1901, p. 530. Addns. from that article and from Brit. Mus. Biog. G.

SALBINGER (SALBLINGER; in 1548 he signs his name 'Salmingor'), SIGISMUND, an early 16th-century Franciscan monk of Munich. He left his order, married and went with his wife to Augsburg c. 1526-27, and joined the moderate anabaptists, but was forced, by imprisonment and torture, to recant in 1530. He was driven out of Augsburg in 1531, but later was allowed to return, and in 1537 he was schoolmaster and afterwards also town musician. In 1544 he started a bookshop, and in 1561-62 was in the service of the Fuggers. He published the first complete metric German version of the Psalms (1537), and also several collective volumes, containing in all 210 songs by various important masters (1540-49).

SALE (SOLE), FRANCISCUS (d. Prague, ? 1599), a Belgian (?) musician; Kapellmeister (magister chori) of the Austrian Princess Magdalena at Hall-on-the-Inn, 1589; singer in the Imperial Chapel at Prague under Phil. de Monte, 1593. He composed 1 book of 5-6 part masses (1589), motets, canzonets, songs to the Virgin Mary and other church music. (See list in Q.-L.; also Riemann.)

SALE, (1) JOHN (b. Gainsborough, Mar. 19, 1734; d. Oct. 2, 1802), was admitted in 1766 a lay-clerk of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and held that post until his death.

His son, (2) JOHN (b. London, 1758; d. Westminster, Nov. 11, 1827), was in 1767 admitted a chorister of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and Eton College under William Webb, and so continued until 1775. In 1777 he obtained a lay-clerk's place in both choirs. On July 12, 1788, he was admitted a gentleman of the Chapel Royal in the room of Nicholas Lade or Ladd; in 1794 he succeeded John Soaper as vicar-choral of St. Paul's; and in 1796 John Hindle as lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey. At Christmas 1796 he resigned his appointments at Windsor and Eton. In 1800 he succeeded Richard Bellamy as almoner and master of the choristers of St. Paul's. On Jan. 14, 1812, he was appointed successor to Samuel Webbe as secretary to the Catch Club, and soon afterwards resigned his places of almoner and master of the choristers of St. Paul's. He was also conductor of the Glee Club. He possessed a rich, full and mellow-toned bass voice, and sang with distinct articulation and energetic expression. He was for thirty years a principal singer at the Concerts of Ancient Music and other leading concerts in London, and at various provincial festivals. He composed several glees (published in 1800), and some which were included, with glees by Lord Mornington and other composers, in collections published by him. He left two sons, viz.:

(3) JOHN BERNARD (b. Windsor, June 24, 1779; d. Westminster, Sept. 16, 1856) was admitted a chorister of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and Eton College in 1785. He was in the chorus of the Ancient Concerts in 1792, and in 1794 was principal soprano at the Three Choirs Festival at Hereford. In 1800 he succeeded Richard Bellamy as lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey; on Jan. 19, 1803, was admitted a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, in the place of Samuel Champness, and in 1806, on the death of Richard Guise, obtained a second lay-vicar's place at Westminster Abbey.¹ On Mar. 30, 1809, he succeeded Michael Rock as organist of St. Margaret's, Westminster. About 1826 he was appointed musical instructor to the Princess Victoria. In 1838 he was admitted organist of the Chapel Royal on the death of Attwood. His voice was a powerful bass, and his style of singing refined; he excelled in anthems, glees and other part-music. He was for many years principal second bass at the Concerts of Ancient Music. He long enjoyed a high reputation as a teacher of singing and the pianoforte. His compositions were few, consisting only of some chants, psalm tunes, Kyries, glees, songs and duets. One of his duets, 'The Butterfly,' was long in favour. In 1837 he published a collection of psalm and hymn tunes, chants, etc., with a concise system of chanting. Of his three daughters, MARY ANNE and SOPHIA (d. May 3, 1869) were organists and teachers of music. The youngest, LAURA, was the wife of William John Thoms, the antiquary, and originator of Notes and Queries.

The other son, (4) GEORGE CHARLES (b. Windsor, 1796; d. Jan. 23, 1869), was admitted a chorister of St. Paul's under his father in 1803. He afterwards became a skilful organist; in 1817 succeeded Dr. Busby as organist of St. Mary, Newington, and in 1826 was appointed organist of St. George's, Hanover Square.

SALES, PIETRO POMPEO (b. Brescia, 1729; d. Hanau, 1797). An earthquake in his native town drove him to Germany, where he held appointments at various courts, being in the service of the Bishop of Augsburg in 1763, whence he went to Padua to produce one of his operas. He returned, however, to Augsburg, as in 1765 he still calls himself Kapellmeister of the Prince-Bishop of Augsburg. After this he visited England, but returned to Germany in 1768, and became Kapellmeister and court councillor of the Elector at Coblenz, where he still was in 1778, and where Burney met him in 1772. There he produced a number of operas which were performed in Germany as well as in London, where in 1776 he appeared also as a virtuoso on the viola da gamba (Pohl, ii. 374). In 1797 he fled before the invading French to Hanau, where he died soon after. He composed operas, oratorios, church music, symphonies and concertos and a sonata for PF. His wife was an excellent opera singer (Riemann; Q.-L.).

SALÉZA, ALBERT (b. Bruges, Basses-Pyrénées, Oct. 18, 1867), operatic tenor. He studied at Paris Conservatoire with Bax and Obin, and carried off the 1st prize for singing and 2nd prize for opera in 1888. He made a successful début the same year at the Opéra-Comique as Mylio in 'Le Roi d'Ys,' and remained until engaged for the Opéra, appearing there Jan. 1, 1892. In the following May he created the chief tenor rôle in Reyer's 'Salammbô'; and in 1894 that of Otello, when Verdi's opera was first given in Paris; besides singing the Cid, Siegmund, Sigurd, Roméo, etc. At Nice he also sustained the leading parts in Berlioz's 'Prise de Troie' and Salvayre's 'Richard III.' His début at Covent Garden took place in 1898, when he sang Roméo to the Juliette of Miss Suzanne Adams (also a débutante) and won an immediate success. His singing was marked by admirable taste and dramatic feeling; his clear, strong tone filled the theatre; and he proved himself a capital actor. His impersonation closely resembled that of Jean de Reszke, whose stage career was then drawing to an end. He was also a good Faust, and created here the rôle of the hero in Mancinelli's opera, 'Ero e Leandro.' He sang at Covent Garden until 1902 and for a few seasons at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. H. K.

SALICIONAL (SALICET), a soft-toned organ-stop of a reedy quality. The pipes are of a very small scale. The mouth is also much more 'cut up' than that of a diapason pipe. The origin of the word Salicet is plain; to this day country boys make toy wind-instruments out of 'withy'; but withy is also called 'sally,' and 'sally' is salix, a willow. In some counties a willow is called (by combining both names) a 'sally-withy.' A Salicet is therefore a stop made to imitate a rustic 'willow-pipe.' The introduction of the Salicional or Salicet was later than that of the Dulciana (said to have been invented by Snetzler), and it must be considered merely as a variety of that stop. It is of 8 ft. or unison pitch. J. S.

SALICOLA, MARGHERITA, a distinguished opera singer, was at the court of Mantua in 1685. The Elector of Saxony, who heard her at Venice, abducted her, and took her to Dresden, as one of the first female singers on the German operatic stage. In 1693 she sang at Vienna.

SALIERI, ANTONIO (b. Legnago, Veronese territory, Aug. 19, 1750; d. Vienna, May 7, 1825), court Kapellmeister at Vienna, son of a wealthy merchant. He learnt music early from his brother Franz, a pupil of Tartini. After the death of his parents a member of the Mocenigo family took him to Venice, where he continued his studies, and made the acquaintance of Gassmann, composer and late Kapellmeister to the Emperor, who became much interested in him, and took him to Vienna in June 1766. Here Gassmann continued his fatherly care, provided his protégé with teachers, and himself instructed him in composition, made him acquainted with Metastasio, and introduced him to the Emperor Joseph, whose chamber concerts he henceforth attended, and often took an active part in. While Gassmann was in Rome, composing an opera for the Carnival of 1770, Salieri conducted the rehearsals for him, and composed his own first comic opera, 'Le donne letterate,' which received the approval of Gluck and Calzabigi, and was performed with success at the Burg-theater. On Gassmann's death in 1774 Salieri returned his paternal kindness by doing all in his power for the family, and educating the two daughters as opera singers. In the same year the Emperor appointed him court composer, and on Bonno's death in 1788 he became court Kapellmeister. He was also a director of the opera for twenty-four years, till 1790, when he resigned, and out of compliment to him the post was given to his pupil Weigl. In 1778 Salieri was in Italy, and composed five operas for Venice, Milan and Rome. For the Emperor's newly founded National Singspiel he wrote 'Der Rauefangkehrer' (1781), and for a fête at Schönbrunn 'Prima la musica, poi le parole' (1786).¹ When the Académie de Musique in Paris requested Gluck to suggest a composer who could supply them with a French opera in which his own principles should be carried out, he proposed Salieri, who accordingly received the libretto of 'Les Danaïdes' from Moline, worked at it under Gluck's supervision, and personally superintended its production in Paris (Apr. 26, 1784).² He was entrusted with librettos for two more operas, and returned with a great increase of fame to Vienna, where he composed an opera buffa, 'La grotto di Trofonio' (Oct. 12, 1785), the best of its kind and one of his finest works, which had an extraordinary success, and was engraved by Artaria. In 1787 he again visited Paris, where the first of his operas, 'Les Horaces,' had failed (Dec. 7, 1786), owing to a variety of untoward circumstances, a failure amply retrieved, however, by the brilliant success of 'Axur, Re d'Ormus' (June 8, 1787), or 'Tarare,' as it was first called. This, which has remained his most important work, was first performed in Vienna, Jan. 8, 1788. Another work composed in Vienna for Paris was a cantata, 'Le Dernier Jugement'¹ (libretto by Chevalier Roger), ordered by the Société d'Apollon, and performed there and at the Concert Spirituel with great applause from the connoisseurs. In 1801 Salieri went to Trieste to conduct an opera composed for the opening of a new opera-house. This was his last Italian opera, and 'Die Neger' (Vienna, 1804) his last German one, for owing to his dislike to the change of taste in dramatic music, he devoted himself chiefly to church music, composing also a few instrumental pieces, choruses, and canons in various parts, published as 'Scherzi armonici.' On June 16, 1816, he celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the beginning of his career in Vienna, when he was decorated with the gold 'Civil-Ehrenmedaille' and chain, and honoured by a fête, at which were performed special compositions by each of his pupils, including Schubert.² Salieri was also vice-president of the Tonkünstler Societät, and till 1818 conducted nearly all the concerts. For the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation (1796) he composed a cantata 'La Riconoscenza,' and for the fiftieth (1821) a part-song, 'Zu Ehren Joseph Haydn,' to whom the society was largely indebted. Salieri was also a generous contributor to the funds. He took great interest in the foundation of the Conservatorium (1817), and wrote a singing-method for the pupils. He lost his only son in 1805, and his wife in 1807, and never recovered his spirits afterwards. On June 14, 1824, after fifty years of service at court, he was allowed to retire on his full salary.

His biographer, Edler von Mosel,³ describes him as a methodical, active, religious-minded, benevolent, and peculiarly grateful man, easily irritated, but as quickly pacified. We have seen how he discharged his obligations to Gassmann. He gave gratuitous instruction and substantial aid of various kinds to many poor musicians, and to the library of the Tonkünstler Societät he bequeathed forty-one scores in his own handwriting (thirty-four operas, and seven cantatas), now in the Hofbibliothek. In accordance with his own wish his Requiem was performed after his death at the Italian church. He remained throughout on cordial terms with Haydn, whose two great oratorios he often conducted, and Beethoven dedicated to him in 1799 three sonatas for PF. and violin, op. 12. Nottebohm⁴ has printed ten Italian vocal pieces, submitted by Beethoven to Salieri, with the corrections of the latter. These chiefly concern the arrangement of the notes to the words, so as to conform to the rules of Italian prosody, and produce the best effect. The pieces are undated, but internal evidence fixes them to the period between 1793 and 1802. It appears that as late as 1809 the great composer consulted his old adviser as to the arrangement of his Italian, probably in the 'Four Ariettas and Duet' of op. 82; and that even then, when Beethoven was so fiercely independent of all other musicians, their relations were such that he voluntarily styled himself 'Salieri's pupil.'⁵ As regards Mozart, Salieri cannot escape censure, for though the accusation of having been the cause of his death has been long ago disproved, it is more than possible that he was not displeased at the removal of so formidable a rival. At any rate, though he had it in his power to influence the Emperor in Mozart's favour, he not only neglected to do so, but even intrigued against him, as Mozart himself relates in a letter to his friend Ruchberg.⁶ After his death, however, Salieri befriended his son, and gave him a testimonial, which secured him his first appointment.

His works were too much in accordance with the taste, albeit the best taste, of the day to survive. He drew up a catalogue of them in 1818. They comprise five Masses, a Requiem, three Te Deums, and several smaller church works; four oratorios (including 'La Passione di Gesù Cristo,' performed by the Tonkünstler Societät in 1777); one French, three Italian, and two German cantatas, and five patriotic part-songs; several instrumental pieces; two operas to French, and thirty-seven to Italian words; one German Singspiel, three German operas, and numerous vocal pieces for one or more voices, choruses, canons, fragments of operas, etc. (See Q.-L. for detailed list.)

SALIMBENE, FRA, a Minorite friar, of Parma, who began his life early in the 13th century, and seems to have lived through the greater part of the same century (achieving a good deal of distinction in his order), and whose extremely curious Cronaca or Diary throws considerable interesting side-light on musical affairs in his time. He was a skilled and passionate music-lover. He gives us our accounts of two or three distinguished Franciscan composers and singers of his day, including the once-famous Fra Enrico da Pisa, and Fra Vita da Lucca, who were in great demand during their careers. The Cronaca was found in the Vatican Library in the middle of the 19th century. SALINAS, FRANCISCO DE (b. Burgos, Mar. 1, 1513; d. Salamanca, Jan. 13, 1590), a writer on the theory of music, professor at the University of Salamanca and friend of the poet Luis de León. Salinas was the first Spanish musician to write down folk-songs as they were sung in his own time.

² The autograph of Schubert's Cantata—both words and music by him—was sold by auction in Paris, May 14, 1861.

He was the son of Juan de Salinas, a Treasury official under the Emperor Charles V.; and losing his sight at the age of 10, he was dedicated by his parents to the study of music. Having attained a certain proficiency on the organ, he gave music lessons in exchange for instruction in grammar, and then passed to the University of Salamanca, where he became a familiar of the Archbishop, Don Pedro Sarmiento. This prelate took him first to Santiago, and then on becoming a cardinal brought him to Rome (1538). Salinas became acquainted with the lutenist Francesco da Milano (author of numerous books in tablature published at Venice and elsewhere between 1536 and 1563); the composer he admired most was Orlando Lasso. In 1558 he was organist in the private chapel of the Spanish Viceroy at Naples, which at that time was directed by Diego Ortiz (q.v.). The Viceroy (the great Duke of Alba) afterwards persuaded the Pope (Paul IV.) to confer on Salinas the benefice of the Abbey of San Panerazio in Rocca Scalegna. He returned to Salamanca in 1561, and was elected professor of music (1567) with the obligation to lecture for one hour daily on the theory and practice of the art; his retirement took place in 1587 when he had occupied the chair for 21½ years. He became acquainted with the poet Luis de León, who since 1561 had held one of the chairs of theology in the university. In 1573, giving evidence before the Inquisition, he deposed to having known Luis de León for at least six years, and admitted that the poet often came to his house and discoursed on philosophy, poetry and the arts. Salinas published De musica libri septem in 1577 (2nd ed. 1592). He takes up the position held by Zarlino in Le istituzioni harmoniche (1562); but the chief interest of his book lies in the number of Spanish popular songs, together with a few heard in Rome and Naples, with which he illustrated his chapters on music in relation to classical prosody. The importance of these was first pointed out by Burney,¹ who quoted several of them, while a hundred years later PEDRELL based some of his studies of Spanish musical folk-lore on these melodies. They include several old Spanish ballads and a number of popular songs, some of which relate to historical events. One of the finest tunes ('Yo me iba, mi madre') is found 200 years earlier in the 'Llibre vermell,' a MS. of pilgrims' songs from Montserrat. Another ('No me digays, madre') is the earliest known tune for the old Portuguese dance, the Foñas (q.v.). A third ('Rey don Alonso') was originally a Moorish song and dance, 'Qalbi bi qalbi, qalbi 'arabi' ('My heart, oh my heart, is the heart of an Arab'), frequently referred to in old Spanish literature; it is the first Arab tune to be noted in western musical notation. Salinas was famous as an organist; his playing has been immortalised by Luis de León in one of the finest poems in the Spanish language. (See M. and L., vol. viii. No. 1). J. B. T.

SALLANTIN, ANTOINE (b. Paris, 1754; d. there, after 1813), member of a numerous family of musicians, and a famous oboist. He was a pupil of J. Chr. Fischer in London, 1790–1792, and from 1794–1813 was oboe-teacher at the Paris Conservatoire. He did much to raise the standard of oboe-playing in France. A flute concerto which appeared under his name is probably by his son CHARLES (le jeune), an excellent flute-player (Fétis; Riemann; Q.-L.).

SALMON, (1) MRS. (maiden name, ELIZA MUNDAY) (b. Oxford, 1787; d. 33 King's Road East, Chelsea, June 5, 1849). Her mother's family had produced several good musicians; her uncle, William Mahon (b. 1753; d. Salisbury, May 2, 1816), was the best clarinettist of his day; her aunts, Mrs. Warton, Mrs. Ambrose and Mrs. Second, were capable singers.

She was a pupil of John Ashley, and made her first appearance at Covent Garden in the Lenten concerts given by him under the name of 'oratorios,' Mar. 4, 1803. On Feb. 11, 1806, she married James Salmon, and went to reside at Liverpool, where she became distinguished as a concert singer, occasionally appearing in London, and rapidly attaining the highest popularity. In 1812 she sang at the Gloucester Festival, and in 1815 at the Ancient Concerts. From that time to the close of her career her services were in constant request at nearly all the concerts, oratorios and festivals in town and country. Her voice was a pure soprano of the most beautiful quality, of extensive compass, very brilliant tone and extraordinary flexibility. She excelled in songs of agility. She unfortunately gave way to intemperance, which eventually occasioned derangement of the nervous system, and in 1825 she suddenly lost her voice. She married again, a clergyman named Hinde, who died leaving her totally destitute. A concert was given for her relief, June 24, 1840, which proved a complete failure. She gradually sank into a state of the greatest poverty; in 1845 an effort was made to raise a fund to purchase an annuity for her, but it was only partially successful. Her death was registered in the names of Eliza Salmon Hinde.

Her husband, (2) JAMES SALMON (d. West Indies), son of (3) JAMES SALMON (gentleman of the Chapel Royal, Nov. 30, 1789, vicar-choral of St. Paul's, and lay-clerk of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, d. 1827), received his early musical education as a chorister of St. George's, Windsor. In 1805 he was appointed organist of St. Peter's, Liverpool, and was in much esteem as a performer. In 1813, having fallen into embarrassed circumstances (by some attributed to his wife's extravagance, and by others to his own irregularities), he enlisted, and went with his regiment to the West Indies, where he died.

(4) WILLIAM (b. 1789; d. Windsor, Jan. 26, 1858), another son of James (3), was also a chorister of St. George's. He was admitted a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, May 28, 1817, and was also lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey and lay-clerk of St. George's, Windsor.

W. H. H.

SALMON, THOMAS (b. Hackney, Middlesex, June 24, 1648; d. Mepsal, Bedfordshire, July 1706), was on Apr. 8, 1664, admitted a commoner of Trinity College, Oxford. He took the degree of M.A. and became rector of Mepsal or Meppershall. In 1672 he published 'An Essay to the Advancement of Musick, by casting away the perplexity of different Cliffs, and uniting all sorts of Musick in one universal character.'

A quotation from the Essay will be found in the article SPINET.

Matthew LOCKE (q.v.) criticised the scheme with great asperity, and the author published a Vindication of it, to which Locke and others replied. In 1688 he wrote a book on Temperament, A Proposal to perform Music in Perfect and Mathematical Proportions; he lectured before the Royal Society on Just Intonation, in July 1705; and in the following December approached Sir Hans Sloane with a view of making researches into the Greek enharmonic music. He was buried at Mepsal, Aug. 1, 1706. For his non-musical works see D.N.B.

SALÒ, (1) GASPARO DA (b. circa 1542; d. Brescia, Apr. 14, 1609), a celebrated violin-maker of Brescia. The career of this maker rested entirely upon conjecture, until the keeper of the Brescian State Archives, Cavaliere Livi, undertook to investigate da Salò's life, and published the result of his researches in the Nuova antologia, on Aug. 16, 1891. The documentary evidence there quoted has proved Gasparo da Salò to have been a member of an artistic family; that his legitimate name was Gasparo di Bertolotti; that his grandfather was a lute-maker of Polepennazze, named Santino di Bertolotti; and that his father was a painter, Francesco di Bertolotti, who was apparently called 'Violino' by his intimate friends. Owing to the loss of certain requisite pages of the parish registers of Salò, the exact date of this violin-maker's birth is still unknown, but calculating by the income-tax returns of Brescia, which declare him to be 26 in 1568, and 45 in 1588, his birth locates itself with some degree of accuracy in the year 1542. It is supposed that da Salò learnt his art partly from his grandfather and partly from a Brescian viol-maker who stood sponsor to his son Francesco, named Girolamo Virchi. Whether Virchi was da Salò's master or not is merely surmise, but what is certain is that the great Brescian master's earliest efforts met with such small encouragement that he contemplated removing to France, but was turned from his purpose by a loan of 60 lire from a certain brother Gabriel of St. Pietro. This advance was apparently the turning-point in da Salò's career; it was the moment when hazardous venture gave place to definite aim. In 1568 da Salò was renting a house and shop in the Contrada del Palazzo Vecchio, Brescia, at £20 per annum. He then possessed the title of 'Magistro di violino,' and owned a stock of musical instruments which he valued at £60. In 1579 there is an added title of 'Magistro a cittari,' and in 1583 'Artifice d' instrumenti di Musica.' Five years later, 1588, and twenty after his first establishment in the Contrada del Palazzo Vecchio, he changed his residence to the Contrada Cocere, where he valued his stock of finished and unfinished violins at £200, and styled himself 'Magister instrumentorum musicæ.' In 1599 he bought a house in Brescia, in a street called St. Peter the Martyr; and between 1581 and 1607 owned some small properties about Calvagese, near Salò. Although all trace of the place of his interment is lost, it is known that he was buried at Santo Juseffo in Brescia. His wife's Christian name was Isabella (b. 1546).

G. da Salò's son, (2) FRANCESCO (b. Brescia, 1565; d. there, ? 1614), was married to Signorina Fior of Calvagese, near Salò, in his twenty-third year. He followed the fiddle-making profession during his father's lifetime, but ceased to do so after his death. It is probable that he sold his business to his father's pupil Paolo Maggini, and retired. In any case

Gasparo da Salò was one of the earliest makers of stringed instruments who employed the pattern of the violin as distinguished from that of the viol. His works are of a primitive pattern, more advanced than that of Zanetto and other old Brescian makers, but totally different from that of the contemporary Amati family. The model varies, being sometimes high, sometimes flat; the middle curves are shallow, and the sound-holes straight and angular. The wood is generally well chosen, and the thicknesses are correct; and the tone of the instrument, when of the flat model and in good preservation, peculiarly deep and penetrating. He made many instruments, especially basses, of pear wood as well as sycamore wood. His selection of timber was most careful; indeed, the remarkable regularity of the grain in the tables of his instruments bears evidence to this particular trait of the Brescian master. His varnish is principally deep yellow, and rich in tone, though some of his instruments are much darker in colour; in fact some are almost black, an effect doubtless due to age. The sound-holes are long, parallel and pointed in form, and in the gambas and violas still retain the more simple C shape; yet in spite of their length they are in perfect harmony with the form of the instrument. The purfling is usually single, and the general appearance of his work is bold, but not highly finished. His tickets run as follows: 'Gasparo da Salò: In Brescia,' and are undated.

The pattern of Gasparo da Salò was partially revived in the 18th century, owing no doubt to its great tone-producing capacity, by the celebrated Joseph GUARNERIUS (q.v.), and to a less extent by some of the French makers. As a maker of tenors and double-basses Gasparo da Salò has never had an equal, and his instruments of these classes are eagerly sought after. The objection to his tenors is their great size, but their effect in a quartet is unrivalled. Two remarkably fine specimens, formerly in the possession successively of Dr. Stewart of Wolverhampton, and of John Adam of Blackheath, came subsequently into the possession of J. A. Torrens Johnson. The most perfect specimen of a da Salò viola ever seen by the writer was the one which belonged to Edward Withers in 1884. This was a fine primitive instrument, and another perfect specimen was the property of Tyssen Amherst, an English amateur of celebrity. At the Special Loan Exhibition of Musical Instruments at the Fishmongers' Hall in 1904 there were three of da Salò's masterpieces. One was a viola of 1570, the property of E. A. Sandermann; another a viola da gamba of the same date, lent by W. E. Hill & Sons; and a third was a viol of 1565, belonging to F. Pengrie. (The dates quoted are according to the catalogue.) At the Victoria and Albert Museum there are two Gasparo da Salò viole da gamba. One is mounted with seven strings, an innovation attributed to Marais in the 17th century. The sound-holes are in the C form, the ribs curve into the neck in the true viol fashion, the wood of the belly is even in grain, and the varnish is brownish yellow. Its complete length is 4 feet, and it was bought at the sale of the Engel collection for £8. The other gamba by this maker is mounted for six strings. The neck terminates in a well-carved grotesque head of an old woman; the wood of the table is even in grain; the sound-holes are in the C form; the varnish is slightly darker than the instrument mentioned above. The finger-board is ornamented with ivory and tortoise-shell, and bound with catgut frets. The purfling is in one single broad line. It is labelled within 'Gasparo da Salò: In Brescia.' The length measures 3 feet 9 inches, and it was bought at the sale of the Engel collection for £10. The well-known violin-maker, August Reichers of Berlin, possessed a small-sized violoncello by this maker in 1894 (probably a cut-down bass), and Dragonetti possessed three or four double-basses by da Salò. The most celebrated of these instruments was presented to him by the monks of the monastery of St. Marco, Venice, about the year 1776, and was returned to the donors after his death. It would appear that this bass has disappeared. Another of Dragonetti's basses was bequeathed by him to the Duke of Leinster, and a third was in the possession of the Rev. G. Leigh Blake in 1875. In the same year John Hart owned a Gasparo da Salò bass (small size) in an exceptional state of preservation.

The most renowned instrument of this maker is the violin which was made by him to the order of the Cardinal Aldobrandini, a noble patron of the fine arts in Rome, who paid da Salò 3000 Neapolitan ducats for his work, and presented it to the treasury of Innsbruck, where it was preserved as a curiosity. The head of this curious violin is said to have been carved by Benvenuto Cellini; it represents an angel's face carved and coloured, surrounded by flowing locks of hair. Behind this there leans a little mermaid, the human form of which terminates in scales of green and gold. The tail-piece is another mermaid, in bronze colour, and the finger-board is ornamented with arabesques in blue and gold; while the bridge is delicately carved in the form of two intertwining fish, similar to the zodiacal sign of the month of February. The belly is made of an exceedingly rare species of Swiss pine, which grows on the Italian side of the Swiss Alps, and is even-grained. When Innsbruck was taken by the French in 1809, this violin was carried to Vienna and sold to a wealthy Bohemian amateur named Rahaczek, who was a well-known collector. Ole Bull saw it at Rahaczek's house during a visit to Vienna in 1839, and tried to persuade his host to part with it, but this he refused to do. However, after his death Rahaczek's sons offered it to Bull at a price, and he purchased it from them in the year 1841. At the death of Ole Bull this violin became the property of an American amateur resident in the United States. Gasparo's violins, which are mostly of small size, are not in request for practical purposes.

Fétis, in A. Stradivari (1864), mentions a very remarkable violin of da Salò which was sold at Milan in 1807; and that Baron de Bagge also possessed one in the year 1788, of which Rudolph Kreutzer spoke with admiration. Another violin he states to be in the possession of T. Forster, an English amateur, and the owner of a numerous collection of violins, which bore the inscription 'Gasparo da Salò: In Brescia, 1613,' but either the ticket or instrument was doubtless counterfeit. On Apr. 21, 1907, commemorative tablets in honour of Gasparo da Salò and G. P. Maggini were placed in the façade of the church of San Giuseppe, and of a house near the Palazzo Vecchio, at Brescia.

SALOMÉ, 'drama' in one act, founded on the French play by Oscar Wilde; German version by Frau Hedwig Lachmann; music by Richard Strauss. Produced Dresden, Dec. 9, 1905; Théâtre du Châtelet, Paris, in German, May 8, 1907 (it had previously been given in Brussels, in French); Covent Garden, Dec. 8, 1910; New York, Metropolitan Opera House, 1907. 'Salomé' was the title under which Massenet's, 'HÉRODIADE' (q.v.) was given in London.

SALOMÉ, THÉODORE CÉSAR (b. Paris, Jan. 20, 1834; d. Saint Germain-en-Laye, July 1896), received his education at the Conservatoire, where he obtained various prizes for harmony, counterpoint and organ, and gained the second Prix de Rome in 1861. For many years he was organist of the small organ in the church of the Trinité, in 1872-73 taught solfège in the Conservatoire, and was maître de chapelle at the Lycée Saint-Louis, etc. He wrote various organ pieces which became popular, and several interesting orchestral works, performed by the Société Nationale in 1877.

SALOMON, JOHANN PETER (b. Bonn,¹ 1745; d. London, Nov. 25, 1815), a name inseparably connected with that of Haydn, early became an expert violinist, and in 1758 was admitted into the orchestra of the Elector Clement August. In 1766 he made a concert tour to Frankfurt and Berlin; and Prince Henry of Prussia, who had an orchestra and a small French opera company at Rheinsberg, made him his Konzertmeister, and composer of operettas. He had already shown his appreciation for Haydn by introducing his symphonies whenever he could. On the prince's sudden dismissal of his band, Salomon went to Paris, where he was well received, but being so near London he determined to go on there, and on Mar. 23, 1781, made his first appearance at Covent Garden Theatre. The pieces on this occasion were Mason's 'Elfrida,' set to music by Dr. Arne, and Collins's 'Ode on the Passions,' with soli and choruses by Dr. Arnold, both of which he led, besides playing a solo in the middle. From this time he frequently appeared at concerts as soloist, quartet-player (violin and viola) and conductor. He quarrelled with the directors of the Professional Concerts, soon after their foundation, and thenceforward took an independent line. During Mara's first season in London, in 1784, he conducted and played solos at all her concerts. In 1786 he gave a series of subscription concerts at the Hanover Square Rooms, and produced symphonies by Haydn and Mozart. From that time he contented himself with an annual benefit concert, but acted as leader at others, both in London, as at the Academy of Ancient Music in 1789, and elsewhere, as at the Oxford Commemoration, Winchester and Dublin. A grand chorus composed by him in honour of the King's recovery, performed by the New Musical Fund in 1789, and repeated at his own concert, was his one successful vocal piece. He removed in 1790 to No. 18 Great Pulteney Street, in which house Haydn stayed with him in the following year. The two had long been in correspondence, Salomon endeavouring in vain to secure the great composer for a series of concerts; but as he was at Cologne on his way from Italy, where he had been to engage singers for the Italian Opera, he saw in the papers the death of Prince Esterhazy, hurried to Vienna, and carried Haydn back in triumph with him to London. Haydn's two visits to England in 1791 and 1794 were the most brilliant part of Salomon's career as an artist, and after the return of the former to Vienna the two continued the best of friends. It was at Salomon's suggestion that Haydn undertook to write 'The Creation.' Salomon's most important composition was an opera, 'Windsor Castle,' composed for the Prince of Wales's wedding, Apr. 8, 1795. In 1796 Salomon resumed his concerts, at which he was assisted by Mara, the young tenor Braham, and his own promising pupil Pinto. On Apr. 21, 1800, he produced Haydn's 'Creation' at the King's Theatre, though not for the first time in England, as he had been forestalled by John Ashley (Covent Garden, Mar. 28). Salomon's active career closes with the foundation of the Philharmonic Society, in which he took a great interest, playing in a quintet by Boccherini, and leading the orchestra, at the first concert in the Argyll Rooms, Mar. 8, 1813. Up to the last he was busy planning an Academy of Music with his friend Ayrton. A fall from his horse caused a long illness, from which he died at his house, No. 70 Newman Street. He was buried Dec. 2, 1815, in the south cloister of Westminster Abbey. He bequeathed his house to the Munchs of Bonn, his next of kin; £200 to F. Ries, for the benefit of his brother Hubert; and his Stradivarius violin (said to have belonged to Corelli, and to have his name upon it) to Sir Patrick Blake, Bart., of Bury St. Edmunds.¹

Salomon was, on the whole, a first-rate solo-player, but his special field was the quartet, in which he showed himself a solid and intelligent musician. Haydn's last quartets were composed especially to suit his style of playing.

He was a man of much cultivation, and moved in distinguished society. Bland published an engraving of him by Facius from Hardy's picture. Another portrait by Lansdale was sent by Salomon himself to the Museum at Bonn. A pencil drawing by Dance is in the R.C.M. His best epitaph is contained in a letter from Beethoven to his pupil Ries in London (Feb. 28, 1816): 'Salomon's death grieves me much, for he was a noble man, and I remember him ever since I was a child.'² C. SALTARELLO (SALTARELLA) (Latin saltare, to jump).

(1) In 16th-century collections of dance tunes the melodies usually consist of two distinct divisions, the first of which is written in common time, the second in 3 time. The former was probably danced like our English country-dances (i.e. the dancers standing in two lines facing each other) and bore the distinguishing name of the dance, while the latter was like the modern round dance and was variously entitled Nachtanz, Propertio, Hoppeltanz or Saltarello, the first three being the German and the last the Italian names for the same movement. Thus in Bernhard Schmidt's Tabulaturluch (Strassburg, 1577) are found the following dances: 'Possomezzo Comun' with 'Il suo saltarello'; 'Ein guter Hofdantz' with 'Nachdantz'; 'Alemando novello: Ein guter neuer Dantz' with 'Propertio darauf,' and 'Ein guter neuer Dantz'.

with 'Hoppeldantz darauf.' Similarly in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book (i. 306) there is an elaborate 'Galiarda Passamezzo' by Peter Philips (dated 1592) which consists of ten 8-bar 'divisions,' the ninth of which is entitled 'Saltarella.' The Saltarello, or Propertio, was always founded on the air of the first part of the dance, played in triple time with a strong accent on the first beat of the bar. The manner in which this was done will be seen by examining the following example, from the second book of Caroso da Sermoneta's 'Nobiltà di dame' (Venice, 1600). It is part of a balletto, 'Laura Soave,' the second part of which (a Gagliarda) and the last forty bars of the Saltarello are not printed here for want of space.

(2) A popular Roman dance, in 3-4 or 6-8 time, danced by one or two persons, generally a man and a woman, the latter of whom holds up her apron throughout the dance. The step is quick and hopping, and the dance gradually increases in rapidity as the dancers move round in a semicircle, incessantly changing their position, and moving their arms as violently as their legs. The music is generally in the minor, and is played on a guitar or mandoline, with tambourine accompaniment. The finale to Mendelssohn's Italian symphony contains two Saltarello themes, in each of which the jumping or hopping step is very apparent. In contrast to these is a Tarantella, used as a third subject, a continuous flow of even triplets. W. B. S.

SALTZMAN-STEVENSON, MINNIE (b. Bloomington, Ill., U.S.A., 1878), operatic soprano. She sang first as a contralto in Chicago churches, then studied four years with Jean de Reszke in Paris (1905-09). Her début as Brünnhilde in 'Die Walküre' at Covent Garden, in Jan. 1909, was her first appearance on the stage, this being a special winter season of one month, consisting mainly of Wagner revivals conducted by Hans Richter. She sang the same part in the remaining sections of the 'Ring,' and in all alike created a highly satisfactory impression by her intelligence of gesture and declamation and the general smoothness and finish of her singing. Her voice proved to be of sympathetic quality, and of adequate power and range for the requirements of these rôles. Later she sang here in English as well as German, and was also heard to advantage as Isolde (1911) and Sieglinde (1912). After her initial success in London she was engaged for Bayreuth and appeared there for two seasons as Kundry and Sieglinde. After further experience at Berlin, Frankfurt and Brussels she returned to her native land and joined the Chicago Opera Company, with which she sang from 1911-14.

SALVAYRE, GERVAIS BERNARD, called GASTON (b. Toulouse, Haute-Garonne, June 24, 1847; d. St. Ague, Toulouse, May 16, 1916), was brought by Ambroise Thomas to the Paris Conservatoire, where he studied the organ with Benoist, and composition and fugue with Thomas and Bazin. He gained the first prize for organ in 1868, and competed for the Prix de Rome every year from 1867-72, gaining it at last by sheer force of perseverance. Many of his compositions date from this time, notably his opera of 'Le Bravo,' and his sacred symphony in four movements, 'Le Jugement dernier,' of which the first two movements were performed at the Concerts du Châtelet, Mar. 19, 1876. It was given in its entirety at the same concerts on Dec. 3, 1876, under the title of 'La Résurrection,' and again, under a third title, 'La Vallée de Josaphat,' at Lamoureux's concert on Apr. 7, 1882. The remaining works written by Salvayre for the concert-room are an 'Ouverture symphonique,' performed on his return from Rome at the Concerts Populaires, Mar. 22, 1874; a Stabat Mater (1876), given under the Administration des Beux-Arts (performed in London, Apr. 23, 1879, at one of Mme. Viard-Louis's concerts); a setting of Ps. cxiii. for soli, chorus and orchestra; and an air and variations for strings, performed in 1877, all the last given as the fruits of his residence in Italy. On his return to Paris he was appointed chorus-master at the Opéra Populaire which it had been attempted to establish at the Théâtre du Châtelet, and he then wrote ballet music for Grisar's 'Amours du Diable,' revived at this theatre Nov. 18, 1874. Three years later he made his real début with his grand opera, 'Le Bravo' (Théâtre-Lyrique, Apr. 18, 1877), a noisy and empty composition. His little ballet 'Fandango' (Opéra, Nov. 26, 1877), in which he made use of some highly characteristic Spanish melodies, was a decided advance in point of instrumentation; but his grand opera, 'Richard III.,' performed at St. Petersburg, Dec. 21, 1883, was a dead failure, and 'Egmont,' produced at the Opéra-Comique, Dec. 6, 1886, was only performed a few times. Salvayre was commissioned to set to music Dumas's drama 'La Dame de Monsoreau,' a subject little fitted for musical treatment. It was produced at the Opéra, Jan. 30, 1888, and was wholly unsuccessful. 'Solange' was produced at the Opéra-Comique, Mar. 10, 1909. Salvayre was decorated with the Légion d'honneur in July 1880. He was musical critic to Gil Blas. A. J.

SALVE REGINA, one of the most celebrated Latin antiphons. It does not belong to the classical Gregorian plain-song, but both words and music were written in the 11th century. They have been ascribed to various authors, but are with greatest probability assigned to Hermann Contractus (1013-54), the crippled monk of St. Gall and Reichenau, composer and writer on musical theory and practice. Originally an independent antiphon, this was afterwards assigned a special place of its own and became one of the antiphons of the Blessed Virgin sung after Compline. The music opens thus—and continues in pure Dorian classical style. In this respect it is unlike the companion antiphon Alma Redemptoris mater, also attributed to Hermann, which shows signs of modern or popular tonality from the very start.

The Salve Regina, text and music, became speedily popular. The words were the subject of sets of sermons by the end of the century, and soon St. Bernard and others still more widely established their popularity. In some rites the antiphon was admitted into the Office itself on one of the festivals of the Blessed Virgin; it was then naturally associated with the First Tone. In the present Roman Breviary the text has been altered, and many incorrect forms of the music prevail. Apart from the plain-song setting the words have frequently been set in the motet style by Palestrina and others. These antiphons of the Blessed Virgin were among the earliest texts to be set in 'prick-song,' partly because elaboration was especially connected with such services, and partly because the antiphon at the close of Compline, being extra-liturgical, gave scope for polyphonic treatment, and in fact was among the first to develop into an 'anthem' in the modern sense of the word. Their popularity has survived down to the present time, and many composers great and small have set the Salve Regina, the Alma Redemptoris, the Regina coeli, etc. W. H. F.

SALZILLI, CRESCENTINO, an early 17th century Neapolitan composer of three books of madrigals and three books of canzonets, published at Naples between 1607 and 1616.

SAMARA, SPIRO (b. Corfu, Nov. 29, 1861; d. Athens, Apr. 1917), the son of a Greek father and an English mother, began his musical education at Athens under Enrico Stancampiano, a former pupil of Mercadante, and afterwards studied at the Paris Conservatoire, where his principal master was Léo Delibes. An introduction to the publisher Sonzogno led to the production of his first opera, 'Flora mirabilis,' which was given at the Teatro Carcano, Milan, May 16, 1886. 'Flora mirabilis,' which was written to a fantastic libretto by Ferdinando Fontana on a subject possibly suggested by the scene of the flower-maidens in the recently produced 'Parsifal,' was a kind of compromise between opera, ballet and spectacle. The legendary atmosphere of the tale appealed strongly to the young composer's imagination, and his music, though unequal, showed remarkable promise. Unfortunately that promise was never redeemed. 'Flora mirabilis,' after a brief period of popularity, dropped into oblivion, and none of Samara's subsequent operas has won anything like permanent success. 'Medgé' (Rome, 1888), a revised edition of an opera written before the production of 'Flora mirabilis,' was followed by 'Lionella' (Milan, 1891). 'La Martire' (Naples, 1894) won a certain measure of success owing to the clever if somewhat brutal treatment of certain realistic scenes, notably that of a café-concert, and still more from the remarkably powerful performance of Mme. Bellincioni in the part of the heroine, but the sheer musical value of 'La Martire' was very small. Samara's next two works, 'La furia domata' (Milan, 1895), an operatic version of Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew, and 'Storia d'amore' (Milan, 1903), were completely unsuccessful, but 'Madoiselle de Belle-Isle' (Genoa, 1905) was more favourably received. Subsequent productions were 'Rhea' (Florence, 1908) and 'La guerra in tempo di guerra' (Athens, 1914).

SAMAROFF, OLGA (b. San Antonio, Tex., U.S.A., Aug. 8, 1882), American pianist of distinction (née HICKENLOOPER). The first American of her sex to be admitted to piano classes at the Paris Conservatoire, she obtained most of her musical education at that institution, later studying with Ernest Hutcheson, and with Jedliczka in Berlin. Her début was made in 1905, with the New York Symphony Society under Walter Damrosch. Since then she has made numerous and extensive tours in America and Europe, and has appeared as soloist with most of the leading orchestras of those continents. In 1911 she married Leopold STOKOWSKI; they were divorced 12 years later. w. s. s.

SAMMARCO, MARIO (b. Palermo, 1873), operatic baritone, was taught singing at Palermo by Antonio Cantelli, made his first appearance at the Dal Verme Theatre, Milan, in Puccini's opera 'Le Villi,' and soon established his position. He came to London in 1904 with a high reputation, and his first appearance as Scarpia in 'Tosca,' Oct. 19, at Covent Garden, proved that report had not exaggerated his merits. He displayed a beautiful baritone voice, high in range—easily reaching g'—rich and sweet throughout its compass and under perfect control. He sang annually at Covent Garden till 1914, was engaged by Hammerstein for the Manhattan Opera House in New York in the winter of 1907, and returned to the same theatre in the two following years. In the autumn season at Covent Garden in 1907 he played Don Giovanni for the first time on any stage. He could not look the part and lacked distinction of manner, but he sang Mozart's music with great fluency and finish. His favourite characters, according to his own statement, are Rigoletto, Don Giovanni, Falstaff (which he has never sung in London), Iago and Tonio ('Pagliacci'). Sammarco has sung in many modern operas, among them the 'Andrea Chénier' of Giordano, 'Germania' of Franchetti, 'La Zaza' of Leoncavallo, and Saint-Saëns's 'Henry VIII.' At various times he has appeared in Moscow, St. Petersburg, Naples, Madrid and Buenos Ayres.

SAMMARTINI, (1) GIUSEPPE (GIOSEFFE) (b. Milan, c. 1693; d. circa 1750), a musician whose works, with those of his brother, were in great vogue in England during the first half of the 18th century. He came to England, according to Burney,¹ in 1723, and according to Hawkins in 1729. Quantz heard him in Milan in 1726, and he published 12 sonatas in London, Oct. 26, 1727.² He was well received by Bononcini. Dr. Greene and others, and was by the influence of the first-named appointed as oboe-player at the Opera. With Arrigoni he gave some concerts at Hickford's Room in 1732.³ His performance on the instrument surpassed all that had been before heard, and raised it to a great importance. It was thought that much of the fine quality he obtained was by a secret method of manipulating the reed before its insertion. Sammartini, having left the Opera, was patronised by Frederick Prince of Wales and his wife, holding in their household the position of musical director of the Chamber Concerts. The precise date of his death is uncertain. Burney³ records his performance at Hickford's Room as late as 1744. Sammartini composed many sets of sonatas for flutes and for violins.

To distinguish him from his brother he is frequently named in contemporary references 'St. Martini of London,' his brother being 'of Milan.' His first publication was a set of sonatas for two flutes, issued in 1738. The sale of these being slow he destroyed the plates and the unsold copies, though they were afterwards reissued by Johnson of Cheapside. In the same year six concerti grossi were published. His next work, dedicated to the Princess of Wales, was twelve sonatas for the violin (Walsh, c. 1740). Others issued by Simpson are: 'Six Concertos for violins, etc., in 7 parts,' eight overtures, six more concerti grossi, harpsichord concertos, 'Six Solos for a German flute,' and 'Six Sonatas for two German flutes or violins.' Scattered pieces by him are often found in collections of airs ('Martini's Minuet' being long a favourite), but it is difficult to distinguish them from work by his brother or from that of many other musicians who bore the same surname. (See Q.-L.)

(2) GIOVANNI BATTISTA (b. Milan, 1700/01; d. there, Jan. 15, 1775¹), his younger brother, remained in Italy, and became a prolific composer both for instruments and voices. J. Simpson of London published (1744) of his works 'Six Sonatas for two violins and a bass,' and Burney² says that between 1740 and 1770, in which latter year he saw him in Milan, he produced for the violin 'an incredible number of spirited and agreeable compositions,' and in 1770 'he was maestro di cappella to more than half the churches in the city, for which he furnished masses upon all the great festivals.' Many motets, etc., and a great number of concertos, symphonies, overtures, trios, sonatas, etc., are mentioned in Q.-L. F. K., addns.

SAMMONS, ALBERT EDWARD (b. London, Feb. 23, 1886), violinist, a pupil of his father, an amateur musician. He had a few desultory lessons from John Saunders and Frederick Weist-Hill. He must mainly be considered as a self-taught artist, yet can command a fine, apparently effortless technique which places him among the most capable of living violinists.

Happening to attract the attention of Sir Thomas Beecham, who heard him play the Mendelssohn concerto at the Waldorf Hotel (1908), he received an engagement as leader of the Beecham orchestra, a post he retained for five years, during which he took part in some fifty operas and ballets.

His early successes as a soloist included appearances at a Patron's Fund Concert at Queen's Hall (Max Bruch concerto), at the Harrogate Symphony Concert (Mendelssohn), and at the Philharmonic Society, of which he became leader, making a favourable impression by his playing of the solo in Strauss's 'Heldenleben.' In 1912 he played before the King in the Saint-Saëns concerto, the composer being present.

He toured in Germany in the spring of 1913 with the Russian ballet under Montoux, passing the summer season of the same year at the Dieppe casino, where he had some useful experience in concerto-playing. Later he won great distinction in London and the provinces by his interpretation of the Elgar concerto, a work singularly suited to his temperament and mentality, and also by his competent quartet leading. He was for nine years leader of the LONDON STRING QUARTET (q.v.), playing in first performances of works by Schönberg, Goossens, Waldo Warner, McEwen, Ethel Smythe and others. He also introduced several new works at a series of sonata recitals given in conjunction with William Murdoch (pianist).

He has edited the Delius concerto and partly rewritten the violin part. His own compositions include a Phantasy quartet for strings (Cobbett prize), several violin soli and books of studies.

At a Cobbett competition among British violin-makers, held at the Æolian Hall on Feb. 19, 1923, he played behind a screen upon a new violin by Alfred Vincent against a Strad, the former, upon which he now habitually plays, gaining the suffrage of the audience. W. W. C.

SAMPSON, RICHARD, LL.D. (b. circa 1470; d. Ecclestone, Sept. 25, 1554), English ecclesiastic and composer of church music. He was appointed proctor at Tournay in 1517, and Dean of St. Stephen's, Westminster, 1520. Two years later he became a canon of St. Paul's Cathedral, and was later appointed Dean of the Chapel Royal. He was holding this latter post when, in 1533, he became Dean of Lichfield. On Feb. 20, 1536, during Dean Pace's illness, Cromwell made him Vice-Dean of St. Paul's, and in May of that year, when Pace died, he succeeded him as Dean. A few months after this he became Bishop of Chichester. He was deprived of his deanery of the Chapel Royal, but on Mar. 3, 1543, he was promoted by Henry VIII. to the see of Lichfield and Coventry.³

Like his predecessor at St. Paul's, Sampson was a musician (for details of Pace's musical activities see PYGOTT and REYNOLD). Two motets by Sampson, 'Quam pulchra es, amica,' a 5, and 'Psallite felices protecti culmine rose purpuree,' a 4, are in the Roy. Lib. B.M. 11 E x1/11b. The latter is a long setting of a Latin song in honour of Henry VIII. There

SAMSON, oratorio by Handel; words compiled by Newburgh Hamilton from Milton's 'Samson Agonistes,' 'Hymn on the Nativity' and 'Lines on a Solemn Musick.' The autograph of the work is in the Roy. Lib. B.M., and contains the following dates: End of first part, 'Sept. 29, 1741'; end of second part, '○ (i.e. Sunday) Oct. 11, 1741'; end of chorus 'Glorious hero,' 'Fine dell' Oratorio,' S.D.G., London, G. F. Handel, 11 (i.e. Thursday) Oct. 29, 1741'; then the words 'Fine dell' oratorio' have been struck out, and 'Come, come,' 'Let the bright,' and 'Let their celestial' added, with a note at end, 'S.D.G.—G. F. Handel, Oct. 12, 1742.' Produced Covent Garden, Lent, 1743; revived by the Sacred Harmonic Society, Nov. 14, 1838. G.

SAMSON ET DALILA, opera in 3 acts, text by Ferdinand Lemaire, music by Saint-Saëns; produced Weimar under Liszt, Dec. 2, 1877; Rouen, 1890; Covent Garden (in concert form), Sept. 25, 1893; as opera, Covent Garden, Apr. 26, 1909; in English, Theatre Royal, Dublin (Moody-Manners Co.), Jan. 11, 1910.

SAMUEL, HAROLD (b. London, May 23, 1879), a pianist who has made a special study of Bach, was educated at the R.C.M. under Dannreuther and Stanford. His playing of the major works of Bach early attracted the attention of musicians, but it was not until 1921, when he gave a week of daily concerts of Bach in London, that his powers were appreciated by a wider public. He has since given several such weeks, and has toured with success in America. He is a musician of wide sympathies, and his interpretative gifts have been shown in the playing of compositions of many schools and times. C.

SANCES, GIOVANNI FELICE (b. Rome, c. 1600; d. Vienna, Nov. 24, 1679), one of the first who used the word 'cantata' for vocal compositions in several parts for a solo voice. He entered the Imperial Chapel, Vienna, as tenor singer in 1637, became vice-Kapellmeister, Oct. 1, 1649, and Kapellmeister, Oct. 1, 1669. He was a prolific composer who wrote so much that J. J. Fux wrote to the Emperor in 1715: 'The greater part of the chapel is still filled with his compositions.' Among these were: 3 operas, 4 oratorios, 4 books of 'Cantate a voce sola,' 'Capricci poetici' and 'Trattenimenti musicali per camera' (I.M.G. xv. 116; Q.-L.; Riemann).

SANCTUS. The angelic hymn based on Isaiah vi. 3 and St. Matt. xxi. 9, sung in all Liturgies at the beginning of the Anaphora or central section of the service. In the Latin rite it is introduced by the Preface, sung by the celebrant, while the hymn itself is sung by the clergy and congregation, or by the choir, according to later usage. The original setting was in the simplest style of recitative like that of the Preface. Later plain-song settings were more elaborate (see PLAIN-SONG, p. 201).

Various specimens survive of the setting of the Sanctus in prick-song. The first stage here, as elsewhere, was the setting of an Organum or free voice part against the plain-song, as in the following instance from the latter part of the Sanctus:

The original may be seen in facsimile in Early English Harmony (Plain-song Soc.), pl. xl. It belongs to the 14th century. This was but a step on the way to developed polyphony. Another Sanctus in three parts written by John Benet in the first half of the 15th century is given at pp. 51, 52 of the same volume, and this may be cited as marking an intermediate stage on the way to the great masters of the 16th century. (See MASS.) W. H. F.

SANDBERGER, ADOLF (b. Würzburg, Dec. 19, 1864), has achieved most important work in musical research and has also been an assiduous composer.

After prolonged study in the principal cities of Europe, he became curator of the musical department of the State Library at Munich and teacher of musical science at the University of Munich in 1894, becoming professor of the University in 1900. His most important work has been as editor of the Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Bayern (see DENKMÄLER). He has written much on general musical subjects, his work ranging from Leben und Werke des Dichtermusikers Peter Cornelius, to Beiträge zur Geschichte der bayrischen Hofkapelle unter Orlando di Lasso. He is editor of the complete edition of the works of Lasso. C.

SANDERSON, JAMES (b. Worthington, Durham, 1769; d. circa 1841), had from early childhood a passion for music, and, without the assistance of masters, so qualified himself that in 1783 he was engaged as violinist at the Sunderland Theatre. In 1784 he went to Shields as a teacher of the violin and pianoforte, and met with much success. In 1787 he was engaged as leader at the Newcastle-upon-Tyne Theatre, and in 1788 at Astley's Amphitheatre. In 1789 he made his first attempt at dramatic composition by writing instrumental interludes to illustrate the several parts of Collins's 'Ode on the Passions,' which the eminent tragedian, George Frederick Cooke, was to recite on his benefit night at Chester. His next work was 'Harlequin in Ireland' at Astley's in 1792. In 1793 he was engaged at the Royal Circus, afterwards the Surrey Theatre, as composer and music director, a post which he retained for many years. His principal productions during that period were 'Blackbeard,' 1798; 'Cora,' 1799; 'Sir Francis Drake,' 1800 (in which was the song, 'Bound 'prentice to a waterman,' which became so great a favourite with stage representatives of British sailors that it was constantly introduced into pieces in which a seaman formed one of the characters for fully half a century), and 'Hallowe'en.' His 'Angling Duet,' originally composed for 'The Magic Pipe,' a pantomime produced at the Adelphi, also enjoyed a long popularity. He composed many pieces for the violin. W. H. H.

In these pantomimes and operas he was associated with J. C. Cross, who wrote most of the words and contrived the scenic effects. The song 'Gin a body meet a body' is claimed by Chappell as originally appearing in one of these productions, 'Harlequin Mariner,' 1795-96, but the air is found in print in Scottish collections long before this, and there is sufficient evidence to show that Cross and Sanderson had merely adapted the song to London requirements. F. K.

SANDERSON, SIBYL (b. Sacramento, California, Dec. 7, 1865; d. Paris, May 16, 1903), American dramatic soprano, chiefly associated with the operas of Massenet. Educated in San Francisco, at the age of 19 she entered the Paris Conservatoire and there studied under Sbriglia and Mme. Marchesi. She made her début in the title-rôle of Massenet's 'Manon' at The Hague in 1888. Massenet, much impressed by her voice with its range of three octaves, wrote for her 'Eclairmonde' and later 'Thaïs'; in the former she made her first appearance in Paris, at the Opéra-Comique, in 1889. Although she also sang in Brussels, St. Petersburg, Moscow, London and New York, her popularity was chiefly confined to Paris. Massenet in his memoirs called her an 'ideal' Manon and an 'unforgettable' Thaïs. W. S. S.

author of Christmastide, its History, Festivities and Carols, with twelve carol tunes, 1852; and joint author with Simon Andrew Forster of The History of the Violin and other Instruments played on with the Bow. . . . Also an Account of the Principal Makers, English and Foreign, 1864. W. H. H.

SANTA MARIA, FR. THOMAS DE (b. Madrid; d. 1580). Spanish organist and Dominican monk. In 1565 he published

SANTI, FATHER ANGELO DE (b. Trieste, July 12, 1847), Italian ecclesiastic and writer, entered young the Jesuit Order, his knowledge of music being almost entirely the fruit of self-education. He graduated in letters at Innsbruck University. His success as a director of music in various Jesuit colleges brought him to the notice of Pope Leo XIII., who encouraged his ideas of a complete reform of religious music. He was instrumental in founding the Schola Cantorum of the Vatican Seminary, where the whole repertory consists almost entirely of works of the classical school of Palestrina. Father De Santi was the prime mover of the Gregorian celebrations held in Rome in 1891, on which occasion he published various articles which aroused a good deal of opposition. Pope Leo stood his friend, but it was only during the pontificate of Pius X. that the reforms of De Santi were applied and embodied in the famous Motu proprio on church music. In 1910, Pius X., on the advice of De Santi, decided to create in Rome a centre for the study of sacred music, and a school was opened in the following year. De Santi, who was elected in 1909, and again in 1920, President of the Italian Association St. Cecilia, has written also much on historical and literary subjects. Most of his articles on music have appeared in Civiltà Catholica and Rassegna Gregoriana. F. B.

SANTI, ORLANDI (d. Mantua, July 1619), maestro di cappella of Cardinal Ferd. Gonzaga, Florence, temporary maestro in 1608, and maestro di cappella at Mantua as Monteverdi's successor in 1612. He composed 5 books of madrigals (1602-09), arias, duets and an opera 'Galatea,' produced at Mantua, 1617, which has been lost. E. V. D. S.

SANTINI, FORTUNATO (b. Rome, Jan. 5, 1778; d. there, 1862), Abbé, a learned musician who early lost his parents, and was brought up in an orphanage. He showed such talent for music that he was put to study with Jannaconi, and received into the Collegio Salvati. During his stay there (until 1798) he occupied himself in copying and scoring the church music of the great masters, and after his ordination in 1801 devoted his life to music, copying, collating and compiling with unwearied industry. As an ecclesiastic he had the entrée to many libraries and collections generally inaccessible, and set himself to the task of scoring all important works then existing only in parts. In 1820 he issued a catalogue (46 pp., 1000 Nos.) of his music, the MS. of which, containing more than the printed one, was in the collection of the writer.¹ A MS. copy of a Catalogo della musica antica, sacra, e madrigalesca, che si trova in Roma via dell' anima no. 50 presso Fortunato Santini, is in the Fétis collection at Brussels, No. 6166. His learning, and practical knowledge of church music, made his assistance invaluable to all engaged in musical research. He did much to make German music known in Italy, translating Rammeler's 'Tod Jesu' into Italian, and helping the introduction of Graun's music. Mendelssohn writes (Letters, Rome, Nov. 2, 1830):

'The Abbé has long been on the look-out for me, hoping I should bring the score of Bach's "Passion."

And again (Nov. 8):

'Santini is a delightful acquaintance; his library of old Italian music is most complete, and he gives or lends me anything and everything.'

Then he tells how Santini is trying to get Bach's composition performed at Naples, and goes on (Nov. 16):

'Old Santini continues to be courtesy personified; if some evening in company I praise anything, or say I do not know such and such a piece, the very next morning he comes knocking gently at my door with the identical piece folded up in his blue handkerchief. Then I go to him in the evenings, and we are really fond of each other.'

Santini composed pieces in five, six and eight real parts. A Requiem a 8 is at Bologna, where are numerous other church compositions. (See Q.-L.) The Singakademie of Berlin elected him an honorary member. On the death of his sister he sold his valuable collection, stipulating, however, for the use of it for life. His library is in the Museum of Christian Antiquities at Münster in Westphalia. A pamphlet, L'Abbé Santini et sa collection musicale à Rome (Florence, 1854), giving a useful résumé of its contents, was published by the Russian, Vladimir Stasov. F. G.

SANTLEY, SIR CHARLES (b. Liverpool, Feb. 28, 1834; d. Sept. 22, 1922), baritone singer, son of William Santley, a teacher of music. He was a chorister in early life, and, after various appearances as an amateur, he went to Italy to have his beautiful voice trained. Here, at Milan, he was under Gaetano Nava from Oct. 1855.

He made a début before very long, as the Doctor in 'La Traviata,' at Pavia, and after singing some other small parts, returned to England in Oct. 1857, and pursued his studies under Manuel Garcia. His first appearance before an English audience was at St. Martin's Hall on Nov. 16, 1857, when he sang the part of Adam in 'The Creation'; he next sang three times at the Crystal Palace, and again in 'The Creation' (taking the parts of Raphael and Adam), at the Sacred Harmonic Society, Jan. 8, 1858. In March of the same year he undertook, at the same society's concert, the part of Elijah, with which he was afterwards so closely identified. In the following autumn he sang at the first Leeds Festival, taking the bass part of Rossini's Stabat Mater, and other works. His first appearance on the English stage was at Covent Garden, with the Pyne and Harrison Company, as Hoel in 'Dinorah,' in Sept. 1859; he sang with the same company in 'Trovatore,' 'Lurline' and other operas. He took part in a concert performance of 'Iphigénie en Tauride,' under Hallé, about this time. In the winter of 1860-61 he sang in English opera at Her Majesty's Theatre, in 'Robin Hood,' 'La Reine Topaze,' 'Fra Diavolo,' etc. In 1861 he sang for the first time at the Birmingham Festival, and in the winter again at Covent Garden, in 'The Lily of Killarney,' and other things. He first appeared in the Italian opera in England at Covent Garden in 1862 in 'Il Trovatore,' and later in the same season he joined the company of Her Majesty's Theatre under Mapleson, appearing as the Count in 'Figaro,' and Nevers in 'Les Huguenots.' In 1863 he sang the part of Valentine on the production of 'Faust' in England with such success that Gounod wrote the song 'Even bravest heart' ('Dio possente') especially for him, and for the English performance of the work in 1864. He sang at Barcelona in the winter of 1864-65, adding Rigoletto to the number of his characters. At Manchester in Sept. 1865 he sang the part of Don Giovanni for the first time, and later on appeared in London as Caspar in 'Der Freischütz.' In 1870, after singing the part of the Dutchman for the first time in England (as 'L' Olandese dannato'), he gave up Italian opera, and sang at the Gaiety Theatre under Hollingshead, as Zampa, Peter the Shipwright, and Fra Diavolo. In 1871 he made a very successful tour in America in opera and concerts. In 1875 he joined the Carl Rosa Company at the Princess's Theatre; he appeared as Figaro on the opening night of the season, continuing with the company in 1876, when he sang the Flying Dutchman in English at the Lyceum.

After his first festival performance at Birmingham in 1861, he was in request at all the autumnal festivals, singing, for the first time at the Three Choir Meetings, at Worcester in 1863. He had previously sung at the Handel Festival in 1862, and until 1906 he appeared regularly at these triennial meetings. From about this time his position in oratorio and concert work was ever more and more important. On Apr. 9, 1859, he had married Gertrude Kemble, daughter of John Mitchell Kemble, the eminent Anglo-Saxon scholar, and grand-daughter of Charles Kemble. She appeared as a soprano singer at St. Martin's Hall in the 'Messiah,' but retired from public life on her marriage. Their daughter, EDITH, had a short but brilliant career as a concert singer (soprano), before her marriage in 1884 with the Hon. R. H. Lytton.

Though the versatility of his genius allowed him to express any emotion to the full, yet Santley's singing was identified with certain characteristics in the minds of those who knew it best. The quality of the voice was less remarkable for richness or sonority than for its eloquence of expression, and had a timbre which in love-music more easily represented fiery passion than soft languor. This fire was never more perfectly in its place than in 'Elijah,' where it was prominent from the opening recitative until the end. His distinct enunciation and power of varying the tone-colour were among his technical merits; but beyond and above these was the informing spirit of energy finely held in control. This made his singing of songs as dramatic as if they were scenes on the stage, although he never fell into the error of making lyrics sound operative. His performance of the 'Erl King' (which he always sang in English) can never be forgotten in this respect, and in a kindred mood Hatton's 'To Anthea' became exclusively his own. His interpretation of Handel's 'O ruddier than the cherry' was masterly in delineation and humour. Among the oratorios in which he made the greatest impression, apart from 'Elijah,' must be mentioned 'The Redemption' (Birmingham, 1882) and 'The Spectre's Bride' (Birmingham, 1885). He found time in the intervals of a wonderfully successful and busy career to compose several works for the service of the Roman Church (which he joined about 1880), such as a Mass in A flat, an Ave Maria, and other things. A berceuse for orchestra was performed at Sydney in 1890, when Santley was on a tour in Australia. In 1887 he was created a Knight Commander of St. Gregory the Great by Pope Leo XIII. In 1892 he published an amusing and valuable volume of reminiscences, Student and Singer. On May 1, 1907, the 'jubilee' of his artistic career was celebrated at a concert at the Albert Hall, when he appeared with many eminent artists. A money presentation, referred to on that occasion, was made some time afterwards. He was knighted later in the year. He took part in a benefit given for him at Covent Garden on May 23, 1911, when he sang in Dibdin's 'The Waterman,' and made his last appearance in 1915 at the Mansion House at a concert in aid of Belgian refugees. He published The Singing Master, 1900, The Art of Singing, 1908, and Reminiscences of my Life, 1909.

SANTOLIVUDDO, FRANCESCO (b. San Giorgio a Cremano, Naples, Aug. 6, 1883), composer, received his musical education at the Liceo Santa Cecilia in Rome, where one of his professors was Stanislao Falchi. In his aims and sympathies he belongs to the younger, progressive Italian school, but his long absence from his country kept him somewhat aloof from the activities of his colleagues. Having written an orchestral work, 'Crepuscolo sul mare,' in his student days, and conducted it at Nuremberg in 1909, and produced an opera, 'La favola di Helga,' at the Teatro dal Verme in Milan in 1910, he emigrated to Tunisia the following year, taking up his residence at a remote little Arab village. This voluntary exile was not without influence on his music. Although he wrote a 'Symphony in F major in the Classical Style' in 1916, several of his works are impregnated with Oriental feeling. A second opera, 'Ferhuda,' based on scenes from Arab life, was produced at Tunis in 1919, and an orchestral piece, 'Il profumo delle oasi sahariane,' on popular Arab tunes, was written on the edge of the desert, and first performed at Tunis and Algiers in 1918 by an orchestra of Serbian refugees. Another work on an Eastern subject is the mimed drama 'La bajadera della maschera gialla,' produced in Rome in 1923. Santolivuddo now lives in the Italian capital, but still spends much of his time in North Africa. Among his works not mentioned above are: an unpublished opera, 'L'ignota'; 'La morte di Tintaglies,' 'Paesaggi' and 'Acquarelle' for orchestra; some settings of Japanese and Persian poetry for voice and piano; and several piano pieces, including 'Due acqueforti tunisine' and 'Ex humo ad sidera.'

SANTUCCI, MARCO (b. Camaiore, Toscana,

July 4, 1762; d. Lucca, Nov. 29, 1843), studied at the Conservatorio di Loroeto, Naples, took holy orders in 1794, and became maestro di cappella at S. Giovanni, Lateran, Rome. In 1808 he was made a canon at Lucca Cathedral. He was a noted contrapuntist who wrote sacred choral works up to 48 parts. He also wrote 12 sonatas in fugal style for PF. Lists of his works are given in Q.-L., and by Fétis and Riemann. He published also some theoretical essays which Fétis considers of no value.

SANZ, GASPÀR (b. Calanda, 17th cent.), Spanish guitarist. After taking degrees in philosophy and theology at Salamanca, he passed to Naples, where he is said (on doubtful authority) to have studied with Christoforo Carisani (Caresana), though Carisani may have been several years older than Sanz and have succeeded him as maestro de capilla to the Spanish viceroy. He published a book of tablature entitled

Instrucción de musica sobre la guitarra española. . . . Saragossa, 1674 (Madrid, Bibl. Nac. Munich.) Also 1697. (B.M. Paris, Conservatoire; Brussels, Conservatoire, Barcelona, Diputación.)

SAPELLNIKOFF, VASSILY (b. Odessa, Nov. 2, 1868), was a student of the Conservatorium at Odessa under L. Brassin and Sophie Menter; became professor of the pianoforte at the Moscow Conservatorium in 1897; but after a few years took up his residence in Germany, living for a time at Leipzig, and subsequently at Munich. His career as a pianist has been one of continuous success. He made his debut at Hamburg in 1888 when he played Tchaikovsky's concerto in B flat minor under the composer's direction. This work he introduced into England. His first appearance here was at the Philharmonic Concert on Apr. 11, 1889, and he has returned repeatedly since. M.; addns. c.

SARABAND, a stately dance, once very popular in Spain, France and England. Its origin and derivation have given rise to many surmises. *Fuertes*¹ says that the dance was invented in the middle of the 16th century by a dancer called Zarabanda, who, according to other authorities, was a native of either Seville or Guayaquil, and after whom it was named. Others connect it with the Spanish Sarao (an entertainment of dancing), and Sir William Ouseley,² in a note to a Turkish air called 'Ser-i-Khāneh,' or 'the top of the house,' has the following:

'Some tunes are divided into three parts and are marked Khāne-i sāni "the second part," and Khāne-i sāli "the third part"; near the conclusion of several we also find the Persian words err-band, from which, without doubt, our sara-band has been derived.'³

Whatever its origin may have been, it is found in Europe at the beginning of the 16th century, performed in such a manner as to render its Oriental source highly probable. This may be gathered from the following extract from chapter xii., 'Del baile y cantar llamado Zarabanda,' of the Tratado contra los Juegos Publicos (Treatise against Public Amusements) of Mariana (1536-1623):

'Entre las otras invenciones ha salido estos años un baile y cantar tan lascivo en las palabras, tan feo en los menos, que basta para pegar fuego aun á las personas muy honestas' ('Amongst other inventions there has appeared during late years a dance and song, so lascivious in its words, so ugly in its movements, that it is enough to inflame even very modest people').

This reputation was not confined to Spain, for Marini in his poem L'Adone (1623) says:

'Chlama questo suo gioco emulo e profano
Saravanda, e l'Acconca, il nuovo Ispano.'⁴

Padre Mariana, who believed in its Spanish origin, says that its invention was one of the disgraces of the nation, and other authors attribute its invention directly to the devil. The dance was attacked by Cervantes and Guevara, and defended by Lope de Vega, but it seems to have been so bad that at the end of the reign of Philip II. it was for a time suppressed. It was soon, however, revived in a purer form, and was introduced at the French court in 1588, where later on Richelieu, wearing green velvet knee-breeches, with bells on his feet, and castanets in his hands, danced it in a ballet before Anne of Austria.

In England the Saraband was soon transformed into an ordinary country-dance. The first edition of Playford's Dancing Master (1651) has two examples, one to be danced 'longways for as many as will' (i.e. as 'Sir Roger de Coverley' is danced), and the other, 'Adson's Saraband,' to be danced 'longways for six.' It was at about this time that the Saraband, together with other dances, found its way into the Suite, of which it formed the slow movement, placed before the concluding Gigue. In this form it is remarkable for its strongly accentuated and majestic rhythm, generally as follows:

It is written either in the major or the minor key, in 3-2 or 3-4 time, although Walther (Lexikon, 1732) says that it may be also written in 2-4 time. It usually consists of two 8- or 12-bar divisions, begins on the down-beat, and ends on the second or third beat. Bach, in the 'Clavierübung,' Pt. I. (B.-G. iii. 76), has a Saraband beginning on the up-beat, and Handel (Suite XI.) has one with variations. Those by Corelli do not conform to the established rules, but are little more than Sicilianas played slowly (see BRAT 3).

The following Saraband for the guitar is printed in Fuenes' Historia de la musica española.

Handel's noble air 'Lascia ch' io pianga,' in 'Rinaldo,' is taken with no material alteration from a Saraband in his earlier opera of 'Almira,' in which the majestic rhythm mentioned reigns in all its dignity. See Chrysander's Händel, i. 121.

SARADIEV, CONSTANTINE SOLOMONOVICH (b. Derbent, Darghestan, Caucasus, Sept. 26, 1877), conductor and violinist, studied first at the Moscow Conservatoire under Hfimaly (violin) and Taneve (theory); from 1905-06 was a pupil of Nikisch at Leipzig, and also worked under Ševčík in Prague. He taught the violin at the Synodal School, Moscow, 1898-1907, and conducted the Sokolniki Concerts there in 1908, 1910 and 1911. He was associated with various movements to bring music within reach of the masses. He is now director of the State Institute of Theatrical Art, Moscow.

SARASATE. PABLO MARTIN MELITON SARASATE Y NAVASCUES (b. Pamplona, Mar. 10, 1844; d. Villa Navarra, Biarritz, Sept. 21, 1908), celebrated violinist, came to France as a child, and entered the Paris Conservatoire, Jan. 1, 1856. The following year he became the favourite pupil of Alard, and gained the first prizes for solfège and violin. He then entered Reber's harmony class, and secured a premier accessit in 1859, but shortly after relinquished the study of composition for the more tempting career of a concert player. His beautiful tone, retentive memory, immense execution and certainty of finger, added to the singularity of his manners and appearance, ensured his success in Paris, the French provinces and the Peninsula. The Spaniards naturally honoured an artist whom they looked upon as their own countryman, but Sarasate aspired to make his name known wherever music was appreciated, as well as in the two countries especially his own by birth and adoption. Besides making his way through Europe, from the remotest corner of Portugal to Norway, and from London to Moscow, he visited America, North and South. In all his wanderings he contrived to carry on his cultivation, and develop his great natural gifts. To London his first visit was in 1861, when he played at St. James's Hall on May 22; he came again in 1874, when he played at the Philharmonic Concert, May 18, and at the Musical Union, June 9, etc. He returned in 1877 (Crystal Palace, Oct. 13) and 1878 (Philharmonic, Mar. 28), and frequently afterwards. In 1885 and 1886 he gave sets of orchestral concerts conducted by Cusins, and at the Birmingham Festival of 1885 played a concerto written for him by Mackenzie.

Sarasate's distinguishing characteristics were not so much fire, force and passion, though of these he had an ample store, as purity of style, charm, brightness of tone, flexibility and extraordinary facility. He had a large repertory, comprising the concertos of German masters and the works of the French and Belgian schools. The concertos of Saint-Saëns and Lalo (who wrote his first violin concerto for Sarasate), and the 'Symphonie espagnole' of the latter, were favourites with him. Bruch wrote his second concerto and the 'Scottish Fantasia' for him. He generally avoided the music of Paganini and his followers, partly for want of taste for it, and partly because of the long stretches required, his hand being very small. But he will always be remembered for his rendering of the solos he wrote for himself, and played so exquisitely, giving the spirit of Spanish dance translated into terms of the violin virtuoso. He possessed two fine Stradivari violins, one of which, dated 1724, was presented to him when a boy by Queen Isabella of Spain. This instrument was one of those brought from the 'Chapelle Royale at Naples by Charles III. (for whom Boccherini composed his quintets), and upon it he mainly played throughout his career. A successful copy of it was made by Vuillaume, and was sometimes used by him at rehearsals. Later in life he acquired from the Boissier collection an exceptionally beautiful instrument, bearing date 1713. Sarasate composed for his instrument romances, fantasies, and especially transcriptions of Spanish airs and dances, all calculated to display his skill as a virtuoso. His 'Zigeunerweisen,' 'Jota Aragonesa' and the four books of Spanish dances are among the most popular violin soli in existence. G. C.; addns. W. W. C., etc.

SARDANA, see SONG, subsection SPAIN (2).
SARGENT, HAROLD MALCOLM WATTS (b. Stamford, Lincolnshire, Apr. 29, 1895), has made a distinct mark as a conductor both in concert work and opera.

Sargent took his A.R.C.O. diploma while still a pupil of Stamford School, in 1911 he was articled to Dr. Keeton of Peterborough Cathedral, and became organist of Melton Mowbray parish church in 1914. During the war he served with the 27th Durham Light Infantry, but was able to take his degree Mus.D. at Durham in 1919. The opportunity of conducting an orchestral composition of his own, 'Impressions of a Windy Day,' at a Queen's Hall Promenade Concert in 1921 showed where his special gifts lay. He was subsequently appointed to the teaching staff of the R.C.M. as junior orchestral conductor, and soon undertook work for the B.N.O.C. His success in carrying through the first public performance of Vaughan Williams's opera, 'Hugh the Drover' (His Majesty's Theatre, July 1924), showed unusual ability, and he later conducted Holst's 'At the Boar's Head' at Manchester, as well as a fairly large repertory of standard works with the B.N.O.C. In 1925 he was invited by the Royal Philharmonic Society to conduct a programme of English orchestral works, which included the first performance of Herbert Howells's PF. concerto and Vaughan Williams's pastoral symphony. He has been constantly in request for special performances in many parts of the country; his regular engagements have included the season of the Llandudno Orchestra, several series of valuable children's concerts at Westminster, and the London season (1926) of the D'Oyly Carte Opera Company. SARRO (SARRI), DOMENICO (b. Trani, Naples, c. 1678; d. ? Naples, after 1739), studied at the Conservatorio de' Turchini, 1688-1697; was vice-maestro in 1712, and afterwards maestro of the Chapel Royal, Naples. As an opera composer he established a European reputation, although he himself apparently never left Naples. In addition to 36 operas, performed in all the principal European theatres, he wrote oratorios, masses and other church music, cantatas, serenades, arias; also a concerto for 2 vlns., flute, viola, violoncello and bass (Q.-L.; Riemann).

SARRUSOPHONE, a brass instrument of conical bore, played with a double reed, designed in 1863 by Sarrus, a bandmaster in the French army. The scheme of the inventor comprised a whole family of instruments ranging in pitch from soprano to contra-bass, and his expectation was that they might well take the place of oboes and bassoons in military bands. As regards the contra-bass models, Sarrus was to some extent anticipated by Stehle of Vienna in 1835, who brought out a contra-bassoon in brass, of simple fingering, and whose model has been further developed by Cervený of Königgratz, and Mahillon of Brussels; but to Sarrus belongs the credit of designing a whole family of double-reed instruments as possible substitutes for the oboe and bassoon groups. The objection that has been raised to them is that they fail to produce the delicate and distinctive qualities of the wooden double-reed instruments. (See PLATE V. No. 2.)

The complete family of sarrusophones comprises the soprano in e', soprano in b', alto in e, tenor in B, baritone in E, bass in B, contra-bass in E, and the contra-bassoon in C, or B. All these have a compass from one tone below the pitch note, to a fifth above its double octave, b to f'', agreeing in this respect with the oboe, and the general scheme of fingering is much like that of the oboe. The tube of all but the small instruments is bent back upon itself, so as to reduce the length to a convenient compass.

The actual use of the sarrusophone in the orchestra has been very limited, but Saint-Saëns appears to have thought highly of the contra-bass instrument as an alternative to the double-bassoon, and used it on several occasions. Jules Massenet introduced it in his 'Esclarmonde' with great effect, and other composers have followed his example. It is possible that the bass and contra-bass members of the family may be kept alive, as they have distinctive qualities, but the treble and alto instruments can be regarded only as interesting experiments. SARTI, GIOVANNI VINCENZO, of St. Agata, was maestro di cappella at Forlì Cathedral c. 1643, and at the Metropolitan church at Ravenna, 1648. He composed 6 books of 'Concerti sacri,' 2-6 v., Litanies, 8 v., and 2 books of psalms, between 1643 and 1655 (Q.-L.).

SARTI, GIUSEPPE (b. Faenza, Dec. 1, 1729¹; d. Berlin, July 28, 1802), opera composer, was the son of a jeweller who played the violin in the cathedral. He early learned music, and had lessons in composition—from Vallotti according to his own family, from Padre

Martini according to his biographers. Whether at Padua or at Bologna (the respective homes of the two masters), he completed his studies at an early age, for we learn from the Chapter archives, still preserved in the library of Faenza, that he was organist of the cathedral from 1748 to Apr. 1750, and director of the theatre from 1752. In 1751 he composed his first opera, 'Pompeo in Armenia,' which was enthusiastically received by his fellow-townsmen, and followed by several more serious works, and 'Il rè pastore' (Venice, 1753), which had an immense success. So quickly did his fame spread that when he was only 24 the King of Denmark (Frederick V.) invited him to Copenhagen as Kapellmeister to the Prince Royal, and director of the Italian opera; and, on the closing of the latter in two years, made him court Kapellmeister. In the summer of 1765 the King determined to reopen the opera, and Sarti went back to Italy to engage singers after an absence of twelve years; but his plans were upset by the deaths first of the King in 1766 and then of his own mother in 1767, so that it was not till 1768 that he returned to Copenhagen. These three years of trouble were not unfruitful, as he composed five operas, of which two, 'I contratempi' (1767) and 'Didone abbandonata,' were given in Venice, where he seems chiefly to have resided.

Overskou's carefully compiled *History of the Danish Stage*¹ informs us that Sarti directed the Danish court theatre from 1770 to May 20, 1775, when he was summarily dismissed. A favourite with Christian VII., and the protégé of Struensee and Queen Caroline Matilda, he was too artless and straightforward to curry favour with the Queen Dowager and the ambitious Ove Guldberg; so after the catastrophe of 1772 he found his position gradually becoming worse and worse, and when the oligarchical party had secured the upper hand, imprisoning the Queen, and reducing the King to a mere cipher, he had, with other court favourites, to endure much ill treatment, and was finally banished. During this second stay at Copenhagen he married Camilla Pasi, by whom he had two daughters.

Returning to Italy in the summer of 1775, he went first to Venice, became at once director of the Ospedaletto Conservatorio, and administered it with great success for four years. In 1779 the post of maestro di cappella of the cathedral of Milan fell vacant through the death of Fioroni, and Sarti was pronounced successful at a competition held before the Conservatorio of Naples. This victory over Paisiello and other eminent musicians greatly increased his reputation, and procured him many distinguished pupils, Cherubini among the number, who indeed was not only his pupil, but for some years his assistant.² In 1784 he received an invitation from Russia too advantageous to be refused, but the nine years spent in Milan were the most brilliant of his whole career, and the most prolific, including as they did his most successful operas, 'Le Gelosie villane' and 'Farnace' (Venice, 1776); 'Achille in Sciro' (Florence, Oct. 1779); 'Giulio Sabino' (Venice, 1781), and 'I due litiganti' (Milan, 1782). To complete the list, at least ten more operas and several cantatas on a large scale should be added, works for the cathedral choir, including several masses, a Miserere a 4, and some important motets.

On his way to St. Petersburg, Sarti made some stay at Vienna, where Joseph II. received him graciously, and granted him the proceeds of a performance of 'I due litiganti,' which had long maintained its place at the Burgtheater, and had helped to fill its coffers, as the monarch politely told the composer. He there made the acquaintance of Mozart, then in the very prime of life, who speaks of him as an 'honest, good man,' and who not only played to him a good deal, but adopted an air from his 'I due litiganti' as the theme of a set of Variations (Köchel, 460), and as a subject in the second finale of 'Don Juan.' His pleasure in Mozart's playing did not, however, place him on Mozart's level; and when the famous six quartets were published, Sarti was one of the loudest to complain of their 'barbarisms.' His examination remains mostly in MS., but some extracts are given in the A.M.Z. for 1832 (p. 373), including nineteen serious errors in thirty-six bars, and showing how difficult it is even for a very clever composer to apprehend the ideas of one greater than himself.

Catherine II. received him with even greater marks of favour than Joseph, which he repaid by composing several important works for her own choir, and by bringing the Italian opera into a state of efficiency it had never attained before. Among his sacred compositions of this period may be mentioned an oratorio for two choirs, full orchestra and band of Russian horns; a Te Deum for the taking of Otchakow by Potomkin; and a Requiem in honour of Louis XVI. It was in the Te Deum that Sarti employed fireworks and the discharge of cannon to heighten the martial effect of the music. Among his operas produced at St. Petersburg were 'Armida' (1786), which had an immense success, and was sung to perfection by the celebrated Todi; and 'Olega,' the libretto of which was by the Empress herself. In this opera Sarti endeavoured to imitate the music of the ancient Greeks, and made use of some of their modes. A skilled mathematician and physicist, he was fond of explaining to the Empress his theories of acoustics, which he illustrated by many ingenious experiments. He invented a machine for counting the vibrations of sounds, and fixed 436 vibrations¹ for the A, as the normal pitch for his orchestra. For this invention he was elected an honorary member of the Academy of Science in St. Petersburg. Many other honours were conferred upon him, including those of councillor of the University, chief maître de chapelle to the court and nobility of the first class. Todi's intrigues caused him temporary inconvenience, but he consoled himself for a short period of disgrace by going to a village in the Ukraine, given him by Prince Potemkin, and founding there a school of singing which turned out some remarkable singers. In 1793 the Empress restored him completely to favour, and placed him at the head of a Conservatoire planned after the model of those in Italy. After her death and that of her son Paul I., Sarti determined to revisit his native land, and in the spring of 1802 left Russia, where he had lived for eighteen years without a break. At Berlin he formed an intimacy with the court Kapellmeister, Noël Mussini (b. Bergamo, 1765; d. Florence, 1837), who fell in love with his daughter Giuliana, and became his son-in-law.² Immediately after the marriage the kind and gentle Sarti fell seriously ill of gout, and died July 28, 1802. He was buried in the Catholic church of St. Edwige, where his ashes still remain.

From some unexplained cause, very few of Sarti's compositions have been engraved. His Te Deum was printed with Russian words at St. Petersburg, and Breitkopf & Härtel have published two of his sacred pieces, one in eight, the other in six real parts. A French translation of the 'Nozze di Dorina' (identical with 'I due litiganti'), apparently the only opera of his that has been engraved, appeared in Paris; but Ricordi of Milan has copies of 'Armida e Rinaldo,' 'I finti eredi,' 'Le gelosie villane,' 'Nitteti' and 'Vologeso.' These scores, as well as those of 'Adriano in Sciro,' 'Alessandro,' 'Gli amanti consolati,' 'Castore e Polluce,' 'I Contrattempi,' 'Didone abbandonata,' 'Erifile,' 'I due litiganti,' 'Giulio Sabino,' 'Idalide,' 'Ifigenia,' 'Il Medonte,' 'Il militare bizzarro,' 'Mitridate' and 'Scipione,' and also of nearly all his sacred works, are in the library of the Paris Conservatoire, from which circumstance the writer is able to pronounce upon his style. The part-writing is eminently vocal, and the most difficult combinations are mastered with ease, but the scientific element is never unduly forced into notice, owing to Sarti's gift of fresh and spontaneous melody. Most of his operas contain numbers well constructed with a view to stage effect, and full of expression and charm; indeed so much of his music might still be heard with pleasure that it seems strange that no great artist has attempted to revive it.

His masses alone retain their hold on public favour, and one was performed on Easter Day 1880 in Milan Cathedral, which still has all the MSS.

Sarti left six sonatas for clavier solo (London, 1762). An Allegro from these was included in Pauer's 'Alte Meister.' Cherubini quotes a 'Cum sancto' a 8 of his in his Counterpoint; and Fétis a Kyrie from the same Mass in his treatise. Breitkopf published a fugue for eight voices, a hymn and a Miserere, and the overture to 'Ciro riconosciuto.' A rondo for mezzo-soprano will be found in Gevaert's 'Gloires d'Italie,' and a cavatina, from 'Giulio Sabino,' in the 'Gemma d' antichità.'

The Mussini family possess a fine oil-painting of the composer, taken in 1786 by Tonci, an-Italian painter settled in St. Petersburg. Le Chevalier Sarti, a novel by P. Scudo, appeared first in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and has since been published separately (Paris, Hachette, 1857). g. c.

SARTORIO (SERTORI), ANTONIO (b. Venice, c. 1620), was Kapellmeister at the court of Brunswick until 1676; from then till c. 1681 (when he was succeeded by Legrenzi) he was maestro di cappella at St. Mark's, Venice. He is one of the chief representatives of Venetian opera after Cavalli and Cesti. Apart from a number of operas he composed 8-part psalms, cantatas, solo cantatas, motets and canzonets (Q.-L.; Fétis).

² The articles on Sarti and Mussini in PA's are full of errors and omissions. We have corrected the most glaring mistakes from family papers kindly furnished by the distinguished painter, L. Mussini, director of the Museo at Siena, and grandson of the time as Marie Saxe, she was the Elisabeth in the ill-fated performances of 'Tannhäuser' at Paris in 1861, and at Paris in 1865 she played Selika at the production of 'L'Africaine.'

She was a pupil of Mme. Ugalde, and from all accounts had an exceptional voice. Appearing first in Paris at the Théâtre-Lyrique in 1859, she was at the Opéra between 1860-70. After the Franco-German war she sang in Italy and Spain, and also at Brussels. One of her parts at the Opéra was Donna Anna, which she sang at a special revival to Faure's Don Juan. She died in great poverty. Her husband—the union only lasted from 1864-67—was M. SATANELLA, OR THE POWER OF LOVE, opera in 4 acts; words by Harris and Falconer; music by Balfe. Produced Lyceum Theatre ('Pyne and Harrison'), Dec. 20, 1858. G.

SATIE, ERIK ALFRED LESLIE (b. Honfleur, Calvados, Mar. 17, 1866; d. Paris, July 2, 1925), composer. His father was a composer and music publisher in Paris, and his mother, of British origin, composed pianoforte pieces, under the name of Eugénie Satie-Barnetsche.

Having spent a year at the Conservatoire (1883-84), Satie brought out his 'Ogives' (1886; publ. 1889), a series of works of which the strange titles and the novelty of expression provoked some astonishment: 'Sarabandes' (1887), 'Gymnopédies' (1888; Nos. 1 and 3 orchestrated by Debussy); 'Gnossiennes' (1890). He collaborated in the rites imagined by the poet Joseph Péladan ('Le Sâr'), the music for the scene of the 'Fils des Étoiles' (1891), etc.; wrote a prelude for Jules Bois, for 'La Porte héroïque du Ciel' (1894); and composed some 'Danses gothiques' (1893), etc. But he collaborated also with the Montmartre song-writer Hypsa, and composed for the music-hall singer Paulette Darty (Mme. de Bardy) some waltz songs ('Je te veux,' 'Poudre d'or,' etc.), which had some vogue.

Becoming friends, towards 1890, with Claude Debussy, it is claimed that Satie exercised a certain amount of influence over him, and that he counselled him to ask Maeterlinck for a dramatic poem.

Between 1905-08, Satie, at the age of 40, took it into his head to study at the Schola Cantorum, where he had for masters V. d'Indy and Albert Roussel. In spite of his attendance at this institution, Satie, who had published 'Pièces froides' (1897), 'Pièces en forme de poire' (1903), etc., continued to compose such works as 'Trois Valses du précieux dégoût,' 'Choses vues à droite et à gauche' (with the 'Fugue à tâtons'), 'Chapitres tournés en tous sens,' 'Croquis et agaceries d'un homme de bois,' 'Les Pantins dansent,' 'Descriptions automatiques,' 'Véritables préludes flasques' (for a dog), 'Aperçus désagréables' (with a fugue), 'Heures séculaires et instantanées,' 'En habit de cheval' (2 preludes, 1 choral), etc.: the greater part of these works were published in 1913 (Demets; republished Rouart-Lerolle); 'Pièces montées' (1920), etc.

Satie was considered as a pioneer by some young musicians who 'discovered' him about 1910, and he became a kind of leader of a school, l'École d'Arcueil (Satie lived in this locality). He had attempted compositions of greater dimensions: 'Parade' (Russian Ballets, 1917), 'Relâche' (Swedish Ballets, 1924), 'Mercure' (Soirées de Paris, 1924), 'Socrate,' symphonic drama in three parts, with voice, on the dialogues of Plato, translated by Victor Cousin (1919, for the Société Nationale; adapted for the stage, Prague, 1925); 'Le Piège de Méduse,' lyric comedy (1921); recitatives for 'Le Médecin malgré lui' of Gounod (Monte Carlo, 1924). He left a score of 'Paul et Virginie' (libretto by R. Radiguet and J. Cocteau).

An incomplete musician, Satie, partly by chance, partly consciously, outstripped by forty years contemporary polytonalists and atonalists. A humorist, literary rather than musical, he searched for unusual titles for his compositions (imitated in this respect by other composers, such as Ravel and Florent Schmitt); fanciful, mystifying, with a natural facility for provoking astonishment and a sense of the grotesque, with a simplicity of means which perhaps shows his natural limitation, Satie occupies a place apart in the history of contemporary music.

'C'est sa singularité outrancière et paradoxale qui a empêché le succès direct de ses efforts, mais c'est bien elle aussi qui eut le mérite de la découverte. Si l'absurde de 1886 est devenu la réalité de 1910, si les trouvailles d'un simple ont renouvelé le langage des habiles, l'histoire de la musique doit le savoir, comme le savent quelques initiés' (J. Écoucheville.)

SATZ, the German term for MOVEMENT (q.v.). SAUER, EMIL (b. Hamburg, Oct. 8, 1862), was a pupil of Nicolas Rubinstein at the Moscow Conservatorium in 1876-81, and subsequently studied under Liszt and Deppe. From 1882 he made frequent and successful concert tours as a virtuoso pianist. He first appeared in England at eight recitals of his own, in Nov. 1894, and rapidly attained great success in this country, maintained through many visits. In 1901 he was appointed head of one department of the pianoforte branch of the Vienna Conservatorium, which he gave up in Apr. 1907, going to live at Dresden. He resumed his position in Vienna in 1915. His technique is wonderfully neat and accurate, and his playing, though occasionally rather wanting in breadth, is always agreeable. He has written a 'Suite moderne,' 24 concert études, 2 sonatas and many slighter pieces for the pianoforte, as well as two concertos in E minor and C minor. He has also published a volume of reminiscences, Meine Welt (1901).

SAUNDERS, JOHN (b. Dec. 23, 1867; d. Oct. 7, 1919), violinist, studied at the G.S.M. under J. T. Carrodus and Benoît Hollander. Though his services were much in request for orchestral playing (he led the orchestra of the Royal Philharmonic Society in 1910, and that of the Russian ballet in 1918-19) it is as a chamber music player that he will be best remembered. His purity of style made him an ideal leader of quartets in classic mould, and he was perhaps the most appreciated of all the performers at the SOUTH PLACE CONCERTS (q.v.). His first appearance there was on Dec. 20, 1891, his last on Jan. 5, 1919, and his total number of appearances 239, a truly remarkable record. The audiences showed their appreciation by subscribing over £300 for the establishment of a John Saunders Memorial Scholarship. W. W. C.

SAURET, ÉMILE (b. Dun-le-Roi, Cher, France, May 22, 1852; d. London, Feb. 12, 1920), violinist, soon attracted the notice of de Bériot, and became his pupil, the last he ever had. He began to travel at an early age, playing in the chief towns of France and Italy, in Vienna and in London, where he played at the International Exhibition of 1862 and also at the Alhambra. More important was his appearance at Alfred Mellon's Concerts, Covent Garden, Aug. 27, 1866. He played often at the French court in the last days of the Second Empire. In 1872 he made his first visit with Strakosch to the United States, and his second in 1874, remaining there till Jan. 1876. In New York he made the acquaintance of von Bülow and Rubinstein, and on his return to Leipzig was welcomed by the latter, then engaged in the rehearsals of his 'Paradise Lost.' Sauret made his début in the Gewandhaus in May 1876 in Mendelssohn's concerto, and was most warmly received. He took lessons in composition from Jadassohn. He, however, returned immediately to America, and it was not till he came back again in 1877, and went through Germany and Austria in two long and most successful tours, that his reputation was established in his native country. In England he reappeared in 1880, and played at the Crystal Palace, Apr. 24, and Philharmonic (Bruch's concerto, No. 1) on the 28th.

Liszt showed him much kindness, and they often played together. In 1872 he married Teresa Carreño, the marriage being dissolved a few years later. In 1879 he married Emma Hotter of Dusseldorf, and being appointed professor of the violin at Kullak's Academy in Berlin, he settled in that city, remaining there nearly ten years. He relinquished this post, however, in 1890, when the R.A.M. invited him to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the principal violin professor, Prosper Sainton. In 1903 Sauret again gave up this second professorship for a similar position at the Chicago Musical College, where he remained until July 1906. For a time he lived in Geneva, giving private lessons to a small coterie of pupils, many of whom followed him from America. As a virtuoso Sauret obtained a greater degree of popularity in America than here. His playing was distinguished by the grace and elegance of the French school, to which was added a conscientious handling of the classics. He wrote a large amount of music, including an excellent Method for the violin.

His published works include a concerto in G minor; a Ballade, a Légende; and a Serenade in G—all for solo violin and orchestra; Caprice de Concert in D; Scherzo fantastique; Valse-caprice; Barcarolle-mazurka, and many other drawing-room pieces, as well as transcriptions from Mendelssohn, Rubinstein, Wagner, etc.

He also wrote a concerto in E major for violin and orchestra, a Gradius ad Parnassum du violiniste (Leipzig, 1894), and a number of études, small pieces and transcriptions for the violin, with and without orchestra.

SAUTILLÉ (Ital. saltato), a technical term in violin and violoncello music whereby the executant understands that a certain skipping motion of the bow is to be employed. To the school of classical composers from Corelli to Spohr, sautillé was either unknown or by them ignored; but with the advent of Paganini this brilliant embellishment came into vogue. SAUZAY, CHARLES EUGÈNE (b. Paris, July 14, 1809; d. there, Jan. 24, 1901), eminent French violinist. In 1823 he entered the Conservatoire, and in his second year became the pupil of Baillot and of Reicha. He obtained the second violin prize in 1825, the first violin prize and the second for fugue in 1827. A few years later he joined Baillot's quartet, first as second violin and then as tenor, vice Urhan, married Mlle. Baillot, and continued one of her father's party till its dissolution in 1840. He soon rose rapidly both in society and as a professor. In 1840 he was made first violin to Louis Philippe, and afterwards leader of the second violins to the Emperor Napoleon III. In 1860 he succeeded Girard as professor at the Conservatoire. His own quartet party started after the termination of Baillot's, including his wife and Boëly as pianists, Norblin and Franchomme; and gave its concerts, sometimes with and sometimes without orchestra, in the Salle Pleyel. Sauzay is mentioned by Hiller as one of Mendelssohn's acquaintances during his stay in Paris in 1830. He was greatly sought after both as a player and a teacher. His publications are not important, and consist of incidental music to 'Georges Dandin' and 'Le Sicilien,' cleverly written in the style of Lully to suit the date of the pieces; fantasias and romances; a PF. trio; a string trio; songs; Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven; Étude sur le quatuor (Paris, 1861), a disappointing work from the pen of a musician of so much eminence and experience; L'École de l'accompagnement (Paris, 1869), a sequel to the foregoing. He also composed a series of 'Études harmoniques' for the violin.

SAVAGE, WILLIAM (b. circa 1720; d. London, July 27, 1789), was a pupil of Pepusch, and became a gentleman of the Chapel Royal in 1744. He was almoner, vicar-choral and master of the choristers at St. Paul's Cathedral in 1748, and was the master of Battishill and Stevens. He wrote some chants and church music of little importance. SAVART, FÉLIX (b. Mézières, June 30, 1791; d. Mar. 17,¹ 1841), a French doctor of medicine who abandoned his profession and devoted himself to investigating the theory of the vibration of surfaces and strings. He was the son of Gérard Savart, a mathematical instrument maker of repute, director of the ateliers of the École d'Artillerie, and the author of several useful innovations, including an ingenious contrivance for dividing circles.

Originally established at Metz, he left Paris in 1819, where he was made conservateur de physique at the Collège de France, and in 1827 was elected a member of the Académie des Sciences. Following in the steps of Chladni, he made many investigations in acoustics, which are recorded in the several publications bearing his name. He appears particularly to have thrown light on the nature of that complicated relation between a vibrating body which is the source of sound, and other bodies brought into connexion with it, by virtue of which the original sound is magnified in intensity and modified in quality; well-known examples of such an arrangement being furnished by the sound-boards of the violin tribe and the pianoforte.

In his Mémoire sur la construction des instruments à cordes et d'archet, published in Paris in 1819, he explains the series of experiments which led him to construct his 'Trapezoid Violin,' familiarly known in England as Savart's 'Box Fiddle.' The exhaustive tests therein described are the most renowned and convincing that have ever been undertaken. Clearly and distinctly he proved that wood arched in the form ordinarily employed for stringed instruments of the violin tribe does not vibrate in every part of its length and breadth equally; that there are points where the vibrations decrease, and points—i.e. the bouts, corner-blocks and sound-holes—where the vibrations cease; finally, that a flat piece of wood vibrates more readily and evenly than an arched one. Taking these facts for his basis, he constructed a violin in the form of a box, narrower at the upper than at the lower end. The two tables were flat, planed on the inner side and slightly raised on the outer so as to support the increased pressure of the strings caused by the bridge, which was necessarily higher than usual, so as to allow the bow a free passage across the strings, which would otherwise be hindered by the straight sides of the instrument. In contrast with the customary curved sound-holes of the ordinary violin, Savart cut his straight; and their position in the belly, and distance apart, he determined by a series of practical experiments which are minutely described in his book. He tried two bass-bars, one placed down the centre joint of the violin, the other crescent-shaped, only touching the table at a point just below the bridge. Curiously enough, both these forms produced apparently identical effects. The sides of the instrument were $\frac{1}{4}$ in. in thickness, and no side linings were employed. The sound-post was placed behind the bridge, but a little more to the right than is customary. To prevent the excessive pull of the strings on the tender part of the table (inseparable from a tail-piece attached in the ordinary way), Savart carried his strings over a hardwood or ivory nut at the end of the violin and attached them to the tail-pin, which was set slightly below the centre. A jury of the Académie des Sciences, composed of Biot, Charles, Haüy and De Prony, together with four members of the Académie des Arts, Berton, Catel, Le Sueur and Cherubini, were appointed to consider the merits of this violin. The eminent violinist Lefebvre played alternately on a fine Cremona and Savart's violin before this jury, and eventually the latter was pronounced to be equal, if not superior, to the Italian masterpiece.

Savart's name is also connected with an ingenious little device for measuring, in a manner easily appreciable by a lecture audience, the number of vibrations corresponding to a given musical note. A wheel, caused to rotate quickly by ordinary mechanical contrivances, is furnished on its circumference with teeth or ratchets, against which a tongue of pasteboard or some other elastic substance is brought into contact. The passage of each tooth gives a vibration to the tongue, and if the wheel revolve fast enough, the repetition of these vibrations will produce a musical sound. Hence, as the number of rotations of the wheel in a given time can be easily counted, the number of vibrations corresponding to the note produced can be experimentally ascertained with tolerable precision. This mode of determining vibration numbers has been since superseded by the more elegant instrument, the SIREN, and by other modes known to modern acoustic physicists, but from the simplicity of its demonstrations it is still often used. Savart also investigated with some attention and success the acoustical laws bearing on wind instruments and on the production of the voice.

He wrote Mémoire sur la voix humaine, published in 1825, and also Sur la voix des oiseaux, 1826. His complete works were published in the Annales de Physique et de Chimie, 1819-40.

SAX, (1) CHARLES JOSEPH (b. Dinant, Belgium, Feb. 1, 1791; d. Paris, Apr. 26, 1865), a Belgian musical-instrument maker of the first rank. He was first a cabinet-maker, then a mechanic in a spinning-machine factory, and then set up in Brussels as a maker of wind instruments. He had served no apprenticeship to the trade, and his only qualification was that he could play the serpent; he was therefore obliged to investigate for himself the laws concerning the bore of instruments; but as he had great manual dexterity, and a turn for invention, he was soon able to produce serpents and flutes of fair quality. He quickly attracted notice by his clarinets and bassoons, which gained him a medal at the Industrial Exhibition of 1820, and the title of musical-instrument maker to the court of the Netherlands, which also encouraged him by advancing him capital. In 1822 he began to make all kinds of wind instruments, brass and wood, and in 1824 invented an 'omnitonic horn,' which he continued to perfect till 1846. This instrument could be adjusted to any key by means of a piston sliding backwards or forwards on a graduated scale of about half an inch long, which set the body of the instrument in communication with tubes of different lengths corresponding to all the major keys. On a separate elbow was a movable register which the player fixed opposite the number of the key he wished to use, and the tube of that key being at once brought into position, the instrument was played exactly like an ordinary horn. Sax also invented brass instruments producing every note in the scale, without crooks, pistons or cylinders. He took out patents for a keyed harp, a piano and a guitar on a new system, but his efforts were mainly directed to perfecting the clarinet, especially the bass clarinet, and discovering new methods of boring brass and wood wind instruments with a view to make them more exactly in tune. His exertions were crowned with success, and he obtained gratifying distinctions at the Brussels Industrial Exhibition of 1835.

Charles Sax was the father of eleven children, of whom two sons were distinguished in the same line. The eldest of these,

(2) ANTOINE JOSEPH, known as ADOLPHE SAX (b. Dinant, Nov. 6, 1814; d. Paris, Feb. 4, 1894), was brought up in his father's workshop, and as a child was remarkable for manual skill, and love of music. He entered the Brussels Conservatoire and studied the flute and clarinet—the latter with Bender, who considered him one of his best pupils. Like his father his efforts were directed mainly to the improvement of that instrument, especially the bass clarinet, and he even designed a double-bass clarinet in B \flat . In the course of his endeavours to improve the tune of his favourite instrument he invented an entire family of brass instruments with a new quality of tone, which he called SAXOPHONE (q.v.). The hope of making both fame and money led him to Paris; he arrived in 1842 and established himself in the Rue St. Georges, in small premises which he was afterwards forced to enlarge. He had no capital beyond his brains and fingers, which he used both as a manufacturer and an artist; but he had the active support of Berlioz, Halévy and G. Kastner, and this soon procured him money, tools and workmen. He exhibited in the French Exhibition of 1844, and obtained a silver medal for his brass and wood wind instruments, a great stimulus to a man who looked down upon all his rivals, and aimed not only at eclipsing them, but at securing the monopoly of furnishing musical instruments to the French army. In 1845 he took out a patent for the SAXHORN (q.v.), a new kind of bugle, and for a family of cylinder instruments called SAXO-TROMBA, intermediate between the saxhorn and the cylinder trumpet. On June 22, 1846, he registered the saxophone, which has remained his most important discovery. A man of such inventive power naturally excited much jealousy and ill-feeling among those whose business suffered from his discoveries, but his tact and wisdom made numerous and powerful friends, among others Général de Rumigny, Aide-de-camp to Louis Philippe, and a host of newspaper writers who were perpetually trumpeting his praises. He lost no opportunity of vaunting the superiority of his instruments over those in use in the French military bands, at a special competition held between the two; and the superiority, whether deserved or not, soon resulted in a monopoly, the first effect of which was to banish from the military bands all horns, oboes and bassoons.

The Paris Industrial Exhibition of 1849, at which Sax obtained a gold medal, brought his three families of instruments still more into notice; and he received the Council Medal at the Great Exhibition of 1851. In spite of these merited honours, he became bankrupt in 1852. He soon, however, made an arrangement with his creditors, and on re-starting business entered for the Paris Exhibition of 1855, and gained another gold medal. When the pitch was reformed in 1859 every orchestra and military band in France had to procure new wind instruments—an enormous advantage, by which any one else in Sax's place would have made a fortune; but with all his ability and shrewdness he was not a man of business, and his affairs became more and more hopelessly involved. There was full scope for his inventive faculties under the Second Empire, and he introduced various improvements into the different piston instruments, only one of which need be specified, viz. the substitution of a single ascending piston for the group of descending ones. This principle he adapted to both conical and cylindrical instruments. He also invented instruments with seven bells and six separate pistons; instruments with rotatory bells for altering the direction of the sound, and a host of smaller improvements and experiments, all detailed in Fétis's Rapports de l'Exposition and Biographie universelle.

At the London International Exhibition of 1862, Sax exhibited cornets, saxhorns and saxotrombas, with 3 pistons, and with 2, 3, 4 and 5 keys; and at Paris in 1867 he took the Grand Prix for specimens of all the instruments invented or improved by him. He afterwards lost his powerful patrons and declined in prosperity year after year. He was obliged to give up his vast establishment in the Rue St. Georges and to sell (Dec. 1877) his collection of musical instruments. The printed catalogue contains 467 items, and though not absolutely correct is interesting, especially for the view it gives of the numerous infringements of his patents. The typical instruments of the collection were bought by the Museum of the Paris Conservatoire, the Musée Instrumental of Brussels and the late César Snoeck of Renaix, a wealthy Belgian collector.

Among the numerous works written to advertise the merits of Adolphe Sax's instruments we need only mention two—Comettant's Histoire d'un inventeur au XIX^{me} siècle (Paris, 1860, 552 pp. 8vo, with a fair likeness of Sax); and Pontécoulant's Organographie (Paris, 1861, 2 vols. 8vo).

(3) ALPHONSE, worked with his brother for some years, and seems to have devoted his attention especially to ascending pistons. He set up for himself in the Rue d'Abbeville (No. 5 bis), but did not succeed. He published a pamphlet, Gymnastique des poumons; la musique instrumentale au point de vue de l'hygiène et la création des orchestres féminins (Paris, 1865), which is merely a disguised puff.

SAXHORN (SAXTUBA), a brass valve instrument of the bugle type, invented by Adolphe SAX (q.v.), played with a cup mouth-piece. (See PLATE LXXXIV. No. 3.)

It is built in at least seven different pitches, so as to provide a range of somewhat similar tone-colour of about five octaves. The saxhorn family naturally divides itself into two groups, the soprano and alto (flügel-horns) in E \flat and B \flat respectively, and the tenor in E_b and baritone in E_b (althorns), forming the upper and speaking from the second harmonic  sounding a minor third, and a whole tone lower, while the bass in B_b (equivalent to the euphonium) and bass tuba in E_b (bombardon) and contra-bass, an octave below the B_b bass, form the lower and speak from the fundamental . (See TUBA.) The tone-colour of the lower group is broader and heavier than that of the upper. The difference between the baritone and the euphonium, both in B_b and of the same pitch and compass, may be compared to the difference between the baritone and bass voices. Although the lower group can take three octaves easily, the average easy compass of the upper is about two octaves.

The valve system of the saxhorn is arranged in such manner that the depression of the second valve flattens the pitch a semitone, the depression of the first valve flattens it a tone, and the third valve a tone and a half. Whatever the normal pitch of the instrument, the second note of the harmonic series is written as middle c' when the treble clef is used, but when the bass clef is employed the notes are written as sounded. The harmonic scale obtained from the unaltered length of the instrument is supplemented when three valves are used singly and in combination, by six other similar scales, and by this means a complete chromatic scale can be produced.

are required, and to obtain them a fourth valve, altering the pitch two and half tones, is usually employed. (For explanation of certain inaccuracies due to the use of valves in combination see VALVE.)

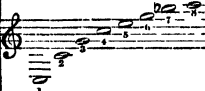

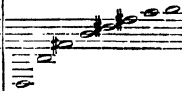

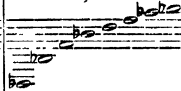

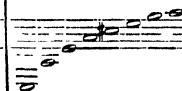

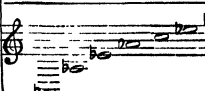

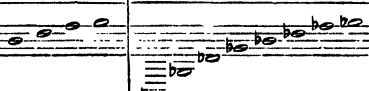

The instruments are sometimes pitched in F instead of E_b and in C instead of B_b when required for use in the orchestra. As stated above, the second note in the harmonic series is written as middle C when the treble clef is used, the actual pitch of the note for each of the instruments named being as here shown :

In every case, however, the note written as middle C is known as the 'low C' of the instrument, the octave below is the 'pedal C,' and the octave above, or No. 4 in the harmonic series, is known as 'middle C.' 'Top C' or No. 8 in the harmonic series is rarely passed.

There can be no doubt that the inventor of the saxhorn added greatly to the compass, richness and flexibility of the military brass and reed bands. (See WIND BAND.) But it is

SCHEME OF FINGERING FOR THE SAXHORN

OPEN NOTES.		VALVE NOTES.

2nd and 3rd valves.		1st and 3rd valves.		1st, 2nd, and 3rd valves.

It will be observed, on comparing the notes on the first and last groups of the scheme, that there is a gap between the open pedal C (No. 1) and the G_b above it, produced by the combined use of the 1st, 2nd and 3rd valves, but this is of no practical consequence on the alto, tenor and baritone instruments, as the quality of the extreme low notes is poor. With the basses (euphoniums and tubas), however, the case is different, as the notes of the pedal octave a question whether the tone of these powerful auxiliaries blends so well with the stringed instruments as that of the trumpet, French horn and trombone—and hence their comparative neglect.

Sax's first advice to players exhibits the power of his new instruments—that, namely, of playing in every key without using 'crooks,' as in the French horn and trumpet. (See HORN.) He also attacked the problem of true intonation in valve instruments, by means of what he terms a compensator. Besides these improvements he planned all the tubes and mechanism on a far sounder acoustical basis than had been attempted in the fortuitous and disconnected contrivances of former periods. The valve or piston was indeed known, but was open to the objection stated above, and was at best but a clumsy machine. He unquestionably simplified it by causing fewer turns and corners to interfere with the free course of the vibrating column of air. It is to be noted, however, that all the instruments of the Sax family, like the ordinary cornet-à-pistons, utilise the harmonic octave below that in which the natural trumpet and French horn speak; indeed, as said, the three lowest can speak from the fundamental, and thus obtain power and facility somewhat at the expense of quality.

Sax did not aim at designing or improving instruments of the trumpet and horn qualities only, but rather at adapting improved valves systematically to brass instruments of the bugle type ranging in pitch from soprano to contrabass, the lower pitched members of the family being substitutes for the imperfect serpents, ophicleides and other bass horns then in use. The power and facility of tone production of the instruments known as saxhorns, whether made by Sax or by other makers who have followed up his ideas, should therefore be compared with that obtainable on these keyed instruments, rather than with the quality of French horns and trumpets. The cornet is an instrument standing by itself, as a hybrid between the trumpet and the flügel-horn, and its analogy with saxhorns, as now understood, cannot be pushed beyond the fact that the free use of the second octave in the harmonic series is common to it and to them.

It is to open-air music that we must look to understand the change that has been brought about by the introduction of the saxhorns. Granting that with the exception of the bass tubas, nothing distinctive has been added to the orchestra by them, it yet remains that popular music has been revolutionised, for military bands have been reorganised, and the brass bands which are so largely instrumental in introducing good music to the masses have become possible. W. H. S.; addns. D. J. B.

SAXOPHONE, an instrument invented by Adolphe Sax about 1840, introduced officially into the French army bands, July 31, 1845, and registered by Sax, June 22, 1846. It consists essentially of a conical brass tube furnished with about twenty lateral orifices covered by keys, and with six studs or finger-plates for the first three fingers of either hand, and is played by means of a mouthpiece and single reed of the clarinet kind. (See PLATE XVII. Nos. 1, 2.) In addition to lateral holes giving the scale, two small holes opened by keys, and known as 'pipes' or 'speakers,' are also provided, and are used for the production of the octaves. The saxophones generally in use are the soprano in $b\flat$, the alto in $e\flat$, the tenor in $B\flat$, the baritone in $E\flat$, and the bass in $B\flat$. A soprano in $e\flat$ is sometimes made, and c and f are occasionally used for the pitch notes instead of $b\flat$ and $e\flat$ respectively. Those most used are the alto and tenor varieties. In French military bands, however, five or more are in use; having to a great degree superseded the more difficult but more flexible clarinet, and having quite replaced the bassoon. (See WIND BAND.)

The compass of the saxophone as generally recognised is from b to f''' , but all the members of the family are frequently made with an extension of the bell for $b\flat$, which note is obtained by the closing of an extra open-standing key. The two highest keys, giving e''' and f''' , are, however, seldom fitted to any but the alto and tenor instruments. The key-system for the right hand is similar to that of the Boehm flute, but for the left hand approaches more nearly to that of the ordinary oboe. The fundamental sounds from $b\flat$ or $b\sharp$ to $c''\sharp$ are obtained by the successive opening of the lateral holes, and by means of the two octave or 'pipe' keys the compass is carried up from d''' to $c'''\sharp$. The four highest notes, d''' , $e'''\flat$, e''' and f''' , are produced by four keys on the upper part of the instrument, used exclusively for these notes. Since its introduction, many improved or alternative fingerings have been designed for and adopted on the saxophone; among these are, an extension downwards to $A\flat$ by means of a second open-standing key, shake keys from e' to f' , $f'\sharp$ to $g'\sharp$, $b'\flat$ to $b'\sharp$, and a key giving the fourth from c''' to f''' . The tenor saxophone in C is also in growing use as a melody instrument.

The saxophone, though inferior in compass, quality and power of articulation to the clarinet and basset-horn, and especially to the bassoon, has great value in military combinations. It reproduces on a magnified scale something of the violoncello quality, and gives great sustaining power to the full chorus of brass instruments, by introducing a mass of harmonic overtones wanting in Sax's other contrivance. The tone of the soprano saxophone is somewhat strident, but the general quality of all combines the 'vocal' and the 'string' characteristics, and undoubtedly bridges over the gap between the older established 'reed' instruments and the 'brass.' There is a growing use of the instrument in British military bands, consequent upon a revised scheme of instrumentation authorised by Col. Somerville, Commandant of the Royal Military School of Music in 1923; while for the performance of popular dance music it has had a great vogue in recent years.

In the orchestra it has not been much employed except in France, where it was introduced by Kastner in 1844 in 'Le dernier roi de Juda,' and subsequently by Meyerbeer, Thomas, Saint-Saëns, Bizet and Vincent d'Indy. Strauss employed a quartet of saxophones in his 'Domestic Symphony.' Joseph Holbrooke has written for them a good deal.

SAXO-TROMBA. In addition to the SAXHORN (q.v.), Adolphe SAX also designed a family of brass valve instruments, having, as the title suggests, a tube mainly cylindrical so as to produce the effect of a valve trombone. They were originally made in the model of the baritone, upright, so as to be suitable for mounted military bands, but have quite fallen out of use. The tone-quality lay between that of the bugle and the trumpet.

One of her most successful impersonations was Wania in Glinka's 'Vie pour le Czar.' She had frequent engagements in Italy, St. Petersburg, Moscow, Vienna, North and South America, etc. In Sept. 1875 she married Signor Lolli, a gentleman of Ferrara.

SCALE (Lat. and Ital. scala = ladder; Fr. gamme; Ger. Tonleiter = sound-ladder). A scale is a theoretical statement of the notes employed by convention in music. Scale is in itself an intimate fusion of melody and harmony. The music of any period tends to fall into certain accepted melodic figures (melody), and these are related to a central tonic note (harmony). These two constitute a convention, which alters as time goes on, and scale therefore has a history. (See HARMONY.)

Almost all the peoples of the earth have recognised the fourth as a starting-point. This they filled in variously, and, as their musical experience grew, they extended their compass by means of a second fourth similarly filled.

The point at which they unconsciously aimed was to have the maximum number of notes consonant, and that is brought about by having the two tetrachords similar. The Greeks, among others, realised this, though they also recognised other 'mixed' scales in which the tetrachords were dissimilar. (See GREEK MUSIC.) Their typical scale was and though their tonic was originally E or A, they found before long that any note could be the tonic. The music of the Latin Church (10th to 16th centuries), from which grew the whole body of later European music, adopted, or at any rate coincided with, the Greek in a general way, and their scales were arranged in a system of Modes or Tones. (See MODES, ECCLESIASTICAL.) These we may rearrange in a harmonic order. (The tonic in each case is C, with the dominant to the right of it, and the subdominant to the left.)

Of the two extreme modes, the Lydian as such was practically never used, and the Phrygian was rare in polyphonic music. The other settled down into two groups: (1) The Mixolydian and Ionian, in which we recognise our major scale, and (2) the Æolian and Dorian, in which, if the leading note (B) is optionally sharpened, we find our three minors—the 'descending' with A♭, B♭; the 'ascending' with A♯, B♯; and the 'harmonic' with A♭, B♯. That is the state of things in the Handel-Bach period, when a good deal of major is really Mixolydian and a good deal of minor is really Dorian.

The classical period—say, from the 'B minor Mass' to the 'Deutsches Requiem'—definitely fixed major and minor, whose exact intonation is given under INTERVAL. Since then the scale seems to some to have altered, but whether the terms 'Whole Tone' and 'duodecimal,' by which that alteration is described, are anything more than a change of nomenclature, it is too soon to say. It should be remembered that EQUAL TEMPERAMENT (q.v.), to which they appeal for their justification, was in full swing during the classical period, and yet that Mozart entirely, and Beethoven for the most part, wrote with Just Intonation for their premiss. Equal temperament is only a melodic alteration which, without making the harmonic basis unrecognisable, permits modulation on a keyboard which cannot adjust itself to the needs of the moment; but voices and strings, which can adjust, recur to JUST INTONATION (q.v.) whenever the harmonic import outweighs the melodic. (Cf. HARMONY.) A. H. F. S.

SCALETTA, ORAZIO (b. Crema, mid-16th cent.; d. Mantua, c. 1630). He stood in high repute as a composer, and received many marks of distinction from ruling sovereigns, while the Duke Gonzaga had a medal struck in his honour. In 1611 he was maestro di cappella at the principal church of Salò. A small book of his on musical theory for the use of students appeared in a large number of editions. He composed masses, madrigals, motets, sacred and secular songs. (See list in Q.-L.) He died of the plague. E. v. d. s.

SCANDELLO (SCANDELLIUS, SCANDELLI), ANTONIO (b. Brescia, 1517; d. Dresden, Jan. 18, 1580). In 1553 he was already resident in Dresden and a member of the Hofkapelle, but he often returned to visit his native place; in 1567, on account of the plague, he and his family left Dresden and spent four months in Brescia. In 1575 six Italians are mentioned as being members of the Dresden

Hofkapelle: 'welsche Instrumentisten in der Musica,' among them Antonius Scandellus, his brother Angelus Scandellus and Benedict Tola, the painter, whose daughter Agnes became Scandello's second wife in June 1568.¹ The Italians, receiving higher pay than the Germans, were even then arousing feelings of jealousy, which later resulted in open quarrels and opposition.² In 1555, Scandello, with 250 fl. 16 grs. 9 pf. a year, was receiving a larger salary than the Kapellmeister, Matthias Le Maistre, who had only 204 fl. 7 grs. 9 pf. It is also curious to note that the Italian players were paid on a higher scale than singers from the Netherlands, the highest salary to the latter only amounting to 120 fl.³ It is true that the player was expected to show facility on a large variety of instruments; Scandello himself was a noted zinke (or cornett) player, besides being already a composer of some repute.

In 1566 Scandello became assistant Kapellmeister to the ageing Le Maistre, and on his retirement was appointed Kapellmeister, Feb. 12, 1568, when his salary altogether amounted to 400 fl. a year, a large sum for those days. A letter addressed to the Kapellmeister on Jan. 13, 1579, gives leave to his brother Angelo to go to Venice for three months, to collect some debts. He retained his post until his death. One of his sons, August, was also a member of the Dresden Hofkapelle.

Three motets for six voices, dated 1551, in a manuscript in the Dresden Library, are probably Scandello's earliest compositions. Next comes the Mass for six voices, in commemoration of the death of the Elector Moritz of Saxony, July 9, 1553, at the battle of Sievershausen. In the 'Inventarium' of the Kapelle music drawn up by the Dresden Kapellmeister, Johann Walther, Oct. 16, 1554, for the use of his successor, Matthias Le Maistre, this Mass is mentioned as being in six little printed part-books: 'VI. kleine gedruckte Partes in pergament, darinnen das Epitaphium Electoris Mauricii Antonii Scandelli.'⁴ At the present time only a manuscript copy of it is known, made in Torgau, in 1562, by one Moritz Bauerbach of Pirna, tenorist in the Dresden Kapelle; very possibly it was owing to the suggestion of Johann Walther, then living in retirement at Torgau, that Bauerbach wrote it. The manuscript⁵ was formerly in the Pirna Stadt-Bibliothek, but is now in the Dresden Staat-Bibliothek.

Especial mention must be made of the Passion music⁶ and the story of the Resurrection, which were in all probability composed before 1561. Scandello some years later refers to them in a document dated July 15, 1573; they were therefore in existence some fifty years before Heinrich Schütz's great works were published, his 'Auferstehung' in 1623, and his 'Passionen nach Johannis' not until 1664. A manuscript copy of Scandello's work, dated 1593, formerly at Grimma, now in the Dresden Library, is entitled 'Passio et Resurrectio Domini nostri Jesu Christi ab Antonio Scandello compositae'; the scribe was Johann Gengenbach of Colditz. It only gives the tenor part of the choruses; the music is otherwise complete. The manuscript of the tenor part-book now in the same library, but formerly at Löbau, contains the 'Johannisspassion' and the 'Auferstehungsgeschichte,' without mention of the composer's name. Another Löbau manuscript contains a complete copy of the 'Auferstehung'; this part of the composition was the first to appear in print. It was published by Samuel Besler at Breslau, 1612, with the title,

'Gaudii paschalis Jesu Christi reditivi in Gloriae laudae Resurrectionis ejus laetam celebrationem Relatio historica à quatuor Evangelistis consignata, etc., durch Samuel Beslerom, etc.'

Besler alludes in the preface to the composer, Antonius Scandellus, 'der berühmte musicus.' It was again published in an adapted form by O. S. Harnisch in 1621. In the same year Besler published the Passion music:

'Ant. Scandellii . . . Passio, Das Leyden unsers Herrn Jesu Christi nach dem II. Evangelisten Johanne. Durch S. B. den Chorstimme vernehret, Breslau, 1621.

It is from this edition that the chorus parts, missing in the manuscripts, have been filled in. The Passion opens with the words in four-part writing, 'Das Leyden unsers Herrn Jesu Christi wie das der heilige Evangelist Johannes beschreibet.' Throughout, each individual character is represented by a duo, trio or quartet, with the exception of the Evangelist, who is given the traditional recitative. The words of Christ are invariably set as a solo quartet, those of Peter as a trio, and so on. The concluding chorus and the short, quick outcries of the people are all in five-part writing; possibly the opening chorus should be the same. There is no accompaniment (see PASSION MUSIC). For a comparison of the Schütz and Scandello works see SCHÜTZ, also M.f.M. 1882, p. 37, where also the identity of the anonymous 'Auferstehung' published by Vopelius in the Neu Leipziger Gesangbuch, 1682, pp. 311-65,¹ with that of Scandello's is pointed out. Scandello was the first composer to set the story of the Resurrection to music, and he followed very closely the lines laid down in his Passion music.

As to his other compositions, it may be noted that although his Italian madrigals, published 1566 and 1577, are purely vocal works with no accompaniment, the German Lieder, both sacred and secular, published 1568, 1570 and 1575, may be sung to an instrumental accompaniment. Examples are given in Ambros's Geschichte der Musik, v., 'Bonzorno, madonna,' for four voices; 'Der Wein der schmeckt mir' for six voices; and 'Nu komm der Heiden Heiland' for five voices.

SCARIA, EMIL (b. Graz, Styria, Sept. 18, 1840; d. Blasewitz, near Dresden, July 22, 1886), studied at the Conservatorium, Vienna, under Gontliuommo, made his début at Pest as St. Bris in the 'Huguenots,' and afterwards sang at Brunn and Frankfurt. In 1862 he came to London for the purpose of further study under Garcia, and sang at the Crystal Palace, on Apr. 5, and at a concert given later by Franz Abt, who procured him an engagement at Dessau. He next played at Leipzig (1863-65) and from 1865-72 at Dresden. From 1872-86 he was engaged at Vienna, where he established his reputation as a versatile singer and actor in both baritone and bass parts, but best in the latter, as his 'carefully deadened high notes form so great a contrast to the vigorous notes of his lower and middle register.'

On leave of absence he sang in the principal German cities, in Italian opera in Russia, etc.

1 Handel.

He sang the part of Escamillo to the Carmen of Bertha Ehnn, Oct. 23, 1875, when Bizet's opera was first given outside France. Among his later parts were Hans Sachs ('Meister-singer'), Wotan ('Nibelungen'), for which character he was originally selected by Wagner for Bayreuth, and which he sang at Her Majesty's Theatre in 1882, Micheli ('Wasser-träger'), Marcel, Bertram and (1879) Senechal ('Jean de Paris'). Finest of all was his Gurnemanz in 'Parsifal,' which he created at Bayreuth in 1882; he sang it at the concert performance of the work in the Albert Hall, London, in 1884. He became insane in 1886, and died the same year. A. Neumann's Erinnerungen an Richard Wagner, 1907, gives many amusing stories of him.

SCARLATTI, (1) ALESSANDRO (b. Palermo, Sicily, 1659²; d. Naples, Oct. 24, 1725). It has generally been assumed that his birthplace was Trapani, on the strength of an alleged autograph score of his opera 'Pompeo,' which both Fétis and Florino supposed to have seen while in the possession of Gaspare Selvaggi of Naples. Selvaggi's library was bought by the Marquis of Northampton, and presented by him in 1843 to the British Museum; but no score of 'Pompeo' is to be found there now, nor is it included in the MS. catalogue of the collection drawn up for the donor at the time. The only known score of 'Pompeo' is in the Royal Library at Brussels, and formerly belonged to Fétis; but it is not autograph, and does not bear the inscription mentioned. This inscription, by the way, is given by Fétis as 'Musica del Signor Alessandro Scarlatti da Trapani,' and by Florino as 'Pompeo del Cav. Alessandro Scarlatti di Trapani.' Florino's version can hardly be accepted as genuine, since 'Pompeo' appeared in 1683, while the composer did not receive the title of Cavaliere until many years later. The official record of his birth or baptism has hitherto eluded the most careful research. The fact, however, that he was born in Sicily is proved conclusively by statements in the printed libretti of his early operas, and in MS. chronicles which record their performance, and speak of the composer as a Sicilian. A number of documents have recently been discovered which prove beyond dispute that he always described himself as a native of Palermo. His father, who may probably have been a musician, since all his children except the eldest daughter are known to have been musicians, was named Pietro; his wife's name was Eleonora d'Anato. He left Palermo in 1672 with his five children, and established himself at Rome; the two youngest sons, Francesco and Tommaso, were not taken to Rome, but left at Naples, where both remained until they were grown up. This suggests that Pietro or his wife may have had relatives at Naples who would take charge of them. Alessandro is traditionally supposed to have been a pupil of Carissimi in Rome, although that master died when Scarlatti was 15 years old. His early compositions show the influence of Legrenzi, and more especially of Stradella, whose best work has been shown to have been done in Rome; and his early chamber cantatas, of which some are probably earlier in date than even his first operas, are generally to be found in MS. alongside of similar music by composers who worked in Rome and northern Italy.

Pietro did not live long after his migration to Rome. He was already dead when Alessandro married Antonia Anzalone, a native of Rome, in the church of S. Andrea delle Fratte on Apr. 12, 1678. His eldest son, who as usual bore his grandfather's name, PIETRO FILIPP (5), was born on Jan. 5, 1679. Another son, Benedetto Bartolomeo, was born at Rome on Aug. 24 of the following year; he died at Naples in 1684. A third son, Raimondo, seems also to have been born at Rome; nothing is known of him except that he was living in Rome in 1717, when he acted for his brother Domenico in a legal matter. His daughter Flaminia was probably born at Rome, and possibly also Cristina, who was presumably a daughter of Alessandro, as she stood godmother to one of his grand-daughters in 1714. At what date Scarlatti migrated to Naples it is difficult to ascertain. He stated himself that he lived 'seven or eight years' in Rome; but his sister Melchiorra, who was the eldest of the family, says that she went to live in Naples in Oct. 1682, and it might seem probable that they went there together. But the Neapolitan libretto of 'Pompeo' (Feb. 1684) still describes Scarlatti as maestro di cappella to the Queen of Sweden.

His first known opera was 'L' errore innocente ovvero Gli equivoci nel sembiante,' produced Feb. 8, 1679, in Rome at the Collegio Clementino. This work won him the interest of Christina Queen of Sweden, who even asserted her protection of him in defiance of the Papal representatives, Scarlatti being in bad odour at the Vatican on account of the misconduct of his sister with an ecclesiastic. In the libretto of his second opera, 'L' honestà negli Amori' (1680), he is described as maestro di cappella to Queen Christina. Both these operas are on a small scale; 'Pompeo' (Rome, 1683) was probably his first attempt at opera seria in the grand manner. In Feb. 1684 'Pompeo' was given at Naples, where 'Gli equivoci' had also been heard, and on the 17th of the same month he was appointed maestro di cappella to the Viceroy, his brother FRANCESCO (2) receiving a post as violinist in the same chapel royal. The two brothers owed their appointments to the influence of their sister, Anna Maria, an opera singer, who was the mistress of a court official; and the affair seems to have caused some indignation at Naples, not so much on grounds of morality as from motives of chauvinism. That Scarlatti was regarded as a stranger in Naples seems a sufficient proof that he did not receive his musical education there, as Neapolitan historians of music have tried to maintain. His famous son GIUSEPPE DOMENICO (3) was born at Naples, Oct. 26, 1685, and three more children, Caterina, Carlo and Gian Francesco, in 1690, 1692 and 1695. From this time to 1702 he remained at Naples, occupied principally in the composition of operas for production at the royal palace or at the royal theatre of San Bartolomeo. He was also much in demand as a composer of music for aristocratic entertainments, and soon fell into a popular and hasty style of work. His chamber music, however, shows that even at this time his artistic ideals were much higher, and by 1702 Naples had become so irksome to him, both for musical and financial reasons, that he determined to try his fortunes elsewhere. His salary was in arrear, and the political disturbances consequent on the War of the Spanish Succession rendered his position still more insecure. On June 14 he went with Domenico to Florence, where they enjoyed the patronage of Ferdinand III., son of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, a prince who was enthusiastically devoted to music. For his private theatre at Pratolino Scarlatti composed several operas, and the Archivio Mediceo at Florence contains a very interesting correspondence between the prince and the musician on the subject of these works. Ferdinand, however, was not disposed to offer him any permanent post, and Scarlatti, being resolved not to return to Naples, accepted the humble position of assistant maestro di cappella at the church of S. Maria Maggiore in Rome. This was obtained for him by Cardinal Pietro Ottoboni, who had taken an interest in him for some twelve years or more, and who also made him his private maestro di cappella. Nevertheless, Scarlatti seems to have been no happier in Rome than in Naples, judging from the contempt for both places which he expresses in his letters to Ferdinand. He had been forced to write down to the level of a Spanish viceroy's taste for the opera-house at Naples; at Rome the Popes had done their best to suppress opera altogether on grounds of public morality. This must, no doubt, have been a severe blow to Scarlatti, whose real genius sought expression in dramatic music, although it found vent in chamber music when its natural outlet was obstructed.

On Apr. 26, 1706, Scarlatti was admitted a member of the Arcadian Academy, under the name of Terpendro Politeo, Corelli and Pasquini being elected at the same time. Crescimbeni¹ gives a charming account of their musical performances at these pastoral assemblies. To this period of Scarlatti's activity belong many of his beautiful chamber cantatas, and a certain amount of church music. In May 1707 Antonio Foggia died, and Scarlatti succeeded him as principal maestro at the church of S. Maria Maggiore. He continued to compose operas for Ferdinand de' Medici while living in Rome, but although his voluminous correspondence about these works has been preserved, the scores of them have unfortunately disappeared. In spite of all his efforts to write pleasing music, he seems to have been too severe for the prince's taste, and in 1707 he was dropped in favour of Pertti.

In this year he produced two operas, 'Mitridate Eupatore' and 'Il trionfo della Libertà,' at Venice (Teatro S. Giovanni Crisostomo), going there in person to direct them. These works are on a larger scale than any of his previous operas, and the first is one of the best that he ever wrote; the second has come down to us in so fragmentary a condition that it is hardly possible to form a fair judgment upon it. In all probability Scarlatti remained at Venice to the end of the Carnival, and thence made his way to Urbino, travelling, there is reason to believe, by way of Ferrara. The reigning pope (Clement XI.) was a native of Urbino, and the Albani family, to which he belonged, were nobles of great importance in that country. The resident representative of the family, Cardinal Orazio Albani, was interested in music, and although no trace of Alessandro Scarlatti is now to be found there, the Albani library possesses several libretti of Domenico's operas, as well as a few musical treasures of an earlier date. Scarlatti remained at Urbino until September, but probably returned to Rome for Christmas, since he wrote a Mass with orchestral accompaniment for this festival.

Although Scarlatti had left Naples in June 1702, his post at the royal chapel was not filled up until Oct. 1704, when a certain Gaetano Veneziano was appointed. In Dec. 1707 he was succeeded by Francesco Mancini; but towards the end of 1708, Cardinal Grimani, the Austrian Viceroy, made an attempt to persuade Scarlatti to return. It seems that Scarlatti, as might have been expected, declined to accept the post of deputy first organist, which was offered him, having been at the head of the chapel for nearly twenty years, and did not return until he had been restored to the office of maestro di cappella, with an increased stipend. Mancini was compensated with the title of Vice-maestro, and the right of succeeding eventually to the post held by Scarlatti. It is doubtful, however, whether he re-established himself definitely at Naples until 1713. Although described in the libretti of 'L' Amor volubile e tiranno' (1709) and 'La principessa fedele' (1710) as Maestro della Real Cappella, he does not appear to have written anything more for Naples during the next three years, and on May 27, 1713, the new Viceroy, Count Daun, made a special confirmation of the appointment given him by Cardinal Grimani. This action secured him for Naples for the next few years.

During this second period of work in Naples Scarlatti was at the height of his fame. He produced operas on a magnificent scale at the court theatre; 'Tigrane' (1715) and its contemporaries, though less interesting than his later operas, are brilliant and effective—the leisurely work of a man mellowed by success, not the hurried output of one struggling to retain the favour of his patrons at any sacrifice of artistic ideals. To this period also belong some oratorios, notably 'San Filippo Neri' (1713), and several serenatas for state occasions. The honour of knighthood, which is first vouched for by the appearance of his name with the title Cavaliere in the libretto of 'Carlo Rè d' Alemagna' (1716), was probably conferred upon him in recognition of the serenata and opera which he composed to celebrate the birth of the Archduke Leopold. It has been suggested that he received the order of the Golden Spur from the Pope, at the request of Cardinal Ottoboni; but if this were the case it is only natural to suppose that it would have been conferred upon him while in the Cardinal's service, or even under the pontificate of the Cardinal's uncle, Alexander VIII. It may, however, be pointed out that in this year, 1716, he composed a Mass (known as 'Missa Clementina II.') for Clement XI. In 1718 he made his one attempt at pure comic opera, 'Il trionfo dell'onore,' performed at the Teatro dei Fiorentini.

The interest of the Neapolitans in Scarlatti's music seems to have waned about this time. After 'Cambise' (1719) no more of his operas were heard there, and it is probable that he established himself in Rome, since his stipend as maestro di cappella at Naples was not paid to him any more, although he retained the title. At Rome he had a number of admirers sufficient to undertake the production of a series of operas which exhibit the composer in a still more advanced phase of artistic development. The first of these was 'Telemaco' (1718), which was followed by 'Marco Attilio Regolo' (1719), 'Tito Sempronio Gracco' and 'Turno Aricino' (1720), apparently not so much revivals as entire recompositions of two earlier operas, and finally his 114th and last opera, 'Griselda' (1721). Since the autograph score of this last informs us that it was composed for Prince Ruspoli, we may suppose that that nobleman (who had interested himself in Scarlatti's work when he was living in Rome before) was the principal organiser of the performances, which took place at the 'Sala degli illustrissimi Signori Capranica.' In 1721

Clement XI. was succeeded by Innocent XIII., and in November of that year Scarlatti was commissioned by the Portuguese Ambassador to compose a pastoral for the Pope's formal entrance into the Vatican. This appears to have been his last work for Rome, where he had distinguished himself in sacred music as well as in opera, producing a fine Mass with orchestra and other works for St. Cecilia's Day at the request of Cardinal Acquaviva, who had a special interest in the church of St. Cecilia in Trastevere. In 1722 he seems to have visited Loreto, where he is supposed to have composed a setting of the psalm 'Memento Domine David' and an Ave Maria. The following year probably saw him back at Naples. He set to work on a serenata for the marriage of the Prince of Stigliano, but appears to have left it unfinished, as the first part only has come down to us. There is every reason to suppose that he was now living in complete retirement, forgotten by his own generation, and regarded as a crabbed and eccentric harmonist by even so learned a musician as the German theorist Heinichen.

In 1724 J. A. Hasse, having quarrelled with Porpora, came to Scarlatti as a pupil; the old man was attracted by the boy's amiable disposition, and during the few remaining months of Scarlatti's life the two musicians regarded each other with the affection of father and son. Quantz visited Naples in 1725 and stayed with Hasse, whom he begged to introduce him to Scarlatti; Scarlatti, however, merely replied to Hasse's request, 'My son, you know that I cannot endure players of wind instruments, for they all blow out of tune.' Hasse succeeded eventually in inducing him to receive Quantz, who heard him play the harpsichord 'in a learned manner'; Scarlatti even accompanied him in a solo and composed a couple of flute pieces for him. He died on Oct. 24 of the same year, and was buried in the church of Montesanto. His epitaph is said to have been written by Cardinal Ottoboni, and runs as follows:

Scarlatti is one of the most important figures, not only in the history of opera, but in the entire history of music. He is the most important of that group of composers who succeeded the first pioneers of the monodic style, based upon the modern tonal system, and who moulded and developed a musical idiom which served as the language of musical expression down to the days of Beethoven. In his early work he is naturally under the influence of older composers—Carissimi, Luigi Rossi, Stradella and Legrenzi; indeed, the vague tradition of his having studied in Parma might associate him with the last-named composer as a pupil. His first operas and his early cantatas and church music have, moreover, a certain harshness and crudity which reveals the beginner; Stradella's operas and Rossi's cantatas, though old-fashioned in their phraseology, are much more mature and finished in their execution. It is interesting to compare Scarlatti with Purcell, who was his exact contemporary; Purcell was also under Italian influence, and we find in the young Scarlatti many points of resemblance to him, notably in the treatment of harmony—both composers showing a tendency to think polyphonically, though melodiously, and being either indifferent to, or more probably taking a positive pleasure in, the painful dissonances resulting from their unbending logic. But with his appointment as maestro di cappella at Naples, Scarlatti modified his style. Here he was forced to work with the utmost rapidity, and to work for popular success. The fine detail of his earlier work is swept aside; the curious forms, derived in part from the ground-bass, in which he had once delighted, are abandoned, and he poured forth a long series of operas in which the grace and vigour of his best moments eventually degenerated into insipidity and vulgarity. Three important features characterise this somewhat unfortunate period of his career. The da capo aria in ternary form (ABA), though of course not an invention of Scarlatti, is now definitely established as the only type of operatic aria, to the entire exclusion of all other forms. The form of overture known as the 'Italian' overture was introduced in 1696 for the revival of an earlier opera, 'Dal male il bene,' and, though subject to much development, remains constant in its main outlines to the end of the Metastasio period of Italian opera; and lastly, the opera 'Olimpia vendicata' (1686) presents us with the earliest known example of accompanied recitative. From about 1686-96 Scarlatti's operas have a facile grace that is often far removed from triviality; the operas 'La Statira' (1690), 'La Rosaura' (1690) and 'Pirro e Demetrio' (1694), which was performed in London in an English adaptation in 1708, were deservedly popular in their day, and contain music which has even survived down to our own. About 1697 a change comes over Scarlatti's style, due in all probability to the influence of Giovanni Bononcini, whose 'Trionfo di Camilla' was performed at Naples in that year. Bononcini had a certain genius for airs of a spirited martial type—'L'esperto nocchiero' from 'Astarto' is a good specimen—and no doubt they pleased the court, since they were easy to understand, and even a vice-roy could beat time to them. Scarlatti, either on his own initiative or more probably in obedience to orders from above, set to work on the same lines, and from 1697–1702 turned out a number of inferior operas, full of airs that are either sugary and cloying or pompous and stilted. Their only redeeming features, as a rule, are the comic scenes, which are trivial but certainly humorous. Of this phase 'Eraclea' (1700) and 'Laodicea e Berenice' (1701) are the best examples.

There can be little doubt that Scarlatti's most serious work was being put into the operas which he composed for Ferdinand de' Medici. His letters give a detailed account of the composition of 'Turmo Arcino' (1704), 'Lucio Manlio' (1705) and 'Il Gran Tamerlano' (1706). He speaks with enthusiasm of Stampiglia's libretto to the second of these, and appears to have considered the opera the best that he had hitherto composed, although each act was written in a fortnight. The scores of these operas, however, have entirely disappeared, and not even scattered fragments of them can be traced. To what great height he was capable of rising at this stage may be seen in the opera 'Mitridate Eupatore,' composed for Venice in 1707. Although the interest is not equally sustained all through, the work is a very remarkable example of the classical manner at its grandest. The libretto is also remarkable, as depending entirely upon its political interest. There are no love scenes at all; but the devotion of the heroine for her lost brother is expressed with a passionate sincerity that far transcends anything that Scarlatti had written before. J. S. Bach at his best has hardly surpassed the dignified recitative 'O Mitridate mio,' followed by the magnificent aria 'Cara tomba' in Act iv.

With his return to Naples in 1709 Scarlatti entered upon yet another stage of development. The deep poetic intention of 'Mitridate' is indeed seldom apparent; but the experience of former years had given the composer command of every resource, and the honour in which he was held at the Austrian court enabled him to write in a style more worthy of himself. We may regret the loss of that tender charm so characteristic of his early work, but we must admit the wonderful vigour and brilliance of such operas as 'La principessa fedele' (1710), 'Il Ciro' (Rome, 1712), 'Scipione nelle Spagne' (Naples, 1714) and, above all, 'Tigrane' (1715). In these operas we may notice not only the more extended development of the ternary aria forms, but also an advance towards a more modern treatment of the orchestra. Scarlatti's early operas are generally scored for a band of strings, supported, of course, by the harpsichord and other harmonic instruments, such as the lute, playing from the basso continuo, which in this case we can hardly call the 'figured' bass, since Italian accompanists were so fluent in improvisation that the composer could generally spare himself the trouble of indicating the harmony in the conventional shorthand. To this band are added occasionally trumpets, flutes, oboes and bassoons, not as regular constituents of the orchestra, but treated more as obligato instruments, with a view to special colour effects. The burden of the accompaniment rested on the harpsichord. Violin-playing was at the close of the 17th century still so primitive that the strings of an opera band could seldom be trusted with the delicate task of supporting a singer. In most cases they enter only to play the final noisy ritornello at the close of an air; sometimes they are given a share in the accompaniment, but treated as a group antiphonal to the harpsichord. Scarlatti, however, was evidently interested in the development of violin-playing, and as time went on he allotted to the strings a more important share of the work, stimulated, no doubt, by the influence of Corelli, who was thought by his contemporaries to be distinguished more as a conductor than as a composer. As early as 'Mitridate Eupatore' (1707) we may observe the tendency to reverse the principle of the earlier work; it is the strings (generally without double-basses) that accompany the voice, and the harpsichord that is reserved to add power and brilliance to the ritornelli. Moreover, Scarlatti's whole outlook becomes gradually less and less aggressively contrapuntal, the harsh dissonances of his boyhood are soon smoothed away, and the general scheme of his musical thought tends more to melody supported by harmony, although he showed to the end of his life that he regarded free counterpoint as the most intellectual style of expression. This point of view naturally influences his instrumentation, and causes his later scores to have much more affinity to the modern style of treating the orchestra.

A fifth and final period is exemplified in the series of operas written for Rome that began with 'Telemaco' and ended with 'Griselda.' Twenty years earlier Scarlatti had bitterly lamented the impossibility of producing operas in the city that had witnessed his first triumphs. But the passion for opera, which had attacked Rome no less than other Italian cities during the baroque period, was too serious to be stifled by the protests of clerical prudery, and Rome now showed him that here at last was an audience which could appreciate the full maturity of the genius which she had been the first to encourage. In these latest operas we see not only the furthest development of technical resource, but also the ripened fruits of emotional experience. Here at last is the whole Scarlatti; here at last he was able to place upon the stage something of that passionate tenderness and serious musical reasoning that he had for so many years brought to utterance only in the intimacy of his chamber cantatas, and exhibit the whole in all the glory of variegated orchestration, lighted up by the blaze of vocal coloratura.

Scarlatti has been remembered in modern times chiefly on account of his operas; but we cannot understand his complete development without a study of his chamber music. The chamber cantata was to the age of Rossi and Scarlatti what the pianoforte sonata or violin sonata was to the age of Beethoven and Brahms—the most intimate and the most intellectual form of music that could be produced. The degraded age of vocal virtuosity had not yet arrived; the singers were not merely the most agile performers upon the most perfect of instruments, but the most intellectual exponents of the art of music. Scarlatti, the greatest and almost the last of the great writers of chamber cantatas, practised in this form, as Beethoven did in the pianoforte sonata, from his earliest years to that of his death. Over five hundred of his cantatas have come down to us, representing every period of his life, and we may often see that for any given period, as with Beethoven's pianoforte sonatas, they represent the highest intellectual achievement of the moment. It is unfair to judge them by the standard of Schumann's 'Lieder'; they are not lyrical outbursts, sacrificing formality to the personal emotion of the poet, much less scenes taken out of operas, as has been suggested, but carefully designed studies in composition, often depending for their main interest on the working out of some interesting problem of modulation or of thematic development. Thus in 1712 he sent Gasparini two settings of the cantata 'Andate o miei sospiri' which had been set by Gasparini and sent to him by the composer. The first of these two settings is a beautiful specimen of Scarlatti's work at this period; the second was designed with a view to puzzling his correspondent with the most difficult modulations, both in the recitatives and in the airs. The work is difficult even to the modern reader, but only on account of the terseness of its thought. 'Awkward' and 'experimental' are epithets that could hardly ever be applied to Scarlatti, and his music often fails to interest the modern romantic reader because of the absolute mastery with which he solves his problems.

His instrumental chamber music is of less value. It was apparently traditional to treat

this branch of art in a more archaic style; the four 'Sonate a quattro' (string quartets), and even the twelve symphonies for small orchestra (1716), are more primitive in their methods than the sonatas of Corelli. He composed a certain amount of music for the harpsichord and organ, but it is for the most part straggling and ineffective, interesting only as showing a certain influence on the early work of his son. His best work for the harpsichord is a set of variations on the theme of Corelli's 'Follia'.¹

As a church composer Scarlatti is not at his best. The story of his having set the Mass two hundred times may be dismissed as a fable. Considering the vast quantity of other music of his that has survived, it can hardly be believed that as many as 190 masses should have been lost. Quantz is the only authority for this statement, and as he never mentions a single composition of Scarlatti's by name, his information deserves little credit. Of the ten surviving masses, the majority are in the strict style kept up to the end of the 18th century and called 'alla Palestrina,' though breaking gradually away from the manner of its illustrious model. Scarlatti treats discords with more freedom, and occasionally shows a more modern feeling for fugue; but his strict masses are on the whole uninteresting. Two masses with orchestra are important in the history of modern church music. The first (1707) is somewhat crude and ineffective, but the second (1720) is a worthy ancestor of the great masses of Bach and Beethoven. The miscellaneous church music calls for little comment. Roger of Amsterdam printed a collection of 'Concerti sacri' (about 1710), characterised by a Jesuitical brilliance which is meretricious, but certainly attractive; three motets for double choir, 'Tu es Petrus,' 'O magnum mysterium' and 'Volo, Pater' (about 1707), are broad and dignified; the little 'Laetatus sum' for four voices (printed by Proske) is a model of counterpoint in Leo's manner. The oratorios and secular serenatas are of very varying value, and show the same sort of tendencies as the operas. (See ORATORIO.)

Mention must also be made of Scarlatti as a teacher. The Regole per principianti, a MS. treatise on accompaniment, is of interest, as showing that its author was always liberal in his views on the theory of his art. He allows various harmonies (e.g. the use of a second inversion of a dominant seventh) which his contemporaries did not, admitting that not everybody would agree with him, but defending himself on the principle that such progressions sound well. To what extent he taught at Naples is not clear. The tendency of modern research is to indicate that the younger generation of composers at Naples were trained for the most part by Nicola Fago and Gaetano Greco; Hasse seems to have been almost the only one who came into intimate relations with him. His frequent absence from Naples must have been a serious interruption to teaching work, and in his latter years he was evidently quite forgotten by the Neapolitan public.

Nevertheless, Alessandro Scarlatti must certainly be regarded as the founder of the Neapolitan school of the 18th century. He was, of course, not the first teacher nor the first opera composer that appeared in Naples; but Provenzale, a man far inferior to his Venetian and Roman contemporaries, was much too insignificant to be the leader of a new movement. The real celebrity of Naples as an operatic centre dated from Scarlatti's appointment in 1683, and the long series of his operas performed there from 1683-1702, and from 1709-1719, during which periods he almost monopolised the stage of S. Bartolomeo, caused his artistic influence to be paramount there. But the unfortunate, though natural, consequence was that the younger generation of composers imitated him not at his ripest but at his most successful phase, so that, in spite of the earnest effort of Leo, the later Italian opera proceeded rapidly to that state of decadence against which Gluck finally led the reaction. For this reason Scarlatti has too often been represented as the first composer who took the downward step towards empty formalism and the prostitution of opera to the vanity of singers. This is gross injustice. We may regret that adverse circumstances compelled him to produce much that was unworthy of his best ideals; but the mass of chamber cantatas and the later operas show him to have been a thoroughly intellectual musician, a complete master of form in its minutest details, who made as severe demands upon the brains of his interpreters as upon their technical powers.

Scarlatti indeed is the founder of that musical language which has served the classical composers for the expression of their thoughts down to the close of the Viennese period. Thematic development, balance of melodic phrase, chromatic harmony—all the devices which the 17th century had tentatively introduced, are by him woven into a smooth and supple texture, which reached its perfection in one who, although he never knew his true master, was yet his best pupil—Mozart.

(2) FRANCESCO (b. ? Palermo, 1668), a brother of Alessandro, spent his early life at Naples, where he became violinist in the royal band in 1684. He married Rosalina

Albano in 1690, and in 1691 obtained leave to go to Palermo. He was in Vienna in 1715 and applied without success for the post of vice-Kapellmeister, in spite of the support of Fux. He was on the staff of the Royal Chapel in Naples again in 1719, but shortly afterwards came to London, where he gave a concert mainly of his own compositions, in Sept. 1720, at Hickford's Room. A Mass and Dixit Dominus by him, a 16, are in the Bodleian Library, dated 1702 and 1703 respectively. A Miserere a 5 is in the court library at Vienna, and some opera airs and cantatas in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge, and elsewhere. (See Q.-L.) E. J. D.

(3) GIUSEPPE DOMENICO (b. Naples, Oct. 26, 1685; d. there, 1757), son of Alessandro, first learned from his father, and later from Gasparini. He has been called a pupil of Bernardo Pasquini, but that seems most improbable, seeing that Pasquini was of the school of Palestrina, and wrote entirely in the contrapuntal style, whereas Domenico Scarlatti's chief interest is that he was the first composer who studied the peculiar characteristics of the free style of the harpsichord. Shedlock's suggestion that he was taught, or at least largely influenced, by Gaetano Greco is far more likely. His bold style was by no means appreciated in Italy, for Burney remarks 'that the harpsichord was so little played that it had not affected the organ, which was still played in the grand old traditional style. The first work on which Domenico is known to have been engaged was that of remodelling for Naples, in 1704, Polaroli's opera 'Irene' (Venice, 1695). At Naples Alessandro wrote to Ferdinand de' Medici on May 30, 1705:

'His talent found scope indeed, but it was not the sort of talent for that place. I send him away from Rome also, since Rome has no room to shelter music that lives here in beggary. This son of mine is an eagle whose wings are grown; he ought not to stay idle in the nest, and I ought not to hinder his flight. Since the virtuoso Nicolino, of Naples, is passing through Rome on his way to Venice, I have thought fit to send Domenico with him; and under the sole escort of his own artistic ability (which has made great progress since he was able to be with me and enjoy the honour of obeying Your Royal Highness's commands in person, three years ago), he sets forth to meet whatever opportunities may present themselves for making himself known—opportunities for which it is hopeless to wait in Rome nowadays.'

Domenico duly presented himself to the Prince with this letter, which is now in the Medici archives at Florence, and presumably continued his journey with Nicolino, at any rate as far as Venice. In 1708 he was in Venice studying with Gasparini, and making the acquaintance of Handel. Domenico seems to have accompanied Handel to Rome, for Cardinal Ottoboni held a kind of competition between the two, at which the victory was undecided on the harpsichord, but when it came to the organ, Scarlatti was the first to acknowledge his rival's superiority, declaring that he had no idea such playing as Handel's existed. The two became fast friends from that day; they remained together till Handel left Italy, and met again in London in 1720.

In 1709 he entered the service of Marie Casimire, Queen of Poland, and composed for her private theatre in Rome several operas: a dramma pastorale 'Sylvia' (libretto in the Paris Bibliothèque Nationale), which was followed by 'Orlando' (1711), 'Fatide in Sciro' (1712), 'Ifigenia in Aulide' and 'in Tauride' (1713), 'Amor d'un' ombra' and 'Narciso' (1714), and 'Amleto' (1715, Teatro Capranica), interesting as the first musical setting of that subject. Even in extreme old age Handel spoke with pleasure of D. Scarlatti, and Mainwaring¹ relates that when Scarlatti was in Spain, if his own playing was admired, he would turn the conversation on Handel's, crossing himself at the same time as a sign of his extreme reverence. In Jan. 1715 he succeeded Baj as maestro di cappella of St. Peter's in Rome, where he composed masses, Salve Reginas, etc. On Jan. 28, 1717, he obtained legally, somewhat against his father's wishes, his 'emancipation', i.e. his full legal independence of his father's control. This was probably in view of his journey to London. In 1719 he went to London, where his 'Narciso' was performed (May 30, 1720), and in 1721 to Lisbon, where he became a court favourite. The longing for home and kindred, however, drove him back to Naples, where Hasse heard him play the harpsichord in 1725.

In 1729 he was invited to the Spanish court, and appointed music-master to the Princess of the Asturias, whom he had formerly taught in Lisbon. Details of the later part of Scarlatti's life are curiously few, but a visit to Dublin² in the autumn of 1740, made perhaps at the suggestion of T. Roseingrave who had been in Italy, has been established. Two benefit concerts were arranged for him there early in 1741, and the fact that he contributed songs to two pasticcio operas, 'Alessandro in Persia' and 'Merope', in London, 1741-42, marks his return. According to the Gazetta musicale of Naples (Sept. 15, 1838) he returned to Naples in 1754, and died there in 1757. Being an inveterate gambler he left his family in great destitution, but Farinelli came to their assistance.³

As we have said, Scarlatti was in some sense the founder of modern execution, and his influence may be traced in Mendelssohn, Liszt and many other masters of the modern school. He made great use of the crossing of the hands, and produced entirely new effects by this means. His pieces, unlike the suites of Handel and his predecessors, were all short. Santini possessed 349 of them. Of these Scarlatti himself only published one book of thirty pieces, entitled 'Esercizii per gravicembalo', etc., printed according to Burney in Venice, but at any rate before Aug. 1746, when the Prince of the Asturias, whose name is on the title-page, ascended the throne. In the Fétis collection is a Paris edition, 'Pièces pour le clavecin,' two vols., published by Mme. Boivin (d. Sept. 1733) and Le Clerc.⁴ '42 Suites' of Lessons' were printed by John Johnson (at the Harp and Crown, Cheapside), London, under the supervision of Scarlatti's friend Roseingrave (between 1730 and 1737, when Roseingrave went out of his mind). In 1752 John Worgan obtained the sole licence to print certain new works by Domenico Scarlatti, and published them (at J. Johnson's, facing Bow Church, Cheapside). These were twelve sonatas, most of them new to England. Czerny's edition (Haslinger, Vienna, 1839), containing 200 pieces, was re-edited (Paris, Sauer, Girod) and revised by Mme. Farrenc from Roseingrave's edition and MSS. then in possession of Rimbauld. There are also 130 pieces in Farrenc's 'Trésor des pianistes' (1864); sixty sonatas are published by Breitkopf; and eighteen pieces, grouped as Suites by von Bülow, by Peters, and an edition of 'Esercizi per gravicembalo' by Paul Dukas. Tausig arranged several of the sonatas to suit the requirements of modern pianists, but the greatest boon to lovers of Domenico Scarlatti is the publication of a complete edition of his sonatas by Ricordi under the editorship of Alessandro Longo. Besides these famous works and the operas, among which last are to be included contributions to various pasticcios, Domenico Scarlatti wrote a Stabat Mater for ten voices and organ, and a Salve Regina for a single voice, stated to be his last composition.

(4) PIETRO FILIPPO (b. Rome, Jan. 5, 1679; d. Naples, Feb. 22, 1750), eldest son of Alessandro, appears to have studied in Rome along with his brother Domenico. He returned with his father to Naples in 1708, being then married to Vittoria Glieri and father of two sons. Cardinal Grimani, the viceroy, gave him the post of supernumerary organist in the Royal Chapel, and he succeeded Vignola as organist in 1712. He seems to have inherited little of his father's ability, for in 1744 he applied for the post of maestro di cappella on the death of Leo and was refused it. He left his children badly off. After his death the three, Domenico, Alessandro and Anna, presented a petition to the King that Alessandro might be appointed to succeed his father, but it was not granted. A sum of 30 ducats was granted to Anna in

(5) TOMMASO, brother of Alessandro (b. Palermo, c. 1670; d. Naples, Aug. 1, 1760), entered the Conservatorio di S. Onofrio at the age of 10, and became a tenor singer. He sang the comic parts in several of his brother's operas. He married Antonia Carbone in 1701 and had ten children, of whom the youngest was

(6) GIUSEPPE (b. Naples, June 18, 1723; d. Vienna, Aug. 17, 1777), nephew, therefore, not grandson, as has been formerly stated, of Alessandro. At one time he seems to have been maestro at Pavia, and in the textbook of 'I portentosi effetti,' revived at Berlin in 1763, he is styled maestro di cappella in Naples. He settled in Vienna in 1757, before which date he had produced the following operas: 'Merope,' Rome, 1740 (repeated at Naples, 1755); 'Dario,' Turin, 1741; 'Pompeo in Armonio,' Rome, 1747; 'Adriano in Siria,' Naples, 1752; 'Ezio,' Naples, 1754; 'I portentosi effetti della natura,' Venice, 1754; 'Antigone,' Milan, 1756; 'Chi tutto abbraccia nulla stringe,' Venice, 1756. In Vienna he brought out at the court theatre: 'Il mercato di malmantile' and 'L' isola disabitata,' 1757; 'La serva scaltra,' 1759; 'Issipile' and 'La clemenza di Tito,' 1760; 'Artasorse,' 1763; 'Li stravaganti,' 1765; 'La moglie padrona,' 1768. SCENA (Gr. Σκηνή; Lat. scena; Ital. scena, teatro, pulco; Fr. scène, théâtre; Eng. scene, stage; Ger. Bühne, Auftritt), a term which, in its oldest and fullest significance, applies equally to the stage, to the scenery it represents, and to the dramatic action which takes place upon it. Hence the long array of synonyms placed at the beginning of this article.

(1) Classical authors most frequently use the word in its first sense, as applying to that part of a Greek or Roman theatre which most nearly answers to what we should now call the stage; and the classical tendencies of the Renaissance movement led to its similar use in the 16th century.

(2) In its second sense the word is commonly applied, in England, to those divisions of a drama which are marked by an actual change of scenery; a method of arrangement which is even extended to English translations of foreign works.

(3) In the Italian, German and French theatres the word is more frequently used, in its third sense, to designate those subordinate divisions of an act¹ which are marked by the entrance or exit of one or more members of the 'Dramatis Personae,' a new scene being always added to the list when a new character appears upon or quits the stage, though it be only a messenger with half a dozen words to say or sing.

W. S. R.

(4) In a more limited sense the term scena is applied to an operatic movement generally, though not always, for solo voices which differs from the ordinary recitative and aria by its dramatic rather than lyrical or reflective character. In the older types it consisted of accompanied recitative, either interspersed with passages of rhythmic melody or followed by a regular aria. In the former case the word was generally used alone—and always in its Italian form: in the latter the composition was sometimes called 'scena od aria.' (See OPERA.)

In later operatic developments the differentiation between lyrical and dramatic expression has become less marked in a formal sense, while the tendency to avoid soliloquy has naturally limited the introduction of moments to which the term scena might be properly applied.

Besides the operatic scena, notable examples of which are to be found in Mozart ('Fidelio') and Weber, the term is also applied to certain detached movements of Mozart, to Beethoven's 'Ah! perfido' and Mendelssohn's 'Infelice.' Spöhr used the title 'scena cantante' for a work for violin and orchestra.

SCENARIO, an Italian term meaning a preliminary sketch of the scenes and main points of an opera libretto.

G.

SCHABLONE, the German term for a stencil or pattern, and thence in musical criticism applied to music written with too much adherence to mechanical form or manner, whether the composer's own or some one else's—made on a cut-and-dried pattern. The term Kapellmeister-Musik is used by the German critics for a similar thing. With a slightly different metaphor we should say, 'cast in the same mould.'

G.

SCHACK (ŽAK), BENEDICT (b. Miřovice, Bohemia, 1758; d. Munich, 1826), the first Tamino, and one of the party² who stood round Mozart's bed the night before his death, and at his request sang the completed portions of the Requiem as far as the first bars of the 'Lacrimosa,' when he broke into violent weeping at the thought that he should never finish it. Schack was a man of general cultivation, a thorough musician and a good flute-player. He composed several operas for Schikaneder's theatre. Mozart was on intimate terms with him, and would often come and fetch him for a walk, and, while waiting for Schack to dress, would sit down at his desk and touch up his scores. Schack's voice was a fine tenor, flexible and sonorous, and his execution thoroughly artistic, but he was a poor actor.³ In 1787 he was taking second parts only; in 1792 he sang Tamino, Count Almaviva and Don Ottavio (Don Gonsalvo in the German translation), after which we hear no more of him as a singer. In 1780 he was Kapellmeister to a nobleman, and in 1805 retired on a pension. A Mass by him was finished by Mozart.¹ His operas or Sing-spiele came between 1789 and 1793; some were written with Gerl.² C. F. P.

SCHADE (SCHADAEUS), ABRAHAM (b. Senftenberg), studied at Leipzig in 1564; was cantor at Torgau, 1613-14, and afterwards at Bautzen, where he became rector, and retired in 1617. He edited the famous collection of motets in 4 volumes, 'Promptuarium musicum,' of which a detailed account appears in Eitner's Bibliographie, p. 251. E. v. d. s.

SCHÄFER, DIRK (b. Rotterdam, Nov. 5, 1873), pianist and composer. He was a pupil at the Cologne Conservatoire, 1891-94; he won in 1894 the Mendelssohn Prize in Berlin; he then came to The Hague and moved in 1904 to Amsterdam. Amongst his compositions the most notable are his chamber works. They include a piano quintet, a string quartet and several violin sonatas. He has written for orchestra a 'Suite pastorale' and a 'Javaansche Rapsodie.' In his own country Schafer is acclaimed as a fine pianist. R. M^o.

SCHAEFFER, PAUL, town musician in Gora from 1617 to c. 1620 and from 1621 at Breslau, where he still was in 1645. Between 1617 and 1626 he composed 8 volumes of sacred and secular music, including 1 book of 4-part dance tunes (1622). E. v. d. s.

SCHAFFRATH, CHRISTOPH (b. Hohenstein, near Dresden, 1709; d. Berlin, Feb. 17, 1763), a famous harpsichord player, and composer of distinct merit. In 1733 he was in the service of the Polish Prince Sangusko. He competed unsuccessfully with Wilhelm Friedemann Bach for the post of organist at the Sophienkirche, Dresden. In 1735 he became chamber musician to the Crown Prince of Prussia, on whose accession to the throne as Frederic II. (the Great) he remained attached to the court, and was afterwards musician to Princess Amalia. He composed symphonies, overtures, concertos for harpsichord and for violin, and a large amount of chamber music of every kind. (List in Q.-L.) E. v. d. s.

SCHAFHÄUTL, KARL FRANZ EMIL (b. Ingolstadt, Feb. 16, 1803; d. Munich, Feb. 25, 1890), a scientist who made valuable researches in acoustics (see Riemann, 1923). (See BELLY; SOUNDBOARD.)

SCHALE, see CYMBALS.

SCHALE, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH (b. Brandenburg, 1713; d. Berlin, Mar. 2, 1800), an excellent violoncellist, organist, and distinguished composer of songs and instrumental music. He was a pupil of Christ. E. Rolle.

In 1742 he was royal chamber virtuoso, organist of Berlin Cathedral (Dom) in 1764, and in 1749 he founded with others the first amateur concert at Berlin, 'Die musikausbende Gesellschaft,' at the house of the then cathedral organist, Sack. Burney made his acquaintance at Berlin. (For list of works, see Q.-L.) E. v. d. s.

SCHALK, FRANZ (b. Vienna, May 27, 1863), conductor, was a pupil of Anton Bruckner, and had gained a lengthy and varied experience, chiefly in Vienna, before succeeding Ferdinand Löwe as chief conductor at the Hofoper in that city. He paid two visits to London, namely, during the winter of 1907 and the autumn of 1911, both short German seasons at Covent Garden. During the latter, when he was sole conductor, he earned unqualified commendation by his artistic direction of 'Der Ring' (three cycles) and a finished production of Humperdinck's 'Königskinder.' After the war (1914-18) he had Richard Strauss for some years as his associate at the Vienna Imperial Opera; but differences arose between them and reached an acute stage in 1924, when Strauss ultimately resigned and left his colleague in sole control. SCHARWENKA, (1) LUDWIG PHILIPP (b. Samter, near Posen, East Prussia, Feb. 16, 1847; d. July 16, 1917). His father was an architect in Samter. His taste for music showed itself early, but he was unable to cultivate it seriously till the removal of his family to Berlin in 1865, when he entered Kullak's 'New Academy,' studying under Wüerst and Heinrich Dorn, having previously completed his studies at the Gymnasium in Posen, where his parents settled in 1859. On completing his course at the Academy he remained on the staff as a teacher of theory till 1881, when he became teacher of composition at his brother's newly opened Conservatorium, the direction of which he undertook with Hugo Goldschmidt on his brother's emigration to America in 1891. In 1880 he married the well-known violinist Marianne Stresow (d. Oct. 24, 1918). Besides having made a good name for himself with a long list of interesting compositions, Scharwenka was an accomplished caricaturist.

The compositions of Philipp Scharwenka include a vast number of piano pieces—Ländler, waltzes, minuets, mazurkas, etc.—of which 'Album polonais' (op. 33) is best known, many songs, three concert pieces for violin and PF. (op. 17), studies for violin, studies for violoncello, three sonatas for pianoforte (op. 61); two choral works with soli and orchestra, 'Herbstfeier' (op. 44) and 'Sakuntala'; a choral work with pianoforte accompaniment ad lib., 'Dörpertanzweise'; a PF. trio in C \sharp minor (op. 100); and some orchestral works, two symphonies, a Serenade (op. 19), a Fantasiestück 'Liebes

His brother, (2) FRANZ XAVER (b. Samter, Jan. 6, 1850; d. Berlin, Dec. 8, 1924), pianist and composer, was, like his brother, at Kullak's Academy in Berlin, where he was well known, while still a pupil, for his P.F. playing and composition, which he studied under Kullak and Wuerst respectively. He made his first appearance in public in Berlin at the Singakademie in 1869, and remained for some time at Kullak's as a teacher, until compelled to leave it for his military duties in 1873. After this he began to travel, and was soon renowned as a fine and brilliant player, and a 'young composer of remarkable endowments.' In 1877 he produced his first concerto for the P.F. (in B \flat minor, op. 32), playing it to the meeting of German musicians at Hanover in May; it was played in England for the first time by Edward Dannreuther at the Crystal Palace, Oct. 27, 1877. In 1878, Feb. 14, Scharwenka himself played it at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig. In 1879 he made his first appearance in England, playing the same work at the Crystal Palace, Mar. 1, and played at the Musical Union, Apr. 29. In 1880 he returned and played his B \flat minor concerto at the Philharmonie, Feb. 19, and the Beethoven E \flat concerto on June 9. In 1881 he made a third visit and played his second concerto (in C minor, op. 56), which he had produced at the Gesellschaftskonzert at Vienna, Feb. 24; but his stay was shortened by his recall to Germany for his military duties, though he found time to appear several times, and deepened the favourable impression he had previously made. In 1899 he made another visit to England and played his third concerto (C \sharp minor, op. 80).

On Oct. 1, 1881, Scharwenka opened his own Conservatorium in Berlin (staff including his brother Philipp's wife, née Marianne Stresow, Albert Becker, Philipp Rüfer, J. Kotek, O. Lessmann, W. Langhans, M. Roder, W. Jähns, A. Hennis and Philipp Scharwenka), which became amalgamated with that of Klindworth in 1893, subsequently known as the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatorium (and School for Opera and Drama), and run under the artistic direction of the brothers Scharwenka and Kapellmeister Robitschek and the administration of the latter, with Xaver Scharwenka as principal.

In 1891, answering a call to found and direct a branch of his Conservatorium in New York, Xaver Scharwenka, his wife and family, with all their belongings, emigrated to the States, where they remained seven years; he, however, crossing to Europe and back no less than seven times during that period. In the New World he made numerous tours, and to his astonishment discovered that in the West he had already earned a reputation as a pianist through a former pupil of his brother, who had adopted his name and given concerts for two years without his identity being discovered. He toured in America as late as 1914. In that year he left the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatorium to found a school of his own in Berlin.

As a pianist Xaver Scharwenka was renowned above all his other qualifications for the beautiful quality of his tone. If he was a specialist as interpreter of one composer rather than another it was of Chopin, whose nationality he partly shared, but of the other great masters his readings were always grand and musicianly, while to hear him play a waltz of Strauss was as dance-inspiring as the magic bells of Papageno. His compositions, which possess energy, harmonic interest, strong rhythm, many beautiful melodies and much Polish national character, include a symphony in C minor (op. 60); four P.F. concertos in B \flat minor, C minor, C \sharp minor and F minor (opp. 32, 56, 80 and 82); two P.F. trios in F \sharp minor and A minor (opp. 1 and 42); two v'cello sonatas in D minor and E minor (opp. 2 and 46); a P.F. quartet in F (op. 37); two P.F. sonatas in C \sharp minor and E \flat (opp. 6 and 36); very many piano pieces, mostly Polish dances, but also a scherzo in G, a ballade (op. 8), a concert menuet in B (op. 18), a theme and variations, studies and some songs, besides some books of technical exercises of great value to the pianist (Methodik des Klavierspiels, 1908). An opera without opus number, in 4 acts, to a libretto by Dr. Ernst Koppel, 'Matawintha' (from the novel of Felix Dahn, Ein Kampf um Rom), was produced at Weimar, Oct. 4, 1896, under Stavenhagen, and at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, Apr. 1, 1897, under the composer's direction.

Xaver Scharwenka was Royal Professor, Imperial and Royal 'Kammervirtuos', ordinary member and senator of the Royal Prussian Academy of Arts, president of the 'Musik pädagogische' Association, Doctor of Music (America), and bore the title of Ritter hoher Orden. He published Klänge aus meinem Leben. Erinnerungen eines Musikers (Leipzig, 1922).

SCHAUSPIELDIREKTOR, DER, 'Comédie mit Musik in 1 Act,' containing an overture and four numbers; words by Stephanie, jun., music by Mozart. Produced at a court festival at Schonbrunn, Feb. 7, 1786. Over the tertzet (No. 3) is the date Jan. 18, 1786. It was adapted to a French libretto by Léon Battu and Ludovic Halévy under the name of 'L'impresario,' and produced in Paris, Bouffes-Parisiens, May 20, 1856. A careful version of the entire piece from the German original, by W. Grist, was brought out at the Crystal Palace, London, on Sept. 14, 1877, as 'The Manager.' G.

SCHEBEK, EDMUND (b. Petersdorf, Moravia, Oct. 22, 1819; d. Prague, Feb. 11, 1895), a distinguished and influential Austrian amateur, Doctor of Law, imperial councillor and secretary to the Chamber of Commerce at Prague. He began his musical career as head of a society at Olmutz, and continued it at Prague, where, in conjunction with Weiss, the superior of the Capuchins, and Krejci he revived much of the best old Italian church music. He devoted his attention specially to the construction of the violin, in relation to which he published very interesting treatises—*On the Orchestral Instruments in the Paris Exhibition of 1855*¹; On the Cremonese Instruments, à propos of the Vienna Exhibition of 1873, and The Italian Violin Manufacture and its German Origin.² He also published a valuable little pamphlet on Froberger (1874). Dr. Schebek possessed a fine collection of ancient stringed instruments, Beethoven autographs, etc. G.

SCHEBEST, AGNES (b. Vienna, Feb. 15, 1813; d. Stuttgart, Dec. 22, 1869), became attached at a very early age to the court theatre at Dresden, first in the chorus, and then as singer of small solo parts. Here she had the inestimable advantage of frequently hearing and seeing the great Schroeder-Dovrient. In 1833 she left Dresden for Pest, and from 1836–41 starred throughout Germany with very great applause. Her voice was a fine mezzo-soprano; her style and method were good, her best parts heroic, with much energy and passion. In 1841 she married the great theologian Dr. David Strauss (himself a keen amateur, and author of an interesting paper on Beethoven's ninth symphony). She left an account of her career—Aus dem Leben einer Künstlerin (1857), and Rede und Gebärde (1862). G.

SCHECHNER-WAAGEN, NANETTE (b. Munich, 1806; d. Apr. 30, 1860), dramatic singer. She was employed in the opera at Munich in a minor capacity, and, on the occasion of Madame Grassini's visit, was chosen to second her in some selections from Cimarosa's 'Gli Orazii e Curiazii.' Schechner's beautiful voice made a great impression, and won for her a patroness in the Queen of Bavaria. After some study in singing and in Italian, she appeared in Italian opera in Munich until 1827, after which she devoted herself to German opera. In 1826 she was in Vienna, in a curious story, related by Schindler, of a scene in the theatre there, apropos of an air written for her by SCHUBERT (q.v.), may be believed. It is related by Fétis that, when she first appeared in Berlin in Weigl's 'Schweizerfamilie,' the first act was played to an almost empty house; but such enthusiasm did her Emmeline arouse in the few listeners, that the report of it spread to the neighbouring cafés during the entr'acte, a large audience was drawn to the theatre for the rest of the performance, and the singer's success was complete. Her Donna Anna, Euryanthe, Fidelio, Reiza, Vestalin and Iphigenie in Tauris excited great admiration in Berlin and Munich. In 1832 she married Waagen, a lithographer and painter. She took a place in the first rank of German singers, but her brilliant career lasted no longer than ten years. A severe illness injured her voice, and she retired from the stage in 1835.

Mendelssohn heard her at Munich in 1830, and while he found her voice much gone off and her intonation false, says that her expression was still so touching as to make him weep.³ L. M. M.

SCHEIBE, JOHANN ADOLPH (b. Leipzig, May 1708; d. Copenhagen, Apr. 22, 1776), the son of an organ-builder, was educated for the law at the Nikolaischule, and at the University, where Gottsched was at the time professor. In 1735 he set out to try his fortune as a musician, visiting Prague, Gotha, Sondershausen, and settling in 1736 at Hamburg as a teacher. He composed incidental music to various plays, and wrote a grand opera which only reached the stage of being twice rehearsed. In 1737 he began the publication by which he is famous in the history of German opera, Der critische Musikus, as it was called, came out as a weekly periodical, and carried further the war against Italian operatic conventions which Gottsched had declared in his Vernünftigen Tadelrinnen. In 1740 he was appointed Kapellmeister to the Margrave of Brandenburg-Culmbach, and also visited Copenhagen, where he settled two years later, and in 1742 became director of the court opera, retaining this post till 1749, when he was succeeded by the Italian Sarti. He next devoted himself to literature and composition, becoming for a time head of a music-school at Sonderburg in Holstein. In 1745 he published a second edition of the Critischer Musikus (see below), and in 1754 wrote an Abhandlung vom Ursprung und Alter der Musik. He contributed a treatise on recitative, in the composition of which he was a proficient, to the Bibliothek der schönen Wissenschaften und freien Künste (vols. xi. and xii.), 1764–65. In 1773 appeared the first of four projected volumes on composition, Über die musikalische Composition, but no more was finished, as the author died in 1776. Apart from his championship of German opera, he obtained an unenviable notoriety by an attack on Sebastian Bach, published in the sixth number of his periodical, under date May 14, 1737. He had competed for the post of organist to the Nikolaikirche in 1729, and Bach, one of the judges, had not approved his playing; furthermore, it seems probable that Bach, in his cantata 'Der Streit zwischen Phöbus und Pan,' had intended the character of Midas as a reference to Scheibe. It is only fair to say that Scheibe recanted his errors in the second edition of the Critischer Musikus, issued in 1745. Scheibe wrote an opera, 'Thusnelda,' which was published (with an introductory article on vocal music) at Copenhagen in 1749; two oratorios, 'Die Auferstehung' and 'Der wundervolle Tod des Weiterlösers'; masses, secular cantatas, church compositions to the number of 200; 150 flute concertos; 70 quartets or symphonies, trios, sonatas, existed, for the most part in MS.

SCHEIBLER, JOHANN HEINRICH (b. Montjoie, near Aix-la-Chapelle, Nov. 11, 1777; d. Nov. 20, 1838), a silk manufacturer who, after many travels, settled down at Crefeld, where he was first-assistant Bürgermeister. He made some interesting experiments with JEW'S-HARPS (g.v.), and in 1812-13 turned his attention to the imperfections of existing means of tuning. He first tried a monochord, but finding that he could not always get the same note from the same division of his monochord, he endeavoured to help himself by beats, and discovered that each beat corresponded to a difference of two simple vibrations or one double vibration in a second. His plan was to fix the monochord by finding the stopped length which would give a note beating four times in a second with his own fork. Then, after endless trials and calculations, he found similar places for all the divisions of the scale, and finally from the monochord made forks for each note of the equally tempered scale. By repeated comparisons with his forks he found that it was impossible to make a mathematically accurate monochord, or to protect it from the effects of temperature. He then hit upon the plan of inserting forks between the forks of his scale, from the lowest A of the violin to the open A, and counting the beats between them. It was this counting that was the trouble, but by highly ingenious mechanical contrivances he was enabled to complete the count of his fifty-two forks within from .0067 to .00083 beats or double vibrations in a second, and hence to tune a set of twelve forks so as to form a perfectly equal scale for any given pitch of A. The particulars of his forks and the mode of counting them are contained in his little pamphlet Der physikalische und musikalische Tonmesser (Essen, Badeker, 1834, p. 80, with lithographic plates),¹ from which the preceding history has been gathered. During his lifetime he issued four smaller tracts, showing how to tune organs by beats, which were collected after his death as H. Scheibler's Schriften, etc. (Crefeld, Schmüller, 1838). These pamphlets form part of the interesting bequest left to A. J. Hipkins by A. J. Ellis, and have since completed Hipkins's gift to the Royal Institution in memory of his friend Dr. Ellis. Scheibler's wonderful tonometer of fifty-two forks has completely disappeared. But another one, of fifty-six instead of fifty-two forks, which belonged to Scheibler, still exists, and was inherited by his daughter and grandson, who lent it to Amels, formerly of Crefeld, who again lent it to A. J. Ellis, who counted it and, having checked his results by means of M'Leod's and Mayer's machines for measuring pitch, gave the value of each fork in the Journal of the Society of Arts for Mar. 5, 1880, p. 300, correct to less than one-tenth of a double vibration. The two extreme forks of this fifty-six-fork tonometer agree in pitch precisely with those of the fifty-two-fork tonometer; but no other forks are alike, nor could the forks of the fifty-two-fork tonometer have been easily converted into those of the other one. In 1834, at a congress of physicists at Stuttgart, Scheibler proposed with approval the pitch A 440 at 69° F. (= A 440.2 at 59° F.) for general purposes, and this has been consequently called the Stuttgart pitch.² (Cf. PRERN.) A. J. H.

SCHEIDEMANN, the name of a family of organists in Hamburg in the 16th and 17th centuries. (1) DAVID, probably an uncle of (2) HEINRICH, was in 1585 organist of St. Michael's Church, Hamburg. He is chiefly noteworthy as associated with three other Hamburg organists of repute, Jacob and Hieronymus Praetorius and Joachim Decker, in the compilation of what we should now call a Choralbuch, though this name was not in general use then,³ a book of the usual hymn tunes or Chorals of the Lutheran Church, simply harmonised in four parts for congregational singing. This book appeared in 1604. Its original title is:

Melodeyen-Gesangbuch, darinnen 174 Lutheren und anderer Christen gebräuchlichste Gesänge, ihren gewöhnlichen Melodien nach . . . in vier Stimmen übergesetzt.

The example first set by Lucas Osiander, in 1586, of uniformly giving the melody to the soprano part and not to the tenor, as the older practice was, is here followed, and in the preface attention is called to the greater convenience of this for congregational singing. Of the eighty-eight tunes in the book, David Scheidemann harmonised thirteen or fourteen; among them there appears for the first time harmonised 'Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern.' Gerber, confusing David with Heinrich, attributes both the melody and the setting of this Choral to Heinrich. But Winterfeld shows (Ev. Kirch. i. p. 90) that the melody belongs to neither, but seems to be taken from an old secular song beginning with similar words ('Wie schon leuchten die Äugelein'), to the metre of which Philip Nicolai in 1599 wrote the words of his hymn 'Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern.' It should be mentioned, however, that Wackernagel (Das deutsche Kirchenlied, Bd. i. pp. 618-19), after giving the words of the secular song in full, adduces reasons for believing that in this case the secular song is a later parody of Nicolai's hymn, not vice versa. Winterfeld praises Scheidemann's settings of the Chorals for their fresh animated character, and for the happy way in which the rhythmical peculiarities of the old melodies are brought out. Chorals were not then sung as now, all in slow uniform rhythm, but many of the older melodies had curious changes of rhythm, as from common to triple time, in successive lines. (See the specimens of Scheidemann in Winterfeld, Part i. Nos. 70, 71.)

(2) HEINRICH (b. circa 1596; d. 1654¹) was the son of Hans Scheidemann, organist of St. Catherine's Church, Hamburg, who instructed him in his art until c. 1613-14, when the church administrators, recognising his talent, sent him with Jacob Praetorius, the younger, to Amsterdam, to be initiated into a higher style of organ-playing under the tuition of the then most famous organ-player of Europe, Peter Sweelinck. Heinrich succeeded his father on his death in 1625 as organist of St. Catherine's, and became one of the greatest organists of his time. Mattheson says of Scheidemann that his organ-playing and compositions were like himself, popular and agreeable, easy and cheerful, with no pretence or desire for mere show. Some of his organ pieces have been discovered in MS. tablature at Lüneburg, for an estimate of which see Seiffert's Geschichte der Klaviermusik, vol. i. pp. 117-19. In 1641 he was called to Lübeck to examine and give his verdict about the new organ. Heinrich Scheidemann was again associated with Jacob Praetorius in contributing melodies to Rist's 'Himmliche Lieder,' which were published in 1641-42. Praetorius composed ten to the 4th part of Rist's book, Scheidemann ten to the 5th part, entitled 'Hollenlieder.' One of Scheidemann's melodies in this collection, 'Frisch auf und laßt uns singen,' continued for a while in church use, as it appears again in Vopelius's 'Leipziger Gesangbuch' of 1682. Among Scheidemann's pupils were Werner Fabricius, Matthias Weckmann and Joh. Adam Reincken, the last of whom became his successor as organist of St. Catherine's, Hamburg, in 1654.

SCHEIDEMANTEL, KARL (b. Weimar, Jan. 21, 1859; d. there, Oct. 1923), was taught singing by Bodo Borchers, and on Sept. 15, 1878, made his début at Weimar as Wolfram. He remained there until 1886, having in the meantime received further instruction from Stockhausen at Frankfurt. In 1884, on leave from Weimar, he sang in German at Covent Garden, June 4, as Kothner, as the Minister ('Fidelio'), Herald ('Lohengrin'), Kurwenal, Wolfram, and July 9, Rucello, on the production of Stanford's 'Savonarola.' He made a very favourable impression, both on account of his fine baritone voice and his excellent singing and acting. In 1886 he sang at Bayreuth as Klingsor, Amfortas (a remarkable performance) and Kurwenal; after which he made his débuts at Dresden as the Dutchman, and the Templar and Hans Heiling of Marschner, as a permanent member of the company there, as successor to Degele, the result of a successful 'Gastspiel' the previous year. Here he remained till 1911, and gained great popularity in a large number of parts.

On Dec. 12, 1896, he sang with great success as the hero in Bungen's 'Odysseus' Heimkehr,' on Jan. 29, 1898, in 'Kirke,' on Mar. 21, 1901, in 'Nausikaa' (the second and third parts respectively of the Homeric tetralogy), and on May 21, 1901, in Paderewski's 'Manru,' on the production of that opera. On leave of absence, in 1888, he sang as Hans Sachs at Bayreuth; in 1893, at the Gotha Opera Festival, as Rodolph in the revival of Boieldieu's 'Petit Chaperon Rouge.' On May 27, 1899, he sang again at Covent Garden, as Hans Sachs a performance remarkable both on account of his fine acting and for the refinement of his singing and declamation. In 1909 he brought out a new edition of 'Cosi fan tutte' ('Dame Kobold'), and published Stimm- und Gesangsbildung (1907), and Gesangsbildung (1913, Eng. trans. Carlyle).

After his retirement from the Dresden stage he taught for a time at Weimar, and from 1920-1922 he directed the Landesoper at Dresden.

SCHEIDT, SAMUEL (b. Halle, 1587; d. there, Mar. 30,² 1654), one of the celebrated three S's (the other two being Heinrich Schütz and Johann Hermann Schein, his contemporaries), was the best German organist of his time.

His father, Conrad Scheidt, was master or overseer of salt-works at Halle. The family must have been musical, as some works are still preserved of Gottfried, Samuel's brother, which A. G. Ritter¹ says show considerable musical ability. Samuel owed his training as an organist to the then famous 'Organistenmacher,' Peter Sweelinck of Amsterdam. About 1605 he betook himself to Amsterdam, and became a pupil of Sweelinck. In 1608 or 1609 he became organist in the Moritzkirche in Halle, and in 1620 at least, if not earlier, he had received the appointment of organist and Kapellmeister to Christian Wilhelm, Markgraf of Brandenburg, and then Protestant administrator of the archbishopric of Magdeburg. In this capacity Scheidt officiated not at Magdeburg but in the Hofkirche at Halle. The troubles of the Thirty Years' War and the misfortunes of his patron, the siege and sack of Magdeburg in 1631, and the abdication of Christian Wilhelm in 1638, seem to have made no difference to Scheidt's official position at Halle, though his income and means of living must have suffered; the service in the Hofkirche ceased after 1625, and the Moritzkirche was destroyed by fire in 1637. We have no record as to his personal relations with Christian's successors in the administration of the Magdeburg archbishopric, but Chrysander² prints a letter from Scheidt to Duke Augustus of Brunswick in 1642, which seems to imply that he was then looking for some patronage or assistance from that art-loving prince. Scheidt never left Halle, however, and his circumstances may have improved, as in his will he bequeathed some money for the sake of the organ in the St. Moritzkirche at Halle.

Scheidt's first published work appeared at Hamburg in 1620 ('Cantiones sacrae octo vocum'), and consists of thirty-nine vocal compositions, fifteen of which are settings of Lutheran Chorals. In 1621-22 appeared the first part of his sacred concertos, in 2-12 vocal parts with instrumental accompaniment. This was followed by successive books of similar pieces, published in 1631, 1634, 1635 and 1640. His fame, however, rests not on his vocal compositions but on his works for the organ. His next work, also published at Hamburg in 1624, is considered epoch-making in the history of organ music. It consists of three parts, but the whole work bears the general title 'Tabulatura nova' (republished D.D.T. vol. i.); the same title, indeed, as many earlier works of the same kind in Germany (e.g. Ammerbach, 1571; B. Schmid, 1577; Paix, 1583; Woltz, 1617), from all of which, however, it differs widely both in aim and style, and indeed marks the beginning of a new and better treatment of the organ both with regard to playing and to composition. From 1570 to about 1620 organ-playing in Germany almost entirely consisted in what was known as the art of 'coloriren,' the art of 'colouring' melodies sacred or secular by the inserting of meaningless passages, all framed on one and the same pattern, between each note or chord of the melody. These earlier Tablature-books were all compiled simply to teach this purely mechanical art of 'colouring' melodies for the organ. The music was written in the so-called German tablature, i.e. with letters instead of notes.³ (For a full account of these German 'Coloristen' of the 16th and 17th centuries, see A. G. Ritter's Geschichte des Orgelmusik, pp. 111-39.) Scheidt's 'Tabulatura nova' put an end to this miserable style of playing and composing for the organ, as well as to the old German tablature. The music in his book is noted in score of four staves, with five lines to the stave, so far differing from the notation both of Frescobaldi and Sweelinck, the former using two staves of six and eight lines respectively, the latter two staves both of six lines. To give an idea of the contents of Scheidt's work, we transcribe in full the separate titles of the three parts:

I. Tabulatura Nova, continens variationes aliquot Psalmorum, Psaalterum, Cantiliarum, Passamezzo et Canones aliquot, in gratiam Organistarum adornata a Samuele Scheidt Hallesensi, Reverendissimi Illustrissimique Principis ac Domini, Christiani Guillelmi Archiepiscopi Magdeburgensis, Primatiae Germaniae Organista et Capellae Magistro. Hamburgi . . . MDCXXIV.

II. Pars Secunda . . . continens Psaalterum, Antiphonam et Echus Tocatae variationes varias et omnimodas. Pro quorumvis Organistarum capta et modulo.

III. Tertia et ultima pars, continens Kyrie Dominicali, (credo in unum Deum, Psalmum de Cona Domini sui communione, Hymnos praecipuos Festorum totius anni, Magnificat 1-9 toni, modum ludendi pleno Organo et Benedicamus . . . In gratiam Organistarum, praecipue eorum qui musice pure et absque celeritatis coloraturis Organo ludere gaudent . . .

The last words mark an important difference between the third part and the two preceding. In the first two parts the composer appears to wish to show how he could beat the 'Colourists' on their own ground, his figures and passages, however, not being like theirs, absolutely meaningless and void of invention, but new and varied, and having an organic connexion with the whole composition to which they belong. He shows himself still as virtuosus, desirous to extend the technique of organ-playing, while at the same time displaying his contrapuntal mastery. So far as technique is concerned, there is to be noticed in Scheidt the extended use of the pedal, so different from Frescobaldi's occasional use of it for single notes merely, also the imitation of orchestral effects, such as what he himself terms 'imitatio violistica,' the imitation of the effects of the different ways of bowing on the violin, and the imitation of an organ tremulant itself by the rapid interchange of the fingers of the two hands on one and the same key ('Bicinium imitatione tremula organi duobus digitis in una tantum clave manu tum dextra, tum sinistra'). The first two parts contain a mixture of sacred and secular pieces, the secular pieces, however, being marked off as for domestic rather than for church use by the absence of a pedal part. The sacred pieces consist of ten fantasias or sets of variations on Choral melodies, with a few fugues or fantasias on another motive, among which is a 'fantasia fuga quadruplici' on a madrigal by Palestrina which Ritter describes as a masterpiece of contrapuntal art, four subjects from the madrigal being treated first singly and then together, and with contrary motion and other devices. The secular pieces consist chiefly of variations on secular melodies, among which appears one entitled an English song 'de fortuna' (i.e. the famous 'Fortune, my foe').

The third part of the 'Tabulatura nova' stands, however, on a higher level than the first two. The composer expressly renounces the virtuoso; he writes, as the title-page says, for those who delight to play the organ purely musically, and without mere ornamental and passage work. In this third part he gives very full directions with regard to registering both for manuals and pedal. It is intended entirely for church use, and both by the choice of pieces and the manner in which they are arranged, it gives us an insight into the way in which the organ was very frequently employed in the church services of those days. It was not then generally used to accompany or sustain the voices of the choir or congregation, but rather to alternate with them. Thus, for instance, between each verse of the Magnificat sung by the choir without accompaniment, the organ would come in independently with some variation or changing harmonies on the plain-song melody. A further use of the organ was even to take the place of the choir in making the responses to the ecclesiastical intonations of the officiating clergy when there was no proper choir to do this. Frescobaldi's works (especially 'Fiori musicali', 1635) furnish instances of this use of the organ in the Catholic ritual. Thus when the priest had intoned the Kyrie of the Mass, in the absence of a proper choir, the organist would answer, as Ambros¹ expresses it when speaking of Frescobaldi's works of the kind, 'with a kind of artistically ennobling and enriching echo' ('mit einer Art von künstlerisch-veredelnden und bereichernden Echo'), that is to say, the organist, taking up the plain-song theme, would not just harmonise it note by note, but treat it in the form of a short polyphonic composition for the organ. The third part of Scheidt's 'Tabulatura' shows that this usage was retained for a considerable time in the Lutheran service. It opens with twelve short movements based on the plain-song of the different sections of the Kyrie and Gloria of the Mass, and the remark, or rubric, as we might call it, 'Gloria canit pastor,' shows that they were expressly intended as responses made by the organ to the intonation of officiating clergy. The Magnificat follows, in all the church tones, one verse sung by the ecclesiastic and every alternate verse arranged to be played by the organ in lieu of a choir. This way of treating the Magnificat prevailed in Lutheran churches even up to Pachelbel's time (1706), though the plain-song was more and more put into the background, and the practice became simply an excuse for interludes on any motive. After the Magnificat came a series of hymns common to both Catholic and Lutheran churches, with their plain-song melodies treated in a similar fashion. The book further contains Luther's version of the Creed ('Wir glauben All' an einen Gott') with its Doric melody, John Huss's Communion Hymn, arranged to be played instead of being sung during Communion. The two last pieces in the book are 6-part movements for the full organ, meant to be played at the end of Vespers. Interwoven with the last is the liturgical melody of the Benedicamus. In all these compositions Scheidt has faithfully adhered to the original plain-song melodies when they appear as cantus firmus, but in the further working-out has not been content simply to harmonise them according to the laws of the church modes, but has so far altered them in accordance with the new ideas of harmony then beginning to make way. But there is still wanting in him a consistent system of modulation. The chromatic semitones are still employed by him rather in a haphazard sort of way.

Twenty-six years later, viz. in 1650, Scheidt published another work for the organ, his second and last, which shows a different conception as to the use of the organ in the services of the Church, and probably marks a change which was then going on gradually in the practice of the Lutheran Church. The congregational singing of metrical hymns was gradually superseding the older liturgical music, and the organ had more and more to surrender its independence to accommodate itself to the simple accompaniment in 4-part harmony of the melodies of these hymns, which now began to assume exclusively the name of Choral-musik. This, which was at first a loss, became in time a gain, as it deepened the sense of the value of harmony for its own sake; and besides, out of this originated the new art form of the Choral-Vorspiel of later days. Scheidt's last organ work was intended to meet the new requirements. Its title sufficiently explains its object:

'Tabulatur-Buch 100 geistlicher Lieder u. Psalmen D. Martin Lutheri und anderer gottelicher Männer für die Herren Organisten mit der Christlichen Kirchen u. Gemeine auf der Orgel, dergleichen auch zu Hause zu spielen u. zu singen, auf alle Feiert. Sonntage durchs ganze Jahr mit 4 Stimmen componirt. . . Gedruckt zu Goltitz . . . im 1680 Jahr.'

This work is dedicated to the Magistrates and Town Council of Goltitz, and the composer seems to imply that it had been undertaken at their special desire. In this, as in his previous work, there is noticeable, as Ritter points out, the same undecided struggle in the composer's mind between attachment to the old and inclination to the new. Thus, while he strictly adheres to the original rhythms of the old melodies, he harmonises according to the rules of modern musical accent, and thus the rhythm of the melody is not in agreement with the rhythm implied by the harmony. See for illustration his setting of 'Ein feste Burg' in Ritter, Geschichte der Orgel-Musik, p. 19, the first two bars of which may here be given:

One Choral appears in this book for the first time, viz. 'O Jesulein süß, O Jesulein mild,' which has been adapted in later Choral-books to the words 'O heiliger Geist, O heiliger Gott.' As harmonised by Scheidt it is given in Winterfeld, Ev. K. G. ii. No. 218, and Schöberlein, Schatz des Chorgesangs, ii. No. 457.

If it is his organ works that now entitle Scheidt to honourable remembrance, and give him a distinct position of his own amongst composers, it was not his organ works, but his vocal compositions, that procured him the esteem of his contemporaries, and caused him to be ranked as one of the celebrated three S's. Of his vocal works, besides the 'Sacrae cantiones' of 1620, mentioned above, there are mentioned 'Liebliche Krafft-Blümlein Concertweise mit 2 Stimmen sampt dem General-Baße, Halle, 1625. Another work should also be recorded, consisting of 'Paduana, Galliarda,' etc., for four and five voices, 1621, the second part of which was called 'Ludorum musicorum prima et secunda pars,' and published in 1622.

It is natural to draw comparisons, as Ritter does in his history above quoted, between Scheidt and Frescobaldi, whose lives covered nearly the same period of time, and who may both be regarded as the true founders of modern organ music, or rather, the Italian of clavier music generally, the German of specifically organ music. Of the two, Frescobaldi is the greater genius, showing greater force of imagination in the invention of new forms and the solution of difficult problems; Scheidt is more laborious and painstaking, showing greater study of the capabilities of his instrument, as for instance in the use of the pedal, and in registering generally, with neither of which did Frescobaldi concern himself. As Ritter points out, while Scheidt has thus greater command of all the resources of expression, Frescobaldi has more of real poetic expression in his music itself. For more detailed comparison of the two masters it will be sufficient to refer to Ritter's work.

SCHEIN, JOHANN HERMANN (b. Grunhain Saxony, Jan. 20, 1586; d. Leipzig, Nov. 19, 1630). His father was Lutheran pastor at Grunhain. Having lost his father at an early age, he was taken to Dresden and became a chorister in the court chapel there in 1599. His further education was received at the Gymnasium of Schulpforta in 1603 and the University of Leipzig (1607). Of his further musical training we have no details. In 1615 he was invited to be Kapellmeister at Weimar, but held this post for only two years. On the death of Seth Calvisius in Nov. 1615 he obtained the appointment of cantor to the Thomasschule in Leipzig, which post he held till his death.

Schein is chiefly known to later times by his Cantional, first published in 1627. Its original title is:

'Cantional oder Gesangbuch Ausgeputzter Confession, in welchem das Herrn D. Martin Lutheri und anderer frommen Christen, auch des Autoris eigene Lieder und Psalmen . . . So im Chur- und Fürstenthümern Sachsen, insonderheit aber in beiden Kirchen und Gemeinen allhier zu Leipzig gebräuchlich, verfertigt und mit 4, 5, 6 Stimmen componirt.'

A second (enlarged) edition appeared in 1645, after Schein's death. As the title shows, it consists of Choral-melodies, both old and new, harmonised for ordinary church use, mostly note against note. Schein himself appears in this book in three capacities, viz. as poet, melodist and harmonist. Of the 200 and odd Choral-melodies in the book about 80 are Schein's own, a few of which have still held their ground in modern Choral-books, though some appear to be attributed to him by mistake. Schein's book differs from Crüger's similar book of later date (1648) in retaining the old irregular rhythm of Choral-melodies, while Crüger has transformed their rhythms according to more modern ideas. But if Schein still retains the old rhythm in the melodies, in his harmonies he has almost entirely lost, as Winterfeld points out, the feeling for the peculiarities of the old church modes in which these melodies are written, though otherwise his harmonies are serious and dignified. With Michael Praetorius and Heinrich Schütz, and probably through their influence, Schein was one of the pioneers in Germany of the new movement in music proceeding from Italy at the beginning of the 17th century. Naturally his other works show this more plainly than the Cantional, as many of them are avowedly written in imitation of Italian models. These other works are as follows:

1. Venus-Kränlein mit allerley lieblichen und schönen Blumen gezieret und gewunden, oder Neue Weltliche Lieder mit 5 Stimmen, sieben etlichen Intraden, Gagliarden und Canzonzen . . . Leipzig, 1609. This work consists of sixteen secular strophic songs a 5 and one a 8, in the simplest Italian canzonetta style, homophonic throughout, besides eight instrumental pieces a 5 and 6.
2. Cymbalum Sionium oder Cantiones Sacrae 5, 6, 8, 10 et 12 vocum. Leipzig, 1615. This work contains thirty sacred motets, some to Latin texts, some to German, besides an instrumental canzone a 5 & 8 Corollatum.
3. Banchetto Musicale, neuer annuthiger Padouanen, Gagliarden, Couranten und Almendans a 5 auf allerley Instrumenten, bevorans auf solten nicht ohne sonderbare gracia lieblich und lustig zu gebrauchen . . . Leipzig, 1617. This work was dedicated to Duke Johann Ernst of Weimar and contains twenty instrumental suites consisting of Padouanes, Gagliardas, Courantes a 5 and Almendans and Tripla a 4, with two separate pieces at the end.
4. Opella Nova, erster Theil Geistlicher Concerten mit 3, 4 und 5 Stimmen zuzusamt dem General-Bass auf jetzo gebräuchliche Itallienische Invention componirt. Leipzig, 1618. This work contains thirty sacred compositions on German texts in the new Italian style, with instrumental basso continuo, which, however, seems to be purely ad libitum.
5. Musica, Baccareola, Walddiederlein auf Itallen-Villanelliche Invention, Beides für sich allein mit lebendiger Stim, oder in ein Clavicebel, Spinnet, Flörb, Lauten, etc. This work appeared in three parts published in 1621, 1625, 1629 respectively, and contains altogether fifty secular compositions a 3 on poems by Schein himself written in the artificial pastoral style of the time. These pieces are more polyphonic in their character than those of the 'Venus-Kränlein', and, as the title indicates, they may be sung by voices alone or with the substitution of instruments for one or other of the vocal parts or instruments accompanied generally. A new edition of the work appeared in 1644, with the substitution of sacred texts for the original secular.
6. Fontana d'Israel, Jeremie Bräuelen ausseiner Kraft-vorbringen also und neuen Tactum von 5 und 6 Stimmen zuzusamt dem General Bass auf eine sonderbare annuthige Itallienische Madrigalische Manier sowohl für sich allein mit lebendiger Stim und Instrumenten als auch in die Orgel Clavicebel bequemblich zugebrauchen. Leipzig, 1623. This work consists of twenty-six sacred pieces a 5 and 6 on German texts, composed in the later freer madrigal style of Monteverdi and others, allowing greater boldness of harmonic progression.
7. Dilecti pastoralis, Hirten Lust von 8 Stim. zuzusamt dem General-Bass auf Madrigal Manier. Leipzig, 1624. 15 Nos.
8. Studenten-Schmaus a 5. Leipzig, 1626. 5 Nos.
9. Opella Nova, Ander Theil Geistlicher Concerten. Leipzig, 1626. Contains thirty-two sacred pieces, twenty-seven with German texts, five with Latin.

Besides these works and the Cantional of 1627, Q.-L. enumerates a large number of occasional compositions for weddings and funerals, many of which, however, Schein himself incorporated into the publications above specified.

In 1895 Arthur Prüfer published a monograph on Schein's Life and Works,¹ by way of preparation for an edition of his works which has since been completed in 8 volumes.

SCHELBLE, JOHANN NEPOMUK (b. Hüfingen, Black Forest, May 16, 1789; d. Frankfurt, Aug. 7, 1837), a thoroughly excellent and representative German musician, whose father was superintendent of the House of Correction at Hüfingen. His strict musical education was begun in a monastery of Marchthal 1800-1803, and continued at Donaueschingen under Weisse. He then spent some time, first with Vogler at Darmstadt and then with Krebs, a distinguished singer, at Stuttgart, and there, in 1812, he filled the post of elementary teacher in the Royal Musical Institution, a very famous and complete school of those times.² In 1813 he went to Vienna, lived in intimate acquaintance with Beethoven, Moscheles, Weigl, Spohr, etc., composed an opera and many smaller works, and went on the stage, where, however, his singing, though remarkable, was neutralised by his want of power to act. From Austria in 1816 he went to Frankfurt, which became his home. Here the beauty of his voice, the excellence of his method, and the justness of his expression, were at once recognised. He became the favourite teacher, and in 1817 was made director of the Musical Academy. This, however, proved too desultory for his views, and on July 24, 1818, he formed a society of his own, which developed into the famous Cæcilian Society of Frankfurt, and at the head of which he remained till his death. The first work chosen by the infant institution was the 'Zauberflöte'; then Mozart's Requiem; then one of his Masses; and then works by Handel, Cherubini, Bach, etc. In 1821 the Society assumed the name of the 'Cæcilienverein'; the repertory was increased by works of Palestrina, Scarlatti and other Italian masters, and at length, on Mar. 10, 1828, Mozart's 'Davide penitente' and the Credo of Bach's Mass in B minor were given; then, May 2, 1829 (stimulated by the example of Mendelssohn in Berlin), the Matthew Passion; and after that we hear of 'Samson' and other oratorios of Handel, Bach's motets and choruses of Mendelssohn, whose genius Schelble was one of the first to recognise, and whose 'St. Paul' was suggested to him by the Cæcilian Association, doubtless on the motion of its conductor. Whether the Society ever attempted Beethoven's Mass does not appear, but Schelble was one of the two private individuals who answered Beethoven's invitation to subscribe for its publication.

His health gradually declined, and at length, in the winter of 1835, it was found necessary to make some new arrangement for the direction of the Society. Mendelssohn was asked,³ and undertook it for six weeks during the summer of 1836. Mendelssohn's fondness and esteem for the man whose place he was thus temporarily filling is evident in every sentence referring to him in his letters of this date. Schelble's great qualities as a practical musician, a conductor and a man, are well summed up by Hiller⁴ in his book on Mendelssohn, to which we refer the reader.

SCHELLER, JAKOB (b. Schettal, Rakonitz, Bohemia, May 16, 1759; d. 1803), a very clever violinist. He was thrown on his own resources from a very early age, and we hear of him at Prague, Vienna and Mannheim, where he remained for two years playing in the court band, and learning composition from Vogler. After more wandering he made a stay of three years in Paris, studying the school of Viotti. He then, in 1785, took a position as Konzertmeister in the Duke of Wurtemberg's band at Montbeliard. This forced him to resume his wandering life, and that again drove him to intemperance, till after seven or eight years more he ended miserably, being even obliged to borrow a fiddle at each town he came to.¹ He was celebrated more for his tricks and lours de force than for his legitimate playing. Spohr² speaks of his flageolet-tones, of variations on one string, of pizzicato with the nails of the left hand, of imitations of a bassoon, an old woman, etc.; and Fétis mentions a trick in which by loosening the bow he played on all four strings at once.

G.
SCHELLING, ERNEST (b. Belvidere, New Jersey, July 26, 1876), American pianist and composer. A pianistic prodigy in Philadelphia at the age of 4, he studied, 1882-85, with Mathias at the Paris Conservatoire and later with Moszkowski, Bruckner, Leschetizky, Huber, Barth and Paderewski. He has given recitals throughout Europe and South America as well as in the United States, and has played with most of the leading orchestras and with various chamber-music organisations. He was a captain in the American Expeditionary Forces during the war (1918). Since 1924 he has been lecturing to juvenile audiences on orchestral music and orchestral instruments. His orchestral compositions have been widely played. His works include:

- Symphony, C minor.
- 'Fantastic Suite', pianoforte and orchestra.
- 'Impressions from an Artist's Life', pianoforte and orchestra.
- 'Symphonic Legend'.
- 'A Victory Hall', orchestral fantasia.
- 'Concerto, Violin'.
- 'Divertimento', pianoforte and string quartet.
- Other chamber music, pianoforte pieces and songs.

SCHEMELLI, GEORG CHRISTIAN (b. Herzberg, c. 1678), was a pupil of the Thomas-schule at Leipzig from 1695, and was cantor of the castle at Zeitz. In 1736 he published a

In the preface the compiler states that the tunes in his book were partly newly composed, partly improved, by J. S. Bach. Various authorities on the life of Bach have spent much labour in investigating which were the tunes newly composed by him, and which were merely revised and corrected by him. While Spitta attributes 29 out of the 69 tunes to Bach, F. Wüllner, the editor of the volume of the Bach Gesellschaft (xxxix.) in which the hymns appear, considers that only 24 are Bach's; while Q.-L. assigns only 22 to Bach. His name, curiously enough, is appended to only one of the sacred songs of which the collection mainly consists (the beautiful 'Vergiss mein nicht,' above which is written 'di J. S. Bach, D. M. Lips.' See S. Spitta, J. S. Bach, Eng. trans. i. 367-70; iii. 109-14).

SCHENK, JOHANN, was a viola da gamba player in the service of the Elector Palatine at Düsseldorf in the latter part of the 17th century. He was afterwards at Amsterdam, where he published numerous works for his instrument, and other compositions. The following are known to have existed, but only a few of them are still extant, according to Q.-L.:

- Op. 1. Aires from an opera, 'Ceres en Bachus.'
- 2. Konstoefeninghen (sonatas or suites).
- 3. Il giardino armonico, sonate da camera a 4 (two vlns., gamba and continuo).
- 4. Koninklyke Harpsichorden, 150 airs for one or two voices, with a prelude and postlude.
- 5. Scherzi musicali, for viola da gamba and bass.
- 6. Eighteen sonatas for violin and bass.
- 7. La nuptia del Reno, twelve sonatas or suites.
- 8. L'Echo du Danube, sonatas.
- 10. Les Fantaisies bizarres de la goutte, twelve sonatas for viola da gamba.

E. van der Straeten's History of the Violoncello contains a very full account of Schenk; Q.-L.; Riemann.

M.
SCHENK, JOHANN (b. Wiener Neustadt, Lower Austria, Nov. 30, 1761³; d. Dec. 29, 1836), mainly interesting from his connexion with Beethoven, at an early age was admitted into the Archbishop's choir at Vienna. In 1774 he was a pupil of Wagenseil. In 1778 he produced his first Mass, which he followed by other sacred pieces and by many Singspiele and operas, beginning with 'Die Weinlese,' 1785, and 'Die Weihnacht auf dem Lande,' 1786, and ending with 'Der Fassbinder,' 1802, which gained him a considerable name, and rank with those of Dittersdorf and Wenzel Müller. In addition he wrote symphonies, concertos, quartets, Lieder, etc. The autograph of many of these are in the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde at Vienna, with that of a theoretical work, Grundsätze des Generalbasses. In 1794 he was appointed music director to Prince Carl von Auersperg; in 1795 his 'Achmet und Almanzine' was brought out at Vienna, and finally 'Der Dorfbarbier' was produced at the Kärnthnertheater, Nov. 7, 1796, a work that was always popular, and kept its position in the repertory for many years. Between this, his masterpiece, and the 'Fassbinder,' already mentioned, came 'Der Bettelstudent' (1796) and 'Die Jagd' (1797). The anecdote of his kissing Mozart's hand during the overture on the first night of the 'Zauberflöte' has been already related (see MOZART). His first meeting with Beethoven is told in Bauernfeld's biographical sketch of Schenk in the Wiener Zeitschrift für Kunst for 1837 (Nos. 5, 6 and 7). Gelinek mentioned to Schenk that he had found a young man whose playing excelled anything ever heard before, excepting Mozart's, and who had been studying counterpoint for six months with Haydn, but to so little purpose that it would be a great kindness if Schenk would give him some help. A meeting was arranged at Gelinek's house, when Beethoven improvised for over half an hour in so remarkable and unusual a manner that, forty years afterwards, Schenk could not speak of it without emotion. Schenk next went to see the young artist. Himself a model of neatness, he was rather taken aback by the disorderliness of the room, but Beethoven's reception was cordial and animated. On the desk lay some short exercises in counterpoint, in which on the first glance Schenk detected a few errors. Beethoven's troubles soon came out. He had come to Vienna aware of his own ability, but anxious to learn; had at once put himself in the hands of the first master to be got, and yet was making no progress. Schenk at once agreed to help him, and took him through Fux's Gradus ad Parnassum, with which indeed Haydn was familiar enough. As it was essential that Haydn should not be entirely thrown over, Beethoven copied exercises partly corrected by Schenk,¹ and Haydn was then able to congratulate himself on the progress of his hot-headed pupil. The affair was of course kept strictly secret; but Beethoven having fallen out with Gelinek, the latter gossiped, and Schenk was deeply annoyed. Beethoven, however, when on the point of following Haydn to Eisenstadt, wrote very gratefully to Schenk,² and the two remained on pleasant terms. It is interesting to know that besides Mozart and Beethoven, Schenk was acquainted with Schubert. Bauernfeld introduced them, and so congenial were they that after an hour's talk they parted like old friends.

Very unassuming in his ways, Schenk was respected as a thorough though somewhat pedantic teacher of the piano and composition. His portrait, in the museum of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Vienna, shows a pleasing countenance. Two cantatas, 'Die Huldigung' and 'Die Mai,' his last complete compositions, date from 1819, and at an advanced age he set about remodelling his 'Jagd,' for which he got Bauernfeld to write him a new libretto. He had finished the first act when he died.

² 'I wish I were not starting to-day for Eisenstadt. I should like to have had more talk with you. In the meantime you may count upon my gratitude for the kindness you have shown me. I shall do all in my power to return it. I hope to see you and enjoy your society again soon. Farewell, and do not forget your Beethoven.'

SCHERER, SEBASTIAN ANTON (bapt. Ulm, Oct. 4, 1631; d. there, Aug. 26, 1712), was town musician in 1653; second organist, 1664; director of music, 1668; organist at Ulm Cathedral (successor of Tob. Eberlin), 1671. He composed masses, psalms and motets with instruments, two books of organ pieces in tablature highly spoken of by Fétis, sonatas for 2 violins and viola da gamba, suites for lute. Eitner states that he was appointed organist at St. Thomas, Strassburg, Nov. 4, 1684 (Q.-L.; Riemann).

SCHERING, ARNOLD (b. Breslau, Apr. 2, 1877), holds an important place amongst German research students, having devoted himself particularly to the rise of the classical style in oratorio and sonata, as well as the early vocal music of Germany.

Schering graduated D.Ph. at Leipzig in 1902 with the study of the early violin concerto. In 1907 he became teacher at the University of Leipzig and in due course professor. Since 1909 he has held courses in musical history at the Conservatoire, and since 1920 has been professor of the University of Halle. Since 1904 he has edited the Bachjahrbuch of the Neuen Bachgesellschaft. His publications on oratorio, early chamber music, organ music, etc., are numerous. He edited Hasse's oratorio, 'La conversione di S. Agostino,' for the D.D.T. (see DENKMALER), and has produced many editions of old works. In 1908 he discovered the parts of the lost 'Christmas Oratorio' of Heinrich Schutz (q.v.) and edited their publication as a supplement to the complete works.

SCHERZANDO (SCHERZOSO), 'playful,' 'lively'; a direction of frequent occurrence, indicating a passage of a light and cheerful character. It is occasionally used, in combination with some other direction, to indicate the style of a whole movement, as Allegro scherzando, Allegretto scherzando (Beethoven, symphony No. 8), etc., but its more usual and characteristic application is to a phrase which is to be played in a lively manner, in contrast to the rest of the movement or to some other phrase. The word is found, where one would little expect it, in the old editions of Beethoven's Mass in D, near the beginning of the 'Et vitam venturi'; but on reference to Breitkopf & Härtel's complete edition it turns out to have been read in error for sforzando!

SCHERZO, an Italian word signifying 'jest' or 'joke.' Its application in music is extensive and—as is the case with many other musical titles—often incorrect.

The term (Scherzando) seems to have been first employed merely as a direction for performance, but there are early instances of its use as a distinctive title. The light Italian canzonets popular in Germany in the 17th century were called 'Scherzi musicali.' Late in the 17th century Johann Schenk published some 'Scherzi musicali per la viola di gamba.' Later, when each movement of an instrumental composition had to receive a distinctive character, the directions Allegretto scherzando and Presto scherzando became common, several examples occurring in the sonatas of Ph. Em. Bach. But even in the 'Partitas' of his great father we find a scherzo preceded by a burlesca and a fantaisie.

Coming to the period of the SYMPHONY (q.v.), it may be as well to remind the reader that the presence of the minuet or scherzo in works of the symphonic class is a matter of natural selection or survival of the fittest. In the old suites the minuet, being of rather shorter rhythm than the other dances, was seized upon, perhaps unconsciously, by the great masters who tied themselves down to the old form, and was exaggerated out of all recognition for the sake of contrast. When we come to Haydn the term minuet ceases to have any meaning; the staidness and character of the dance are quite gone. But with the true instinct of an artist, Haydn felt that, in a work containing such subtleties as the ordinary first movement and slow movement, a piece of far lighter character was imperatively demanded. So lighter and quicker and more sportive grew the minuets, till Beethoven crowned the incongruous fashion with the minuet of his first symphony. The minuets of many of the string quartets of Haydn exhibit indeed those quaint and fanciful devices of unexpected reiteration, surprises of rhythm and abrupt terminations which are the leading characteristics of the Scherzo, and are completely opposed to the spirit of the true minuet. One which begins and ends each part with these bars is a strong instance in point.

Beethoven quickly gave the Scherzo the permanent position in the symphony which it now occupies. He also settled its form and character (see FORM, under SUBSIDIARY FORMS OF THE SONATA: (2) MINUET AND SCHERZO). It is a good answer to those who consider the classical forms worn out and irksome to the flow of inspiration to point out that in the Scherzo, where full rein is given to the individual caprice of the musician, there is as much attention given to construction as anywhere. In fact, either the bold and masculine first-movement form, or its sister the weaker and more feminine rondo form, must be the backbone of every piece of music with any pretensions to the name. But, lest the light and airy character of the Scherzo should be spoiled by the obtrusion of the machinery, the greater composers have sought to obscure the form artistically by several devices, the most frequent and obvious being the humorous persistent dwelling on some one phrase, generally the leading feature of the first subject. Witness the scherzo of Beethoven's ninth symphony, where the opening phrase for the drums is used as an accompaniment to the second subject—indeed as a persistent 'motto' throughout. Apart from this there is not the slightest departure from rigid first-movement form in this great movement.

The trio, which is a relic of the minuet and takes the position of third subject or middle section in a rondo, survives because of the naturally felt want of a contrast to the rapid rhythm of the Scherzo. Many modern composers affect to dispense with it, but there is usually a central section answering to it, even though it be not divided off from the rest by a double bar. Mendelssohn was most successful in writing scherzos without trios. The main idea was to have a movement in extremely short and marked rhythm, for which purpose triple time is generally the best. In the pianoforte sonatas, the scherzo to that in E \flat (op. 31, No. 3) is the only instance where Beethoven has employed 2-4. The trios to the scherzos of the Pastoral and Choral Symphonies are 2-4 and C for special reasons of effect and contrast. It may be worth noticing that Beethoven invariably writes 3-4 even where 6-8 or 3-8 could equally well have been employed. Amongst Beethoven's endless devices for novelty should be noticed the famous treatment of the scherzo in the C minor symphony—its conversion into a weird and mysterious terror, and its sudden reappearance, all alive and well again, in the midst of the tremendous jubilation of the finale. Symphony No. 8, too, presents some singular features. The second movement is positively a cross between a slow movement and a scherzo, partaking equally of the sentimental and the humorous. But the finale is nothing else than a rollicking scherzo, teeming with eccentricities and practical jokes from beginning to end, the opening jest (and secret of the movement) being the sudden unexpected entry of the basses with a tremendous C sharp, afterwards turned into D flat, and the final one, the repetition of the chord of F at great length as if for a conclusion, and then, when the hearer naturally thinks that the end is reached, a start off in another direction with a new coda and wind-up.

Humour is more unexpected in Schubert than in Beethoven, and perhaps because of its unexpectedness we appreciate it the more. The scherzo of the C major symphony is full of happy thoughts and surprises, as fine as any of Beethoven's, and yet distinct from them. The varied changes of rhythm in two, three and four bars, the piquant use of the wood wind, and above all the sudden and lovely gleam of sunshine combine to place this movement among the things imperishable. The scherzos of the octet, the quintet in C, and above all, the PF. duet in C, which Joachim restored to its rightful dignity of symphony, are all worthy of honour. The last-named, with its imitations by inversion of the leading phrase, and its grotesque bass, is truly comical:

It is much to be regretted that later composers lost sight of the true bearing of the Scherzo so completely. Mendelssohn indeed has given it an elfish fairy character, but though this is admirable in the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' it is perhaps a little out of place elsewhere. Lightness and airy grace his scherzos possess to admiration, in common with his capriccios, which they closely resemble; but neither he nor his successors realised the musical humour which vents itself in unexpected rhythms and impudent upstartings of themes in strange places. Mendelssohn has not used the title 'scherzo' to either of his five symphonies, though the 'Vivace non troppo' of the 'Scotch,' the 'Allegretto' of the 'Lobgesang' and the 'Allegro Vivace' of the 'Reformation' are usually called scherzos. It is sufficient to name the string octet, the two PF. trios and the two quintets for strings, as a few of his works which contain the most striking specimens in this line.

With Schumann we find ourselves again in a new field. Humour, his music seldom, if ever, presents, and he is really often far less gay in his scherzos than elsewhere. He introduced the innovation of two trios in his B \flat and C symphonies, PF. quintet and other works, but although this practice allows more scope to the fancy of the composer in setting forth strongly contrasted movements in related rhythm, it is to be deprecated as tending to give undue length and consequent heaviness to what should be the lightest and most epigrammatic of music. Beethoven has repeated the trios of his fourth and seventh symphonies, but that is quite another thing. Still, though Schumann's scherzos are wanting in lightness, their originality is more than compensation. Several of his Kreisleriana and other small PF. pieces are to all intents and purposes scherzos.

Unlike Schubert and Beethoven, Brahms seldom wrote a really bright scherzo, but he published one for PF. solo (op. 4) which is very odd and striking. The second symphony has a movement which is a combination of minuet and scherzo, and certainly one of his most charming ideas. On somewhat the same principle is the scherzo of the second string sextet (op. 36) which begins in 2-4 as a kind of gavotte, while the trio is 3-4 presto, thus reversing the ordinary practice of making the trio broader and slower than the rest of the piece.

Quite on a pedestal of their own stand the four scherzos for piano by Chopin. They are indeed no joke in any sense; the first has been entitled 'Le Banquet infernal,' and all four are characterised by a wild power and grandeur to which their composer seldom attained.

The position of the Scherzo in the symphony—whether second or third of the four movements—is clearly a matter of individual taste, the sole object being contrast. F. C.

SCHETKY, JOHANN GEORG CHRISTOFF (b. Hesse-Darmstadt, 1740; d. Edinburgh, Nov. 29, 1824), a composer, and an excellent performer on the violoncello. He was the son of Louis Schetky, secretary and musician to the Landgrave there.

J. G. C. Schetky was intended for the law, but developed musical abilities and became locally famous. He travelled to Italy and France, and obtained recognition and patronage at various courts. He returned to Hesse-Darmstadt, but after the death of the Landgrave set out for London. Robert Bremner, the music publisher, having been commissioned by the gentlemen directors of St. Cecilia's Hall, Edinburgh, to engage a first violoncellist for the concerts held there, met Schetky at Lille and brought him to Edinburgh, where he arrived in Feb. 1772, and there spent the remainder of a long life. He played at the Edinburgh concerts, and became associated with the musical life there. He was a friend of Robert Burns, and at the latter's request set to music his song 'Clarinda, mistress of my soul,' printed with the music in the second volume of Johnson's Scots Museum, 1788. In 1774 Schetky married the daughter of Joseph RENAULT (q.v.), senior, an Austrian musician who was then settled in Edinburgh. He had several children by this marriage, one of whom, John Christian, was marine painter to George IV. and to Queen Victoria. Schetky, the musician, died in Edinburgh aged 84, and was buried in the Canongate burial-ground. His published works consist of concertos, duets, trios, etc., for strings, and some harpsichord sonatas. They were principally, if not all, published by Robert Bremner. A MS. oratorio, 'Die verschmachtende Verspottung des zum Tode verurtheilten Heylandes,' is at Darmstadt. For some details of his life see Life of John C. Schetky, late Marine Painter, by his daughter, and St. Cecilia's Hall, by David Fraser Harris, Edinburgh, 1899. F. K.

SCHEURLEER, DR. DANIEL FRANÇOIS (b. The Hague, Nov. 13, 1855), a banker by profession, has devoted his considerable wealth to the collection of a fine library of books about music and a museum of ancient and modern musical instruments (see COLLECTIONS), and to the study on his own part and the encouragement of the study by others, of music in its historical aspects.

An enthusiastic member of the International Musical Society, after the dissolution of that body he started in 1920 the Union Musicologique, in which he had the assistance of an eminent international committee. A Bulletin is issued twice each year containing reports from various countries, and articles by W. Barclay Squire, Ch. van den Borren, Prof. Max Seiffert, Dr. Guido Adler, J. G. Prod'homme and others (see PERIODICALS). He wrote and published in 1878 an essay on Twee Titanen der 19e eeuw: Hector Berlioz en Antoine Wiertz, but most of his writing has been concerned with the music of the Netherlands. He was for some years president of the Vereeniging voor Noord-Nederlandsch Muziek Geschiedenis, and received the honorary degree of Doctor in 1910. His principal works are Catalogues of his own library (see LIBRARIES, subsection HOLLAND), a new edition of Jan Fruytier's Ecclesiasticus, oft de wijse sproken Iesu des soons Syrach, nu eerstmael deurdeelt ende ghestelt in hedekens, op bequame en ghemeine voisen naer wtuijzen der musijck-noten daer by ghevoecht, and of the 16th-century 'Een devoot ende Profitelijck Boecxken,' an Introduction to Röntgen's 'Dutch dances of the 16th century,' Muziekleven in Nederland in de 2de helft der 18e eeuw, and Muziekleven te 's-Gravenhage in de 2de helft der 18de eeuw. SCHICHT, JOHANN GOTTFRIED (b. Reichenau, Zittau, Sept. 29, 1753; d. Feb. 16, 1823), owed his education to an uncle; went to Leipzig University in 1778, intending to study law, but gradually adopted music, and was soon chosen by Adam Hiller as solo clavier-player at his concerts. On Hiller's retirement he succeeded him in 1785, and at length in 1810 rose to the head of his profession as cantor of the Thomasschule. He died, leaving many large works (three oratorios, much church and chamber music), as well as a translation of the P.F. Schools of Pleyel and Clementi, and of Pellegrini-Celoni's Singing Method, etc., but his most important legacy was an edition of J. S. Bach's motets (B. & H. 1802-03). G.

SCHICK, (1) MARGARETE LUISE (née HAMEL) (b. Mainz, Apr. 26, 1773; d. Berlin, Apr. 29, 1809), a famous singer, especially as interpreter of Gluck's works; daughter of a bassoon-player, pupil of Stephani at Würzburg and Righini at Mainz. She made her début at Mainz in 1788. When Mozart heard her at the coronation of Leopold II. at Frankfort-on-the-Main, he said, 'Now I do not want to hear any other singing.' In 1791 she married the violinist Ernst Schick, went to Hamburg in 1793, and thence to Berlin, where Frederick William II. had engaged both for the Schlosstheater. Margarete was allowed, however, to sing at the National Theatre also, where she appeared in operas by Gluck and Mozart, which suited her more serious nature and deep and intense feeling. Unfortunately, when singing after a long illness in Righini's Te Deum the effort proved too much; she had a relapse, and the rupture of an artery in the throat caused her death. A bust by Wichmann of this great artist decorates the concert-room of the Schauspielhaus, Berlin. Her husband, (2) ERNST (b. The Hague, 1756; d. Berlin, Feb. 10, 1815), studied the violin under Kreusser, taking Esser and Lolli as his models. In 1793 he instituted chamber concerts with Bohrer at Berlin, where they produced chiefly lesser known classical compositions. Schick composed 6 violin concertos and some Masonic songs. Both his daughter Julie and his granddaughter Pauline von Schatzel were noted singers (Mendel).

SCHICKHARD (SCHICKARD), JOHANN CHRISTIAN, a composer resident at Hamburg about 1730. His works were chiefly published at Amsterdam, but were republished by the elder John Walsh in England. They comprise instrumental pieces, including: soli for a flute and bass, op. 17; concertos for flutes, op. 19; soli for German flute, hautboy or violin, op. 20; sonatas for two violins and a bass, op. 5; sonatas for two German flutes and a bass, op. 10; and some others. These were all published by Walsh and reissued by Randall. F. K.

SCHIEDERMAYR (SCHIEDERMAIER), JOHANN BAPTIST (b. Pfaffenmünster, near Straubing, June 23, 1779; d. Linz, Jan. 6, 1840), organist of Linz Cathedral. He was a prolific composer of masses and other church music, Singpiele, symphonies, chamber music. He brought out an abbreviated edition of Leopold Mozart's violin Tutor, and an instruction book for the singing of Chorals in Roman Catholic churches (Q.-L.; Riemann).

SCHIEDMAYER. Two firms of this name in Stuttgart have enjoyed wide reputation as pianoforte-makers, viz. 'Schiedmayer & Sons' and 'Schiedmayer Pianofortefabrik'; vormal, J. & P. Schiedmayer.'

(1) JOHANN DAVID SCHIEDMAYER (d. Nuremberg, 1806) towards the close of the 18th century was a musical instrument maker at Erlangen, and afterwards at Nuremberg. His son, (2) JOHANN LORENZ (b. 1786; d. 1860), went after this for two years to Vienna as a workman, and in 1809 established a business at Stuttgart in partnership with C. F. Dieudonné (d. 1825). Before that time pianoforte-making was virtually unknown in Stuttgart, those who required satisfactory instruments obtaining them from Vienna. Lorenz Schiedmayer's intelligence and aptness for business gained a position for his firm, and it soon became one of the first in Germany. In 1845 Lorenz united his two eldest sons, (3) ADOLF (b. 1820; d. 1890) and (4) HERMANN (d. 1861), to himself, and 'Schiedmayer & Sons' soon became as well known in foreign countries as in Württemberg. The sons of the brothers Adolf and Hermann, bearing the same Christian names, were for many years the directors of this firm, which has made both concert and ordinary instruments, and has competed with success in London and Paris and other exhibitions.

The two younger sons of Johann David, (5) JULIUS (b. Feb. 17, 1822; d. Feb. 1878) and (6) PAUL (d. June 18, 1890), at first devoted themselves to harmonium-making, then of recent introduction, a practical knowledge of which had been gained by Paul in Paris. They started together in 1854, but after the death of the father in 1860, turned to pianoforte-making in competition with the elder firm, and the younger firm became known as 'Schiedmayer Pianofortefabrik.'

Special mention must be made of Julius Schiedmayer's prominence as an expert in the juries of the great Exhibitions of London, 1862; Paris, 1867; Vienna, 1873; and Philadelphia, 1876.

SCHIEVER, ERNST (b. Hanover, Mar. 23, 1844; d. there, 1915), violinist, studied under Joachim, 1860-64. In 1868 he joined the Müller Quartet, with which he travelled as leader until its dissolution in 1869, and became in the same year a teacher at the Hochschule and a member of the Joachim Quartet. He remained in Berlin two years, organising with Hermann Franke (second violin), Leonhard Wolff (viola) and Robert Hausmann (violin-cello) another quartet party, which was engaged subsequently by Count Hochberg, and became known as the Gräfinch Hochberg Quartet of Schloss Rohnstock, near Striegau, in Silesia. In 1878 he came to England, making Liverpool his headquarters and undertaking the leadership of the Richter orchestra, with which he was connected for nearly thirty years. The Schiever Quartet, in which he was associated with A. Ross (second violin), Carl Courvoisier (viola) and Walter Hatton (violin-cello), was an institution favourably known in the north of England. w. w. c.

SCHIKANEDER, EMMANUEL (b. Ratisbon, Jan. 3, 1748¹; d. Vienna, Sept. 21, 1812), theatrical manager, playwright, actor and singer. He began life as a poor wandering musician, joined some strolling players at Augsburg in 1773, married the adopted daughter of the manager, and at length undertook the direction himself. In 1780 his wanderings brought him to Salzburg, where he fell in with the Mozarts, and at once began to make a profit out of Wolfgang's talents. In 1784 we find him in Vienna, giving with Kumpf a series of excellent performances of German opera, comedy, etc., at the Kärnthnerthor theatre. He appeared on the boards both here and at the Burgtheater, where, however, he did not succeed. He next took the management of the theatre at Ratisbon, but was recalled to Vienna by his wife, who had undertaken the little theatre lately built in the grounds of Prince Starhemberg's house in the suburb of Wieden, for which Schikaneder received a privilegium or licence.² He had no scruples as to the means to be adopted to make a hit, but in spite of large receipts was continually in difficulty. On one such occasion (Mar. 1791) he had recourse to Mozart, whom he implored to set to music a libretto adapted by himself from a piece by Giesecke, a member of his company. Mozart, always good-natured, especially to a brother Mason, consented, and from that moment till its completion Schikaneder stuck closely to him, and did all he could to keep him amused over his work. The history of the 'Zauberflöte' is well known; Schikaneder made various suggestions in the composition, took the part of Papageno, and found himself saved from ruin by the success of the opera; but he showed little gratitude to Mozart, and after his death, instead of helping the widow of the man by whom he had benefited so materially, contented himself with loud and vain lamentations. In 1800 he entered into partnership with a merchant named Zitterbarth, who, at a short distance from the small theatre just mentioned, built the 'Theater-an-der-Wien,' opened June 13, 1801 (see BEETHOVEN). Zitterbarth then bought the privilegium from Schikaneder, who managed it for him till 1806. His next project was to build, with the assistance of some wealthy friends, a new theatre in the Josephstadt suburb, but this he did not carry out. On his way to Pest, whither he had been invited to undertake a theatre, he went mad, was brought back to Vienna, and died in great misery.

Schikaneder wrote the librettos for many popular operas, Singspiele and fairy pieces, the list of which, with year of performance, is here published for the first time:

'Anton der dumme Gartner' (Schack and Gerl, 1789); 'Die beiden Antons' (with 4 sequels); 'Jakob und Nanterl' and 'Der Stein der Weisen', or 'Die Zauberinsel' (Schack and others), 1790; 'Die Zauberhute' (Mozart), 1791; 'Der wohlthätige Dervisch', or 'Die Schellenkappe' (Schack, Gerl and others), 1792; 'Die Eisenkonigin', 'Die Waldmänner' and 'Der Zauberpfiff' (Lickl), 1793; 'Der Spiegel von Arkaden' (Rosenmayer) and 'Die Hirten am Rheine', 1794; 'Der Scherenschleifer' (Henneberg), 'Der Königssohn aus Itahia' (A. F. Hoffmeister) and 'Der Hellenberg' (Weylich), 1795; 'Der Tyroler Wastel' (Halle), and a second part 'Osterreich's treue Brüder', 1796; 'Das vortreffliche Constatum' (Halle), 'Der Löwenbrunnen' (Sevried) and 'Babylons Pyramiden' (Act I Gallus, Act II. Peter Winter), 1797; 'Das Labyrinth', or 'Kampf mit den Elementen' (second part of 'Zauberhute', Winter), 1798; 'Die Ostindier vom Spitzberg' (Sevried, Rosenmayer, etc.), 'Comrad Langhans', or 'Der Burggeist' (Henneberg), 'Minna und Peru', or 'Königspflanz' (Act I Henneberg, Act II. Sevried), and 'Der Wundermann aus Wasserfall' (Sevried), 1799; 'Antons Schillingen' (Sevried), 1800; at the Theater-an-der-Wien—opening night—'Alexander' (Teuber), 'Theopis Traum' and 'Proteus und Arabiens Sohne' (Stegussa), 1801; 'Die Schillingen' (Henneberg), 1802; 'Die Entlarvten', a continuation of the 'Waldmänner' (Anton Fischer), and 'Pflanzend- und Personalarrest' (Teuber), 1803; 'Der Reine der Weisen' (Schack and others), 1804; 'Kwastards Zauberhals' (Fischer), 1805; 'Die Eisenkonigin' (Henneberg) and 'Die Kurgäste am Sauerbrunnen' (Anton Diabelli), Schikaneder's last piece, given for his benefit, 1806.

SCHILDT, MELCHIOR (b. Hanover (?), 1592; d. there, May 22, 1667), a pupil of Sweelinck, organist at the principal church at Wolfenbüttel from 1623–26, court organist at Copenhagen from 1626–29, and from 1629 to his death organist at the Market church, Hanover, as successor to his father and brother. Of his valuable compositions only one cantata, 4 v., and a few organ and harpsichord pieces in MS. are preserved (Q.-L.; Riemann).

SCHILLING, DR. GUSTAV (b. Schwiegershausen, Hanover, Nov. 3, 1803; d. Nebraska, U.S.A., Mar. 1881), author of a book much esteemed in Germany, though little known in England—Encyclopädie der gesamten musikalischen Wissenschaften oder Universal Lexikon der Tonkunst (7 vols. 8vo, Stuttgart, 1835–40). His father was a pastor at Schwiegershausen. He was brought up at Göttingen and Halle, and in 1830 settled in Stuttgart as director of Stöpel's Music School. In 1857 he went to America. He published several other works bearing on music, but none of the importance of that already mentioned. (For list see Riemann.) G.

SCHILLINGS, MAX VON (b. Düren, Rheinland, Apr. 19, 1868), studied under K. Joseph Brambach and O. F. von Königsow at Bonn. From the former he derived the traditions of both Hummel and Beethoven, as shown through the medium of the teaching of Hiller, whose pupil Brambach was; while from the latter he inherited, musically, the methods of David the violinist, and Moritz Hauptmann the distinguished theorist. On leaving Bonn, Schillings continued his studies at Munich, where, after three years spent in perfecting himself in all branches of his art, he decided to settle. He was appointed chorus-master at Bayreuth in 1902, having acted as one of the assistant stage conductors there in 1892. In the autumn of 1908 he became musical assistant to the intendant of the Stuttgart court theatre, conductor of the royal concerts and director of operatic productions. From 1911–18 he was general musical director at Stuttgart, and received from the King of Württemberg the title 'Von' in 1912, the year of the opening of the new opera-house of Stuttgart. Other events of this period were his production of a condensed version of Berlioz's 'Les Troyens' (1913), and the production of his own opera 'Mona Lisa' on Sept. 26, 1915. In 1919 he became director of the Staatsoper at BERLIN (q.v.). His compositions, fairly numerous, show a high order of talent; but the composer was at first considered to be decidedly dominated by the influence of Wagner. Theopus numbers not mentioned in the following list are for the most part filled with songs, partsongs and other small works.

SCHIMON, (1) ADOLF (b. Vienna, Feb. 29, 1820; d. Leipzig, June 21, 1887), son of an Austrian artist, well known for his portraits of Beethoven, Weber, Spohr, etc. At 16 he went to Paris and entered the Conservatoire as a pupil of Berton and Halévy. In 1844 he brought out an opera called 'Stradella,' at La Pergola in Florence. In 1850 he was in London, and took a provincial tour with Balfe, Reeves and Clara Novello. From 1854–59 he was attached to the Italian opera in Paris, and in 1858 produced a comic opera, 'List um List,' which was successful in North Germany. In 1872 we find him again at Florence, where he married Anna REGAN. From 1874–77 he was teacher of singing in the Conservatorium at Leipzig, and from thence was called to Munich, where he was professor of singing in the Royal Music School until 1886, when he returned to Leipzig. His original compositions embrace quartets, trios and solos for the PF., and songs in various languages, and he edited

His wife, (2) ANNA REGAN-SCHIMON (b. Aich, near Carlsbad, Sept. 18, 1841; d. Munich, Apr. 18, 1902), was brought up in the house of Dr. Anger in Carlsbad till 1859, when she was placed as a pupil with Mme. Schubert (née Maschinka-Schneider) in Dresden. In the following year she accompanied Mme. Sabatier-Ungher, the great contralto, to Florence, where she remained under the care of that eminent artist till Feb. 1864. During this time she made her first attempts on the stage at Siena, her success in which encouraged her in further study. From 1864-67 she was engaged at the court theatre at Hanover; then as Kammersängerin to the Grand Duchess Helena in St. Petersburg, where she sang at three of the seven concerts given by Berlioz. In 1869 she visited London in company with her old friend and teacher Mme. Sabatier, sang twice at the Philharmonic and three times at the Crystal Palace, and at Hallé's Recitals, etc. From this time till 1875 she was frequently in England, widely known and much liked for her exquisite delivery of Schubert's and other songs. In 1870 and 1871 she visited Vienna with great success, and in 1872 married Dr. Schirron. She made two brilliant tours with Mombelli, Sivori, Trebelli, etc., in the winters of 1872 and 1873, and from that time till her death only appeared occasionally at the Gewandhaus Concerts at Leipzig. After her husband's death she accepted a post in the Royal Music School at Munich. G.

SCHINDELMEISSER, LOUIS (b. Königsberg, Dec. 8, 1811; d. Darmstadt, Mar. 30, 1864), was educated at the Gymnasium at Berlin. He learned music from a French musician named Hostié, and from Gährich. He first adopted the clarinet, but afterwards took a wider range. From 1832-37 he filled Kapellmeisters' posts at Salzburg, Innsbruck, Graz, Berlin (Königstadt Theatre) and Pest, where he remained for nine years. Finally he was court Kapellmeister at Darmstadt. His works embrace six operas—'Mathilde,' 'Ten happy Days,' 'Peter von Szapary' (Pest, 1839), 'Malvina' (Pest, 1851), 'The Avenger,' 'Melusine' (1861); an oratorio, 'S. Boniface'; an overture to 'Uriel Acosta' and incidental music to various plays; a concerto for clarinet and orchestra, and a concertante for four clarinets and orchestra; songs, PF. pieces, etc. G.

SCHINDLER, ANTON (b. Medl, Neustadt, Moravia, 1796; d. Bockenheim, near Frankfurt, Jan. 16, 1864), the devoted friend and biographer of Beethoven. His father was cantor and schoolmaster at Medl. He began the study of music and the violin early in life. While quite young he entered the Vienna University to study law, and assiduously kept up his music by practice in an amateur orchestra. His introduction to Beethoven took place accidentally in 1814, when he was asked to take a note from Schuppanzigh to the great composer. Later in the year he played in Beethoven's two concerts of Nov. 29 and Dec. 2. He and the master met often, and the intimacy increased until, early in 1819, on the recommendation of Dr. Brach he became a kind of secretary to Beethoven, and at length, in 1822, took up residence in his house. He then became conductor at the Josephstadt Theatre, where he studied several of Beethoven's great works under his own direction. Beethoven, however, at last began to tire of his young friend, and after much unpleasantness, in 1824 after the failure of the concert of May 23, the breach came. Beethoven behaved with great violence and injustice, and Schindler was driven from him till Dec. 1826, when he arrived in Vienna from Gneixendorf, to die. Schindler at once resumed his position, attended him with devotion till his death, wrote several letters¹ to Moscheles on the details of the event, and in company with Breuning took charge of Beethoven's papers. Breuning died, and then the whole came into Schindler's hands.

In 1831 he wrote some interesting articles on Beethoven and Schubert in Bäuerle's Theaterzeitung. In December he left Vienna and became Kapellmeister to the cathedral at Münster, a post which he exchanged four years later for that of music-director at Aix-la-Chapelle. After some years he relinquished this, became first a private teacher and then went entirely into private life. He lived in various towns of Germany, and at length in Bockenheim.

His book on Beethoven is entitled Biographie von Ludwig van Beethoven. Mit dem Porträt Beethovens und zwei Facsimilen (Münster, 1840, 1 vol. 8vo).² This was followed by Beethoven in Paris . . . ein Nachtrag zur Biographie Beethovens's, etc. (Münster, 1842; 1 thin vol. 8vo), and that by a second edition of the Biographie with additions (Münster, 1845, 1 vol. 8vo). The third and last edition appeared in 1860. Being so long about Beethoven, he accumulated many autographs and other papers and articles of interest, and these he disposed of to the library at Berlin for an annuity. His sister was a singer, who in the year 1830 was engaged at the Königstadt Theatre, Berlin.

Schindler has been the object of much obloquy and mistrust, but it is satisfactory to know, on the authority of A. W. Thayer, that this is unfounded, and that his honesty and intelligence are both to be trusted. G.

1882), German-American conductor and composer. He studied extensively at the universities of Munich and Berlin, as well as piano with Zieler, Gernsheim, L. C. Wolf and Ansgore, and composition with Bussler and Thuille. After various engagements as a conductor in Germany, he went to New York in 1905 as assistant conductor of German opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, a post he held for three seasons. In 1909 he founded in that city the MacDowell Chorus, which in 1912 became the Schola Cantorum, now one of the most significant of American choral organisations (see NEW YORK). A skilful and ingenious translator and arranger of songs and choral music, he has also to his credit more than 50 compositions in various vocal forms. W. S. S.

SCHIRA, FRANCESCO (b. Malta, Sept. 19, 1815; d. London, Oct. 16, 1883), received his early education at Milan, and was placed, at the age of 9, in the Conservatorio, where he learned counterpoint under Basily, principal of that institution. At 17, having completed his studies, Francesco was commissioned to write an opera for La Scala, which was produced Nov. 17, 1832. That 'Elena e Malvina' won favourable recognition may be inferred from the fact that a Lisbon impresario, being at Milan with the object of forming a company for the Santo Carlos, contracted an engagement with Schira for the forthcoming season as Maestro Direttore, Compositore e Conduttore della Musica. He remained eight years at Lisbon, where he was also appointed professor of harmony and counterpoint at the Conservatorio, composing 'I cavalieri di Valenza' and 'Il fanatico per la musica' for the Santo Carlos, besides ballets, cantatas, etc.

In Jan. 1842 Schira quitted Lisbon for Paris, with the idea of obtaining some book in the French language which he might set to music. In Paris he made the acquaintance of Maddox, then in quest of artists for the Princess's Theatre. This led to an offer from the London manager, and Schira was appointed director of music and orchestral chief at that establishment. On Monday, Dec. 26, 1842, the Princess's opened as a lyric theatre, and Schira's appearance at the conductor's desk was his first introduction to the English public. The opera chosen was an English version of 'La Sonnambula.' Among notable incidents during Schira's term of conductorship may be specified the production of two operas by Balfe, originally composed for the Paris Opéra-Comique—'Le Puits d'Amour,' called 'Geraldine' (Aug. 1843), and 'Les Quatre Fils d'Aymon,' called 'The Castle of Aymon' (Nov. 1844). At the end of 1844 Schira accepted an engagement from Alfred Bunn, then lessee of Drury Lane, to fill the place left vacant by Benedict, who resigned immediately after Balfe's 'Daughter of St. Mark' was brought out. At Drury Lane he remained until the spring of 1847, when Bunn seceded from the management, the committee having entertained the proposal of Jullien to become future lessee; and here several adaptations of foreign operas, besides a good number of works by English composers, were produced. From the latter it will suffice to name Wallace's 'Maritana' and 'Matilda of Hungary,' Macfarren's 'Don Quixote,' Benedict's 'Crusaders,' Lavenue's 'Loretta' (composed for Mme. Anna Bishop), Balfe's 'Enchantress,' etc.; among the former, Flotow's 'Stradella' and 'Martha.' In Sept. 1848 Bunn took Covent Garden Theatre, and Schira was again appointed conductor. The season only lasted two months, but comprised the engagement of Sims Reeves and an entirely new opera called 'Quentin Durward,' the composition of Henri Laurent. The success of the enterprise was not in proportion to the expectations of the manager; 'Quentin Durward' was by no means a hit, and though Bunn had lowered his prices the house was prematurely closed. Thus an opera entitled 'Kenilworth,' from Schira's own pen, which had already been put into rehearsal with Sims Reeves in the part of Leicester, was lost to the public, and no more English opera was heard at Covent Garden until Pyne and Harrison migrated there from the Lyceum.

Although he had severed his connexion with the Princess's as musical director, in which position his worthy successor was Edward Loder, Schira wrote two original works for the theatre in Oxford Street—'Mina,' produced in 1845, and 'Theresa, or the Orphan of Geneva,' in 1850, both, the latter especially, received with marked favour. Schira was once more engaged as conductor at Drury Lane, and the theatre opened on Jan. 23, 1852, with an English version of 'Robert le Diable,' succeeded by 'Fra Diavolo,' with Sims Reeves in the title part. The principal incident that marked the season was the production of 'The Sicilian Bride,' by Balfe, in no respect one of his most successful efforts. From this time Schira devoted himself specially to giving instructions in the vocal art. He nevertheless did not neglect composition, as testified in a number of charming songs, duets, trios, etc., some of which have attained wide popularity. He also was busily employed in the composition of a grand opera called 'Niccolò de' Lapi,' performed with marked applause at Her Majesty's Theatre in May 1863. For the Carnival at Naples, two years later, he wrote another grand opera entitled 'Selvaggia,' which was given with brilliant success, and represented at Milan, Barcelona and elsewhere. The reception accorded to 'Selvaggia' led to his being asked to write another opera, 'Lia,' for Venice. This, also brought out during the Carnival, was hardly so much to the taste of the Venetians as its precursor. Nevertheless there are amateurs who regard 'Lia' as Schira's best work.

The managers of the Birmingham Festival commissioned Schira to write a cantata for the meeting of 1873, and he wrote a piece entitled 'The Lord of Burleigh,' the libretto, by Desmond Lumley Ryan, being founded upon Tennyson's well-known poem, though not a line was appropriated save the motto which heads the title-page of the printed edition. An operetta entitled 'The Ear-ring' was performed at the St. George's Hall Theatre. In his own country and elsewhere abroad he held the insignia of several orders of merit, the most prized of which was that of Commendatore della Corona d'Italia—prized the more because conferred by King Humbert motu proprio.

SCHIRMER, G., is the corporate name under which is carried on the music-publishing business, now one of the largest and most important of its kind, that was established in New York by GUSTAV SCHIRMER (b. Saxony, 1829; d. Eisenach, 1893). Schirmer went to New York in 1837, and in 1861, with B. Beer, he took over Breusing's music business, of which he had for some time been manager. Later Schirmer obtained complete control, and the house increased steadily in standing and in importance. On the death of Gustav Schirmer in 1893 the business was incorporated by his heirs, and its management undertaken by his two sons, now both deceased.

After this incorporation the business continued to expand, particularly in the department of publication. The firm has its own engraving and printing plant, one of the few maintained by American music-publishing houses. The principal circulating music library in the United States was established and for many years maintained by G. Schirmer; in 1906 it was transferred to the Institute of Musical Art. Since 1891 the Boston Music Company has been affiliated with G. Schirmer as a branch house. Since 1915 the house of G. Schirmer has published The Musical Quarterly (see PERIODICALS), under the editorship of O. G. SONNECK (q.v.).

SCHLESINGER, the name of two famous music-publishing firms, one in Berlin the other in Paris.

The Berlin firm ('Schlesingerschen Buch- und Musikalienhandlung') was founded in 1810 by (1) ADOLF MARTIN SCHLESINGER (d. 1839), a man of original character and great ability.

Among the principal works issued by him was the edition of Bach's 'Matthew Passion,' one of the fruits of Mendelssohn's revival of it, which Schlesinger brought out, according to his favourite expression, 'for the honour of the house.' It was announced in Sept. 1829, and published soon afterwards both in full and in PF. score. He also founded the Berliner A.M.Z., which under the editorship of A. B. Marx had for seven years (1824-30) much influence for good in Germany.

His second son, (2) HEINRICH (b. 1807; d. Dec. 14, 1879), carried on the business till his death. He founded the Echo in 1851, a periodical which remained in his hands till 1864, when it was sold to R. Lienau.

The eldest son, (3) MORITZ ADOLF (d. Baden-Baden, Feb. 1871), left Berlin, and in 1819 entered the bookselling house of Bossange père at Paris. In 1823 he endeavoured to found a similar business for himself. Police difficulties prevented him from carrying out his intention, and he founded, in 1834, a music business instead which soon took a leading place among French publishers. He brought his German tastes with him, and an unusual degree of enterprise. His first serious effort was an edition of Mozart's operas in PF. score, for which Horace Vernet designed the title-page. This was followed by editions of the complete works of Beethoven, Weber, Hummel, etc., and a 'Collection de chefs-d'œuvre' in twenty-four volumes. He published also the full scores of Meyerbeer's 'Robert' and 'Les Huguenots'; Halévy's 'L'Éclair'; 'La Juive,' 'Les Mousquetaires,' 'La Reine de Chypre,' 'Guido et Ginevra,' 'Charles VI'; Donizetti's 'La Favorite'; Berlioz's 'Symphonie fantastique,' and overture to the 'Carnaval romain'; the arrangements of Wagner; the chamber music of Onslow, Reissiger, and a host of other pieces of all descriptions for which the reader must be referred to the catalogue of the firm. Amongst the educational works the 'Méthode des méthodes' is conspicuous. On Jan. 5, 1834, he issued the first number of the Gazette musicale, which in a few months was united to the Revue musicale and ran a useful and successful course till its expiry in 1880. In 1846 Schlesinger sold the business to Brandus and Dufour, and retired to Baden-Baden. The music stock is now in the possession of Joubert of Paris.

G.

SCHLICK, ARNOLD, the elder (b. Bohemia, c. 1460; d. after 1517). Like Faumann of Nuremberg he was blind, a fine organist and a lute-player. He was a member of the Hofkapelle at Heidelberg before 1511, holding the post of organist to the Count Palatine.

In the fourth book of the 'Micrologus,' 1517, dedicated to Schlick, 'musicus consummatissimo, ac Palatini Principis organiste probatissimo,' Ornithoparcus thus apostrophises him:

'From your sentence no man will enter appeal; because there is no man either learner, or subtler in this art, than your self, who besides the practice, hast wisdom, eloquence, gentleness, quickness of wit, and in all kinds of musick a divine industry, and further the knowledge of many other sciences. Thou wastest the bodily lamp, but in thy mind shineth that golden light; . . . wherefore not only by thy princes, who are to thee most gracious, but even of all men (like Orpheus and Amphion) art thou loved.'

Schlick himself states in the preface to his 'Tabulaturen' that he made tours through Germany and Holland, winning much renown as an organist, and that he was in Worms in 1495, at the time that the Reichstag was held there. Two of Schlick's works are still in existence, the first on organs and organists, the second, a volume of organ and lute pieces in tablature. The former was called:

'Spiegel der Orgelmacher und Organisten allen Stiften vnd kirchen so Orgel halten oder machen lassen hochtützlich, durch den hochberühmten vnd kunstreichen meyster Arnolt Schlickken, Pfalzgrauen-Organisten artlich verfaßt,' etc. (1611), small 4to, 30 pages ('Mirror of organ-builders, and organists, very useful to all foundations and churches which possess or order organs, excellently composed by the celebrated and gifted master A. S., organist to the Palatine').

The only copy known lacks the page at the end which would have given the name of the publisher, but there is little doubt that it was printed by Peter Schoffer at Mainz. Eitner reprinted the whole work in the M.f.M., 1869, giving a facsimile of the engraved title-page. It deals with the materials to be used for the construction of an organ, its erection, the tuning of the pipes, and other technical and theoretical matters, to which is added a description of the organs then in existence, and some allusions to the music of the period. Ellis, in his paper on the history of musical pitch read before the Society of Arts, Mar. 3, 1880 (see PTCH), referred to this book as being of great use in showing the relation between very high and very low church pitch, and the method of tuning before the invention of the mean-tone temperament. He notes also the curious fact that Schlick recommended both the very sharp and the very flat pitch, and for the same reason, consideration of the convenience of both singer and organist using the old ecclesiastical tones, that is, consideration of the compass of the voice and of ease in fingering. This appears to account for the high and low pitches in the earlier period of church pitch.

'Dann ich neulich ein tractetlin han gelesen, das ist der spiegel aller organisten vnn orgelmacher intituliert oder genannt, darin find ich in dem andern capitel, das er spricht der organist well dann per fectum musicam spielen, weste der selb von den dreien geschlechtern zu sagen er wurd eye, nit fectum musicam nennen, dann das er maynt fectum musicam syn das ist cromaticum genusen . . . man soll ihn aber verzeihen dann er hat es übersehen, its augen schuld, oder der spiegel ist dunckel worden.' etc.

These remarks on his use of the term 'musica ficta' did not at all please Schlick, and in return he made a long attack on Virdung in his preface to the 'Tabulaturen,' published the year after; there are only two copies known of this important work, one in the Leipzig Stadtbibliothek, the other, without title-page, is in the Berlin Königl. Bibliothek. The full title is 'Tabulaturen etlicher lobgesang vnd kidelin vff die orgeln vn lauten, ein theil mit zweien stimmen zu zwicken vn die drit dartzu singen, etlich on gesangk mit dreien, von Arnolt Schlickken Pfalzgrauen Churfürstlichen Organisten tabulirt, vn in den truck in d'vrsprunglichen stadt der truckerei zu Mainz wie ble nach volgt verordnet. (On last page) Getruckt zu Mainz durch Peter Schoffern. Vff Sant Mattheis Abent.' Anno 1512, small obl. 4to, 63 pages unnumbered.

It contains fourteen organ pieces, twelve songs with lute accompaniment, and three pieces for lute. Eitner reprinted (M.f.M., 1869) all the organ and two lute compositions. They are preceded by a letter from Schlick's son Arnolt, asking his father to make him a collection of organ and lute music; it is dated. St. Catherine's Day, 1511, and an answer from his father promising to do so, although he has become blind, is dated St. Andrew's Day, 1511. Some satirical verses about Virdung follow.

Schlick's method of arranging songs, some with one-voice part and two lutes accompanying, others for three lutes only, is noted by Ambros² as being rather remarkable at that early date. Two examples were transcribed and published by Wilhelm Tappert.³ Schlick's volume is also the earliest appearance in print of organ pieces in the German tablature, for Ammerbach's 'Tabulaturbuch' was not published until 1571, and Bernh. Jobin's work in 1572. The organ pieces are all taken from sacred vocal compositions, but are arranged with intelligence and artistic feeling, and with a musician's touch that shows a genuine sense of instrumental composition; the next step in advance was to be taken later on by Buus, Willaert and others, in their 'Ricercari' for the organ.⁴ No. 10 from 'Tabulaturen,' an organ arrangement in three-part writing of 'Maria zart,' was published in A. G. Ritter's Zur Geschichte des Orgelspiels, 1884, ii. 96. In the Heilbronn Gymnasial-bibliothek is a MS. partbook with the bass only of a three-part song, 'Mi, mi,' by Arnolt Schlick. A manuscript, Mus. Theoret. 40, 57, written between 1533 and 1540, in the Berlin Königl. Bibliothek, contains a treatise, De musica poetica, which has been ascribed to Arnolt Schlick the younger, because of the initials A. S. attached to it. It is described by H. Bellermand,⁵ who gives a facsimile of one of the musical examples in it, a four-part setting by Heinrich Isaac; it is interesting because of the different parts being distinguished by different colours, the soprano and bass being written in red, the alto in green, and the tenor in black ink. c. s.

SCHLICK, JOHANN KONRAD (b. Münster, c. 1759; d. Gotha, c. 1825), an excellent violoncellist at the Episcopal Chapel, Münster, until 1776, when he went to Gotha as court musician. He toured a great deal as virtuoso, and married in 1785 the violin virtuoso Regina STRINASSACCHI (q.v.). Joh. Schlick composed symphonies, chamber music, concertos, etc., but only a few of his concertos and sonatas for violoncello and three string quartets are still extant. (Mendel; Q.-L.; E. van der Straeten, Hist. of the Violoncello.) E. v. d. s.

SCHLICK, RUDOLF, a doctor of medicine who lived in Meissen, published the following work:

'Rodolph Schlicki R. Exercitatio, qua musices origo prima, altus antiquitatis, dignitas maxima, et auctoritas, quae tam animo quam corpori humano conferat summa, breviter ac dilucide exponuntur. Spira, typis Bernardi Albiini, 1886, 8vo, pp. 48.'

SCHLOESSER, (1) LOUIS (b. Darmstadt, 1800; d. there, Nov. 17, 1886), learnt music from Rinck at Darmstadt, and from Seyfried, Salieri and Mayseider in Vienna. In due time he entered the Conservatoire at Paris, and attended the violin class of Kreutzer and the composition class of Lesueur. He then went to Darmstadt and became first leader and then conductor of the court band. His works comprise five operas, among them 'Das Leben ein Traum' (1839) and 'Die Braut des Herzogs' (1847), a melodrama, music to 'Faust,' a Mass, a ballet and a quantity of instrumental music of all descriptions. His son, (2) CARL WILHELM ADOLPH (b. Darmstadt, Feb. 1, 1830; d. Great Bookham, Nov. 10, 1913), was educated by his father, and in 1847 established himself at Frankfurt. In 1854 he went to England and settled in London as an esteemed teacher. He was a professor at the R.A.M. until his retirement in 1903. He published both in England and Germany a great number of PF. works, both soli and duets, including a suite dedicated to Cipriani Potter and a set of twenty-four studies; many songs and vocal pieces; and many larger works are in MS. His 'Schumann Evenings' in 1868 were well known, and did much to advance the knowledge of Schumann in England. G.

SCHMEDES, ERIK (b. Gyentofte, near Copenhagen, Aug. 27, 1868), operatic tenor, studied with various teachers in Germany and Austria and with Padilla in Paris, before making a brilliant début at Wiesbaden in 1891. Singing as a light or lyric tenor, he went on to Nuremberg in 1894 and to Dresden in 1896; but two years later, when he began his long career at the Vienna Imperial Opera, he attacked the heavier dramatic and Wagnerian parts with signal success. The result was his engagement for Bayreuth in 1899, and he sang there for several years. His production and style were remarkable for ease and polish, the quality of his voice very pleasing; and he was an excellent actor.

SCHMELTZL (SCHMELTZEL), WOLFGANG, a native of Kemnat in the Upper Palatinate, was at first a Protestant cantor at Amberg, where he married, but eventually forsook his wife and children and became a Roman priest. About 1540 he was a schoolmaster in Vienna, and in 1544 issued the book by which he is known, a collection of 'Quodlibets' for four and five voices, as well as folk-songs of the time. The title is:

'Guter seltsamer vnd kunstreicher deutscher Gesang, sonderlich etliche künstliche Quodlibet, Schicht (bei Pavla), vnd dergleichen mit 4 oder 5 Stimmen.'

It was printed at Nuremberg in four part-books. Copies are at Berlin, in the British Museum, and elsewhere.

SCHMELZER, AB EHRENRUEFF, JOHANN HEINRICH (b. circa 1630; d. Vienna, June 1680), chamber musician in the Imperial Court Chapel, Oct. 1, 1649–70; vice-Kapellmeister, Jan. 1, 1671; Kapellmeister, Oct. 1, 1679. He wrote the ballets for the operas given at the court, especially to those by Draghi; composed vocal and instrumental pieces which remained in MS., including many sonatas for violin with and without other instruments (Q.-L.; Riemann).

SCHMID, ANTON (b. Pihl, near Leipa, Bohemia, Jan. 30, 1787; d. Salzburg, July 3, 1857), custos of the Hofbibliothek in Vienna, entered the Imperial Library at Vienna in 1818, became scriptor in 1819 and custos in 1844. His department as a writer was the history and literature of music and hymns. He contributed to the following works: Dr. Ferdinand Wolf's Über die Lais, Sequenzen, und Leiche (Heidelberg, 1841); Becker's Darstellung der musikalischen Literatur (supplement, Leipzig, 1839); A. Schmidt's Allg. Wiener musik. Zeitung (from 1842–48); Dehn's Cäcilia (from 1841–48; Mayence, Schott); and the Österreich. Blätter für Lit. und Kunst (1844–1845). His independent works are Ottaviano dei Petrucci of Fossombrone, the inventor of movable metal types for printing music, and his successors (Vienna, Rohrmann, 1845); Joseph Haydn und Nicolo Zingarelli, proving that Haydn was the author of the Austrian national hymn (Vienna, Rohrmann, 1847); Christoph Willibald Ritter von Gluck (Leipzig, Fleischer, 1854); also a work on chess, Tschaturangavidja (Vienna, Gerold, 1847).

To Schmid in the first instance is due the orderly and systematic arrangement of the musical archives of the Hofbibliothek. ^{1a} recognition of his unwearied industry and research he was made a member of many learned societies in different parts of Europe.

SCHMID, (1) BERNHARD (b. Strassburg, 1520; d. there, ? 1592), organist at St. Thomas, Strassburg, 1560, and from 1564-92 at the cathedral. He wrote 2 books of organ pieces (1577) in tablature, including arrangements of motets by Lassus, Crecquillon, Arcadelt, etc.; (2) BERNHARD, son of the former (b. Strassburg, 1548), succeeded his father in both positions, and published a book in organ tablature of preludes, toccatas, motets, canzonets, madrigals and fugues in 4, 5 and 6 parts (1607) (Q.-L.; Riemann).

SCHMIDT, BERNHARD, see SMITH ('Father Smith').

SCHMIDT, JOHANN CHRISTOPH (b. Hohenstein, 1664; d. Dresden, Apr. 13, 1728). After holding appointments as teacher of the choir-boys and second organist at the Dresden court, he was sent to Italy for further studies. In 1696 he became vice-Kapellmeister, and succeeded Strungk as Kapellmeister in 1698. He was entrusted with the entire management of the Electoral Chapel, was court composer, and honoured with the title of Ober Kapellmeister in 1717. Joh. Seb. Bach appears to have thought well of him, as he copied one of his motets. He composed masses, motets and other sacred and secular vocal and instrumental music, which remained mostly in MS. (Q.-L.).

The son, (1) ALOYS (b. Erlenbach-on-Main, Aug. 26, 1788; d. Frankfurt, July 25, 1866), was taught to play by his father. He then learned composition from André of Offenbach, and in 1816 established himself in Frankfurt as a PF. teacher. After a few successful years there—during which, among others, he had taught Ferdinand Hiller—and much travelling, he migrated to Berlin, then to Hanover, where he held the post of court organist (1825-29), and lastly back to Frankfurt. His reputation as a teacher was great, though he had a passion for journeys, and his pupils complained of his frequent absences. He composed more than 100 works of all descriptions, including masses, four operas, two oratorios and string quartets, besides some useful PF. studies.

His brother, (2) JAKOB (b. Obernburg, Nov. 2, 1803; d. June 1853), was a pupil of Aloys. He settled in Hamburg, where he brought out an opera ('Alfred der Grosse') and a prodigious amount of music, including many sonatas for the piano, solo and with violin, variations, three books of studies, etc., in all more than 300 works.

(3) GEORG ALOYS (b. Hanover, Feb. 2, 1827; d. Dresden, Oct. 15, 1902), son of Aloys (1), was at Heidelberg University, and put himself under Vollweiler for serious study of counterpoint. His first attempt was an operetta called 'Trilby,' which was performed at Frankfurt in 1850 with great success. He then passed some years in various towns of Germany, and at length, in 1856, was called by Flotow to Schwerin as court Kapellmeister. He retired on a pension in 1892, and in the following year became head of the Mozartverein in Dresden. In 1860 he visited London and played before Queen Victoria. He wrote operas, music to plays, and orchestral and other works. He edited and completed Mozart's Mass in C minor (1901). Emma BRANDES (Mme. Engelmann), the eminent pianist, was his pupil. G.

SCHMITT, FATHER JOSEPH, an 18th-century Cistercian monk in the monastery of Eberbach, Rheingau; an excellent violinist and prolific instrumental composer. He left the monastery before 1780 and went to Amsterdam, where he started a music engraving and publishing business which was taken over by J. J. Hummel. Driven out by the French Revolution, he went to Frankfort-on-Main in 1803, where he became musical director of the theatre. A list of his works is given in Q.-L. His youngest son, FRIEDRICH, was an operatic tenor and well-known singing-master. E. v. d. S.

SCHMITT, FLORENT (b. Blâmont, Meurthe-et-Moselle, Sept. 28, 1870), French composer. He began his musical studies at Nancy, 1887, entering two years later the Paris Conservatoire, where he was a pupil of Dubois and Lavignac (harmony), and Massenet and G. Fauré (composition). He won the Grand Prix de Rome in 1900. He was director of the Conservatoire, Lyons, 1922-24.

Florent Schmitt has composed much and in many styles; but he is first and foremost a symphonic composer, loving great and deeply-felt poems, solidly planned, imposingly eloquent and decorated with the most dazzling orchestral colours. His music overflows with life and colour. The power of his eloquence upon the public cannot be doubted, since it acclaims the formidable Psalm xli., the powerful 'Tragédie de Salomé' or the symphonic episodes of 'Antoine et Cléopâtre.' The music of Florent Schmitt is specially remarkable for the vigour of its style, the inexhaustible variety of its writing, and the skill of the composer in drawing out his vocal and orchestral masses. For the rest, Florent Schmitt has written numerous critical musical articles in La France musicale.

SCHMITTBAUR, JOSEPH ALOYS (b. Bamberg, Nov. 8, 1718; d. Karlsruhe, Oct. 24, 1809). He was a pupil of Jommelli and prolific composer, who became Kapellmeister at Karlsruhe in 1772. He was looked upon as one of the greatest vocal composers of his time, and his masses were performed in all the great Catholic cathedrals, especially in the Rhineland and in Cologne, where they were still in use during the first half of the 19th century. His numerous symphonies and chamber music works were of a superficial nature, like the products of the younger Mannheim school. (See list in Q.-L.) E. v. d. s.

SCHMULLER, ALEXANDER (b. Mozyr, Russia, Dec. 5, 1880), violinist, a pupil of Ševčík, Hřmaly and Auer. He settled in Berlin in 1908; in 1914 he accepted a post at the Conservatoire of Amsterdam, from which place he undertakes extensive concert tours. Schmuller is one of the most versatile violinists of our time, especially in the excellence of his interpretation of modern music. He played for a number of years with Max Reger, the value of whose compositions he was amongst the first to recognise. R. M^o.

SCHNABEL, JOSEPH IGNAZ (b. Naumburg a/Queis, May 24, 1767; d. Breslau, June 16, 1831). The son of a cantor and himself a schoolmaster, he gained a wide reputation for the singing of his pupils. In 1797 he went to Breslau as organist of St. Clara and violinist at St. Vincent. In 1805 he became Kapellmeister of the cathedral; in 1812 musical director of the University, director of the Royal Institute for church music, and teacher of music at the Catholic seminary. He composed masses and other church and secular vocal and instrumental music (Q.-L.: Riemann).

SCHNEIDER, (1) GEORG ABRAHAM (b. Darmstadt, Apr. 9, 1770; d. Berlin, Jan. 19, 1839), became a proficient on the horn, and studied theory with Portmann, whose daughter he afterwards married. He was successively oboist in a Hessian regiment, horn-player in the court bands of Darmstadt, Schwerin, Rheinsberg and Berlin. In 1812 or 1814 he undertook the duties of theatrical conductor at Reval, but went back to Berlin in 1816, and in 1820 was made Kapellmeister of the court opera and director of military bands. He had a rare knowledge of musical instruments of all kinds, and wrote a large number of operettas, masses, cantatas, an oratorio, 'Die Pilgrime auf Golgotha', symphonies, concertos and chamber music of all kinds. (Q.-L.: Riemann.) M.

(2) LOUIS (b. Berlin, Apr. 29, 1805; d. Potsdam, Dec. 16, 1878), son of the above, published Geschichte der Oper und des Königlichen Opernhäuses zu Berlin, 1852. (Riemann.)

SCHNEIDER, (1) JOHANN CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH (b. Alt-Waltersdorf, near Zittau, Jan. 3, 1786; d. Nov. 23, 1853), composer, teacher and conductor, composed a symphony at the age of 10. In 1798 he entered the Gymnasium of Zittau, and studied music with Schönfelder and Unger. In 1804 he published three PF. sonatas, and having entered the University of Leipzig in 1805, carried on his musical studies to such purpose that in 1807 he became organist of St. Paul's, in 1810 director of the Seconda opera, in 1812 organist of the Thomaskirche, and in 1817 director at the Stadt Theater. There he remained till 1821, when he became Kapellmeister to the Duke of Dessau, whose music he much improved, and founded in the town a Singakademie, a schoolmasters' choral society and a Liedertafel. In 1820 he founded a musical institute, which succeeded well, and educated several excellent musicians, Robert Franz among the number. Schneider was also an industrious composer, his works comprising: Oratorios—'Die Hohenfahrt des Messias' (1810), 'Das Weltgericht' (1819), 'Totenfeier' (1821), 'Die Sündfluth' (1825), 'Verlorne Paradies' (1824), 'Jesu Geburt' (1825), 'Christus das Kind', 'Pharao' and 'Gideon' (1829), 'Absalom' (1830), 'Das befreite Jerusalem' (1830), 'Salomons Tempelbau' (1836), 'Bonifatius' (1837), 'Christus der Erlöser' (1838), 'Gethsemane und Golgotha' (1838); 14 masses, various settings of Gloria and Te Deum, 25 cantatas; 6 hymns; 13 psalms; 7 operas, 23 symphonies; 60 sonatas; 6 concertos, 400 Liedr. for men's voices, and 200 ditto for a single voice.

Schneider directed the musical festivals of Magdeburg (1825), Nuremberg (1828), Strassburg (1830), Halle (1830 and 1835), Halberstadt (1830), Dessau (1834), Wittenberg (1835), Coethen (1838 and 1846), Coblenz and Hamburg (1840), Meissen (1841), Zerbst (1844) and Lübeck (1847). He also published didactic works—Elementarbuch der Harmonie und Tonsetzkunst (1820), translated into English (London, 1828); Vorschule der Musik (1827). and Handbuch des Organisten (1829-30). The oratorio of the 'Sündfluth' was translated into English as 'The Deluge' by E. Taylor, published in London, and performed at the Norwich Festival of 1833.

Schneider was a doctor of philosophy and a member of the Berlin and several other academies. Some traits of his curious jealous temper will be found in Schubring's Reminiscences of Mendelssohn, in Daheim for 1866, No. 26. He was vexed with Mendelssohn for his revival of Bach's Passion—but the feeling passed away; and in the Signale for 1866, Nos. 46, 47, 48, there are eight letters, 1820-45

'translated in The Musical World, Dec. 29, 1866, and Jan. 5, 1867, from Mendelssohn to him showing that they were on very good terms.¹ When Mendelssohn's body passed through Dessau on its way to Berlin, Schneider met it at the station with his choir, and a lament was sung which he had purposely composed, and which will be found in the A.M.Z. for 1847, No. 48.

(2) JOHANN GOTTLÖB (b. Alt-Gersdorf, Oct. 28, 1789; d. Dresden, Apr. 13, 1864), celebrated Dresden organist, brother of the preceding, was at 22 organist of the Leipzig University church, and by 1820 was recognised as one of the first organists living. To his fine playing at a Magdeburg festival in 1825 he owed his Dresden appointment of court organist, which he held till his death. From the organ-loft of the Hofkirche he made his influence felt; how widely, may be gathered from the mere names of his pupils, amongst whom were Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, Merkel, Topfer, Van Eycken. The last four were amongst the thirty old pupils who composed and presented to him that graceful offering, the 'Jubel Album für die Orgel,' in 1861, the fiftieth year of his artistic career. Schumann's studies with him permanently influenced the composer, and directly inspired or helped to inspire the Pedal Pianoforte Studies, and Fugues on the name of Bach; and Mendelssohn confessed a like obligation and admiration. Schneider's reading of Bach—derived straight from him by direct descent in only three removes—was the best weapon in his equipment as a teacher. He always ended a lesson by playing one of the great fugues or, especially, 'organ Chorals.' Sir Herbert Oakeley (Schneider's last pupil) used to talk much of his playing of these compositions. He liked playing some of 'the 48' on his deep-toned Silbermann organ.

Schneider's few published works include an 'answer of thanks' to the 'Jubel Album,' a masterly fantasia and fugue in D minor (op. 3), etc.

1865), tenor singer, the son of the painter Julius Schnorr von Carolsfeld. He first received instruction in music from Julius Otto at Dresden, where, in 1846, his father became director of the Kunst Akademie. In 1854 he was for a short time at the Leipzig Conservatorium, and later in the year studied for the stage under Eduard Devrient at Carlsruhe, where he became engaged. He made his début in the modest part of Naphthali in Méhul's 'Joseph,' and later made a great success as Robert (Meyerbeer). About this period he married the singer Malwina Garrigues (b. Dec. 7, 1825; d. Vincentus Hospital, Carlsruhe, Feb. 8, 1904). On leave of absence, he sang in opera at Wiesbaden and Frankfurt, and at festivals at Mainz and Dusseldorf. From 1860-65 he was engaged at Dresden, where he increased his popularity. In 1862 Wagner heard him when singing at Carlsruhe as Lohengrin, and was so struck with his performance that he determined to confide to him the part of Tristan whenever the opera was produced. Schnorr had been warmly recommended to the composer earlier, both by Tichatschek the singer, and Devrient, but for a time Wagner was not prepossessed in Schnorr's favour, on account of his unromantic figure, in spite of his talent and his enthusiasm for Wagner and his music.² On June 10, 1865, Schnorr and his wife created the parts of Tristan and Isolde, when the opera was produced at Munich, at the express instance of the composer. Their leave of absence being limited, they returned to Dresden, July 15, and the tenor died six days after, of a chill and rheumatism, caught at the first performance of the opera. He was a clever all-round musician, an excellent pianist and extempore player, a composer, and arranger of songs of Bach, Gluck and the old Italian school. He was also a painter and a writer of poetry. In 1867 his widow published a volume of poems by herself and her husband. After his death she was engaged at Hamburg, and finally at Carlsruhe, where, on her retirement, she became a teacher of singing. A. G. SCHNÜFFIS, see LAURENTIUS VON SCHNÜFFIS.

SCHOBERLECHNER, (1) FRANZ (b. Vienna, July 21, 1797; d. Berlin, Jan. 7, 1843). Hummel composed for him his second pianoforte concerto in C, which he performed in public with success when only 10 years old. The precocious child was taken under the patronage of Prince Esterhazy, and sent to Vienna to study under Forster. From 1814 he travelled in Austria and Italy. While at Florence he composed a Requiem and a buffa opera, 'I virtuosi teatrali.' In the next year, having been appointed maestro di cappella to the Duchess of Lucca, he wrote 'Gli Arabi nelle Gallie,' and subsequently, at Vienna in 1820, 'Der junge Onkel.' In 1823 he went to Russia. He seems to have written to Beethoven before starting, for letters of introduction, which the composer refused.¹ At St. Petersburg he recommended himself to dall' Occa, a professor of singing, whose daughter he married in 1824. After travelling in Germany and Italy, the pair returned to St. Petersburg in 1827, where Mme. Schoberechnecker was engaged for three years at the Italian Opera at a salary of 20,000 roubles. Her husband composed for her an opera, 'Il Barone di Dolzheim,' which had some success. In 1831 Schoberechnecker retired to a country house near Florence. His last opera was 'Rossane,' produced at Milan, Feb. 9, 1839.

(2) MADAME SOPHIE SCHOBERECHNECKER, daughter of Signor dall' Occa (b. St. Petersburg, 1807; d. Florence, 1863), till 1827 appeared only in concerts, but was then engaged at the Italian Opera of St. Petersburg. She had a very beautiful voice, and for twelve or thirteen years sang with unvarying success in almost all the principal towns of Germany and Italy. In 1840 she left the stage and retired to her husband's property in Tuscany.

SCHOBERT,² JOHANN (JEAN) (b. circa 1720, d. Sept. 1767), a player on the harpsichord, was brought up at Strassburg. He was at one time organist at Versailles, but was dismissed for negligence. He settled in Paris in 1760, in which year his first works were published there, where he was in the service of the Prince de Conti. On the occasion of his death, Grimm, no mean judge of music, inserts in his Correspondance a very high eulogium on his merits as a player. He praises him for 'his great ability, his brilliant and enchanting execution, and an unequalled facility and clearness. He had not the genius of our Eckard, who is undoubtedly the first master in Paris; but Schobert was more universally liked than Eckard, because he was always agreeable, and because it is not every one who can feel the power of genius.'

He left 17 sonatas for clavier and violin; 11 for clavier, violin and violoncello; 3 quartets for clavier, 2 violins and violoncello; 6 'sinfonies' for clavier, violin and two horns; 6 clavier concertos, and 4 books of sonatas for clavier solo.³ These seem to have been originally published in Paris, but editions of many of them appeared in London between 1770 and 1780. The particulars of his death are given by Grimm. It was occasioned by eating some fungi which he gathered near Paris, and which killed his wife, his children, a friend, the servant, and himself.⁴ Crotch included two of Schobert's pieces in his 'Specimens,' vol. iii. A minuetto and allegro molto in E \flat have been reprinted in Pauer's 'Alte Meister' (the former has been 'freely arranged' in L. Godowsky's 'Renaissance'), other movements in the 'Maitres du clavecin,' and a sonata, so-called, in the Musical Library. A more important reprint, however, is that of D.D.T. vol. xxxix., where a large selection of his works has been edited by Riemann. Burney (Hist. iv. 591, 597) remarks that his music is essentially harpsichord music, and that he was one of the few composers who were not influenced by Emanuel Bach.

SCHÖFFER, PETER (the younger), an early 16th-century printer, son of the partner of Gutenberg and Berg, one of the earliest German music printers, whose work rivals that by Petrucci in every respect. He worked at first at Mainz, where in 1512 he published Arnold Schlick's organ tablature, and in 1513 the first 4-part song-book. Thence he went to Worms, and from 1534-37 was at Strassburg in partnership with Apiarius, who soon after went to Berne. In 1539 he was again working on his own account, and in 1540 was printer at Venice (Q.-L.; Riemann).

SCHÖLCHER, VICTOR (b. Paris, July 21, 1804; d. Harville, Seine-et-Oise, Dec. 24, 1893), French writer and politician, son of a manufacturer of china, was educated at the Collège Louis le Grand, and well known as an ultra-republican. On the accession of the Emperor Napoleon III. he was expelled both from France and Belgium, but took refuge in London, where he brought out his Histoire des crimes du 2 décembre (1853), and an English pamphlet entitled Dangers to England of the Alliance with the Men of the Coup d'État (1854).

Schœlcher remained in England till Aug. 1870, returning to Paris immediately before the Revolution of Sept. 4. As staff-colonel of the Garde Nationale he commanded the Legion of Artillery throughout the siege of Paris. After Jan. 31, 1871, he was elected to the Assemblée Nationale by the Department of the Seine, Martinique and Cayenne, and sat for Martinique till elected a life senator (Dec. 16, 1875).

His claim to a place in this work, however, is as a distinguished amateur. His devotion to art of all kinds was proved by his articles in L'Artiste (1832) and La Revue de Paris (1833), and he made during his travels a most interesting collection of foreign musical instruments. His long stay in England had a still more remarkable result in his enthusiasm for Handel. He accordingly made a collection of Handel's works, and of books and pamphlets bearing on his life and music, a list of which he gives in the beginning of his book. To the autographs in Buckingham Palace and the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge, and to the copies by Smith formerly in possession of H. B. Lennard, he obtained access, and thus provided, published The Life of Handel, by Victor Schœlcher, London, Trübner, 8vo, 1857. The author was materially assisted by Rophino Lacy,¹ whose labours are amply acknowledged in the preface (p. xxii). The work was written by Schœlcher in French, and translated by James Lowe. It contains much information beyond what is indicated in the title, especially with regard to Italian opera and music in general in England during the 18th century. The French MS., Handel et son temps, was handed over to La France musicale, which (Aug. 19, 1860) published the first four chapters and the beginning of the fifth (Nov. 2, 1862), but there broke off, doubtless for political reasons. The MS. was supposed to have been destroyed, till May 25, 1881, when it was offered for sale by Charavay, and at once bought for the library of the Conservatoire, thus completing Schœlcher's magnificent gift (Nov. 1872) of all the works, in print or MS., used by him in preparing the book, and his collection of foreign instruments. He later added a quantity of music and rare books bearing on the history of Italian opera in London, and on singing and pianoforte-playing in the United Kingdom. The Fonds Schœlcher, as it is called, contains in all 500 volumes uniformly bound with the initials of the donor, and has already been of immense service to French artists and musicologists.

SCHÖNBERG, ARNOLD (b. Vienna, Sept. 13, 1874), Austrian composer, was attracted to composition from his earliest school days, when he wrote short duets for his violin lessons. He subsequently taught himself the violoncello, and composed several trios and a string quartet for a group of his schoolfellows with whom he played chamber music. At the age of 16 his father died, and the boy was left in straitened circumstances. He continued his musical pursuits, but remained entirely self-taught in composition until a friend showed some of his work to Alexander von Zemlinsky, who was so favourably impressed that he offered to teach him. This, the only tuition Schönberg had, was the foundation of an intimate personal friendship which was converted into relationship by his marriage, in 1901, with Zemlinsky's sister Mathilde. Meanwhile, in 1897, Schönberg, besides making a piano arrangement of his friend's opera 'Sarema,' wrote a string quartet which, after drastic revision, was performed the following winter and attracted favourable attention. This work, the first to be heard in public, is unfortunately lost, but twelve of the larger number of songs which followed (1898-1900) were published as opp. 1-3. Some of these were included by Prof. Gärtner at a song recital (Dec. 1900) and provoked the first of the hostile demonstrations which have dogged the successive stages of the composer's evolution. His next work was the well-known string sextet 'Verklärte Nacht' (op. 4), which was composed in three weeks (Sept. 1899) during a sojourn with Zemlinsky at Payerbach. He then engaged upon the composition of the 'Gurre-Lieder' (without op. no.), a vast work for soli (one of whom is a reciter), chorus and orchestra, of which a laudatory review by Ernest Newman appeared in the Mus. T. of Jan. 1914. It was completed by Mar. 1901, and the scoring begun the following August, but owing to the pressure of professional occupations it had to be put aside, and the third section of the work was not orchestrated until 1910-11, when, however, no important changes were made in the composition. It was first performed at Vienna on Feb. 23, 1913, under Franz Schreker.

From 1901, the year of his marriage, to July 1903 Schönberg lived in Berlin, at first conducting the Überbrettli performances, afterwards scoring, sometimes conducting, a number of operettas. During this period he wrote the symphonic poem 'Pelleas and Melisande' (op. 5). In the autumn following his return to Vienna (1903) he took up teaching, to which he has since devoted close and constant attention. After writing six songs with orchestra (op. 8), he engaged upon the string quartet in D minor (op. 7) which was begun at Mödling in the summer of 1904, and completed a year later at Gmunden. It was followed by eight songs (op. 6), the last three of which are dated Oct. 1905. The following year (1906) he represented by the ballad 'Jane Grey' (op. 12, no. 1), the chamber symphony in E major (op. 9) and the greater part of a second chamber symphony which he subsequently (1911) discarded. On Mar. 9, 1907, he completed, for a competition, the chorus 'Friede auf Erden' (op. 13), and the same day began the composition of the string quartet in F sharp minor, the first movement of which was completed at Gmunden on Sept. 1. In the early part of that year first the D minor quartet, and then the chamber symphony, had been performed by the Rosé Quartet in the face of violent hostile demonstrations. About this time he wrote the second ballad of op. 12 and, a little later, the songs op. 14. The second quartet was completed in the summer of 1908, and a third sketched which was, however, abandoned. Then followed the Stefan-George cycle 'Die hängenden Gärten' which was completed in the autumn. The first performance of the F sharp minor quartet took place in December amid wild scenes. Frau Guthell-Schoder, of the Opera, sang the Stefan-George poems which are set with its third and fourth movements.

style, to which recent works, notably the quartet (op. 10), and the songs (opp. 14 and 15) had perceptibly been leading. These consisted of the three piano pieces (op. 11), the five orchestral pieces (op. 16), both of which provoked a world-wide discussion, and the monodrama 'Erwartung,' which was composed in sixteen days (Aug. 27-Sept. 12, 1909), but was not performed until the Prague International Festival of May 1924, Zemlinsky conducting and Marie Gutheil-Schoder taking the part of the woman. The text of this, written by Marie Pappenheim at Schönberg's suggestion, is a monodrama—a drama of one character. A woman wanders through a forest anxiously seeking her lover. Her forebodings are realised and she finds him dead, slain near the house of the woman who has taken him from her. Schönberg has employed a large orchestra, and the soprano part is of enormous difficulty. After this he engaged upon a second dramatic work, 'Die glückliche Hand' (The Lucky Hand), op. 18, which was, however, not completed until Nov. 18, 1913. The action is sustained throughout by one character, a man, but there are two others, a man and a woman, and a chorus of six men and six women. The subject is symbolical and might be described as the pursuit of happiness, but the dramatic means employed are strange. At the rise of the curtain the stage is almost in darkness. At the front lies a man. On his back crouches a monstrous cat-like creature which appears to be biting him. At the back are dark violet hangings through which appear in a green light the twelve faces of the chorus, who describe the fate of the man who seeks earthly happiness whilst spiritual happiness awaits him in the end. The subsequent episodes are concerned with spurious forms of happiness. It was first performed at Vienna in Oct. 1924.

In 1910 Schönberg began to write his Treatise on Harmony, and to score the third part of the 'Gurre-Lieder.' For three years previously he had been turning his attention to another medium of expression, and painted a large number of pictures. In the autumn of 1910, on his return from a Berlin performance of 'Pelleas and Melisande,' an exhibition of these was held in Heller's Gallery, in connexion with which Rosé gave performances of both quartets. The following spring (1911) he wrote the six small pieces for piano (op. 19). Later in the year he migrated once more to Berlin, where he completed the Harmony Treatise and the scoring of the 'Gurre-Lieder,' and set 'Herzgewächse' (Maeterlinck) for high soprano, celesta, harmonium and harp (op. 20). In 1912, between Mar. 20 and Sept. 9, he wrote the cycle 'Pierrot Lunaire,' the first performance of which was given that autumn in Berlin, and followed by a tour in Germany and Austria. 'Pierrot Lunaire' consists of twenty-one poems (in three cycles of seven each) by Albert Giraud in a translation by Otto Erich Hartleben, set for declamation with five instruments in constantly varied combinations: piano, flute (alternating with piccolo), clarinet (alternating with bass clarinet), violin (alternating with viola) and violoncello. To English readers, the poems recall the mood of the literary 'nineties as represented for instance by Ernest Dowson, and it is interesting to note that another poet to whom Schönberg has been strongly attracted, Stefan George, is Dowson's German translator. Except at a few points the part of the reciter is notated, but clear indications are given that it is not to be either sung or delivered in a sing-song form of speaking voice. The composer makes the distinction that in song the pitch of each note is unalterably fixed, whereas the speaking voice gives each note but immediately leaves it upwards and downwards. The rhythm is, however, to be maintained as strictly as in song. Performers are further requested not to seek to define the mood and character of the pieces from the text. So far as the composer intended the incidents and emotions described to be expressed, his purpose is achieved in the music as written. Two actresses have given interpretations, notably in Austria, Germany and Holland, which earned the composer's approval: Albertine Zehme in the first performances, and Erika Wagner since the war. These rendered the music in strictest accordance with the composer's views. Marya Freund, who took part in other performances, mainly in France, Italy and England, never forgot that she was a singer. Hence her rendering is not considered strictly orthodox, but its excellence has nevertheless contributed materially to the attention which the work has everywhere received.

Next began a series of foreign appearances. In Nov. 1912 he conducted 'Pelleas and Melisande' at Amsterdam with great success. Returning to Vienna he had the satisfaction of hearing the integral performance of the 'Gurre-Lieder' on Feb. 23, 1913, and conducted an orchestral concert on Mar. 30, attended by the usual disturbance. Meanwhile Sir Henry Wood, who had conducted the first London performance of the five orchestral pieces on Sept. 3, 1912, had invited him to direct the second, which he did in Feb. 1914, journeying afterwards to Leipzig for the 'Gurre-Lieder' and Amsterdam for the five pieces. When war broke out the only composition in addition to the above which was finished was the orchestral song 'Sera-phita,' to which, by the end of 1914, he had added three others to form op. 22. Then occurs a long interval, interrupted during 1915-17 by spells of military service, but otherwise occupied with the poems of a projected trilogy of oratorios, and the composition, as yet unfinished, of its third section, 'Die Jakobsleiter.' Early in 1918 he returned to Vienna, teaching and directing as president the activities of the Verein für Musikalische Privat-Aufführungen. From about 1920 he came again into international prominence with numerous performances everywhere. In the summer of 1922, at the suggestion of Josef Stransky, then conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society, he scored for orchestra two Bach Choral - Preludes: 'Schmücke dich' and 'Komm, Gott, Schöpfer, heiliger Geist.' They were first played in Carnegie Hall the following December. During 1923 he completed three works which showed that in the long interval his style had reached a further stage of evolution. These were the five piano pieces (op. 23) begun in 1920, the serenade for seven instruments (op. 24) begun in 1921 and a suite of dance movements Prelude, Gavotte and Musette, Intermezzo, Minuet and Gigue for piano (op. 25). Since then has appeared the quintet for wind instruments (op. 26), composed 1923-24.

The sequence of works is given above in some detail, because it has considerable bearing upon the stages of the composer's development. For instance, the sensational volte-face which is often alleged to have taken place between op. 10 and 11 acquires a less revolutionary aspect when one realises that several works intervened in which a gradual transition, begun in the quartet op. 10, can be traced until it reaches the definite stage of op. 11. Nevertheless the occurrence of such turning points permits Schönberg's work to be divided into three distinct periods. The first comprises opp. 1-10 and 12-15, of which all but the earliest have a transitional character, which becomes conspicuous from op. 10 onwards. The second is represented by opp. 11 and 16-22, the third by opp. 23-26.

Mastery of, and emancipation from, accepted forms was progressively the goal of the first. Starting with the melodic-harmonic apparatus of the Romantic Movement in the sextet 'Verklärte Nacht,' and the 'Gurre-Lieder,' the composer soon carried chromaticism to the very limits of tonality, by chromatic alteration, and especially by the use of the vacillating (schwebende) chords, among which those resulting from an equal division of the octave, or generally symmetrical intervals, have the most disintegrating effect upon tonality. In the chamber symphony the use of the whole-tone scale, and, at the opening, of four superimposed fourths, set the main tonality of E major, and in the last movement of the F sharp minor quartet there are whole passages in which the key remains fluid and indefinite. In regard to this period it is useful to consult the authoritative and detailed analytical guides to the 'Gurre-Lieder,' 'Pelleas and Melisande' and the chamber symphony which are the work of Schönberg's pupil, Alban Berg (q.v.). In the George-Lieder (op. 15) the composer finally dispenses with the aid of tonality and commits himself to the new path. From this point also the old view of consonance and dissonance gives way to a new, for the most part contrapuntal, mode of writing.

In the second period Schönberg develops the newly-found independence, the first effect of which is a drastic restriction of the dimensions of his works and of the means employed in them. Where nothing is written as a mere product of the context, and consequently every note has its full significance, the texture would naturally be considerably lightened. But whilst the formal principles derived from tonality were discarded, others were not only retained but further developed. For instance, the second cycle of 'Pierrot Lunaire' opens with a passacaglia, 'Die Nacht' to which Roland Tenschert has devoted a careful analytical study in Die Musik (May 1925). 'Der Mondfleck,' in the same work, contains a double canon cancrizans. 'Pierrot Lunaire,' for a reciter and five instruments is the best known work of this period, though in England it has had fewer performances than the five orchestral pieces. The composer's admirers are a little inclined to distrust its relative popularity, fearing lest it may be attributable more to its literary evocations than to an understanding of its strictly musical qualities.

In the third period Schönberg establishes new formal principles to govern the new material and new experience acquired in the second. These principles have been described by Erwin Stein in an essay, Neue Formprinzipien, which is included in the special Schönberg number with which the Musikblätter des Anbruch celebrated his fiftieth birthday, and also in a compilation Von neuer Musik (Marcan, Cologne 1925). Schönberg himself is preparing a treatise on this new method which he terms Komposition mit zwölf Tönen, which he envisages as the continuation of his Treatise on Harmony. Its basis is the twelve-note scale, but, as Stein points out, if this is to create a form it must be differentiated, and that can only happen by means of a limitation of some kind. This is done by arranging the twelve notes (or a portion of them) into a basic shape (Grundgestalt), of which a composition may have one or more. These note-shapes can be inverted, and both the original and the inversion horizontally reversed (cancrizans), giving four variants of each. These again may be transposed at any interval. Thus is constituted the material of the composition, which may be used horizontally, with the consecutive notes in one part or distributed, and vertically, furnishing therefore both line and texture. Stein gives a detailed explanation on these lines of opp. 23, 24 and 25, and in the Anbruch of Feb. 1925 a corresponding analysis of the wind quintet (op. 26) is given by the composer's son-in-law, Felix Greissle, who conducted the first performance, Sept. 16, 1924, at Vienna. The serenade (op. 24) was given at the Venice (1925) Festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music.

Schönberg's Treatise on Harmony, revised and now in its third edition, embodies the substance of his teaching as imparted to his pupils, of whom there have been many, including Anton von Webern, Alban Berg, Heinrich Jalowetz, Erwin Stein, Egon Wellesz, Karl Horwitz, Paul A. Pisk and Hans Eisler. Its preface opens: 'This book I have learned from my pupils.' His poems for 'The Lucky Hand,' and for the projected trilogy of oratorios, 'Totentanz der Prinzipien, Requiem, Die Jakobseleiter,' have been published as 'Texte.' His other writings comprise an article on musical criticism (Der Merker, 1909, II.), a memorial tribute to Mahler (ibid. 1911, V.), problems of art-education (Musik. Taschenbuch, Vienna, 1911), 'Parsifal' and copyright (Konzert-Taschenbuch, 1912), the relation to the text (Blaue Reiter, 1913), Gewissheit (included in a vol. of Confessions, published by Reiss, Berlin), music (Richtlinien für ein Kunstamt, Ad. Loos, Vienna, 1919, reprinted in Von neuer Musik, Marcan, Cologne, 1925), a new twelve-note notation (Anbruch, Jan. 1925), tonality and form (Christian Science Monitor, Dec. 1925) and Gesinnung oder Erkenntnis (Annual of the Universal Edition, Vienna, 1926). In the last-mentioned he refers to a volume Der musikalische Gedanke und seine Darstellung, upon which he is engaged.

There is a rapidly growing Schönberg literature. The most detailed account of the composer and his works is contained in a monograph by Dr. Egon Wellesz (Tal, Vienna, 1921; English translation by W. H. Kerridge, Dent, London, 1925), to which the present writer is indebted for some dates and biographical information. A shorter monograph by Dr. Paul Stefan has been issued by the same publisher (Tal, Vienna, 1924). Then there are two compilations, one a collection of essays inscribed to him by his pupils and published under his name (R. Piper, Munich, 1912), and the other consisting partly of essays and partly of complimentary addresses issued as a special number of the Anbruch (Aug.-Sept. 1924) on the occasion of the composer's fiftieth birthday as mentioned above. Besides the various writings to which the reader has been referred (analytical guides by Alban Berg, articles by Tenechert, Stein and Greissle) should be mentioned further an article Arnold Schönberg, contributed by Paul Bekker to Kritische Zeitbilder; Arnold Schönberg und Wien, by D. I. Bach (Merker 1921, II.); and Pierrot Lunaire, by Erwin Stein (Il Pianoforte, Apr. 1924). But the performance of his most discussed works has led everywhere to numerous articles, appreciative or polemical, and most books on modern music devote a special chapter to his methods.

SCHÖNBERGER, BENNO (b. Vienna, Sept. 12, 1863), was a pupil of Anton Door for piano, Bruckner for counterpoint and Volkmann for composition at the Vienna Conservatorium until 1874, when he played at recitals, and with the Hellmesberger Quartet. He went for a time to study with Liszt, and in 1878 undertook an extended tour in Russia, Germany, Austria and Belgium. From 1880-85 he taught in Vienna, and after a journey to Sweden in 1886 settled in London, making his first appearance at a recital of his own, in Jan. 1887. From that time he held an honourable place among the pianists who appear regularly in London, and his interpretations of the classics were always sound and interesting, while his tone and technique were of remarkable excellence. He went to America on tour in 1894. Later he has made frequent appearances in England, and toured in Europe. He has published numerous piano pieces, including three sonatas and songs. SCHOLZ, (1) BERNHARD E. (b. Mainz, Mar. 30, 1835; d. Munich, Dec. 26, 1916), studied the piano with Ernst Pauer (at that time director of the Liedertafel in that city) and theory with S. W. Dehn, became teacher of theory in the Royal School of Music at Munich in 1856, was Kapellmeister at the Hanover Court Theatre from 1859-65, when he went to live in Berlin, until he was summoned to Breslau in 1871 as director of the Orchester-verein. On Apr. 1, 1883, he became Raff's successor as director of Dr. Hoch's Conservatorium at Frankfort. There he met with much opposition, and in spite of endless intrigue succeeded in ensuring a prosperous future for the Conservatorium. From 1884 he also directed the Gesangverein founded in Mainz by Fried. Wilhelm Rühl. He retired in 1908 and subsequently lived at Florence and Munich.

Scholz's many compositions include songs, string quartets (opp. 46 and 48), and a quintet (op. 47), a piano concerto, a symphony in B \flat (op. 60) entitled 'Malinconia,' some pieces for orchestra, soli and chorus, 'Das Siegesfest,' 'Das Lied von der Glocke,' overtures to Goethe's 'Iphigenie' and 'Im Freien,' a Requiem, and the operas 'Carlo Rosa' (Munich, 1858); 'Zietensche Husaren' (Breslau, 1869); 'Morgiane' (Munich, 1870); 'Genoveva' (Nuremberg, 1875); 'Der Trompeter von Säckingen' (Wiesbaden, 1877); 'Die vornehmen Wirte' (Leipzig, 1883); 'Ingo' (Frankfort-on-M., 1898); 'Anno 1757' (Berlin, 1903); and Mirandolina (Darmstadt, 1907).

His son, (2) HANS (b. Breslau, Mar. 7, 1879), educated at Frankfort, became teacher of harmony and counterpoint in Munich University. In 1914 he produced a German translation of Berlioz's Memoirs.

SCHOP (SCHOPF), JOHANN (d. circa 1664 or 1665), a skilful player on the lute, violin and trombone, who entered the court band at Wolfenbüttel in 1615, was a violinist at the Danish court in 1618-19 (according to one account he went to Denmark in 1615, so that his stay at Wolfenbüttel must have been very short), and in 1621 became director of the Ratemusik at Hamburg, being appointed later on organist to the town and to the church of St. James. Although he was chiefly renowned as an instrumentalist (Mattheson speaks of him as incomparable in his way), he is at present known mainly as a composer of Choral-tunes, in virtue of his contributions to Rist's hymn-book, published in 1641 as 'Himmliche Lieder.' No copy seems to exist of his 'Neue Paduanen, Galliarden, Allemanden,' published in six parts at Hamburg in 1633-40; his 'Geistliche Concerten' appeared in 1643, and many occasional compositions, such as congratulatory odes on weddings, are extant.

Besides Rist's book, already alluded to, the following contain tunes by Schop: Rist's 'Frommer und gottseliger Christen alltägliche Hausmusik' (1654), Philip von Zesen's 'Jugend- und Liebes-Flammen,' 1651 and 1653, and from these books the melodies were copied into later collections. SCHOTT, ANTON (b. Castle Stauffeneck, Swabian Alps, June 25, 1846; d. Stuttgart, Jan. 8, 1913), was educated at the military academy at Ludwigsburg, Württemberg, and served as an artillery officer through the war of 1866. Some time after, his voice attracted the attention of Pischek, and of Frau SCHREIBER, from the latter of whom he had much instruction preparatory to his appearance on the stage. On May 8, 1870, Schott made his début at Frankfort as Max in 'Der Freischütz,' with such success that he determined to abandon the army in favour of music, though prevented for a time by the outbreak of the war of 1870, through which he served and obtained his captaincy. At the end of 1871 he was engaged at Munich, and subsequently at Berlin, Schwerin and Hanover. At the last place he created the part of Benvenuto Cellini on the revival of Berlioz's opera there under Bulow. He sang in England, June 16, 1879, at piano recitals given by von Bülow at St. James's Hall, and at a New Philharmonic concert, in all of which he was well received. He appeared Jan. 10, 1880, at Her Majesty's Theatre (Carl Rosa), as Rienzi, and afterwards as Lohengrin, with only moderate success, owing to his faulty intonation. He had a fine presence and a good voice. He received further instruction from Blume, and created the part of Azim in Stanford's 'Veiled Prophet' on Feb. 8, 1881, at Hanover. In 1882 he sang with Neumann in Wagner's company in Italy, and in 1884 in Leopold Damrosch's company in America. He afterwards devoted himself exclusively to concert-singing. In his day he was considered one of the best 'heroic tenors' in Germany.

SCHOTT (B. SCHOTT UND SÖHNE), the well-known firm of music-publishers at Mainz. This business was founded in 1773 by BERNHARD SCHOTT, and carried on after his death in 1817 by his sons ANDREAS (b. 1781; d. 1840) and JOHANN JOSEPH (b. 1782; d. 1855), who in the early part of the 19th century set up a house of their own at Antwerp (afterwards removed to Brussels) which gave them an advantage both in suppressing pirated editions, and in dealing with the French and Italian composers then in vogue. In 1838 they founded a branch in London, superintended by a third brother, ADAM (who was afterwards a band-master in Canada and India, dying in the latter country), and conducted with great success since 1849 by J. B. Wolf (b. 1815; d. 1881), and, after his death, by Carl Volkert. Another branch in Paris soon followed. PETER (d. Paris, Sept. 20, 1894), grandson of Bernhard, lived in Brussels and managed the business of the branches there and in Paris, forwarding at the same time the circulation of the Mainz publications. Besides these four independent houses the firm had dépôts in Leipzig, Rotterdam and New York. FRANZ PHILIPP (b. 1811; d. Milan, 1874), elder grandson of Bernhard, took part in the business from 1825, and managed it after the death of his father Andreas, first in partnership with his uncle Johann Joseph, and after his death by himself. After his death the business was carried on with the old traditions by PETER SCHOTT (a son of the Brussels Peter), FRANZ VON LANDWEHR (a nephew of the family), and DR. L. STRECKER.

At a time when the book and music trade was regulated by no fixed laws, the correct and elegant editions of Mainz found a ready entrance into foreign countries, and the firm was thus stimulated to keep ahead of rivals by making constant improvements in music-printing and engraving. They were the first to use lithography for this purpose, an important turning-point in the printing of music. Their copyright publications included Beethoven's latest quartets, Ninth Symphony and Mass in D, nearly all the operas of Donizetti, Rossini, Adam and Auber, most of Rink's organ-music, 'Der Choralfreund,' in nine volumes; 'École pratique de la modulation,' op. 99; 'Gesangstudien' (vocalises, méthode de chant, etc.) by Bordèse, Bordogni, Boncone, Fétis, Gavaudé, Garcia, Lablache, Abbé Mainzer, Rossini, Rubini, Vaccai, etc.; in later times, Wagner's 'Meistersinger,' 'Ring des Nibelungen' and 'Parsifal.' The establishment has been enlarged by the addition of a printing-office (where have been printed, among others, Gottfried Weber's theoretical works, the periodical Cécilia, 1824-48, etc.), and in 1829 of a piano factory, which, however, was given up in 1860 on account of the extension of the main business.

The Schotts, besides innumerable services to art and artists, did good work in a smaller circle by fostering music in Mainz itself. Franz and his wife Betty (née von Braunrasch, b. 1820; d. 1875) left a considerable sum for the maintenance of a permanent orchestra and conductor of eminence, in order that Mainz might hold its own in music with the richer cities of the Rhine provinces. SCHOTTISCHE ('The Scots dance'), a round dance very similar to the polka. It must not be confounded with the Ecossaise, which was a country dance of Scottish origin introduced into France towards the end of the 18th century. The Schottische was first danced in England in 1848, when it was also known as the German Polka. It does not seem to have been danced in Paris, as Cellarius (La Danse des salons, Paris, 1847) does not include it amongst the dances he describes. The music is almost the same as that of the polka, but should be played rather slower. The following is the tune to which it was originally danced in England:

SCHRADIECK, HENRY (b. Hamburg, Apr. 29, 1846; d. Brooklyn, Mar. 25, 1918), violinist, received his first lesson from his father on his fourth birthday, and already made public appearances in his sixth year. In 1854 Teresa Milanollo heard and took considerable interest in him, putting him into the hands of Léonard at the Conservatoire in Brussels, where he stayed for four years, and gained the first prize. Afterwards he studied under David at Leipzig (1859-61), obtaining his first important engagement in 1863 as soloist in the so-called 'Private Concerts,' conducted by Reintaler at Bremen. The following year he was appointed professor of the violin at the Moscow Conservatorium, but in 1868 returned to Hamburg to take the post vacated by Auer as Konzertmeister of the Philharmonic Society. After six years he moved (in 1874) to Leipzig, becoming Konzertmeister at the Gewandhaus concerts, professor at the Conservatorium and leader of the theatre orchestra. His pupils became very numerous, and at length he found himself overburdened with so many duties, and accepted an appointment as conductor and teacher of the violin at the College of Music at Cincinnati. Here he worked until 1889, and then returned to his native town, taking his old position as Konzertmeister of the Philharmonic Society, besides teaching at the Hamburg Conservatorium. Subsequently he went to New York as principal violin professor at the National Conservatoire, moving in 1899 to Philadelphia, where he taught at the S. Broad Street Conservatoire.

Amongst his important studies for the violin are 25 Grosse Studien for violin alone, three volumes of Technical Studies, Scale Studies, Guide to the Study of Chords, Finger Exercises and 'The First Position.' He also interested himself in questions connected with the making of violins. W. W. C.

SCHRAMM, MELOCHOR (b. Silesia, c. mid.

'6th cent.), was in the chapel of Count Karl of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen in 1574; organist at Offenburg, Baden, †1595. He was a distinguished composer, who was ranked with Lassus and Kerle. He composed motets and songs (Q.-L.; Riemann; Fétis).

SCHREIDER-TRNAVSKÝ, MIKULÁŠ (b. Trnava, 1881), Slovak composer. He studied music for a year at the Academy of Music, Budapest, then entered the Vienna Conservatoire, and finally worked for two years with Karol Stecker in Prague. On leaving the Prague Conservatoire he did a year's military service as 'volunteer.' His first musical post was at a Serbian church at Great Bečkerok. He toured for a time with the singer Boža Oumirov, visiting Berlin and Paris, where his songs in the national style had considerable success. In 1909 he became director of the choir of the Collegiate Church, Trnava. He had to serve in the army from 1914-18, when he was appointed by the Government to be the inspector of singing in Slovak schools. His 'Collection of National Songs,' published by the Slovak society Detvan (1908), has been commended by specialists (2nd edition, F. Chadim, Prague). A further instalment of Slovak songs was published later at Turčiansky Sv. Martin (2nd edition, Mojmir Urbánek, Prague). His work is highly characteristic and musicianly. Besides these collections of genuine national songs, he has written the chorus 'Up, brothers,' some church music, a pianoforte quintet and a 'School of Singing.'

SCHREKER, FRANZ (b. Monaco, Mar. 23, 1878) is the most conspicuous melodramatic figure since Wagner, though utterly unlike him in sentiments and ideas. He studied in Vienna under Robert Fuchs. In 1911 he founded and became conductor of the Philharmonic Choir in Vienna, where he was also teacher of composition at the Imperial Academy of Music. In 1920 he was appointed director of the Academy of Music in Berlin. A thoroughly modern composer, his strongest powers lie within the melodramatic field, this vein being apparent even in his orchestral works. Fascination of tone, rich colouring, sensuous melodies, great contrasts, half-completed Motives, characterise his musical style. As a dramatist, Schreker moves between naturalism (Wedekind) and mysticism (E. T. A. Hoffmann). His libretti are based on sex-psychological ideas derived from the School of Freud and Weininger.

SCHREYER, CHRISTIAN HEINRICH (b. Dresden, Dec. 24, 1751; d. there, Jan. 24, 1823), Pastor of Ortrand near Dresden. He is valued as a composer of Lieder; he also wrote instrumental music and some theoretical works (Riemann; Q.-L.).

SCHRIDER (SCHREIDER, SCHRÖDER), CHRISTOPHER, was one of Father Smith's workmen, and previous to 1708 had become his son-in-law. After Smith's death he succeeded to his business, and in 1710 was organ-builder to the Royal Chapels. His organs do not appear to be very numerous, that of Westminster being his chef-d'œuvre. It was built for the coronation of George II. in 1727, and was presented to the Abbey by the King.¹ He put up another organ in Henry the Seventh's Chapel for the funeral of Queen Caroline, Dec. 17, 1737.² An amusing epitaph is quoted in Scott's Gleanings from Westminster Abbey, 2nd ed. p. 279. v. de P.

SCHRÖDER-DEVRIENT, WILHELMINE (b. Hamburg, Dec. 6, 1804³; d. Coburg, Jan. 21, 1860), a highly-gifted dramatic singer. Her father, Friedrich Schröder—who died in 1818—had been an excellent baritone singer, a favourite in many operas, especially in Mozart's 'Don Juan,' which he was the first to act in German. Her mother was Antoinette Sophie Bürger, a celebrated actress, sometimes called 'the German Siddons.'

Wilhelmine was the eldest of four children. She enjoyed great advantages of training; dancing lessons, and public appearances in ballets in early childhood, helped her to mastery of attitude and elasticity of movement; afterwards, when her parents' wanderings led them to Vienna, she took such parts as Ophelia, and Aricia (Schiller's 'Phadra'), at the Hofburg-theater, receiving careful instruction in gesture and delivery from her mother, who afterwards superintended her study of operatic parts.

In 1821 Wilhelmine made a brilliant first appearance at the Vienna opera-house as Pamina in 'Die Zauberflöte.' The freshness of her well-developed soprano, her purity of intonation and certainty of attack, astonished the public. Other early triumphs were Emmeline (Weigl's 'Schweizerfamilie'), Marie Grétry's 'Barbe bleu', and Agathe ('Der Freischütz'), in which part she appeared under Weber's direction at Vienna, Mar. 7, 1822. But her great achievement was the creation of the part of Leonore, on the revival of 'Fidelio' at Vienna later in the year. Her impersonation of the heroine, besides laying the foundation of her own fame, won for the work the praise so long withheld, and achieved its ultimate position by repeated performances in Germany, London and Paris. Beethoven was present at the first performance. 'He sat behind the conductor, and had wrapped himself so closely in the folds of his cloak that only his eyes could be seen flashing from it.'¹ Afterwards he smilingly patted her cheek, thanked her, and promised to write an opera for her.

In 1823 she went to Dresden to fulfil a contract to sing at the court theatre for two years, at a salary of 2000 thalers. (At a later period she received 4000 thalers at the same house, for her connexion with Dresden never entirely ceased as long as she was on the stage.) She married Karl Devrient, an excellent actor whom she met in Berlin during an engagement there that year. Four children were born, but the marriage was not a happy one, and was dissolved in 1828. During the next eight years she delighted her audiences by her appearance in the leading classical and romantic characters which ever remained her most successful parts. Yet no less did she succeed, in Paër's comic opera, 'Sargino,' in singing with so much finish, and acting with so much humour, that it became a matter of dispute whether tragedy or comedy was her forte.

In 1830 she passed through Weimar and sang to Goethe on her way to Paris to join Röckel's German company. With an exalted sense of the importance of her mission, she wrote :

'I had to think not only of my own reputation, but to establish German music. My failure would have been injurious to the music of Beethoven, Mozart and Weber.'

This date was an epoch in the history of music in Paris. Bouquets—then an extraordinary manifestation of approval—were showered upon the triumphant singer. In her subsequent visits to Paris, 1831 and 1832, she sang in Italian opera.

In 1832 Schröder-Devrient was heard at the King's Theatre in London, engaging with Monck Mason to sing ten times monthly during May, June and July, for £800 and a benefit. Chelard was conductor. 'Fidelio,' 'Don Juan' and Chelard's 'Macbeth' were repeatedly given.²

The 'Queen of Tears' (so she was styled) was heard next season in 'Der Freischütz,' 'Die Zauberflöte,' 'Euryanthe' and 'Otello.' The engagement was to sing for Bunn at Covent Garden twenty-four times at £40 a night, and once for the benefit of the speculators. However, all London was under the spell of Taglioni and of Fanny Elsler. Malibran and Schröder-Devrient in the English opera; Pasta, Cinti-Damoreau, Rubini and Tamburini, in the Italian opera, sang to empty houses. Again in 1837, after Malibran's death, Bunn engaged Schröder-Devrient at a double salary. 'Fidelio,' 'La Sonnambula' and 'Norma' were performed in English. She broke down in health before the season was over, but was able, however, to give a farewell performance of 'Fidelio,' with the last act of the 'Montecchi e Capuletti,' and then discovered that Bunn had declared himself bankrupt and could pay her nothing. In his book, The Stage both before and behind the Curtain, Bunn complains of the singer's attempts at extortion; says that she demanded the fourth part of the proceeds of each night, but on this sum proving to fall short of the fixed salary, asked for £100.

From 1837 a gradual decline in power was observed in Mme. Schröder-Devrient, though she continued to delight her audiences all over Germany. Of Wagner's operas she only appeared in 'Rienzi' as Adriano Colonna, in 'Der fliegende Holländer' as Senta and in 'Tannhäuser' as Venus.³ Gluck's masterpieces were among her latest studies. Her last appearance in Dresden was in his 'Iphigenie in Aulis,' in 1847; her last appearance on any stage took place at Riga, where she played Romeo. Her concert-singing was greatly admired, and one of the liveliest passages in Mendelssohn's letters⁴ describes the furor caused by her impromptu execution of 'Adelaide' in her ordinary travelling dress at the Gewandhaus Concert of Feb. 11, 1841.

She had made a second marriage with von Döring, a worthless person, who immediately seized upon his wife's earnings and pension, and left her almost destitute, to recover what she could in a long lawsuit. The marriage was dissolved at her wish. In 1850 she married von Bock, a man of culture, who took her to his property in Livonia. Passing through Dresden she was arrested on account of the sympathy she had shown with the revolution of 1848. An examination in Berlin resulted in her being forbidden to return to Saxony; in the meantime she was exiled from Russia. Her husband's exertions and sacrifices secured a reversal of this sentence. In 1856 she visited some German towns, singing Lieder in public concerts. Her interpretations of Beethoven's 'Adelaide' and of Schubert's and Schumann's songs were immensely admired, though by some thought too dramatic. When at Leipzig her strength succumbed to a painful illness. She was devotedly nursed by a sister and a friend at Coburg, where she died.

Even in her best days her voice was of no extraordinary compass, but, to the last, the tones of the middle notes were of exceptionally fine quality. Mazatti's teaching, with further instruction from Radichi and from Miksch (the Dresden chorus-master), had not been sufficient training for the young girl, who had besides been disinclined to the drudgery of scale-singing. The neglect of system and of careful vocal exercise resulted in faulty execution and too early loss of the high notes. But there seemed a discrepancy between the delicate organisation of her voice and the passionate energy of her temperament. By force of will she accomplished more than was warranted by her natural powers. It was the dramatic genius of this artist which won for her a European reputation. She infused a terrible earnestness into the more pathetic impersonations, while an almost unerring instinct of artistic fitness, combined with a conscientious study of the parts, secured a perfection of performance which reached every detail of by-play.

SCHROETER, CHRISTOPH GOTTLIEB (b. Hohenstein, Saxony, Aug. 10, 1699; d. Nordhausen, 1782), long enjoyed in Germany the honour of having invented the pianoforte. His claims, first published by himself in Mizler's Musikalische Bibliothek (Leipzig, 1738) and repeated in Marpurg's Kritische Briefe (Berlin, 1764), have been examined and set aside in favour of Cristofori. (See PIANOFORTE.) We learn from Schroeter's autobiography that at 7 years of age he was placed as a chorister at Dresden, under Kapellmeister Schmidt, and that Graun was his companion. The clavi-chord early became his greatest pleasure. When he lost his voice he entered the Kreuzschule to study thorough-bass, that is, accompaniment as then practised, and learned to quill and tune harpsichords, which led him to the monochord and systems of temperament. On the wish of his mother that he should study theology, he went to Leipzig for that purpose in 1717, but after her death resumed music, returned to Dresden, and was accepted by Lotti to copy for him and write his middle parts. According to Schroeter's own account, it was Hebenstreit's PANTALON (q.v.) which led him at this time to attempt to combine the characteristics of the harpsichord and clavi-chord, by inventing two hammer actions, the models of which he deposited at the Saxon court in 1721; but immediately afterwards he left Dresden, taking service with a Baron whom he does not name, to travel in Germany, Holland and England. In 1724 he went to the University of Jena and began writing upon musical subjects; in 1726 he took the organist's place at Minden, removing in 1732 to Nord-hausen, where he remained until his death. He published a treatise, Deutliche Anweisung zum General-Bass, in 1772 at Halberstadt, and his Letzte Beschäftigung mit musikalischen Dingen appeared posthumously in 1782. A list of his polemical pamphlets is given in Q.-L. and elsewhere.

SCHRÖTER, (1) CORONA ELISABETH WILHELMINE (b. Guben, Jan. 14, 1751; d. Ilmenau, Aug. 23, 1802), a celebrated singer of the Weimar court in its most brilliant days, was the daughter of a musician, Johann Friedrich Schröter, oboist in the royal orchestra. The family shortly after her birth migrated from Guben to Warsaw, and finally to Leipzig. Corona's voice was trained by her father, and she sang when she was but 14 at a Leipzig Grosses Konzert (1765). From the following year until 1771 she was engaged at these concerts, Schmehling (La Mara) being retained as principal vocalist. She then came to London with her family, see below Johann Samuel (3). Goethe had become acquainted with Schröter in 1766; ten years later he conveyed to her the offer of the post of Kammersängerin to the Dowager Duchess of Weimar. Here she made her first appearance Nov. 23, 1776, and soon became the idol of the place. Associated with Goethe himself in the production of his dramas, she created amongst others the part of Iphigenia, completely realising the poet's ideal (see Auf Medings Tod). Her co-operation in 'Die Fischerin' included the composition of all the music. It was on July 22, 1782, that she was heard as Dortchen, and that 'Der Erlkönig,' with which the play opens, was sung for the first time. In 1782-84 she sang at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig. After 1786 Schröter sang little in public, but devoted herself to composition, painting, and a few dramatic pupils. Schiller heard her read Goethe's 'Iphigenie' in 1787, and Charlotte von Schiller, a year or two later, found much to praise in the musical settings of 'Der Taucher' and 'Würde der Frauen,' and their expressive rendering by the famous artist.

Her songs were published in two books. They are melodious and simple settings of poems by Herder, Matthison, Klopstock, etc. Book I. (25 Lieder, Weimar, 1786) contains Goethe's 'Der neue Amadis' and 'Der Erlkönig.' The second collection of songs was published at Weimar, 1794. Besides the life by Keil, Düntzer's Charlotte von Stein und Corona Schröter may be consulted for details of her social and artistic successes. In 1778 Schröter handed to Goethe her MS. autobiography, which has never been made public, perhaps has not yet been discovered among his papers, although Goethe noted the receipt of it in his diary.

(3) JOHANN SAMUEL (b. Warsaw, c. 1750; d. Pimlico, Nov. 2, 1788), another brother, pianoforte-player and composer for that instrument. About 1763 he accompanied his father and sister to Leipzig, and sang there in the Gewandhaus Concerts. On the breaking of his voice he devoted himself entirely to the piano, and travelled with his father, brother and sister, performing as they went, through Holland to London. There they made their début in the concerts of Bach and Abel at the Thatched House, St. James's Street, May 2, 1772, Schröter playing a concerto on the 'Forte Piano,' which J. Christian Bach had first performed in 1767, the brother Johann Heinrich on the violin, and the sister, Corona, singing. In 1773 we find evidence of his performance on the harpsichord, as Broadwood's books show that a harpsichord was sent to Haberdashers' Hall on Mar. 4, for J. S. Schroter. After J. C. Bach's death in 1782, he succeeded him as music-master to the Queen. 'Six Sonatas for the harpsichord or piano forte' are announced by W. Napier in the Public Advertiser in 1776 as his op. 1. This was followed in 1778 by op. 3, 'Six Concertos with an accompaniment for two violins and a bass'; and this again by three concertos with string accompaniments, op. 4; three, op. 5 (Berlin); op. 6 (Paris); op. 2, six trios (Amsterdam); op. 9, two trios (Amsterdam). Many other compositions—quintets, trios, sonatas with and without accompaniment—are enumerated in Q.-L. The A B C Dario (p. 144) says of him:

'He has composed the harpsichord parts of some concertos; the accompaniments are by Bach; they are neither new nor very striking. He plays in an elegant and masterly style; his cadences are well imagined, and if his penchant was not rather to play rapidly than al core, he would excel on the pianoforte.'

Burney, on the other hand (in Rees), says:

'He became one of the neatest and most expressive players of his time, and his style of composition, highly polished, resembles that of Abel more than any other. It was graceful and in good taste, but so chaste as sometimes to seem deficient in fire and invention.'

He did not remain long before the public in consequence of his marriage with one of his pupils, a young lady of birth and fortune, after which he played only at the concerts of the Prince of Wales and a few others of the nobility. He died on Sunday, Nov. 2, 1788, in his own house at Pimlico, having lost his voice some years before by a severe cold. His marriage was a clandestine one, and brought him into collision with his wife's family, the result of which was his surrendering all his rights for an annuity of £500. She is the lady who took lessons from Haydn during his residence in London, and fell violently in love with him.

Haydn spoke of her many years after as a very attractive woman, and still handsome, though over sixty. 'Had I been free,' said the patriarch, 'I should certainly have married her'—she was then a widow. He dedicated to her three clavier trios (B. & H., Nos. 1, 2, 6).

SCHROETER, LEONARD (b. Torgau, mid. 16th cent.; d. circa 1600¹), became cantor of the cathedral of Magdeburg about 1564, in succession to Gallus Dressler, also a composer of some importance. Schroeter's chief work is 'Hymni sacri,' Erfurt, 1587, and consists of 4- and 6-part settings of those Latin church hymns which had been received into the worship of the Lutheran Church. Winterfeld says of these hymns that they belong to the best musical works of the time; the harmony is rich, clear and dignified, and shows an unmistakable advance on the path of the older masters. They are in the same style as the hymns of Palestrina and Victoria, only the choral melody is mostly given to the upper voice. Some of these hymns, as well as some of the German psalms of Gallus Dressler, Schroeter's predecessor, are republished in Schöberlein and Riegel's Schatz des liturgischen Chorgesangs, Göttingen, 1868-72. Earlier publications of hymn-tunes by Schroeter were published in 1562, 1576, 1584, etc. (See Q.-L. for list.) Four Weihnachts-Liedlein by Schroeter are received into the repertory of the Berlin Dom-Chor, and are published in Schlesinger's 'Musica sacra,' No. 11. A German Te Deum for double choir by Schroeter, originally published in 1576, has been printed by Otto Kade in the Notenbeilagen to Ambros's Gesch. der Musik, No. 28. J. R. M.

SCHUBART, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH DANIEL (b. Obersonthem, Suabia, 1739²; d. Stuttgart, Oct. 10, 1791), was brought up (not as a musician) at Nördlingen, Nuremberg and Erlangen. In 1768 we find him as organist at Ludwigsburg. His life seems to have been a very wild and irregular one, but he must have been a man of great talent and energy to justify the eulogies on him so frequent in the early volumes of the A.M.Z. of Leipzig, and the constant references of Otto Jahn in his Life of Mozart. He lived in Mannheim, Munich, Augsburg and Ulm; founded a Deutsche Chronik in 1774; was more than once in confinement for his misdeeds, and at length was imprisoned from 1777-87 at Hohenasperg. On his release he was appointed director of the court theatre; his paper changed its title to Vaterlands-Chronik, and appeared from 1787 until the year of his death. An autobiography, written in prison, appeared in 1791-93. His compositions are few and unimportant. They include a set of 'Musicalische Rhapsodien,' a Salve Regina, variations and other clavier pieces. A work of his on musical æsthetics, Ideen zu einer Ästhetik der Tonkunst, was published after his death by his son Ludwig (Vienna, 1806). From the notices of it in the A.M.Z. (viii. 801, xiii. 53, etc.) and Jahn's citations, it appears to be partly a dissertation on the styles, abilities and characteristics of great musicians and artists. It also contains some fanciful descriptions of the various keys, which Schumann notices (Ges. Schriften, i. 180) only to condemn. But Schubart will always be known as the author of the words of one of F. Schubert's most favourite songs—'Die Forelle' (op. 32). The words of 'An den Tod' and 'Grablied auf einen Soldaten' are also his. His son further published two volumes of his Vermischte Schriften (Zürich, 1812). G.

SCHUBAUR, JOHANN LUKAS (bapt. Lechfeld, Swabia, Dec. 23, 1749; d. Munich, Nov. 15, 1816), studied medicine and became a physician of high repute. From his early youth he had studied music, and the teaching of music was at times his only means of subsistence. As a composer he was one of the most successful representatives of the German Singpiel, which had not long come into existence; he also composed some cantatas and the 107th Psalm in Moses Mendelssohn's translation (Riemann; Q.-L.).

SCHUBERT, (1) FERDINAND (b. Vienna, Oct. 19, 1794; d. Feb. 28, 1859), one of the elder brothers of Franz Schubert, second son of his father. After passing the two-years' course at the Normal School of St. Anna in 1807-08, he became his father's assistant at the school in the Lichtenthal. In Nov. 1810 he was installed as assistant (Gehilfe), and in 1816 teacher, at the Imperial Orphan House (Waisenhaus) in Vienna, where he continued till Mar. 1820, devoting himself specially to the Bell-Lancastrian method. He was then appointed principal teacher and choirmaster to the school at Altdorchenfeld, Vienna, till 1824, when he was nominated to be head teacher of the Normal School of St. Anna, which he held from Jan. 22, 1824, till his appointment as director of the same establishment on Mar. 15, 1854. This position he retained till his death. His merits were recognised by the bestowal of the Gold Cross of Merit (Verdienstkreuze), with the Crown. During this long period of useful and efficient service he was twice married, and had in all seventeen children, of whom Ferdinand, Rudolf and Hermann were living in Vienna in 1882. His daughter Elise married Linus Geisler, and their daughter, Caroline Geisler-Schubert, had a successful career in Vienna as a player and teacher. Between 1819 and 1853 Ferdinand published twelve school-books on various branches of learning, which came into general use. Music he learnt from his father and from Holzer, and left more than forty works, of which the following were published: Regina Cæli, a 4 and orch. (op. 1); German Requiem, a 4 with organ (op. 2); 4 Waisenlieder (op. 3); Cadenzas for PF. in all keys (op. 4); Requiem a 4 and orch. (op. 9); Mass in F a 4 and orch. (op. 10); Salve Regina in F a 4 and orch. (op. 11); Salve Regina a 4 and wind (op. 12); original March and Trio. The MS. works contain various other pieces of church music. Of the two Requiems the first is mentioned in his brother's letter of Aug. 24, 1818; the second was performed a few days before Franz's death, and was possibly the last music he heard. The library of the Musikverein at Vienna contains the autograph of Franz Schubert's Mass in G, with oboes (or clarinets) and bassoons, added by Ferdinand, July 23, 1847.

Ferdinand's love for his brother and care of his memory are often referred to in the article on the latter. (See SCHUBERT, Franz Peter.) An interesting evidence of their attachment is afforded by a letter¹ of his to Franz, dated Vienna, July 3, 1824, and containing the following passage in regard to a clock at the Ungarische Krone in Vienna, which played his brother's music:

'This clock delighted me not a little, when one day at dinner for the first time I heard it play some of your waltzes. I felt so strange at the moment that I really did not know where I was; it was not only that it pleased me, it went regularly through my heart and soul with a fearful pang and longing, which at last turned into settled melancholy.'

This may be fanciful, but it is the language of passionate affection, which evidently animated Ferdinand's whole intercourse with his great brother. Franz's reply (July 16-18, 1824) is quite in the same strain. (The above article is indebted to Wurzbach's Biographisches Lexicon.) G.

SCHUBERT, (1) FRANZ (b. Dresden, July 22, 1808; d. there, Apr. 12, 1878), a violinist, came of a musical family. He was a pupil of Lafont, and rose through various grades to succeed Lipinski in 1861 as first Konzertmeister in his native city. He retired in 1873, on the fiftieth anniversary of his entrance into the orchestra. His published works include studies, a duo for violin and piano, and two concertante for violin and violoncello (with Kummer). His little piece, 'L'Abcille' is often to be found on violinists' programmes.

Schubert's wife, (2) MASCHINKA (b. Aug. 26, 1815; d. Dresden, Sept. 20, 1882), daughter of Georg Abraham SCHNEIDER (q.v.), was a distinguished bravura singer, appeared at the German opera in London in 1832, and was subsequently engaged at Milan and Dresden. G.

(3) GEORGINE (b. Dresden, Oct. 28, 1840; d. Potsdam, Dec. 26, 1878), singer, daughter of the above, was her mother's pupil, and also studied with Jenny Lind and Manuel Garcia.

She made her début (1859) at Hamburg, sang in many German cities as well as Prague, Florence and Paris, when she was engaged at the Théâtre Lyrique. At the Monday Popular Concerts of London (1875) she had a considerable success. (Riemann.)

SCHUBERT,¹ FRANZ PETER (b. Vienna, Jan. 31, 1797; d. there, Nov. 19, 1828). The one great composer native to Vienna, was born in the district called Lichtenthal, at the house which is now numbered 54 of the Nussdorfer Strasse,² on the right, going out from Vienna. There is now a grey marble tablet over the door, with the words 'Franz Schuberts Geburtshaus' in the centre; on the left side a lyre crowned with a star, and on the right a chaplet of leaves containing the words, '31 Jänner 1797.'

He came of a country stock, originally belonging to Zukmantel in Austrian Silesia. His father, Franz, the son of a peasant at Neudorf in Moravia, was born about 1764, studied in Vienna, and in 1784 became assistant to his brother, who kept a school in the Leopoldstadt. His ability and integrity raised him in 1786 to be parish schoolmaster in the parish of the 'Twelve holy helpers' in the Lichtenthal, a post which he kept till 1817 or 1818, when he was appointed to the parish school in the adjoining district of the Rossau, and there he remained till his death, July 9, 1830. He married early, while still helping his brother, probably in 1783, Elisabeth Vitz, or Fitz, a Silesian, who was in service in Vienna, and was, like Beethoven's mother, a cook. Their first child, Ignaz, was born in 1784. Then came a long gap, possibly filled by children who died in infancy—of whom they lost nine in all; then, Oct. 19, 1794, another boy, FERDINAND (q.v.); then in 1796, Karl, then Franz, and lastly, a daughter, Theresia, Sept. 17, 1801, who died Aug. 7, 1878. The hardworked mother of these fourteen children lived till 1812. Soon after her death her husband was married again, to Anna Klagenböck, a Viennese, and had a second family of five children, of whom three grew up, viz. Josefa (d. 1861), Andreas, an accountant in one of the public offices, and Anton, a Benedictine priest, Father Hermann³—the last two living in 1881.

² The Nussdorfer Strasse runs north and south. At the time of Schubert's birth it was called 'Auf dem Himmelportgrund', and the house was No. 72. The Himmelportgrund ('the street of the gate of heaven') was a short street running off at its westwards towards the fortifications—the same which is now the 'Balemgasse'. The present Schubertgasse did not then exist beyond the opening into the main street. I find all this on a large map of the date in the British Museum.

Ignaz and Ferdinand followed their father's calling, and inherited with it the integrity, frugality and modesty, which had gained him such respect. Of the former we do not hear much; the one letter by him that is preserved (Oct. 12, 1818), shows him very free-thinking, very tired of schoolmastering, very much attached to his home and his brother.⁴ He remained at the Rossau school till his death in 1844. Ferdinand, on the other hand, rose to be director of the chief normal school of St. Anna in Vienna, and played a considerable part in the life of his celebrated brother, by whom he was fondly loved, to whom he was deeply attached, and whose eyes it was given to him to close in death.

Little Franz was no doubt well grounded by his father, and to that early training probably owed the methodical habit which stuck to him more or less closely through life, of dating his pieces, a practice which makes the investigation of them doubly interesting.⁵ As schoolmasters the father and his two eldest sons were all more or less musical. Ignaz and Ferdinand had learned the violin with other rudiments from the father, and Franz was also taught it by him in his turn, and the 'Clavier' (i.e. probably the pianoforte—for Beethoven's op. 31 was published before Schubert had passed his sixth year) by Ignaz, who was twelve years his senior. But his high vocation quickly revealed itself; he soon outstripped these simple teachers, and was put under Michael Holzer, the choirmaster of the parish, for both violin and piano, as well as for singing, the organ and thorough-bass. On this good man, who long outlived him, he made a deep impression. 'When I wished to teach him anything fresh,' he would say, 'he always knew it already. I have often listened to him in astonishment.'⁶ Holzer would give him subjects to extemporise upon, and then his joy would know no bounds, and he would cry 'The lad has got harmony at his fingers' ends.'⁷ Such astonishment was natural enough, but it would have been far better if he had taught him counterpoint. Ignaz too—and an elder brother is not always a lenient judge of his junior—bears similar testimony. 'I was much astonished, says he,

'When after a few months he told me that he had no more need of any help from me, but would go on by himself; and indeed I soon had to acknowledge that he had far surpassed me, beyond hope of competition.'

SCHOOL DAYS.—Before he became eleven he was first soprano in the Lichtenthal choir, noted for the beauty of his voice and the appropriate-

less of his expression. He played the violin solos when they occurred in the service, and at home composed little songs and pieces for strings or for pianoforte. For a child so gifted, of people in the position of the Schuberts, the next step was naturally the Imperial Convict, or school¹ for educating the choristers for the court-chapel; and to the Convict accordingly Franz was sent in Oct. 1808, when eleven years and eight months old. He went up with a batch of other boys, who, while waiting, made themselves merry over his grey suit, calling him a miller, and otherwise cracking jokes. But the laugh soon ceased when the 'miller' came under the examiners, the court Kapellmeister Salieri and Eybler, and Korner the singing-master. He sang the trial-pieces in such a style that he was at once received, and henceforth the grey frock was exchanged for the gold-laced uniform of the imperial choristers. The music in the Convict had been a good deal dropt in consequence of the war, but after the signing of the treaty of peace, Oct. 14, 1809, it regained its old footing, and then Franz soon took his right place in the music-school. There was an orchestra formed from the boys, which practised daily symphonies and overtures of Haydn, Mozart, Krommer, Kozeluch, Méhul, Cherubini, etc., and occasionally Beethoven. Here his home practice put him on a level with older boys than himself. The leader of the band, behind whom he sat, several years his senior, turned round the first day to see who it was that was playing so cleverly, and found it to be 'a small boy in spectacles named Franz Schubert.'² The big fellow's name was Spaun, and he soon became intimate with his little neighbour. Franz was extremely sensitive, and one day admitted to his friend, very confused and blushing deeply, that he had already composed much; that indeed he could not help it, and should do it every day if he could afford to get music-paper. Spaun saw the state of matters, and took care that music-paper should be forthcoming; for which and other kindnesses his name will be long remembered. Franz in time became first violin, and when Ruzicka, the regular conductor, was absent, he took his place. The orchestral music must have been a great delight to him, but we only hear that he preferred Kozeluch to Krommer, and that his particular favourites were some adagios of Haydn's, Mozart's G minor symphony, in which he said 'You could hear the angels singing,' and the overtures to 'Figaro' and 'Die Zauberflöte.' It is also evident from his earliest symphonies that the overture to 'Prometheus' had made its mark on his mind. On Sundays and holidays he went home, and then the great delight of the family was to play quartets, his own or those of other writers, in which the father took the violoncello, Ferdinand and Ignaz the first and second violins, and Franz the viola, as Mozart did before him, and Mendelssohn after him. The father would now and then make a mistake; on the first occasion Franz took no notice, but if it recurred he would say with a smile, in a timid way, 'Herr Vater, something must be wrong there.'

The instruction in the Convict was by no means only musical. There was a Curator, a Director (Rev. Innocenz Lang), a Sub-director, an Inspector, a staff of preachers and catechists; and there were teachers of mathematics, history and geography, poetry, writing, drawing, French and Italian.³ In fact it was a school, apart from its music department. Franz of course took his part in all this instruction, and for the first year is said to have acquitted himself with credit, but his reputation in the school fell off as it increased in the musical department. The extraordinary thirst for composition, which is so remarkable throughout his life, began to assert itself at this time, and appears to have been limited only by his power of obtaining paper; and it not unnaturally interfered with his general lessons.

His first pianoforte piece of any dimensions, and apparently his earliest existing composition, was a four-hand fantasia, containing more than a dozen movements, all of different characters, and occupying thirty-two pages of very small writing. It is dated Apr. 8-May 1, 1810, and was followed by two smaller ones.⁴ His brother remarks that not one of the three ends in the key in which it began. The next is a long vocal piece for voice and PF., called 'Hagar's Klage'—Hagar's lament over her dying son—dated Mar. 30, 1811, also containing twelve movements, with curious unconnected changes of key; and another, of even grimmer character, attributed to the same year, is called 'Leichenfantasie,' or Corpsefantasia, to the words of Schiller's gruesome juvenile poem of the same name. This has seventeen movements, and is quite as erratic in its changes of key and disregard of the compass of the voice as the preceding.⁵ The reminiscences of Haydn's 'Creation,' Mozart's opera airs, and Beethoven's andantes, are frequent in both. A fourth is 'Der Vatermörder'—the Parricide—for voice and PF., '26 Dec. 1811,' a pleasant Christmas piece! a decided advance on the two previous songs in individuality of style, and connection. 1811 also saw the composition of a quintet-overture, a string quartet, a second fantasia for four hands, and many songs.⁶ For 1812 the list is more instrumental. It contains an overture for orchestra in D; a quartet overture in B \flat ; string quartets in C, B \flat and D 1 ; a sonata for PF., violin and violoncello 2 ; variations in E \flat , and an andante, both for PF.; a Salve Regina and a Kyrie. In 1813 an octet 3 for wind; three string quartets in C, B \flat , E \flat and D; minuets and trios for orchestra and for PF.; a third fantasia for the PF., four hands; several songs, terzets and canons; a cantata in two movements, for three male voices and guitar, for his father's birthday, Sept. 27—both words and music his own; and his first symphony in D, 4 intended to celebrate the birthday of Dr. Lang, and finished on Oct. 28. With this very important work his time at the Convict ended. He might have remained longer; for it is said that the Emperor, who took an interest in the lads of his chapel, had specially watched the progress of this gifted boy with the lovely voice and fine expression, and that a special decision had been registered in his favour on Oct. 21, assuring him a foundation scholarship in the school, provided that during the vacation he should study sufficiently to pass an examination. 5 To this condition, however, he refused to submit; and at some time between Oct. 26 and Nov. 6 he left the Convict and returned home. 6 His mother died in 1812, but we hear nothing of the event, unless the octet just named refers to it. The father married again in about a year, and the new wife, as we shall see, did her duty to her stepson Franz fully, and apparently with affection.

Franz was now just completing his seventeenth year, and what has been rightly called the first period of his life. The Convict has much to answer for in regard to Schubert. It was entrusted with the most poetical genius of modern times, and it appears to have allowed him to take his own course in the matter of composition almost unrestrained. Had but a portion of the pains been spent on the musical education of Schubert that was lavished on that of Mozart or of Mendelssohn, we can hardly doubt that even his transcendent ability would have been enhanced by it, that he would have gained that control over the prodigious spontaneity of his genius which is his only want, and have risen to the very highest level in all departments of composition, as he did in song—writing. But though Eybler and Salieri were the conductors of the choir in chapel, it does not appear that they had any duties in the school, and Ruzicka, the thorough-bass master, like Holzer, was so prostrated by Schubert's facility as to content himself with exclaiming that his pupil already knew all he could teach him, and must have 'learned direct from heaven.' If all masters adopted this attitude towards their pupils, what would have become of some of the greatest geniuses? The discomforts of the school appear to have been great even for that day of roughness. One of the pupils speaks of the cold of the practice-room as 'dreadful' (schauerlich); and Schubert's own earliest letter, dated Nov. 24, 1812, to his brother Ferdinand, shows that these young growing lads were allowed to go without food for 8½ hours, between 'a poor dinner and a wretched supper.' There was not even sufficient music-paper provided for the scholars, and Schubert was, as we have seen, dependent on the bounty of the richer pupils.

1 Kreisles expressly states this (p. 550) and gives the date—Nov. 19, 1812.

3 This octet, dated Sept. 19, is said to be mentioned by Ferdinand Schubert as 'Franz Schubert's Leichenbesingnisse' (funeral ceremony). It is supposed by Kreisles (p. 31) to have been composed for the funeral of his mother; but it is difficult to believe that the words which he wrote for his father's birthday ode, eight days later, would have had no reference to the mother's death—which they certainly have not—if it had occurred at that date.

 6 It is stated on Spaun's authority that Schubert was led to this decision by the advice of the poet Theodor Körner. But Körner, in whose correspondence there is no mention of Schubert, left Vienna at the beginning of this year and died at Gedenbuch in August.

On the other hand, the motets and masses in the service, the rehearsals in the school, such teaching as there was, and the daily practisings, must have been both stimulating and improving, and with all its roughness a good deal of knowledge could not but have been obtainable. One advantage Schubert reaped from the Convict—the friends which he made there, many of them for life, Spaun, Senn, Holzappel, Stadler and others, all afterwards more or less eminent, who attached themselves to him as every one did who came into contact with him; a band of young adorers, eager to play, or sing, or copy anything that he composed; the earnest of the devoted friends who surrounded him in later years, and helped to force his music on an ignorant and preoccupied public. Nor did the enthusiasm cease with his departure; for some years afterwards the orchestral pieces which he had written while at the school were still played by the boys from his own MS. copies.

EARLY MUSICAL IMPRESSIONS.—Outside the school he had sometimes opportunities of going to the opera. The first opera which he is said to have heard was Weigl's 'Waisenhaus,' played Dec. 12, 1810; but this was eclipsed by the 'Schweizerfamilie' of the same composer, July 8, 1811; that again by Spontini's 'Vestalin,' with Milder, Oct. 1, 1812; and all of them by Gluck's 'Iphigenie auf Tauris,' which he probably heard first Apr. 5, 1815, with Milder and Vogl in the two principal parts, and which made a deep and ineffaceable impression upon him, and drove him to the study of Gluck's scores. 7 During the same years there were also many concerts, including those at which Beethoven produced his 5th, 6th and 7th symphonies, the 'Choral Fantasia,' portions of the Mass in C, the overture to 'Coriolan,' and others of his greatest compositions. Schubert probably heard all these works, but it is very doubtful whether he heard them with the same predilection as the operas just mentioned. We might infer with certainty from the three earliest of his symphonies, that Beethoven's style had as yet taken but little hold on him, notwithstanding the personal fascination which he seems to have felt for the great master from first to last. But, indeed, we have his own express declaration to that effect. Coming home after a performance of an oratorio of Salieri's, June 16, 1816, he speaks of the music in terms which can only refer to Beethoven, as

'Of simple natural expression, free from all that bizarrie which prevails in most of the composers of our time, and for which we have almost solely to thank one of our greatest German artists; that bizarrie which unites the tragic and the comic, the agreeable and the repulsive, the heroic and the petty, the Hollest and a harlequin; infuriates those who hear it instead of dissolving them in love, and makes them laugh instead of raising them heavenwards.'

Mozart was at the time his ideal composer; this, too, is plain from the symphonies, but here also he leaves us in no doubt. Three days earlier we find in the same diary,¹ apropos of one of the quintets of that great master:

'Gently, as if out of the distance, did the magic tones of Mozart's music strike my ears. With what inextinguishable alterable force and tenderness did Schlesinger's masterly playing impress it deep, deep, into my heart! Such lovely impressions remain on the soul, there to work for good, past all power of time or circumstances. In the darkness of this life they reveal a clear, bright, beautiful prospect, inspiring confidence and hope. O Mozart, immortal Mozart! what countless consolatory images of a bright better world hast thou stamped on our souls.'

POST-SCHOOL DAYS.—We have seen what a scourge the conscription proved in the case of Ries, and the uneasiness of Mendelssohn's family till the risk of it was over in his case (Vol. III. p. 384). To avoid a similar danger³ Schubert elected to enter his father's school, and after the necessary study for a few months at the Normal School of St. Anna, did so, and actually remained there for three years as teacher of the lowest class. The duties were odious, but he discharged them with strict regularity, and not with greater severity than might reasonably be expected from the irritable temperament of a musician condemned to such drudgery. The picture of Pegasus thus in vile harness, and the absence of any remark on the anomaly, throws a curious light on the beginnings of a great composer. Out of school hours, however, he had his relaxations. There was a family in the Lichtenthal named Grob—a mother, son and daughter—whose relations to him were somewhat like those of the Breunings to Beethoven (Vol. I. pp. 260-61). The house was higher in the scale than his father's, and he was quite at home there. Therese, the daughter, had a fine high soprano voice, and Heinrich Grob played both pianoforte and violoncello; the mother was a woman of taste, and a great deal of music was made. It is not impossible that Therese inspired him with a softer feeling.⁴ The choir of the Lichtenthal church, where his old friend Holzer was still choirmaster, was his resort on Sundays and feast days, and for it he wrote his first Mass, in F—begun May 17, finished July 22, 1814—a fitting pendant to the symphony of the previous October. He was not yet eighteen, and the Mass is pronounced by a trustworthy critic⁵ to be the most remarkable first mass ever produced, excepting Beethoven's in C, and as striking an instance of the precocity of genius as Mendelssohn's overture to the 'Midsummer Night's Dream.' It seems to have been first performed on Oct. 16, the first Sunday after St. Theresa's day, 1814—Mayseider, then twenty-five and an acknowledged virtuoso, leading the first violins; and was repeated at the Augustine church ten days after. This second performance was quite an event. Franz conducted, Holzer led the choir, Ferdinand took the organ, Therese Grob sang, the enthusiasm of the family and friends was great, and the proud father presented his happy son with a five-octave piano.⁶ Salieri was present and loud in his praises, and claimed Schubert as his pupil. He had indeed begun to take some interest in the lad before⁷ he left the Convict, and continued it by daily lessons 'for a long time.'⁸ That interest was probably much the same that he had shown to Beethoven fifteen years before, making him write to Metastasio's words, and correcting the prosody of his music. But there must have been some curious attraction about the old man to attach two such original geniuses as Beethoven and Schubert to him, and make them willing to style themselves 'scholars of Salieri.'⁹ His permanent influence on Schubert may be measured by the fact that he warned him against Goethe and Schiller, a warning which Schubert attended to so far as to compose sixty-seven songs of the one poet, and fifty-four of the other!

Franz's next effort was an opera—a light and absurd supernatural 'opéra-comique' in three acts, 'Des Teufels Lustschloss,' words by Kotzebue. He probably began it while at the Convict, the first act having been completed

Jacob Schaufli. Schubert found compensation, however, in the friendship of Franz von Schober, a young man of good birth and some small means, who had met with his songs at the house of the Spauns at Linz, and had ever since longed to make his personal acquaintance. Coming to Vienna to enter the university, apparently soon after the Laibach rebuff, he called on Schubert, found him in his father's house, overwhelmed with his school duties, and with apparently no time for music. There, however, were the piles of manuscript—operas, masses, symphonies, songs—heaped up around the young schoolmaster-composer, and Schober saw at once that some step must be taken to put an end to this cruel anomaly and give Schubert time to devote himself wholly to the art of which he was so full. Schober proposed that his new friend should live with him; Franz's father—possibly not oversatisfied with his son's performances as a teacher of the alphabet to infants¹—consented to the plan, and the two young men (Schober was some four months Franz's junior) went off to keep house together at Schober's lodgings in the Landkronsgasse. A trace of this change is found on two MS. songs in the Musikverein at Vienna, 'Leiden der Trennung' and 'Lebenslied,' inscribed 'In Herr v. Schober's lodging' and dated Nov. 1816. Schubert began to give a few lessons, but soon threw them up,² and the household must have been maintained at Schober's expense, since there was obviously as yet no sale for Schubert's compositions. He had good friends, as Beethoven had had at the same age, though not so high in rank—Hofrath von Kiese-wetter, Matthäus von Collin, Graf Moritz Dietrichstein, Hofrath Hammer von Purgstall, Pyrker, afterwards Patriarch of Venice and Archbishop of Erlau, Frau Caroline Pichler—all ready and anxious to help him had they had the opportunity. But Schubert never gave them the opportunity. He was a true Viennese, born in the lowest ranks, without either the art or the taste for 'imposing' on the aristocracy (Beethoven's³ favourite phrase) that Beethoven had; loving the society of his own class, shrinking from praise or notice of any kind, and with an absolute detestation of teaching or any other stated duties. But to know him was to love and value him.

CANTATAS FOR SEVERAL OCCASIONS.—Three little events, which slightly diversify the course of this year, are of moment as showing the position which Schubert took amongst his acquaintances. The first was the 50th anniversary of Salieri's arrival in Vienna, which he had entered as a boy on June 16, 1766. (See SALIERI, p. 509.) On Sunday, June 16, 1816, the old Italian was invested with the Imperial gold medal and chain of honour, in the presence of the whole body of court musicians; and in the evening a concert took place at his own house, in which, surrounded by his pupils, Weigl, Assmayer, Anna Fröhlich, Schubert and many others,⁴ both male and female, he snuffed up the incense of his worshippers and listened to compositions in his honour by his scholars past and present. Among these were pieces sent by Hummel and Moscheles, and a short cantata, both words and music by Schubert.⁵

Eight days afterwards, on July 24, there was another festivity in honour of the birthday of a certain Herr Heinrich Watteroth,⁶ a distinguished official person, for which Schubert had been employed to write a cantata on the subject of Prometheus, words by Philipp Dräxler, another official person. The cantata has disappeared; but from a description of it by Leopold Sonnleithner, communicated to Zellner's Blätter für Theater, etc. (No. 19), and reprinted⁷ separately, it seems to have been written for two solo voices, soprano (Gäa) and bass (Prometheus), chorus and orchestra, and to have contained a duet in recitative, two choruses for mixed and one for male voices (the disciples of Prometheus). This last is described as having been in the form of a slow march, with original and interesting treatment. The performance took place in the garden of Watteroth's house in the Erdberg suburb of Vienna. As all the persons concerned in the festivity were people of some consideration, and as the music was very well received, it may have been an important introduction for the young composer. A congratulatory poem by von Schlechta, addressed to Schubert, appeared a day or two later in the Theaterzeitung. Schubert had already, in the previous year, set a song of Schlechta's—'Auf einem Kirchhof'—and he promptly acknowledged the compliment by adopting one of more moment from Schlechta's 'Diego Manzanaros,' 'Wo irrst du durch einsame Schatten?' his setting of which is dated July 30, 1816.⁸ Schubert evidently was fond of his cantata. It was performed at Innsbruck by Gänsbacher, and at Vienna by Sonnleithner in 1819. Schubert wished to give it at the Augarten in 1820, and had sent it somewhere for performance at the time of his death. He was paid 100 florins Vienna currency (or £4) for it, and he notes in his journal that it was the first time he had composed for money.

The third event was the composition of a

⁴ There was a List among Salieri's pupils at this time, but hardly the future Abbé, who was then but five years old. Franz List and Schubert met once—in the curious collection of variations on Diabelli's waltz, to which fifty Austrian composers contributed Beethoven's contribution being the thirty-three variations, op. 120. List's variations is No. 24, and Schubert's No. 35. List was throughout an indefatigable champion for Schubert.

⁶ His birthday was July 12, but the performance was put off on account of the weather.

⁸ He returned to this poet in 1820, 1825, 1826, 1828.

cantata on a larger scale than either of the others. It was addressed to Dr. Joseph Spendou, in his character of Founder and Principal of the Schoolmasters' Widows' Fund, and contained eight numbers, with solos for two sopranos and bass, a quartet and choruses, all with orchestral accompaniment. Whether it was performed or not is uncertain,¹ but it was published in 1830 in PF. score by Diabelli, as op. 128.

The other compositions of the year 1816 are as numerous as usual. There is a fine trio for S.S.A. and PF. to the words of Klopstock's 'grosstes Halleluja' (Lf. 41, No. 2); a Salve Regina in F, to German words, for four voices and organ² (Feb. 21, 1816), another, to Latin words, for unaccompanied chorus (Feb. 1816), and a Stabat Mater in F minor (Feb. 28, 1816) to Klopstock's translation of the Latin hymn. The last of these is written for soprano, tenor and bass solo and chorus, and for an orchestra of the usual strings, two flutes, two oboes, two bassoons, one contra-bassoon, two horns, three trombones, two trumpets and drums. These, however, are not uniformly employed; the trumpets and drums only appear for a few chords in Nos. 9 and 12; No. 5, an eight-part chorus, is accompanied by the wind alone; and No. 6, a tenor air, by the strings, with oboe solo. This work was performed in 1841 by the Musikverein of Vienna, and in 1863 at the Altlerchenfelder church, but was not published until the appearance of Breitkopf & Härtel's edition.

Among other works of this year are a setting of the Angels' Chorus from 'Faust'—'Christ ist erstanden' (June 1816); a fragment of a Requiem in E^b (July 1816), which ends with the second bar of the second Kyrie; a Tantum ergo in C (Aug.); a Magnificat in C (Sept.); and a duet, 'Auguste jam coelestium' (Oct.), strongly tinged by Mozart.⁴

Of operas we find only one in 1816, probably because only one libretto came in his way. It is called 'Die Bürgschaft,' and is in three acts. The author of the words is not known; and the quotations in Kreissle show that they are in great part absolute rubbish. Schubert continued his task to the third act, fifteen numbers, and there stopped. The autograph, in Herr Dumba's possession, is dated May 1816.

The symphonies of 1816 are two—the fourth, in C minor, entitled 'Tragic symphony,' and dated Apr. 1816⁵; and the fifth, in B_♭, for small orchestra, dated Sept. 1816–Oct. 3, 1816.⁶

⁶ Sept. 1816.—Finis den 3 Oct. 1816. Allegro, B_♭; andante con moto, E_♭; menuet and trio, G minor and G major; finale, allegretto vivace, B_♭. Autograph with Peters & Co.

The first of these is a great advance on its predecessors; the andante is individual and very beautiful, and the finale wonderfully spirited. The other, though full of Mozart, is as gay and untrammelled as all Schubert's orchestral music of that day. It is sometimes entitled 'Without Trumpets or Drums,' and is said to have been composed for the orchestra at the Gundelhof, which grew out of the Schubert Sunday afternoon quartets.⁷ Both were often played at the Crystal Palace, under Manns's direction, and were among the favourite works in the repertory of that establishment. A string quartet in F; a string trio in B_♭, apparently very good; a rondo in A for violin solo and quartet (June 1816); a violin concerto in C; three sonatinas for PF. and violin (op. 137); a PF. sonata in F: two movements of another in E; various marches for PF.; twelve Deutsche (waltzes); six Écossaises, with the inscriptions 'Composed while a prisoner in my room at Erdberg' and 'Thank God'—probably the relic of some practical joke—are still existing.

SONG COMPOSITION.—Very little of the above, however interesting, can be said to be of real, first-rate, permanent value. But when we approach the songs of 1816 the case is altered. There are not quite so many with this date as there were with that of 1815, but there are over a hundred in all, and among them are some of his finest settings of Goethe, the three songs of the Harper, in 'Wilhelm Meister' (op. 12, Sept. 6), Mignon's 'Sehnsucht' song (op. 62, No. 4); 'Der Fischer'; 'Der König in Thule' (op. 5, No. 5), 'Jägers Abendlied' and 'Schäfers Klagelied' (op. 3), 'Wanderer's Nachtlied' (op. 4), 'An Schwager Kronos' (op. 19). Of Schiller there are the beautiful 'Ritter Toggenburg,' 'Thekla's song' (op. 58), etc., and to name only one other, the far-famed 'Wanderer,' by Schmidt of Lubeck.

These magnificent pieces are well known to every lover of Schubert, but they are not more valued than such exquisitely simple and touching little effusions as 'An eine Quelle' of Claudius (op. 109, No. 3), 'Der Abend' of Kosegarten (op. 118, No. 2) or 'Der Leidende' of Hölty (Lief. 50, No. 2), all equally bearing his stamp.

The lists of the songs of these two years throw a curious light on Schubert's musical activity and mode of proceeding. Dr. Johnson was said when he got hold of a book to 'tear the heart out of it,' and with Schubert it was very much the same. To read a poem and at once to fasten upon it and transcribe it in music seems to have been his natural course; and having done one he went at once to the next. A volume of Hölty, or Claudius, or Kosegarten came into his hands; he tore from it a moment what struck him, and was not content with one song, but must have three, four or five. Thus, in the summer of 1815, he evidently meets with Kosegarten's poems, and, in July, sets twenty of them. In March 1816 he sets five songs by Salis; in May, six by Hölty; in Nov., four by Claudius, three by Mayrhofer and so on. To read these lists gives one a kind of visible image of the almost fierce eagerness with which he attacked his poetry, and of the inspiration with which the music rushed from his heart and through his pen—"everything that he touched," says Schumann, "turning into music." Thus, at a later date, calling accidentally on Randhartinger, and his friend being summoned from the room, Schubert, to amuse himself in the interval, took up a little volume which lay on the table. It interested him; and as his friend did not return he carried it off with him. Anxious for his book, Randhartinger called next morning at Schubert's lodgings, and found that he had already set several pieces in it to music. The volume was Wilhelm Müller's poems; the songs were part of the 'Schöne Müllerin.' A year or two after this, in July 1826—it is his old friend Doppler who tells the story—returning from a Sunday stroll with some friends through the village of Währing, he saw a friend sitting at a table in the beer-garden of one of the taverns. The friend, when they joined him, had a volume of Shakespeare on the table. Schubert seized it and began to read; but before he had turned over many pages pointed to 'Hark, hark, the lark!' and exclaimed: 'Such a lovely melody has come into my head, if I had but some music paper.' Some one drew a few staves on the back of a bill of fare, and there, amid the hubbub of the beer-garden, that beautiful song, so perfectly fitting the words, so skilful and so happy in its accompaniment, came into perfect existence. Two others from the same poet not improbably followed in the evening.¹

It seems that the quartet afternoons at the house of Schubert the elder had gradually extended themselves into performances of Haydn's symphonies, arranged as quartets and played with doubled parts; players of ability and name joined, and a few hearers were admitted. After a time the modest room became inconveniently crowded, and then the little society migrated to the house of a tradesman named Frischling (Dorotheengasse 1105), wind instruments were added, and the smaller works of Pleyel, Haydn and Mozart were attacked. In the winter of 1815 another move became necessary, to the house of Otto Hatwig, one of the violins of the Burgtheater, at the Schottenthor, and in the spring of 1818 to his new residence in the Gundelhof, and later still at Pettenkofer's house in the Bauernmarkt. The band now contained some good professional players, and could venture even on Beethoven's first two symphonies and the overtures of Cherubini, Spontini, Boieldieu, Weigl, etc. Schubert belonged to it all through, playing the viola, and it was probably with the view to their performance by the society that he wrote the two symphonies of 1816 (Nos. 4 and 5), two overtures in the winter of 1817 and his sixth symphony in the spring of 1818.

VOGL'S ESTIMATE OF THE SONGS.—Schober and Mayrhofer were Schubert's first friends outside the immediate circle of his youthful associates. He was now to acquire a third, destined to be of more active service than either of the others. This was Vogl. He was twenty years Franz's senior, and at the time of their meeting was a famous singer at the Vienna Opera, admired more for his intellectual gifts than for the technical perfection of his singing, and really great in such parts as Orestes in 'Iphigenie,' Almaviva in 'Figaro,' Creon in 'Medea' and Telasco in the 'Vestalin.' About the year 1816—the date is not precisely given—Vogl was induced by Schober to come to their lodgings and see the young fellow of whom Schober was always raving, but who had no access to any of the circles which Vogl adorned and beautified by his presence. The room as usual was strewn with music. Schubert was confused and awkward; Vogl, the great actor and man of the world, gay, and at his ease. The first song he took up—probably the first music of Schubert's he had ever seen—was Schubert's 'Augenlied.' He hummed it through and thought it melodious, but slight—which it is. 'Ganymed' and the 'Schäfers Klage' made a deeper impression; others followed and he left with the somewhat patronising but true remark: 'There is stuff in you; but you squander your fine thoughts instead of making the most of them.' But the impression remained; he talked of Schubert with astonishment, soon returned, and the acquaintance grew and ripened till they became almost inseparable, and until in their performances of Schubert's songs 'the two seemed,' in Schubert's own words, 'for the moment to be one.' In those days songs were rarely if ever sung in concert-rooms; but Vogl had the entrée to all the great musical houses of Vienna, and before long his performances of the 'Erl King,' the 'Wanderer,' 'Ganymed,' 'Der Kampf,' etc., with the composer's accompaniment, were well known. What Vogl's opinion of him ultimately became may be learnt from a passage in his diary:

'Nothing shows so plainly the want of a good school of singing as Schubert's songs. Otherwise, what an enormous and universal effect must have been produced throughout the world, wherever the German language is understood, by these truly divine inspirations, these utterances of a musical clairvoyance! How many would have comprehended, probably for the first time, the meaning of such expressions as "speech and poetry in music," "words in harmony," "ideas clothed in music," etc., and would have learnt

'that the finest poems of our greatest poets may be enhanced and even transcended when translated into musical language? Numberless examples may be named, but I will only mention "The Erl King," "Gretchen," "Schwazer Kronos," the Mignon and Harper's songs, Schiller's "Sohnsucht," "Der Pilgrim" and "Die Bürgschaft,"'

This extract shows how justly Vogl estimated Schubert, and how, at that early date, his discernment enabled him to pass a judgment which even now it would be difficult to excel. The word clairvoyance, too, shows that he thoroughly entered into Schubert's great characteristic. In hearing Schubert's compositions it is often as if one were brought more immediately and closely into contact with music itself than is the case in the works of others; as if in his pieces the stream from the great heavenly reservoir were dashing over us, or flowing through us, more directly, with less admixture of any medium or channel, than it does in those of any other writer—even of Beethoven himself. And this immediate communication with the origin of music really seems to have happened to him. No sketches, no delay, no anxious period of preparation, no revision appear to have been necessary. He had but to read the poem, to surrender himself to the torrent, and to put down what was given him to say as it rushed through his mind. This was the true 'inspiration of dictation,' as much so as in the utterance of any Hebrew prophet or seer. We have seen one instance in the case of the 'Erl King.' The poem of the Wanderer attracted him in the same way, and the song was completed in one evening. In a third case, that of Goethe's 'Rastlose Liebe,' the paroxysm of inspiration was so fierce that Schubert never forgot it, but, reticent as he often was, talked of it years afterwards.¹ It would seem that the results did not always fix themselves in the composer's memory as permanently as if they had been the effect of longer and more painful elaboration. Vogl tells an anecdote about this which is very much to the point.² On one occasion he received from Schubert some new songs, but being otherwise occupied could not try them over at the moment. When he was able to do so he was particularly pleased with one of them, but as it was too high for his voice he had it copied in a lower key. About a fortnight afterwards they were again making music together, and Vogl placed the transposed song before Schubert on the desk of the piano. Schubert tried it through, liked it, and said, in his Vienna dialect: 'I say! the song's not so bad; whose is it?' so completely, in a fortnight, had it vanished from his mind! Sir Walter Scott attributed a song of his own to Byron; but this was in 1828, after his mind had begun to fail.³

INFLUENCE OF ROSSINI.—1817 was comparatively an idle year. Its great musical event was the arrival of Rossini's music in Vienna. 'L' Inganno felice' was produced at the Hoftheater, Nov. 26, 1816, and 'Tancredi,' Dec. 17; 'L' Italiana in Algeri,' Feb. 1, 1817, and 'Ciro in Babilonia,' June 18; and the enthusiasm of the Viennese—like that of all to whom these fresh and animated strains were brought—knew no bounds. Schubert admired Rossini's melody and spirit, but rather made fun of his orchestral music, and a story is told—not impossibly apocryphal—of his having written an overture in imitation of Rossini, before supper, after returning from 'Tancredi.' At any rate he has left two 'Overtures in the Italian style' in D and C, dated Sept.⁴ and Nov. 1817 respectively, which were much played at the time. Schubert made four-hand P.F. arrangements of both, and that in C has been since published in score and parts as op. 170, and has been played at the Crystal Palace (Dec. 1, 1866, etc.) and elsewhere. Its caricature of Rossini's salient points, including of course the inevitable crescendo, is obvious enough; but nothing could transform Schubert into an Italian, and the overture has individual and characteristic beauties which are immediately recognisable. The influence of Rossini was no mere passing fancy, but may be traced in the sixth symphony, mentioned below, and in music of his later life—in the two marches (op. 121), the finale to the quartet in G (op. 161) and elsewhere.

A third overture in D belongs to 1817, and, though still in MS., has also been played at the Crystal Palace (Feb. 6, 1869, etc.). It is in two movements, adagio and all.^o giusto, and the former is almost a draft of the analogous movement in the overture known as 'Rosamunde' (op. 26), though really the 'Zauberharfe.' There the resemblance ceases. What led Schubert to the pianoforte this year in so marked a manner is not known, but his devotion to it is obvious, for no fewer than six sonatas belong to this period, viz. three with opus numbers—op. 122, in E \flat ; op. 147,⁵ in B (Aug.); op. 164, in A minor⁷; and three others, in F, A \flat and E minor (June).

Schubert's sixth symphony, in C,⁶ completed in Feb. 1818, appears to have been begun in the preceding October. It is the first one which he has marked as 'Grosse Sinfonie,' though hardly with reason, as both in form and orchestra it is the same as the early ones. It is an advance on the others, and the scherzo shows the first decided signs of Beethoven's influence. Passages may also be traced to Rossini and the Italian opera.

The catalogue of the instrumental compositions of this year closes with a string trio¹ and a polonaise for the violin. In the number of the vocal compositions of 1817 there is an equal falling off. Rossini's popularity for the time shut the door against all other composers, and even Schubert's appetite for bad libretti was compelled to wait. Not only, however, are there no operas this year, there is no church music, and but forty-seven songs. In quality, however, there is no deterioration in the songs. The astonishing 'Gruppe aus dem Tartarus' and the 'Pilgrim' of Schiller; the 'Ganymed' of Goethe; the 'Fahrt zum Hades,' 'Memnon' and 'Erlafsee' of Mayrhofer; and 'An die Musik' of Schober are equal to any that come before them. Among the MS. songs is one showing the straits to which Schubert was sometimes put, either by the want of materials or by the sudden call of his inspiration. It is the beginning of a setting of Schiller's 'Entzückung an Laura,' and is written on the front page of the second violin part of a duet-fugue by Fux, the words 'Fuga. Duetto. Violino: Secundo. Del: Sing: Fux' appearing in the copyist's formal handwriting through Schubert's hasty notes. It is superscribed 'Entzückung an Laura Abschied August 1817. Schubert Mpa'—interesting as showing that in 'Abschied' he has added his own comment to Schiller's words; that he dated his pieces at the moment of beginning them; and that he sometimes signed his name without the 'Franz.'

His circle of intimate friends was increased about this date by Anselm and Joseph Hüttenbrenner and Joseph Gahy. Anselm, four years his senior, was a pupil of Salieri's, and there they had met in 1815. With the younger brother, Joseph, he became acquainted in the summer of 1817.² Both were men of independent means, and Anselm was a musician by profession. Gahy was in the Government employment, an excellent pianoforte-player, of whom Schubert was for long very fond. The younger Hüttenbrenner was bewitched by Schubert, much as Krumpolz and Schindler were by Beethoven; and was ever ready to fetch and carry for his idol, and to praise whatever he did, till the idol would turn on his worshipper and be so cruel as to get the nickname of 'The Tyrant' from the rest of the set.

How Schubert existed since he threw up his place at the school and left his father's house is a point on which we are in entire ignorance. His wants were few, but how even those few were supplied is a mystery. We have seen that he lived rent-free with Schober for a few months in 1816, but the return of Schober's brother put an end to the arrangement,⁴ and from that date he must have been indebted to Spaun, or some friend better off than himself, for lodgings, for existence and for his visits to the theatre, for there is no trace of his earning anything by teaching in 1817, and the few pounds paid him for the Watteroth cantata is the only sum which he seems to have earned up to this date.

THE ESTERHAZY FAMILY.—In the summer of 1818, however, on the recommendation of Unger, the father of Mme. Unger-Sabatier the great singer (see UNGER, Caroline), Schubert accepted an engagement as teacher of music in the family of Count Johann Esterhazy, to pass the summer at his country seat at Zselézs, in Hungary, on the Waag, some distance east of Vienna, and the winter in town. He was to be a member of the establishment and to receive two gulden for every lesson. The family consisted of the count and countess, two daughters—Marie, thirteen, and Caroline, eleven—and a boy of five. All were musical. The count sang bass, the countess and Caroline contralto, Marie had a fine soprano, and both daughters played the piano. Baron von Schönstein, their intimate friend, slightly older than Schubert, a singer of the highest qualities, with a noble baritone voice, made up the party, which certainly promised all the elements of enjoyment. It was a pang to Schubert to part from the circle of his companions, to whom he was devoted, but it is not difficult to imagine how pleasant he must have found the comfort and generous living of the Esterhazy house, while at the same time there would be opportunities of retirement and abundant means of diversion in a beautiful country, a new people and the Hungarian and gipsy melodies.

When they left town does not appear.⁵ Schubert's Mass in C,⁶ his fourth, written like the others for Holzer, is dated 'July 1818'; but there is nothing to show whether it was finished in Vienna or in the country. A set of MS. solfeggi for the Countess Marie, also dated July, is perhaps evidence that by that time they were settled at Zselézs. Two letters to Schober are printed by Bauernfeld,⁷ and are dated Aug. 3 and Sept. 18, 1818. The first is addressed to his home circle, his 'dearest fondest friends . . . Spaun, Schober, Mayrhofer and Senn . . . you who are everything to me.' There are messages also to Vogl, and to Schober's mother and sister, and to 'all possible

'Die Erwartung,' composed Feb. 27, 1818—'to his friend, J. H.—' show that the acquaintance was of much earlier date? True, it was not published till the April after Schubert's death; and the song may have been prepared by him for publication shortly before, and the dedication added then.

acquaintances,' and an urgent entreaty to write soon—'every syllable of yours is dear to me.' He is thoroughly well and happy, and 'composing like a god... Mayrhofer's Einsamkeit is ready, and I believe it to be the best thing I have yet done, for I was without anxiety' (ohne Sorge—the italics are his own). 'Einsamkeit' is a long ballad, filling nineteen close pages of print, with a dozen changes of tempo and as many of signature; perhaps not quite coming up to his own estimate of it, though both words and music are often very striking. The length of this and other ballads will probably always hinder their wealth of melody, dramatic effects and other striking beauties from being known by the world at large.

The other letter, seven weeks later, throws more light on his position at Zselézs 'as composer, manager, audience, everything in one.'

'No one here cares for true Art, unless it be now and then the Countess; so I am left alone with my beloved, and have to hide her in my room, or my piano, or my own breast. If this often makes me sad, on the other hand it often elevates me all the more. Several songs have lately come into existence, and I hope very successful ones.'

He is evidently more at home in the servants' hall than the drawing-room:

'The cook is a pleasant fellow; the ladies-maid is thirty; the housemaid very pretty, and often pays me a visit; the nurse is somewhat ancient; the butler is my rival; the two grooms get on better with the horses than with us. The Count is a little rough; the Countess proud, but not without heart; the young ladies good children. I need not tell you, who know me so well, that with my natural frankness I am good friends with everybody.'

The letter ends with an affectionate message to his parents.

The only songs which can be fixed to this autumn, and which are therefore doubtless those just referred to, besides the great 'Einsamkeit,' are the 'Blumenbrief,' 'Blondel und Maria,' 'Das Marienbild' and 'Litaney,' 'Das Abendroth'—for a contralto, evidently composed for the countess; 'Vom Mitleiden Mariä,' and three sonnets from Petrarch. The Hungarian national songs left their mark in the '36 original dances,' or 'First Waltzes' (op. 9), some of which were written down in the course of the next year. The 'Divertissement à la hongroise' and the quartet in A minor (op. 29), in which the Hungarian influence is so strong, belong—the first apparently, the second certainly—to a much later period.

A third letter of this date, hitherto unprinted, with which the writer has been honoured by the granddaughter¹ of Ferdinand Schubert, to whom it was addressed, is not without interest, and is here printed entire. The Requiem referred to was by Ferdinand, and had evidently been sent to his brother for revision. The letter throws a pleasant light on the strong link existing between Franz and his old home, and suggests that assistance more solid than 'linen' may often have reached him from his fond step-mother in his poverty in Vienna. In considering the pecuniary result of the engagement, it must be remembered that the florin was at that time only worth a franc, instead of two shillings. The month's pay therefore, instead of being £20, was really only about £8. Still, for Schubert that was a fortune.

'24 Aug. 1818.

'DEAR BROTHER FERDINAND,

'It is half-past 11 at night, and your Requiem is ready. It has made me sorrowful, as you may believe, for I sang it with all my heart. What is wanting you can fill in, and put the words under the music and the signs above. And if you want much rehearsal you must do it yourself, without asking me in Zselézs. Things are not going well with you; I wish you could change with me, so that for once you might be happy. You should find all your heavy burdens gone, dear brother; I heartily wish it could be so.—My foot is asleep, and I am mad with it. If the fool could only write it wouldn't go to sleep!

'Good morning, my boy, I have been asleep with my foot, and now go on with my letter at 8 o'clock on the 25th. I have one request to make in answer to yours. Give my love to my dear parents, brothers, sisters, friends and acquaintances, especially not forgetting Carl. Didn't he mention me in his letter! As for my friends in the town, bully them, or get some one to bully them well, till they write to me. Tell my mother that my linen is well looked after, and that I am well off, thanks to her motherly care. If I could have some more linen I should very much like her to send me a second batch of pocket-handkerchiefs, cravats and stockings. Also I am much in want of two pair of kerseymer trousers. Hart can get the measure whenever he likes. I would send the money very soon. For July, with the journey-money, I got 200 florins.

'It is beginning already to be cold, and yet we shall not start for Vienna before the middle of October. Next month I hope to have a few weeks at Freystadt, which belongs to Count Erdödy, the uncle of my count. The country there is said to be extraordinarily beautiful. Also I hope to get to Pesth while we are at the vintage at Boszmed, which is not far off. It would be delightful if I should happen to meet Herr Administrator Taigele there. I am delighted at the thought of the vintage, for I have heard so much that is pleasant about it. The harvest also is beautiful here. They don't stow the corn into barns as they do in Austria, but make immense heaps out in the fields, which they call Tristen. They are often 80 to 100 yards long, and 30 to 40 high, and are laid together so cleverly that the rain all runs off without doing any harm. Oats and so on they bury in the ground.

'Though I am so well and happy, and every one so good to me, yet I shall be immensely glad when the moment arrives for going to Vienna. Beloved Vienna, all that is dear and valuable to me is there, and nothing but the actual sight of it will stop my longing! Again entreat you to attend to all my requests, I remain, with much love to all, your true and sincere

'A thousand greetings to your good wife and dear Rea, and a very hearty one to aunt Schubert and her daughter.'

RETURN TO VIENNA.—The inscription 'Zselézs, Nov. 1818' on the song 'Das Abendroth' shows that the return to Vienna was not till nearly the end of the year. He found the theatre more than ever in possession of Rossini. To the former operas, 'Elisabetta' was added in the autumn and 'Otello' early in Jan. 1819. But one of the good traits in Schubert's character was his freedom from jealousy and his determination to enjoy what was good, from whatever quarter it came, or however much it was against his own interest

A letter of his to Hüttenbrenner, written just after the production of 'Otello,' puts this in very good light:

"'Otello' is far better and more characteristic than 'Tancredi.' Extraordinary genius it is impossible to deny him. His orchestration is often most original, and so is his melody; and except the usual Italian gallopadas, and a few reminiscences of 'Tancredi,' there is nothing to object to."

But he was not content to be excluded from the theatre by every one, and the letter goes on to abuse the 'canaille of Weigl and Treitschkes' and 'other rubbish, enough to make your hair stand on end,' all which were keeping his operettas off the boards. Still, it is very good-natured abuse, and so little is he really disheartened that he ends by begging Hüttenbrenner for a libretto; nay, he had actually just completed a little piece called 'Die Zwillingbrüder' ('The Twins'), translated by Hofmann from the French—a Singspiel in one act, containing an overture and ten numbers. He finished it on Jan. 19, 1819, and it came to performance before many months were over.

Of his daily life at this time we know nothing. We must suppose that he had regular duties with his pupils at the Esterhazys' town house, but there is nothing to say so. We gather that he joined Mayrhofer in his lodgings, 420 in the Wipplingerstrasse, early in the year.¹ It was not a prepossessing apartment. 'The lane was gloomy; both room and furniture were the worse for wear; the ceiling drooped; the light was shut out by a big building opposite—a worn-out piano, and a shabby bookcase.' The only relief is the name of the landlady—Sanssouci, a Frenchwoman. No wonder that Mayrhofer's poems—he was ten years Schubert's senior—were of a gloomy cast.

The two friends were on the most intimate terms, and addressed each other by nicknames. What Mayrhofer's appellation may have been we do not know, but Schubert, now and later, was called 'the Tyrant,' for his treatment of Hüttenbrenner; also 'Bertl,' 'Schwammerl,' and, best of all, 'Kanevas'—because when a stranger came into their circle his first question always was, 'Kann er was?' ('Can he do anything?') Their humour took all sorts of shapes, and odd stories are told of their sham fights, their howls, their rough jokes and repartees.² Mayrhofer was a Government employé and went to his office early, leaving his fellow-lodger behind. Schubert began work directly he awoke, and even slept in his spectacles to save trouble; he got at once to his writing, sometimes in bed, but usually at his desk. It was so still when Hiller called on him eight years later.³ "Do you write much?" said the boy, looking at the manuscript on the standing desk—they evidently knew little in north Germany of Schubert's fertility. 'I compose every morning,' was the reply; 'and when one piece is done I begin another.' And yet this was the musicien le plus poète que jamais—it might have been the answer of a mere Czerny! Add to this a trait, communicated to the writer by Schubert's friend, Franz Lachner, of Munich, that when he had completed a piece, and heard it sung or played, he locked it up in a drawer and often never thought about it again.

This close work went on till dinner-time—two o'clock—after which, as a rule, he was free for the day, and spent the remainder either in a country walk with friends or in visits—as to Sofie Muller and Mme. Laasy Buchwieser, whom we shall encounter farther on; or at Schober's rooms, or some coffee-house—in his later days it was Bogner's Café in the Singerstrasse, where the droll cry of a waiter was a never-ending pleasure to him. But no hour or place was proof against the sudden attack of inspiration when anything happened to excite it. An instance occurs at this very time, Nov. 1819, in an overture for four hands in F (op. 34), which he has inscribed as 'written in Joseph Hüttenbrenner's room at the City Hospital in the inside of three hours; and dinner missed in consequence.'⁴ If the weather was fine he would stay in the country till late, regardless of any engagement that he might have made in town.

The only compositions that can be fixed to the spring of 1819 are five songs dated Feb. and one dated Mar.; a very fine quintet for equal voices, to the 'Sehnsucht' song in 'Wilhelm Meister'—a song which he had already set for a single voice in 1816, and was to set twice more in the course of his life (thus rivalling Beethoven, who also set the same words four times); an equally fine quartet for men's voices, 'Ruhe, schönstes Glück der Erde,' dated Apr.; four sacred songs by Novalis, dated May; and a striking overture in E minor, in series ii. of the complete edition.

HOLIDAY WITH VOGL.—The earnings of the previous summer allowed him to make an expedition this year on his own account. Mayrhofer remained in Vienna, and Vogl and Schubert appear to have gone together to Upper Austria. Steyr was the first point in the journey, a town beautifully situated on the Enns, not far south of Linz. They reached it early in July; it was Vogl's native place, and he had the pleasure of introducing his friend to the chief amateurs of the town, Paumgartner, Koller, Dornfeld, Schellmann—substantial citizens of the town, with wives and daughters, 'Pepi Koller,' 'Frizi Dornfeld,' 'the eight Schellmann girls,' etc., who all welcomed the musician with real Austrian hospitality, heard his songs with enthusiasm, and themselves helped to make music with him. His friend Albert Stadler was there also with his sister Kathi. How thoroughly Schubert enjoyed himself in this congenial bourgeois society, and in such lovely country—he mentions its beauties each time he writes—we have ample proof in two letters.¹ Among other drolleries the 'Erl King' was sung with the parts distributed amongst Vogl, Schubert and Pepi Koller. Perhaps, too, Schubert gave them his favourite version of it on a comb. Vogl's birthday (Aug. 10) was celebrated by a cantata in C, containing a terzet, two soprano and two tenor solos, and a finale in canon, pointed by allusions to his various operatic triumphs, words by Stadler, and music by Schubert.² After this the two friends strolled on to Linz, the home of the Spauns, and of Kenner and Ottenwald, whose verses Franz had set in his earlier days; and thence perhaps to Salzburg, returning to Steyr about the end of the month. Nor did the joviality of these good Austrians interfere with composition. Besides the impromptu cantata just mentioned, the well-known PF. quintet (op. 114), in which the air of 'Die Forelle' is used as the theme of the andantino, was written at Steyr, possibly as a commission from the good Paumgartner, and was performed by the Paumgartner party. Schubert achieved in it the same feat which is somewhere ascribed to Mozart, of writing out the separate parts without first making a score, and no doubt played the pianoforte part by heart. The date of their departure, Sept. 14, is marked by an entry in the album of Miss Stadler, when Schubert delivered himself of the following highly correct sentiment: 'Enjoy the present so wisely, that the past may be pleasant to recollect, and the future not alarming to contemplate.' This may pair off with a sentence written by Mozart, in English, in the album of an English Freemason, which has not yet been printed: 'Patience and tranquillity of mind contribute more to cure our distempers as the whole art of medicine. Wien, den 30te März 1787.'³

A few days more saw them again settled in Vienna. Each of the two letters preserved from the journey contains an obvious allusion to some love affair; but nothing is known of it. He could hardly have adopted a more effectual diversion from such sorrows than the composition of a Mass, on an extended scale; that, namely, in A₅—his fifth—which he began this month under the serious title of 'Missa Solemnis'; but he seems to have dawdled over it more than over any other of his works, as it was not finished till Sept. 1822 and contains many marks of indecision.

The most pregnant musical event of this year is the fact that on Feb. 28, 1819, a song of Schubert's was sung in public—the 'Schäfers Klage'lied,' sung by Jäger at Jall's concert at 5 P.M. at the 'Römische Kaiser,' Vienna. It was Schubert's first appearance before the public as a song-writer,⁴ and is noticed by the Leipzig A.M.Z. in these terms:

'Goethe's Schäfers Klage'lied set to music by Herr Franz Schubert—the touching and feeling composition of this talented young man was sung by Herr Jäger in a similar spirit.'

Such is the first utterance of the press on one who has since evoked so much enthusiasm! In the course of this year Schubert appears to have forwarded the three songs 'Schwager Kronos,' 'Über Thal' (Mignon) and 'Ganymed'—afterwards published as op. 19—to Goethe; but no notice was taken by the poet of one who was to give some of his songs a wider popularity than they could otherwise have enjoyed, a popularity independent of country or language; nor does Schubert's name once occur in all the six volumes of Goethe's correspondence with Zelter.

OPERAS.—1820 was again a year of great activity. Owing to Vogl's influence Schubert was gradually attracting the attention of the managers. The 'Zwillingsbrüder' had been written for the Kärnthnerthor Theatre (see p. 594), and it was not long before the régisser of the rival opera-house, the Theatre an-der-Wien, suggested to him a libretto called the 'Zauberharfe,' or 'Magic harp,' a melodrama in three acts, by the same Hofmann who had translated the former piece. To receive such a proposal and to act upon it was a matter of course with Schubert, and the 'Zauberharfe' is said to have been completed in a fortnight.⁵ But before this, early in the year, he had met with the works of A. H. Niemeyer, Professor of Theology at Halle, and had adopted the poem of 'Lazarus, or the Feast of the Resurrection,' for an Easter cantata. Easter fell that year on Apr. 2, and his work is dated 'Feb.,' so that he was in ample time. The poem—or drama, for there are seven distinct characters—is in three parts. 1. The sickness and death. 2. The burial and elegy. 3. The resurrection. Of these the first and a large portion of the second were completed by Schubert, apparently without the knowledge of any of his friends. Ferdinand mentions the first part in his list,⁶ but the existence of the second was unknown till, through the instrumentality of Thayer, it was unearthed in 1861.⁷

On June 14 the 'Zwillingsbrüder,' or 'Zwillinge,' was produced at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre. It is a comic operetta ('Posse'), with spoken dialogue, in one act, containing an overture and ten numbers, and turns on the plot that has done duty many times before, the confusion between two twin-brothers, who were both acted by Vogl. The overture was encored on the first night, and Vogl's two songs were much applauded, but the piece was virtually a fiasco and was withdrawn after six representations. Schubert took so little interest in its production that, like Mendelssohn at the 'Wedding of Camacho,' he did not even stay in the house, and Vogl had to appear instead of him in front of the curtain. The libretto, though overburdened with characters, is sadly deficient in proportion, and contains very little action. Schubert's music, on the other hand, is light, fresh and melodious, pointed, unusually compact and interesting throughout. In the concerted numbers there is evidence of great dramatic power. To condemn it, as the critics of the day do, as wanting in melody, and constantly striving after originality, is to contradict Schubert's most marked characteristics and is contrary to the facts. There is possibly more justice in the complaint that the accompaniments were too loud, though that is certainly not the fault in his masses, his only other published works with orchestral accompaniments anterior to this date. The work has been published in vocal score by Peters (1872).

On Aug. 19 the 'Zauberharfe' was produced at the Theatre an-der-Wien. It consists chiefly of chorus and melodrama, with only a few solo passages. There is a fine overture (in C), original, characteristic and full of beauty, which was published before 1828 as op. 26, under the name of 'Rosamunde,' to which it seems to have no claim.¹ The piece was occasionally brought forward till the winter and was then dropped. These three vocal works appear so far to have whetted Schubert's appetite that in the autumn he attacked the more important libretto of 'Sakontala,' a regular opera in three acts, by P. H. Neumann, founded on the Indian drama of that name. He sketched two acts, and there it remains; the MS. is in Herr Dumba's possession. Another important and very beautiful piece is the 23rd Psalm,² set for two sopranos and two altos with PF. accompaniment, at the instigation of the sisters Frölich, and dated at the beginning '23 Dec. 1820'—perhaps with a view to some private concerts given, now or later, at the old hall of the Musikverein. Another is the 'Gesang der Geister über den Wassern' of Goethe (op. 167). This fine and mystical poem had a strong attraction for Schubert. He set it for four equal voices in 1817; then he reset it for four tenors and four basses with two violas, two violoncellos and bass in Dec. 1820; and lastly revised this in Feb. 1821. It was first produced on Mar. 7, 1821, and found no favour, to Schubert's disgust. It was again performed on Mar. 20 before a more receptive audience, with a far better result. It was revived at Vienna in 1858 by Herbeck, and in England was performed with success on Mar. 22, 1881, under the direction of Prout. It is enormously difficult, and, though perfectly in character with the poem, will probably never be attractive to a mixed audience. Another work of 1820 were some antiphons (op. 113) for Palm Sunday (Mar. 26), composed for Ferdinand, who had been recently appointed choirmaster at the Altlerchenfelder church, and found the duties rather too much for him. They are written with black chalk on coarse grey wrapping paper; and the tradition is that they and two motets were written in great haste, just in time for the service. On Easter Sunday Franz attended and conducted the Mass for his brother.

The fantasia in C for PF. solo (op. 15), containing variations on Schubert's own 'Wanderer,' is probably a work of this year. It was written for von Liebenberg, a PF.-player, to whom Schubert dedicated it. This fine piece was brought into vogue by Liszt's arrangement of it for PF. and orchestra as a concerto; but it is doubtful if it is improved by the process. Schubert never could play it; he always stuck fast in the last movement, and on one occasion jumped up and cried 'Let the devil himself play it!' Another piece is an allegro for strings in C minor, dated Dec. 1820, the first movement of a quartet, of which there exist besides forty-one bars of the andante, in Ab. The allegro is of first-rate quality, and Schubert in every bar. It was published in 1868 by Senff. The MS. was in Brahms's fine collection of autographs.

The songs of 1820, seventeen in all, though not so numerous as those of previous years, are very fine. They contain 'Der Jungling auf dem Hügel' (op. 8, No. 1), 'Der Schiffer,' 'Liebeslauschen,' three grand songs to Mayrhofer's words, 'Orest auf Tauris,' 'Der entzählte Orest,' and 'Freiwilliges Versinken,' and four Italian canti, written for Fr. von Romer, who afterwards married Schubert's friend Spaun, and since published with one which was probably written under Salieri's eye as early as 1813. The most remarkable of all is 'Im Walde,' or 'Waldesnacht,' a very long song of extraordinary beauty, variety, force and imagination.

SONG PUBLICATION BEGUN.—With Feb. 1821 Schubert entered his 25th year, and it was a good omen to receive such a birthday present as the three testimonials of this date which Kreissle has³ preserved. The first is from von Mosel, then court secretary; the second from Weigl, director of the court Opera, Salieri and von Eichthal; the third from Moritz, Count

Dietrichstein, whom Beethoven addresses as 'Hofmusikgraf' and who appears to have been a sort of Jupiter-Apollo with general sway over all court music. These influential personages warmly recognise his eminent ability, industry, knowledge, feeling and taste, and profess the best intentions towards him. The three documents were enclosed by the Count in a letter to Vogl, full of good wishes for the future of his friend. Still more gratifying was the prospect, which now at last opened, of the publication of his songs. It was the first good epoch in Schubert's hitherto struggling life. He had now been writing for more than seven years, with an industry and disregard of consequences which are really fearful to contemplate; and yet, as far as fame or profit were concerned, might almost as well have remained absolutely idle. Here at length was a break in the cloud. It was not less welcome because it was mainly due to his faithful friends the Sonnleithners, who had made his acquaintance through the accident of Leopold Sonnleithner's being at school with him, and ever since cherished it in the most faithful and practical way, Ignaz, the father, having, since 1815, had large periodical music meetings of artists and amateurs in his house at the Gundelhof, which were nothing less than Schubert propaganda. Here, before large audiences of thoroughly musical people, Schubert's pieces were repeatedly performed, and at length, on Dec. 1, 1820, the 'Erl King' was sung by Gynnich, a well-known amateur, with a spirit which fired every one of the audience with the desire to possess the song, and appears to have suggested to Leopold and Gynnich the possibility of finding a publisher for the inspirations which had for so long been their delight and astonishment. They applied to Diabelli and Haslinger, the leading houses of Vienna, but without success; the main objections being the insignificance of the composer and the difficulty of his pianoforte accompaniments. On this they resolved to take the matter into their own hands; and, probably not without misgivings, had the 'Erl King' engraved. The fact was announced at the next concert at the Gundelhof, and a hundred copies were at once subscribed for in the room—sufficient to defray the cost of the engraving and printing and of engraving a second song as well. Meantime the 'Erl King' had been sung in public (for the concerts at the Gundelhof were, strictly speaking, private, limited to the friends of the host) by Gynnich, at an evening concert of the Musikverein, in one of the public rooms of the city, on Jan. 25, 1821, Schubert himself appearing on the platform and playing the accompaniment. Everything was done by the young enthusiasts to foster the Schubert furor, even to the publication of a set of 'Erl King waltzes' by A. Hüttenbrenner, which at any rate must have made the name familiar, though they provoked Schubert, and drew from Kanne some satirical hexameters and pentameters which may be read in Kreissle.¹ On Feb. 8 the programme of the Musikverein concert included three songs of his, the 'Sehnsucht' by Schiller, 'Gretchen am Spinnrade' and 'Der Jüngling auf dem Hügel'; and on Mar. 8 the 'Gruppe aus dem Tartarus.' On Mar. 7 the 'Erl King' was again sung, this time by Vogl himself, at an unmistakable public concert at the Kärnthnertheater, a concert supported by all the most distinguished ladies of the court, who received the song with loud applause. Think what the first appearance of these godlike pieces must have been! It was the rising of the Sun! He is now an everyday sight to us; but how was it the first time that he burst in all his brightness on the eyes of mortals? In the midst of all this enthusiasm the 'Erl King' was published on Apr. 1, 1821, by Cappi and Diabelli, on commission. It was dedicated to Count Moritz Dietrichstein, whose kindness well deserved that recognition. On Apr. 30 'Gretchen am Spinnrade' appeared as op. 2. The succeeding publications—each made to depend on the success of the last—were as follows:

- May 29. Op. 3. Schäfers Klageleid; Meeres-Stille; Heldenroslein; Jagers Abendlied.
- Do. Op. 4. Der Wanderer; Morgenlied; Wanderers Nachtlied.
- July 9. Op. 5. Rastlose Liebe; Nahe des Geliebten; Der Fischer; Erster Verlust; Der König in Thule.
- Aug. 23. Op. 6. Memnon; Antigone und Edip; Am Grabe Anselmos.
- Nov. 27. Op. 7. Die abgeblühte Linde; Der Flug der Zeit; Der Tod und das Mädchen.

Here the publication by commission stopped, the Diabellis being evidently convinced that the risk might be profitably assumed; and accordingly op. 8 appears on May 9, 1822, as 'the property of the publishers.' The dedications of the first seven numbers no doubt furnish the names of Schubert's most influential supporters: 1. Graf von Dietrichstein; 2. Reichsgraf Moritz von Fries; 3. Ignaz von Mosel; 4. Johann Ladislaus Pyrker, Patriarch of Venice; 5. Salieri; 6. Michael Vogl; 7. Graf Ludwig Széchenyi. It must be admitted that the above are very good lists, and that if Schubert had waited long for the publication of his works, the issue of twenty songs in eight months, under the patronage of seven such eminent personages, was a substantial compensation. We do not hear, however, that much money came into his hands from the publication. The favourable impression made by the publication may be gathered from the long, intelligent and sympathetic criticism, 'Blick auf Schuberts Lieder,' by F. von Hentl, which appeared in the Wiener Zeitschrift für Kunst, etc.—a periodical belonging to Diabelli's rivals, Steiner & Co.—for Mar. 23, 1822.

Schubert was now a good deal about the theatre, and when it was determined to produce a German version of Hérold's 'Clochette,' as 'Das Zauberglöckchen,' at the court opera, he was not unnaturally called upon to insert a couple of pieces to suit the Vienna audience. It was what Mozart often did for the Italian operas of his day—what indeed we know Shakespeare to have done in more than one case. The opera was produced on June 20. The interpolated pieces were a long air for tenor,¹ in three movements—maestoso, andante and allegro—full of passion and imagination, and a comic duet between the princes B flat and C natural (Bedur and Cedur). They were more applauded than anything else in the work, but Schubert's name was not divulged; the opera as a whole did not please and was soon withdrawn.

The little variation which he contributed, as No. 38, to Diabelli's collection of fifty variations—the same for which Beethoven wrote his thirty-three (op. 120)—should not be overlooked. Though not published till 1823, the autograph, now in the Hofbibliothek at Vienna, is dated 'March 1821.' The variation is fresh and pretty in the minor of the theme, but is more noticeable from its situation than from its own qualities. A few dances for PF. solo are dated '8th March' and 'July' in this year, and a collection of thirty-six, containing those alluded to and others of 1816 and 1819, was published by Cappi and Diabelli on Nov. 29, as op. 18. Some of these are inscribed on the autograph 'Atzenbrucker Deutsche, July 1821,' indicating a visit to Atzenbruck, the seat of an uncle of Schober's, near Abetstetten, between Vienna and St. Pölten, where a three days' annual festivity was held, to which artists of all kinds were invited, and where Schubert's presence and music were regarded as indispensable.

THE SYMPHONY IN E.—Whether after this he and Schober returned to Vienna we know not, no letters remain; but the next event of which any record remains is the composition of a symphony, his seventh,² in E, which is marked, without note of place, as begun in August. He did not complete the writing of it, and indeed it is probable that it did not occupy him more than a few hours; but the autograph, which is in the writer's possession,³ is a very curious manuscript, probably quite unique, even among Schubert's feats of composition. It occupies 167 pages of 42 sheets (10 quires of 4 and 1 of 2), and is in the usual movements—adagio in E minor and allegro in E major; andante in A; scherzo in C and trio in A⁴; and allegro giusto in E major. The introduction and a portion of the allegro are fully scored and marked; but at the 110th bar—the end of a page—Schubert appears to have grown impatient of this regular proceeding and from that point to the end of the work has made merely memoranda. But these memoranda are, in their way, perfectly complete and orderly to the end of the finale. Every bar is drawn in; and the tempi and names of the instruments are fully written at the beginning of each movement; the nuances are all marked; the very double bars and flourishes are gravely added at the end of the sections, and 'Fine' at the conclusion of the whole; and Schubert evidently regarded the work as no less complete on the paper than it was in his mind. And complete it virtually is; for each subject is given at full length, with a bit of bass or accompaniment-figure or fugato passage. There is not a bar from beginning to end that does not contain the part of one or more instruments; at all crucial places the scoring is much fuller; and it would no doubt be possible to complete it as Schubert himself intended.⁵

'ALFONSO UND ESTRELLA.'—We next find the two friends at the castle of Ochsenburg, a few miles south of St. Pölten, the seat of the Bishop, who was a relative of Schober's; and there and in St. Pölten itself they passed a thoroughly happy and healthy holiday of some weeks in September and October. The Bishop and Baron Mink, a local magnate, were congenial hosts, and the visit of the two clever young men was the signal for various festivities, in which all the aristocracy of the country-side—'a princess, two countesses and three baronesses,' in Schober's enumeration—took part, and in which the music and drollery of Schubert and his friend delighted every one. The great result of the visit, however, was the composition of an opera to Schober's words, on a romantic subject of battles, love, conspiracy, hunting, peasant life and everything else, so natural in opera librettos, so impossible in real life. It was called 'Alfonso und Estrella,' and two acts were completed before their return to town. The first act is dated at the end of the autograph Sept. 20, and the second Oct. 20. A week later they were back again in Vienna.

The songs composed in 1821 are very important, and comprise some of his very finest, and in the most various styles. It is sufficient to name among the published ones 'Grenzer

der Menschheit' (Feb.); 'Geheimes' (Mar.); Sulaika's two songs (opp. 14, 31); 'Sei mir gegrüßet' (op. 20, No. 1); and 'Die Nachtigall,' for four men's voices (op. 11, No. 2)—all of the very highest excellence, of astonishing variety, and enough of themselves to make the fame of any ordinary composer. A fine setting of 'Mahomet's song,' by Goethe, for bass (possibly for Lablache), was begun in March.

The third act of 'Alfonso und Estrella' was finished on Feb. 27, 1822. The fact that a thoroughly worldly, mercenary, money-making manager like Barbaja, who was at the same time a firm believer in Rossini, had become lessee of the two principal theatres of Vienna augured badly for Schubert's chance of success in that direction. But indeed the new piece seems to have been calculated to baffle any manager, not only in Vienna but everywhere else. It caused, as we shall see, a violent dispute, eighteen months later, between Schubert and Weber, which but for Schubert's good temper would have led to a permanent quarrel. Anna Milder, to whom Schubert sent a copy of the work in 1825, tells him, in a letter full of kindness and enthusiasm, that the libretto will not suit the taste of the Berliners, 'who are accustomed to the grand tragic opera or the French opéra-comique.' Nor was the libretto the only drawback. Schubert, like Beethoven in 'Fidelio,' was in advance of the modest execution of those days. At Graz, the abode of the Huttenbrenners, where there was a foyer of Schubert enthusiasts, the opera got as far as the rehearsal, and would probably have reached the stage, if the accompaniments had not proved impossible for the band.¹ No performance took place until twenty-six years after poor Schubert's death, namely, at Weimar, on June 24, 1854, under the direction of Liszt, who, with all his devotion to the master, had to reduce it much for performance. It was very carefully studied, and yet the success, even in that classical town, and with all Liszt's enthusiasm and influence, seems to have been practically nil. At last, however, its time came. Twenty-five years later, in 1879, it was again taken in hand by Kapellmeister Johann Fuchs of the court opera, Vienna, who entirely rewrote the libretto and greatly curtailed the work; and in this form it was brought to performance at Karlsruhe in Mar. 1881, with great success.

RELATIONS WITH BEETHOVEN.—But to return to Schubert and 1822. Early in the year he made the acquaintance² of Weber, who spent a few weeks of Feb. and Mar. in Vienna to arrange for the production of his 'Eury-anthe.' No particulars of their intercourse on this occasion survive. With Beethoven Schubert had as yet hardly exchanged words. And this is hardly to be wondered at, because, though Vienna was not a large city, yet the paths of the two men were quite separate. Apart from the great difference in their ages, and from Beethoven's peculiar position in the town, his habits were fixed, his deafness was a great obstacle to intercourse, and, for the last five or six years, what with the lawsuits into which his nephew dragged him and the severe labour entailed by the composition of the Mass in D, and of the sonatas opp. 106, 109, 110 and 111—works which by no means flowed from him with the ease that masses and sonatas did from Schubert—he was very inaccessible. Any stranger arriving from abroad with a letter of introduction was seen and treated civilly. But Schubert was a born Viennese, and, at the time of which we speak, Beethoven was as much a part of Vienna as St. Stephen's tower, and to visit him required some special reason and more than special resolution.

A remark of Rochlitz's³ in the July of this year shows that Schubert was in the habit of going to the same restaurant with Beethoven, and worshipping at a distance; but the first direct evidence of their coming into contact occurs at this date. On Apr. 19, 1822, he published a set of variations on a French air as op. 10, and dedicated them to Beethoven as 'his admirer and worshipper' (sein Verehrer und Bewunderer). The variations were written in the winter of 1820-21, and Schubert presented them in person to the great master. There are two versions of the interview,⁴ Schindler's and J. Huttenbrenner's. Schindler was constantly about Beethoven. He was devoted to Schubert, and is very unlikely to have given a depreciating account of him. There is therefore no reason for doubting his statement, especially as his own interest or vanity were not concerned. It is the first time we meet Schubert face to face. He was accompanied by Diabelli, who was just beginning to find out his commercial value, and would naturally be anxious for his success. Beethoven was at home, and we know the somewhat overwhelming courtesy with which he welcomed a stranger. Schubert was more bashful and retiring than ever; and when the great man handed him the sheaf of paper and the carpenter's pencil provided for the replies of his visitors, could not collect himself sufficiently to write a word. Then the variations were produced, with their enthusiastic dedication, which probably added to Beethoven's good humour. He opened them and looked through them, and, seeing something that startled him, naturally pointed it out.

² For their meeting we have the authority of Weber's son in his biography, li. 420. But his statement that Schubert was alienated from Weber by Weber's criticism on 'Rosamunde' is more than doubtful, because 'Rosamunde' was probably not composed till some nineteen months later, and because it was not Schubert's habit to take offence at criticism.

⁴ Schindler's Beethoven, li. 176.

At this Schubert's last remnant of self-control seems to have deserted him and he rushed from the room. When he got into the street, and was out of the magic of Beethoven's personality, his presence of mind returned, and all that he might have said flashed upon him, but it was too late. The story is perfectly natural, and we ought to thank Beethoven's Boswell for it.¹ Which of us would not have done the same? Beethoven kept the variations and liked them; and it must have been some consolation to the bashful Franz to hear that he often played them with his nephew. Hüttenbrenner's² story is that Schubert called, but found Beethoven out; which may have been an invention of Diabelli's to shield his young client.

This autumn Schubert again took up the Mass in A_♭, which was begun in 1819; finished it, and inscribed it 'im 7^o 822 beendet.'³ Not that that was the final redaction; for, contrary to his usual practice—in fact it is almost a solitary instance—he took it up again before his death and made material improvements⁴ both in the position of the voice-parts and in the instrumentation, as may be seen from the autograph score now in the library of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde.

This year seems to have been passed entirely in Vienna, at least there are no traces of any journey; and the imprisonment in the broiling city, away from the nature he so dearly loved, was not likely to improve his spirits. What events or circumstances are alluded to in the interesting piece called 'My Dream,'⁵ dated 'July 1822,' it is hard to guess. It may not improbably have been occasioned by some dispute on religious subjects of the nature of those hinted at in his brother Ignaz's letter of Oct. 12, 1818.⁶ At any rate it is deeply pathetic and poetical.

THE 'UNFINISHED' SYMPHONY.—During this summer Joseph Hüttenbrenner was active in the cause of his friend. He made no less than four endeavours to bring out the 'Teufels Lustschloß'⁷—at the Josefstadt and court theatres of Vienna, at Munich and at Prague. At Prague alone was there a gleam of hope. Holleben, the manager there, requests to have the score and parts sent to him, at the same time regretting that during a month which he had passed in Vienna Schubert had not once come near him. Hüttenbrenner also urged Schubert on Peters, the publisher, of Leipzig, who in a tedious egotistical letter, dated Nov. 14, 1822, gives the usual sound reasons of a cautious publisher against taking up with an unknown composer—for in north Germany Schubert was still all but unknown. One is sorry to hear of a little rebuff which he sustained at this time from the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde of Vienna, to whom he applied to be admitted as a practising member (on the viola), but who refused him on the ground of his being a professional and therefore outside their rules.⁸ A somewhat similar repulse was experienced by Haydn from the Tonkünstler Societät. (See Vol. II. p. 571.) On the other hand, the musical societies both of Linz and Graz elected him an honorary member. To the latter of these distinctions we owe the two beautiful movements of the symphony No. 8, in B minor, which was begun at Vienna on Oct. 30, 1822, and intended as a return for the compliment. The allegro and andante alone are finished,⁹ but these are of singular beauty and the greatest originality. In them, for the first time in orchestral composition, Schubert exhibits a style absolutely his own, untinted by any predecessor, and full of that strangely direct appeal to the hearer of which we have already spoken. It is certain that he never heard the music played, and that the new and delicate effects and orchestral combinations with which it is crowded were the result of his imagination alone. The first movement is sadly full of agitation and distress. It lay hidden at Graz for many years, until obtained from Anselm Hüttenbrenner by Herbeck, who first produced it in Vienna at one of the Gesellschaft concerts in 1865.¹⁰ It was published by Spina early in 1867; was played at the Crystal Palace, Apr. 6, 1867, and elsewhere in England, and always with increasing success. In fact no one can hear it without being captivated by it.

The songs composed in 1822—fourteen printed and two in MS.—comprise 'Epistel von Collin' (Jan.); 'Heliopolis' (Apr.); 'Todesmusik,' with a magnificent opening (op. 108, No. 2; Sept.); 'Schatzgräbers Begehr' (op. 23, No. 4; Nov.) with its stately bass; 'Willkommen und Abschied' (op. 56, No. 1; Dec.); 'Die Rose' (op. 73); and 'Der Musensohn' (op. 92). The concerted pieces, 'Constitutionslied' (op. 157; Jan.), 'Geist der Liebe' (op. 11, No. 3), 'Gott in der Natur' (op. 133) and 'Des Tages Weihe' (op. 146), all belong to this year.

Publication went on in 1822, though not so briskly as before. The variations dedicated to Beethoven (op. 10) were first to appear, on Apr. 19. They were followed by op. 8 (four songs) on May 9, and op. 11 (three partsongs) on June 12. Then came a long gap till Dec. 13, on which day opp. 12, 13 and 14, all songs, appeared at once. We have not space to name them. But with such accumulated treasures to draw upon, it is unnecessary to say that they are all of the first class. The pecuniary result of the publications of 1821 had been good: 2000 gulden were realised, and of the 'Erl King' alone more than 800 copies had been sold; and if Schubert had been provident enough to keep his works in his own possession he would soon have been out of the reach of want. This, however, he did not do. Pressed by the want of money, in an incautious moment he sold the first twelve of his works¹ to Diabelli for 800 silver gulden (£80), and entered into some injudicious arrangement with the same firm for future publications. His old and kind friend Count Dietrichstein about this time offered him a post as organist to the court chapel,² but he refused it, and he was probably right, though in so doing he greatly distressed his methodical old father. His habits, like Beethoven's, made it absurd for him to undertake any duties requiring strict attendance.

FURTHER DRAMATIC WORKS.—The Vienna theatre being closed to 'Alfonso und Estrella,' Schubert turned his thoughts in the direction of Dresden, where his admirer Anna Milder was living, and where Weber was director of the Opera; and we find him in a letter of Feb. 28, 1823 (published in 1881 for the first time)³ asking his old patron Herr von Mosel for a letter of recommendation to Weber. He is confined to the house by illness, and apologises for not being able to call. There are no traces of reply to this application, but it probably led to nothing, for, as we shall see, the score of the opera was still in his hands in October. He was evidently now set upon opera. In the letter just mentioned he implores von Mosel to entrust him with a libretto 'suitable for his littleness'; and though he never seems to have obtained this, he went on with the best he could get, and 1823 saw the birth of no less than three dramatic pieces. The first was a one-act play with dialogue, adapted from the French by Castelli, and called 'Die Verschworenen,' or 'The Conspirators.' The play was published in the Dramatic Garland—an annual collection of dramas—for 1823. Schubert must have seen it soon after publication, and by April had finished the composition of it. The autograph, in the British Museum, has at the end the words 'April 1823. F. Schubert, Ende der Oper.' It contains an overture and eleven numbers, and appears from Bauernfeld's testimony to have been composed with a view to representation at the court theatre. The libretto is a very poor one, with but few dramatic points, and confines the composer mainly to the chorus. The licensors changed its title to the less suspicious one of 'Der häusliche Krieg,' or 'The Domestic Struggle,' and it was duly sent in to the management, but it returned in twelve months without examination. It did not come to performance at all during Schubert's lifetime, nor till 1861. In that year it was given, under Herbeck's direction, by the Musikverein, Vienna, on Mar. 1 and 22; and on the stage at Frankfort on Aug. 29: since then at the court theatre, Vienna, at Munich, Salzburg and other German towns; in Paris, Feb. 3, 1868, as 'La Croisade des Dames'; and at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, Mar. 2, 1872, as 'The Conspirators.' In less than two months after throwing off this lively Singpiel, Schubert had embarked in something far more serious, a regular three-act opera of the 'heroico-romantic' pattern—also with spoken dialogue—the scene laid in Spain, with Moors, knights, a king, a king's daughter and all the usual furniture of these dreary compilations. The libretto of 'Fierrabras,' by Josef Kupelwieser—enough of itself to justify all Wagner's charges⁴ against the opera-books of the old school—was commissioned by Barbaja for the court theatre. The book was passed by the Censure on July 21; but Schubert had by that time advanced far in his labours, and had in fact completed more than half of the piece. He began it, as his own date tells us, on May 25. Act 1, filling 304 pages of large oblong paper,⁵ was completely scored by the 31st of the month; Act 2, in five days more, by June 5; and the whole three acts, fully 1000 pages, and containing an overture and twenty-three numbers, were entirely out of hand by Oct. 2. And all for nothing! Schubert was not even kept long in suspense, for early in the following year he learnt that the work had been dismissed. The ground for its rejection was the badness of the libretto; but knowing Barbaja's character, and seeing that Kupelwieser was secretary to a rival house (the Josefstadt), it is difficult not to suspect that the commission had been given by the wily Italian, merely to facilitate the progress of some piece of business between the two establishments.

It is, as Liszt has remarked, extraordinary that Schubert, who was brought up from his youth on the finest poetry, should have unhesi-

¹ So say the books: but the works published on commission were opp. 1-7, containing twenty songs.

³ In the Neue Freie Presse of Vienna, Nov. 19, 1881. 'The letter, though formal in style, is curiously free in some of its expressions. It mentions the overture to the 1st Act of "Alfonso und Estrella." What can this be? The overture known under that name (op. 69) is dated "Dec. 1823," and is said to have been written for "Rosamunde."' tatingly accepted the absurd and impracticable librettos which he did, and which have kept in oblivion so much of his splendid music. His devotion to his friends, and his irrepressible desire to utter what was in him, no doubt help to explain the anomaly, but an anomaly it will always remain. It is absolutely distressing to think of such extraordinary ability, and such still more extraordinary powers of work, being so cruelly thrown away, and of the sickening disappointment which these repeated failures must have entailed on so simple and sensitive a heart as his. Fortunately for us the strains in which he vents his griefs are as beautiful and endearing as those in which he celebrates his joys.

'DIE SCHÖNE MÜLLERIN.'—His work this summer was not, however, to be all disappointment. If the theatre turned a deaf ear to his strains there were always his beloved songs to confide in, and they never deceived him. Of the song in Schubert's hands we may say what Wordsworth so well says of the sonnet:

'With this key
Shakespeare unlocked his heart; the melody
Of this small lute gave ease to Petrarch's wound.

'and when a damp
Fell round the path of Milton, in his hand
The thing became a trumpet, whence he blew Soul-animating strains, alas too few!'

—with the notable difference that it was given to Schubert to gather up and express, in his one person and his one art, all the various moods and passions which Wordsworth has divided amongst so many mighty poets.

And now, in the midst of the overwhelming tumult and absorption which inevitably accompany the production of so large a work of imagination as a three-act opera, brought into being at so extraordinarily rapid a pace, he was to stop and to indite a set of songs, which, though not of greater worth than many others of his, are yet so intelligible, so expressive, address themselves to such universal feelings, and form so attractive a whole, that they have certainly become more popular, and are more widely and permanently beloved, than any similar production by any other composer. We have already described the incident through which Schubert made acquaintance with the Müllerlieder ¹ of Wilhelm Müller, twenty of which he selected for the beautiful series so widely known as the 'Schöne Müllerin.' We have seen the enduring impatience with which he attacked a book when it took his fancy, and the eagerness with which he began upon this particular one. We know that the Müllerlieder were all composed this year; that some of them were written in hospital; that No. 15 is dated

'October'; that a considerable interval elapsed between the second and third act of 'Fierrabras'—probably the best part of July and August. Putting these facts together, it seems to follow that the call on RANDHARTINGER (q.v.) and the composition of the first numbers of the 'Schöne Müllerin' took place in May, before he became immersed in 'Fierrabras.' Then came the first two acts of that opera; then his illness, and his sojourn in the hospital, and more songs; then the third act of the opera; and lastly the completion of the 'Lieder.'

WEBER AND THE OPERA.—Be this as it may, there was no lack of occupation for Schubert after he had put 'Fierrabras' out of hand. Weber arrived in Vienna late in Sept. 1823, and on Oct. 3 began the rehearsals of 'Euryanthe'; and for a month the musical world of Austria was in a ferment. After the first performance, on Oct. 25, Weber and Schubert came somewhat into collision. Schubert, with characteristic frankness, asserted that the new work wanted the geniality and grace of 'Der Freischütz,' that its merit lay mainly in its harmony,² and that he was prepared to prove that the score did not contain a single original melody. Weber had been much tried by the rehearsals, by the growing conviction that his work was too long, and by the imperfect success of the performance; and with a combination of ignorance and insolence which does him no credit replied, 'Let the fool learn something himself before he criticises me.' Schubert's answer to this was to go off to Weber with the score of 'Alfonso und Estrella.' When they had looked through this, Weber returned to Schubert's criticisms on 'Euryanthe,' and, finding that the honest Franz stuck to his point, was absurd enough to lose his temper and say, in the obvious belief that the score before him was Schubert's first attempt, 'I tell you the first puppies and the first operas are always drowned.' Franz, it is unnecessary to say, bore no malice, even for so galling a speech, and it is due to Weber to state that he took some pains later to have the work adopted at the Dresden theatre.³

Schubert did not yet know the fate which awaited 'Fierrabras'; all was at present couleur de rose; and the fascination of the theatre, the desire innate in all musicians, even one so self-contained as Schubert, to address a large public, sharpened not improbably by the chance recently enjoyed by the stranger, was too strong to be resisted, and he again, for the third time in ten months, turned towards the stage. This time the temptation came in the shape of 'Rosamunde, Princess of Cyprus,' a play of ultra-romantic character, by Madame von Chezy, authoress of 'Euryanthe,' a librettist whose lot seems to have been to drag down the musicians connected with her. The book of 'Rosamunde' must have been at least as inefficient as that with which Weber had been struggling, to cause the failure of such magnificent and interesting music as Schubert made for it. The drama has disappeared, but Kreissle gives the plot,¹ and it is both tedious and improbable. It had, moreover, the disadvantage of competition with a sensational spectacular piece, written expressly to suit the taste of the suburban house, the Theatre an-der-Wien, at which 'Rosamunde' was produced, and which, since the time when Schikaneder induced Mozart to join him in the 'Magic Flute,'² had a reputation for such extravaganzas. Schubert completed the music in five days.³ It consists of an overture in D,⁴ since published as 'Alfonso und Estrella,' op. 69; three entr'actes; two numbers of ballet music; a little piece for clarinets, horns and bassoons, called a 'Shepherds' melody,' of bewitching beauty; a romance for soprano solo; and three choruses. The romance (op. 26), the shepherds' chorus, the entr'acte in B \flat and the air de ballet in G are not only very beautiful but very attractive; and the entr'acte in B minor, of a grand, gloomy and highly imaginative cast, is one of the finest pieces of music existing. The play was brought out on Dec. 20, 1823; the overture, though the entire orchestral part of the music had only one rehearsal of two hours, was twice redemanded, other numbers were loudly applauded, and Schubert himself was called for at the close; but it only survived one more representation, and then the parts were tied up and forgotten till the year 1867, when they were discovered by two English travellers in Vienna.⁵ (See Grove, Vol. II. p. 467.)

Besides the Mullerlieder several independent songs of remarkable beauty belong to 1823. Conspicuous among these are 'Viola' (Schneeglocklein; op. 123), a long composition full of the most romantic tenderness and delicacy, with all the finish of Meissonnier's pictures, and all his breadth and dignity. Also the 'Zwerg' (op. 22, No. 1), by Matthias von Collin, in which Schubert has immortalised the one brother, as Beethoven, in his overture to 'Coriolan,' did the other. This long, dramatic and most pathetic ballad, which but few can hear unmoved, was written absolutely à l'improviste, without note or sketch, at the top of his speed, talking all the while to Randhartinger, who was waiting to take him out for a walk.⁶ Equal, if not superior, to these in merit, though of smaller dimensions, are

'Dass sie hier gewesen' (op. 59, No. 2); 'Du bist die Ruh' (op. 59, No. 3); the Barcarolle, 'Auf dem Wasser zu singen' (op. 72), to which no nearer date than '1823' can be given. Below these again, though still fine songs, are 'Der zürnende Barde' (Feb.); 'Drang in die Ferne' (op. 71; Mar. 25); 'Pilgerweise' (Apr.); 'Vergissmännlein' (May). The fine sonata in A minor for PF. solo, published as op. 143, is dated Feb. 1823, and the sketch of a scena for tenor solo and chorus of men's voices, with orchestra, dated May 1823. The latter was completed by Herbeck and published in 1868 by Spina as 'Rüdiger's Heimkehr.'

Ten works (opp. 15 to 24) were published in 1823. The earliest was a collection of dances, viz. twelve waltzes, nine Écossaises and seventeen Ländler, op. 18, published Feb. 5; the PF. fantasia, op. 15, followed on Feb. 24. The rest are songs, either solo—op. 20, Apr. 10; op. 22, May 27; op. 23, Aug. 4; op. 24, Oct. 7; op. 16, Oct. 9; op. 19, twenty-one (no dates)—or partsongs, op. 17, Oct. 9. With op. 20 the names of Sauer & Leidesdorf first occur as publishers.

THE OCTET.—The year 1824 began almost exclusively with instrumental compositions. An introduction and variations for PF. and flute (op. 160), on the 'Trockne Blumen' of the 'Schöne Müllerin,' are dated 'Jan.,' and were followed by the famous octet (op. 166) for clarinet, horn, bassoon, two violins, viola, violoncello and contrabass, which is marked as begun in Feb. and finished on Mar. 1. It was written—not, let us hope, without adequate remuneration, though that was probably the last thing of which its author thought—for Count F. von Troyer, chief officer of the household to the Archduke Rudolph, Beethoven's patron. In this beautiful composition Schubert indulges his love of extension. It contains, like Beethoven's septet, eight movements; but, unlike the septet, it occupies more than an hour in performance. But though long, no one can call it tedious.⁷ The Count played the clarinet, and must have been delighted with the expressive melody allotted to him in the andante. The work was performed immediately after its composition, with Schuppanzigh, Weiss and Linke, three of the famous Rasoumowsky quartet, amongst the players. His association with the members of this celebrated party may well have led Schubert to write string quartets; at any rate, he himself tells us that he had written two before Mar. 31, and these are doubtless those in E \flat and E (op. 125), since the only other quartet bearing the date of 1824—that in A minor—has so strong a Hungarian flavour as to point to his visit to Zselécs later in the year. How powerfully his thoughts were running at present on orchestral music is evident from the fact that he mentions both octet and quartets as studies for 'the Grand Symphony,'¹ which was then his goal, though he did not reach it till eighteen months later.

A bitter disappointment, however, was awaiting him in the rejection of 'Fierrabras,' which, as already mentioned, was returned by Barbaja, ostensibly on account of the badness of its libretto. Two full-sized operas—this and 'Alfonso und Estrella'—to be laid on the shelf without even a rehearsal! Whatever the cause, the blow must have been equally severe to our simple, genuine composer, who had no doubt been expecting, not without reason, day by day for the last four months, to hear of the acceptance of his work. His picture of himself under this temporary eclipse of hope is mournful in the extreme, though natural enough to the easily depressed temperament of a man of genius. After speaking of himself as 'the most unfortunate, most miserable being on earth,' he goes on to say:

'Think of a man whose health can never be restored, and who from sheer despair makes matters worse instead of better. Think, I say, of a man whose brightest hopes have come to nothing, to whom love and friendship are but torture, and whose enthusiasm for the beautiful is fast vanishing; and ask yourself if such a man is not truly unhappy.

My peace is gone, my heart is sore,
Gone for ever and evermore.

This is my daily cry; for every night I go to sleep hoping never again to wake, and every morning only brings back the torment of the day before. Thus joylessly and friendlessly would pass my days, if Schwind did not often look in and give me a glimpse of the old happy times. . . . Your brother's opera "[this is a letter to Kupelwieser the painter, and the allusion is to 'Fierrabras'—"turns out to be impracticable, and my music is therefore wasted. Castelli's "Verschworenen" has been set in Berlin by a composer there, and produced with success. Thus I have composed two operas for nothing.'

This sad mood, real enough at the moment, was only natural after such repulses. It was assisted, as Schubert's depression always was, by the absence of many of his friends, and also, as he himself confesses, by his acquaintance with Leidesdorf the publisher (in Beethoven's banter 'Dorf des Leides,' a very 'village of sorrow'), whom he describes as a thoroughly good, trustworthy fellow, 'but so very melancholy that I begin to fear that I may have learnt too much from him in that direction.' It must surely have been after an evening with this worthy that he made the touching entries in his journal which have been preserved; e.g.

'Grief sharpens the understanding and strengthens the soul: Joy on the other hand seldom troubles itself about the one, and makes the other effeminate or frivolous.' 'My musical works are the product of my genius and my misery, and what the public most relish is that which has given me the greatest distress.'

Fortunately, in men of the genuine composer temperament, the various moods of mind follow one another rapidly. As soon as they begin to compose the demon flies and heaven opens. That gloomy document called 'Beethoven's Will,' to which even Schubert's most wretched letters must yield the palm, was written at the very time that he was pouring out the gay and healthy strains of his second symphony.

COMPOSITIONS AT ZSELÉSZ.—Schubert left town with the Esterhazys in a few weeks after these distressing utterances, and for a time forgot his troubles in the distractions of country life in Hungary. At Zselézs he remained for six months, but his life there is almost entirely a blank to us. We can only estimate it by the compositions which are attributable to the period, and by the scanty information conveyed by his letters, which, though fuller of complaint than those of 1818, are even less communicative of facts and occurrences. To this visit is to be ascribed that noble composition known as the Grand Duo' (op. 140), though designated by himself as 'Sonata for the PF. for four hands. Zselézs, June 1824'; a piece which, though recalling in one movement Beethoven's second, and in another his seventh, symphony, is yet full of the individuality of its author; a symphonic work in every sense of the word, which, through Joachim's instrumentation, has now become an orchestral symphony, and a very fine one. To Zselézs also are due the sonata in B₇ (op. 30, May or June), the variations in A₇ (op. 35, 'middle of 1824'), two waltzes (in op. 33, '1824, July'), and four Ländler ('July 1824,' Nott. p. 215)—all for PF. four hands; other waltzes and Ländler in the same collections for two hands; and the 'Gebet' of Lamotte Fouqué (op. 139a), signed 'Sept. 1824, at Zselézs in Hungary'—all evidently arising from the necessity of providing music for the Count's family circle. The young Countesses were now nineteen and seventeen, and doubtless good performers, as is implied in the duet form of the pianoforte works. We are probably right in also attributing the lovely string quartet in A minor (op. 29) and the four-hand 'Divertissement à la hongroise' (op. 54) to this visit, at any rate to its immediate influence. Both are steeped in the Hungarian spirit, and the divertimento contains a succession of real national tunes, one of which he heard from the lips of a maidservant as he passed the kitchen with Baron Schönstein in returning from a walk. For the Baron was at Zselézs on this as on the last occasion, and frequent and exquisite must have been the performances of the many fine songs which Schubert had written in the interval since his former visit.

The circumstances attending the composition of the vocal quartet ('Gebet,' op. 139) just mentioned are told by Kreissle, probably on the authority of Schönstein, and they give a good instance of Schubert's extraordinary facility. At breakfast one morning, in Sept. 1824, the Countess produced Lamotte Fouqué's poem, and proposed to Schubert to set it for the family party. He withdrew after breakfast, taking the book with him, and in the evening, less than ten hours afterwards, it was tried through from the score at the piano. The next evening it was sung again, this time from separate parts, which Schubert had written out during the day. The piece is composed for quartet, with solos for Mme. Esterhazy, Marie, Schönstein and the Count, and contains 209 bars. A MS. letter of Ferdinand's,¹ dated July 3, full of that strong half-reverential affection which was Ferdinand's habitual attitude towards his gifted brother, and of curious details, mentions having sent him Bach's fugues (never-cloying food of great composers) and an opera-book, 'Der kurze Mantel.' Strange fascination of the stage, which thus, in despite of so many failures, could keep him still enthralled!

The country air of the Hungarian mountains, and no doubt the sound and healthy living and early hours of the château, restored Schubert's health completely, and in a letter of Sept. 21 to Schober he says that for five months he had been well. But he felt his isolation and the want of congenial Vienna society keenly; speaks with regret of having been 'enticed' into a second visit to Hungary, and complains of not having a single person near to whom he could say a sensible word. How different from the exuberant happiness of the visits to Steyr and St. Pölten, when every one he met was a demonstrative admirer, and every evening brought a fresh triumph!

Now, if ever, was the date of his tender feeling for his pupil Caroline Esterhazy, which his biographers have probably much exaggerated. She was 17 at the time, and Bauernfeld represents her as the object of an ideal devotion which soothed, comforted and inspirited Schubert to the end of his life. Ideal it can only have been, considering the etiquette of the time and the wide distance between the stations of the two; and the only occasion on which Schubert is ever alleged to have approached anything like a revelation of his feelings is that told by Kreissle—on what authority he does not say, and it is hard to conceive—when on her jokingly reproaching him for not having dedicated anything to her, he replied, 'Why should I? everything I ever did is dedicated to you.' True, the fine fantasia in F minor, published in the March following his death as op. 103, is dedicated to her 'by Franz Schubert,' a step which the publishers would hardly have ventured upon unless the MS.—probably handed to them before his death—had been so inscribed by himself. But it is difficult to reconcile the complaints of isolation and neglect already quoted from his letter to Schober with the existence of a passion which must have been fed every time he met his pupil or sat down to the piano with her. We must be content to leave each reader to decide the question for himself.

Vocal composition he laid aside almost entirely in 1824. The only songs which we can ascertain to belong to it are four—the fine though gloomy ones called 'Auflösung' and 'Abendstern,' both by Mayrhofer; another evening song 'Im Abendroth' by Lappe, all three in March; and the bass song, 'Lied eines Kriegers,' with which he closed the last day of the year.² Of part-songs there are two, both for men's voices; one a 'Salve regina,' written in April before leaving town; and the other, the 'Gondelfahrer,' or Gondolier, a very fine and picturesque composition, of which Lablache is said to have been so fond that he encoired it on first hearing and himself sang in the encore (Spaun). A sonata for PF. and arpeggione, in A minor, dated Nov. 1824, was probably one of his first compositions after returning to town.³

The publications of 1824 embrace opp. 25 to 28 inclusive, all issued by Sauer & Leidesdorf. Op. 25 is the 'Schöne Müllerin,' 20 songs in five numbers, published Mar. 25; op. 26 is the vocal music in 'Rosamunde,'⁴ the romance and three choruses; op. 27, three fine 'heroic marches,' for PF. four hands; op. 28, 'Der Gondelfahrer,' for four men's voices and PF., Aug. 12.

VIENNA AGAIN.—1825 was a happy year to our hero—happy and productive. He was back again in his dear Vienna, and exchanged the isolation of Zselécz for the old familiar life, with his congenial friends Vogl, Schwind, Jenger, Mayrhofer, etc. (Schober was in Prussia and Kupelwieser still at Rome), in whose applause and sympathy and genial conviviality he rapidly forgot the disappointments and depression that had troubled him in the autumn. Sofie Muller, one of the great actresses of that day, evidently a very accomplished, cultivated woman, was then in Vienna, and during Feb. and Mar. her house was the resort of Schubert, Jenger and Vogl, who sang or listened to her singing of his best and newest Lieder—she herself sang the 'Junge Nonne' at sight on Mar. 3—and lived a pleasant and thoroughly artistic life.⁵ Others, which she mentions as new, and which indeed had their birth at this time, are 'Der Einsame' and 'Ihr Grab.' The 'new songs from the Pirate,' which she heard on Mar. 1, may have been some from the 'Lady of the Lake,' or 'Norna's song,' or even 'Anna Lyle,' usually placed two years later. Schubert published some important works early in this year—the overture in F for four hands (op. 34); also the sonata in B \flat (op. 30) and the variations in A \flat (op. 35), both for four hands; and the string quartet in A minor (op. 29)—fruits of his sojourn in Hungary. The last of these, the only quartet he was destined to publish during his life, is dedicated 'to his friend I. Schuppanzigh,' a pleasant memorial of the acquaintance cemented by the performance of the octet a twelvemonth before. And as on such publications some amount of money passes from the publisher to the composer, this fact of itself would contribute to enliven and inspirit him. In addition to these instrumental works some noble songs were issued in the early part of 1825—'Die zürnende Diana' and the 'Nachtstück,' of Mayrhofer; 'Der Pilgrim' and 'Der Alpenjäger,' of Schiller; and Zuleika's second song. The two beautiful solo sonatas in A minor and in C—the latter of which he never succeeded in completely writing out, but the fragment of which is of first-rate quality—also date from this time.

A SUMMER TOUR.—As if to revenge himself for his sufferings at the Esterhazys', he planned an extensive tour for this summer, in his favourite district and in the company of his favourite friend. Vogl, on Mar. 31, started for his home at Steyr. Schubert soon followed him, and the next five months, to the end of Oct., were passed in a delightful mixture of music, friends, fine scenery, lovely weather and absolute ease and comfort, in Upper Austria and the Salzkammergut, partly amongst the good people who had welcomed him so warmly in 1819, partly among new friends and new enthusiasm. Taking Steyr as their point d'appui, they made excursions to Linz, Steyr, Gmunden, Salzburg and even as far as Gastein, etc., heartily enjoying the glorious scenery by day, received everywhere on arrival with open arms, and making the best possible impression with their joint performances. The songs from 'The Lady of the Lake' were either composed before starting or on the road. At any rate they formed the chief programme during the excursion. If the whole seven were sung or not is uncertain¹; but Schubert particularly mentions the 'Ave Maria,' apropos of which he makes an interesting revelation. 'My new songs,' says he,

'from Walter Scott's "Lady of the Lake," have been very successful. People were greatly astonished at the devotion which I have thrown into the Hymn to the blessed Virgin, and it seems to have seized and impressed everybody. I think that the reason of this is that I never force myself into devotion, or compose hymns or prayers unless I am really overpowered by the feeling; that alone is real, true devotion.'

It is during this journey, at Salzburg, that he makes the remark, already noticed, as to the performance of Vogl and himself. At Salzburg, too, it was the 'Ave Maria' that so riveted his hearers:

'We produced our seven pieces before a select circle, and all were much impressed, especially by the Ave Maria, which I mentioned in my former letter.

The way in which Vogl sings and I accompany, so that for the moment we seem to be one, is something quite new and unexpected to these good people.'

Schubert sometimes performed alone. He had brought some variations and marches for four hands with him, and, finding a good player at the convents of Florian and Kremsmünster, had made a great effect with them. But he was especially successful with the lovely variations from the solo sonata in A minor (op. 42); and here again he lets us into his secret:

'There I played alone, and not without success, for I was assured that the keys under my hands sang like voices, which if true makes me very glad, because I cannot abide that accursed thumping, which even eminent players adopt, but which delights neither my ears nor my judgment.'

He found his compositions well known throughout Upper Austria. The gentry fought for the honour of receiving him, and to this day² old people are found to talk with equal enthusiasm of his lovely music and of the unaffected gaiety and simplicity of his ways and manners.

GASTEIN AND A 'GRAND SYMPHONY.'—The main feature of the tour was the excursion to Gastein in the mountains of East Tyrol. To Schubert this was new ground, and the delight in the scenery which animates his description is obvious. They reached it about Aug. 18, and appear to have remained three or four weeks, returning to Gmunden about Sept. 10. At Gastein, among other good people, he found his old ally Ladislaus Pyrker, Patriarch of Venice, and composed two songs to his poetry, 'Heimweh' and 'Allmacht' (op. 79). But the great work of this date was the 'Grand Symphony'³ which had been before him for so long. We found him eighteen months ago writing quartets and the octet as preparation for it, and an allusion in a letter⁴ of Schwind's shows that at the beginning of Aug. he spoke of the thing as virtually done. That it was actually put on to paper at Gastein at this date we know from the testimony of Bauernfeld,⁵ who also informs us that it was a special favourite with its composer. Seven songs in all are dated in this autumn, amongst them two fine scenes from a play by W. von Schutz called 'Lacrimas' (op. 124), not so well known as they deserve.

The letters of this tour, though not all preserved, are unusually numerous for one who so much disliked writing. One long one to his father and mother; another, much longer, to Ferdinand; a third to Spaun; and a fourth to Bauernfeld, are printed by Kreissle, and contain passages of real interest, showing how keenly he observed and how thoroughly he enjoyed nature, and displaying throughout a vein of good sense and even practical sagacity,⁷ and a facility of expression, which are rare in him.

At length the summer and the money came to an end, Vogl went off to Italy for his gout, and Schubert, meeting Gahy at Linz, returned with him and the MS. symphony to Vienna in an Einspinner, to find Schober and Kupelwieser both once more settled there. The first thing to be done was to replenish his purse, and this he soon did by the sale of the seven songs from 'The Lady of the Lake,' which he disposed of on Oct. 29 to Artaria for 200 silver gulden—just £20! Twenty pounds, however, were a mine of wealth to Schubert; and even after repaying the money which had been advanced by his father, and by Bauernfeld for the rent of the lodgings during his absence, he would still have a few pounds in hand.

During Schubert's absence in the country his old friend Salieri died, and was succeeded by Eybler. The court organist also fell ill, and Schwind wrote urging him to look after the post; but Schubert made no sign, and evidently did nothing in the matter, though the organist died on Nov. 19. He obviously knew much better than his friends that he was absolutely unfit for any post requiring punctuality or restraint. In the course of this year he was made 'Ersatzmann,' or substitute—whatever that may mean—for the Musikverein or Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. Of what happened from this time till the close of 1825 we have no certain information. He set two songs by Schulze in Dec.; and it is probable that the PF. sonata in D (op. 53) and the noble funeral march for the Emperor of Russia (op. 55), whose death was known in Vienna on Dec. 14, both belong to that month. What gave him his interest in the death of Alexander is not known, but the march is an extraordinarily fine specimen. A piece for the piano in F, serving as accompaniment to a recitation from a poem by Pratobevera, a series of graceful modulations in arpeggio form, also dates from this year.¹

The compositions of 1825 may be here summed up: Sonata for PF. solo in A minor (op. 42); ditto in D (op. 53); ditto in A (op. 120); unfinished ditto in C ('Reliquie,' Nott. p. 211); a funeral march, four hands, for the Emperor Alexander of Russia (op. 55). Songs—'Des Sängers Habe,' by Schlehta, and 'Im Walde,' by E. Schulze; seven from 'The Lady of the Lake' (op. 52); another from Scott's 'Pirate'; 'Auf der Bruck,' by Schulze; 'Fülle der Liebe,' by Schlegel; 'Allmacht' and 'Heimweh,' by Pyrker; two scenes from 'Lacrimas,' by W. von Schütz; and 'Abendlied für die Entfernte,' by A. W. Schlegel; 'Die junge Nonne,' 'Todtengräbers Heimweh' and 'Der blinde Knabe,' all by Craigher; 'Der Einsame,' by Lappe; and, in Dec., 'An mein Herz' and 'Der liebliche Stern,' both by Ernst Schulze. It is also more than probable that the string quartet in D minor was at least begun before the end of the year.

The publications of 1825 are: In Jan., opp. 32, 30, 34; Feb. 11, opp. 36 and 37; May 9, op. 38; July 25, op. 43; Aug. 12, op. 31; and, without note of date, opp. 29 and 33. Op. 29 is the lovely A minor quartet; and it is worthy of note that it is published as the first of 'Trois quatuors.' This was never carried out. The two others were written, as we have already seen (p. 603), but they remained unpublished till after the death of their author.

1826 was hardly eventful in any sense of the word, though by no means unimportant in Schubert's history. It seems to have been passed entirely in Vienna. He contemplated a trip to Linz with Spaun and Schwind, but it did not come off. The weather of this spring was extraordinarily bad, and during April and May he composed nothing.² The music attributable to 1826 is, however, of first-rate quality. The string quartet in D minor, by common consent placed at the head of Schubert's music of this class, was first played on Jan. 29, and was therefore doubtless only just completed.³ That in G (op. 161) Schubert himself has dated as being written in ten days (June 20 to June 30), a work teeming with fresh vigour after the inaction of the preceding two months, as full of melody, spirit, romance, variety and individuality as anything he ever penned, and only prevented from taking the same high position as the preceding by its great length—due to the diffuseness which Schubert would no doubt have remedied had he given himself time to do so. One little point may be mentioned en passant in both these noble works—the evidence they afford of his lingering fondness for the past. In the D minor quartet he goes back for the subject and feeling of the andante to a song of his own of 1816, and the finale of the G major is curiously tinged with reminiscences of the Rossini fever of 1819.

The 'Rondeau brillant' in B minor for PF. and violin (op. 70), subsequently such a favourite in the concert-room, also belongs to this year, though it cannot be precisely dated; and so does a piece of still higher quality, which is pronounced by Schumann to be its author's 'most perfect work both in form and conception,' the sonata in G major for PF. solo, op. 78, usually called the 'Fantasia,' owing to a freak of the publisher's. The autograph is inscribed, in the hand of its author, 'IV. Sonate für Pianoforte allein. Oct. 1826. Franz Schubert'; above which, in the writing of Tobias Haslinger, stands the title 'Fantasie, Andante, Menuetto und Allegretto.'¹ We may well say with Beethoven, 'O Tobias!'

By the side of these undying productions the 'Marche héroïque,' written to celebrate the accession of Nicholas I. of Russia, and the andantino and rondo on French motifs—both for PF., four hands—are not of great significance.

An attack of song-writing seems to have come upon him in March, which date we find attached to six songs; or, if the rest of those to Seidl's words, forming opp. 105 and 80, and marked merely '1826,' were written at the same time (as, from Schubert's habit of eviscerating his books, they not improbably were)—twelve. Three Shakespeare songs are due to this July—'Hark! hark! the lark,'² from Cymbeline; 'Who is Sylvia?' from the Two Gentlemen of Verona; and the Drinking-song in Antony and Cleopatra—the first two perhaps as popular as any single songs of Schubert's. The circumstances of the composition, or rather creation, of the first of these have already been mentioned (p. 500). The fact of three songs from the same volume belonging to one month (not improbably to one day, if we only knew) is quite à la Schubert. A beautiful and most characteristic piece of this year is the 'Nachtheile,' or 'Lovely night,' written to words of Seidl's—not improbably for the Musikverein, through Anna Frohlich—for tenor solo, with accompaniment of four men's voices and pianoforte, which would be a treasure to singing societies for its truly romantic loveliness but for the inordinate height to which the voices are taken and the great difficulty of executing it with sufficient delicacy. A song called 'Echo' (op. 130), probably written in 1826, was intended to be the first of six 'humorous songs' for Weigl's firm.³

We hear nothing of the new symphony during the early part of this year. No doubt it was often played from the MS. score at the meetings of the Schubert set, but they say no more about it than they do of the octet, or quartets, or sonatas, which were all equally in existence; and for aught we know it might have been 'locked in a drawer,' which was often Schubert's custom after completing a work—'locked in a drawer and never thought about again.'⁴ It was, however, destined to a different fate. On Sept. 9, 1826, at one of the first meetings of the Board of the Musikverein after the summer recess, Hofrath Kiesewetter reports that Schubert desires to dedicate a symphony to the society; upon which the sum of 100 silver florins (£10) is voted to him in payment for the work, but as a token of sympathy and as an encouragement. The letter conveying the money is dated the 12th, and on or even before its receipt Schubert brought the manuscript and deposited it with the society. His letter accompanying it may here be quoted:

'To the Committee of the Austrian Musical Society. —Convinced of the noble desire of the Society to give its best support to every effort in the cause of art, I venture, as a native artist, to dedicate this my Symphony to the Society, and most respectfully to recommend myself to its protection. With the highest esteem. Your obedient, FRANZ SCHUBERT.'

In accordance with this, the MS. probably bears his formal dedication to the Verein, and we may expect to find that, though so long talked of, it bears marks of having been written down as rapidly as most of his other productions.⁵ At present, however, all trace of it is gone; not even its key is known. There is no entry of it in the catalogue of the society's library, and except for the minute and letter given above, and the positive statements of Bauernfeld quoted below,⁶ it might as well be non-existent. That it is an entirely distinct work from that in C, written two and a half years later, can hardly admit of a doubt.

MISCELLANEOUS PUBLICATIONS. —Of the publications of 1826, the most remarkable are the seven songs from 'The Lady of the Lake,' for which Artaria had paid him 200 florins in the preceding Oct., and which appeared on the 5th of this Apr., in two parts, as op. 52. They were succeeded immediately, on Apr. 8, by the PF. sonata in D (op. 53) and the 'Divertissement à la hongroise' (op. 54), both issued by the same firm. For these two splendid works Schubert received from the penurious Artaria only 300 Vienna florins, equal to £12. Songs issued fast from the press at this date; for on Apr. 6 we find op. 56 (three songs) announced by Pannauer, and opp. 57 and 58 (each three songs) by Weigl; on June 10, op. 60 ('Greisengesang' and 'Dithyrambe') by Cappi and Czerny; in Sept. op. 59 (four songs, including 'Dass sie hier gewesen,' 'Du bist die Ruh' and 'Lachen und Weinen') by Leidesdorf; and op. 64 (three partsongs for men's voices) by Pennauer; and on Nov. 24, op. 65 (three songs) by Cappi and Czerny. Some of these were composed as early as 1814, 1815, 1816; others again in 1820, 1822 and 1823. The Mass in C (op. 48) and three early pieces of church music, 'Tantum ergo' (op. 45), 'Totus in corde' (op. 46) and 'Salve regina' (op. 47) were all issued in this year by Diabelli. Of dances and marches for piano there are eight numbers: a galop and eight Écossaises (op. 49); thirty-four 'Valsees sentimentales' (op. 50); 'Homage aux belles Viennoises' (sixteen Ländler and two Écossaises, op. 67); three marches (four hands, op. 51)—all published by Diabelli; the two Russian marches (opp. 55, 56), by Pennauer; six polonaises (op. 61), Cappi and Czerny; and a divertissement, or 'Marche brillante et raisonnée,' on French motifs (op. 63), Weigl. In all, twenty-two publications, divided among six publishers, and containing 106 works.

² Bauernfeld, in an article 'Franz Schubert' in the Wiener Zeitschrift für Kunst, Literatur, Theater und Mode for 11, 13, 15 June 1829 (Nos. 60, 70, 71), says as follows:—'To the larger works of his later years also belongs a Symphony' written in 1825. Gastein, for which its author had an especial predilection. At a great concert given by the Musik Verein shortly after his death a Symphony in C was performed, which was composed as early as 1817 [1818], and which he considered as one of his best successful works. . . . Perhaps the Society intends at some future time to make us acquainted with one of the later symphonies, possibly the Gastein one already mentioned.' [N.B. The two movements of the B minor symphony (1828) were not at this time known, so that by 'later symphonies' Bauernfeld must surely intend the two of 1826 and 1828.] At the end of the article he gives a 'chronological list of Schubert's principal works not yet generally known.' Amongst these are '1826, Grand Symphony' . . . '1828, Last Symphony'—'Grand' (grosses) being the word used by Schubert himself in his letter to Kapellmeister referred to above (p. 604). It is plain, therefore, that at this time, seven months after Schubert's death, the Gastein symphony of 1826, and that in C major of 1828, were known as distinct works. The present writer has collected the evidence for the existence of the symphony in a letter to the London Athenaeum of Nov. 16, 1881.

PRECARIOUS CONDITIONS.—We have been thus particular to name the numbers and publishers of these works, because they show conclusively how much Schubert's music was coming into demand. Pennauer and Leidesdorf were his personal friends, and may possibly have printed his pieces from chivalrous motives; but no one can suspect hard and experienced men of business like Diabelli and Artaria of publishing the music of any one at their own risk unless they believed that there was a demand for it. The list is a remarkable one, and will compare for extent and variety with that of most years of Beethoven's life. And even at the incredibly low prices¹ which his publishers gave for the exclusive copyright of his works, there is enough in the above to produce an income sufficient for Schubert's wants. But the fact is that he was mixed up with a set of young fellows who regarded him as a Cæsar,² and who virtually lived upon his carelessness and good-nature, under the guise of keeping house in common. Bauernfeld, in an article in the Vienna Presse of Apr. 17, 1869, has given us the account with some naveté. A league or partnership was made between himself, Schwind the painter and Schubert. They had nominally their own lodgings, but often slept all together in the room of one. The affection between them was extraordinary. Schubert used to call Schwind 'seine Geliebte'—his innamorata! A kind of common property was established in clothes and money; hats, coats, boots and cravats were worn in common, and the one who was in cash paid the score of the others. As Schwind and Bauernfeld were considerably younger than Schubert, that duty naturally fell on him. When he had sold a piece of music he seemed to this happy trio to 'swim in money,' which was then spent 'right and left' in the most reckless manner, till it was all gone, and the period of reverse came. Under these circumstances life was a series of fluctuations, in which the party were never rich, and often very poor. On one occasion Bauernfeld and Schubert met in a coffee-house near the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, and each detected the other in ordering a mélange (café au lait) and biscuits, because neither had the money to pay for dinner. And this in Schubert's twenty-ninth year, when he had already written immortal works quite sufficient to make a good livelihood!

Outside the circle of this trio were a number of other young people, artists and literary men—Schober, Jengor, Kupelwieser, etc.—attracted by Schubert's genius, good-nature and love of fun, and all more or less profiting by the generosity of one who never knew what it was to deny a friend. The evenings of this jolly company were usually passed in the Gasthaus, and then they would wander about till day-break drove them to their several quarters, or to the room of one of the party. It would be absurd to judge Vienna manners from an English point of view. The Gasthaus took the place of a modern club, and the drink consumed probably did not much exceed that which some distinguished Vienna artists now imbibe night after night, and does not imply the excess that it would infallibly lead to in a northern climate; but it must be obvious that few constitutions could stand such racket, and that the exertion of thus trying his strength by night and his brain by day must have been more than any frame could stand. In fact his health did not stand the wear and tear. We have seen that in Feb. 1823 he could not leave the house; that in the summer of the same year he was confined to the hospital; that in Mar. 1824 he speaks of his health as irrecoverably gone; and the dedication of the six four-hand marches, op. 40, to his friend Bernhard, doctor of medicine, 'as a token of gratitude,' is strong evidence that in 1826, the year of their publication, he had had another severe attack.³

¹ It is said by Schindler that the prices agreed on with him were ten Vienna gulden per fift of songs, and twelve per pianoforte pieces. (The Vienna gulden was then worth just one franc. 'Fift' meant then a single song, not a 'Part' of two or three. This is conclusively proved by Ferdinand Schubert's letter of 1824. These prices were not adhered to. Thus for the seven 'Lady of the Lake' songs he had 600 paper gulden = £20, or nearly £3 per song. Even that is low enough. On the other hand, F. Lachner told Mr. Barry that in the last year of Schubert's life he took half a dozen of the 'Winterreise' songs to Hüssler at Schubert's request and brought back one gulden a piece (= 10s.) for them!

It was probably a sense of the precarious nature of such a life that led some of his friends in the autumn of 1826 to urge Schubert to stand for the post of vice-Kapellmeister in the Imperial court, vacant by the promotion of Eybler to that of principal Kapellmeister; but the application, like every other of the same kind made by him, was a failure, and the place was given to Joseph Weigl by the Imperial decree of Jan. 27, 1827.

Another opportunity of acquiring a fixed income was opened to him during the same autumn by the removal of Karl August Krebs from the conductorship of the Court theatre to Hamburg. Vogl interested Duport, the administrator of the theatre, in his friend, and the appointment was made to depend on Schubert's success in composing some scenes for the stage. Madame Schechner, for whom the principal part was intended, a young débutante who was making her first appearance in Vienna, objected at the pianoforte rehearsals to some passages in her air, but could not induce the composer to alter them. The same thing happened at the first orchestral rehearsal, when it also became evident that the accompaniments were too noisy for the voice. Still Schubert was immovable. At the full-band rehearsal Schechner fairly broke down, and refused to sing any more. Duport then stepped forward, and formally requested Schubert to alter the music before the next meeting. This he refused to do; but, taking the same course as Beethoven had done on a similar occasion, said loudly, 'I will alter nothing,' took up his score and left the house. After this the question of the conductorship was at an end. Schubert's behaviour in this matter has been strongly censured, but we do not see much in it. Such questions will always depend on the temperament of the composer. Had it been either Mozart or Mendelssohn we cannot doubt that all would have gone smoothly; the prima donna would not only not have been ruffled, but would have felt herself complimented, and the music would have been so altered as to meet every one's wish, and yet sound as well as before. On the other hand, had it been Beethoven or Schumann we may be equally sure that not a note would have been changed, and that everything would have ended in confusion. With all Schubert's good-nature, when his music was concerned he was of the same mind as Beethoven and Schumann. There are other instances of the same stubbornness, which will be noticed later.

Some set-off to these disappointments was afforded by the ready way in which his Gastein symphony¹ was received by the Musikverein, and the sympathetic resolution and prompt donation which accompanied its acceptance, although no attempt to perform or even rehearse it can now be traced. The beautiful 'Nachthele,' already referred to, which he composed in September, was rehearsed during the early winter months, and performed by the Society on Jan. 25, 1827.

Some little gratification also he not improbably derived from the letters which during this year he began to receive from publishers in the north. Probst of Leipzig—one of Beethoven's publishers, predecessor of the firm of Senff—was the first to write. His letter is dated August 26, and is followed by one from Breitkopf & Härtel of Sept. 7. True, neither are very encouraging. Probst speaks of his music as too often 'peculiar and odd,' and 'not intelligible or satisfactory to the public'; and begs him to write so as to be easily understood; while Breitkopf stipulates that the only remuneration at first shall be some copies of the works. Still, even with this poor present result, the fact was obvious that he had begun to attract attention outside of Austria.

THE 'WINTERREISE' CYCLE.—As to Schubert's life in the early part of 1827 we have little to guide us beyond the scanty inferences to be drawn from the dated compositions. The first of these of any moment are eight variations (the eighth very much extended) on a theme in Hérold's opera 'Marie,' for Pf. four hands (op. 82). 'Marie' was produced on the Vienna boards Jan. 18, 1827; and Schubert's variations are dated 'February,' and are dedicated to one of his friends in Upper Austria, Prof. Cajetan Neuhaus of Linz. The next and still more important work is the first half of the 'Winterreise,' twelve songs ('Gute Nacht' to 'Einsamkeit'), marked as begun in Feb. 1827. Franz Lachner remembers that 'half a dozen' of them were written in one morning, and that Haslinger gave a gulden (that is a franc) apiece for them. The poems which form the basis of this work are by Wilhelm Müller, the poet of the 'Schöne Müllerin,' which the Winterreise closely approaches in popularity, and which it would probably equal if the maiden of the Winterwalk were as definite a creation as the miller's daughter is. They are twenty-four in all, and appear under their now immortal name in the second volume of the work of which vol. i. contained the 'Schöne Müllerin,' and which has the quaint title already quoted (p. 602).² The second volume was published at Dessau in 1824, and did not at once attract Schubert's notice. When it did, he made short work of it. Another important composition of this month (dated Feb. 28) is the Schlachtlied (battle-song) of Klopstock, set for two choirs of male voices, sometimes answering in eight real parts, of immense force and vigour, and marked by that dogged adherence to rhythm so characteristic of Schubert.

BEETHOVEN'S RECOGNITION OF SCHUBERT.

—He can scarcely have finished with this before the news that Beethoven was in danger spread through Vienna. The great musician got back to his rooms in the Schwarzschanerhaus from his fatal expedition to Gneixendorf in the first week of December, became very ill, and during Jan. was tapped for the dropsy three times. Then Malfatti was called in, and there was a slight improvement. During this he was allowed to read, and it was then that Schindler, a zealous Schubert propagandist, took the opportunity to put some of Schubert's songs into his hands.¹ He made a selection of about sixty, in print and MS., including 'Iphigenie,' 'Grenzen der Menschheit,' 'Allmacht,' 'Die junge Nonne,'² 'Viola,' the 'Müllerlieder,' etc. Beethoven up to this time probably did not know half a dozen of Schubert's compositions, and his astonishment was extreme, especially when he heard that there existed at least 500 of the same kind. 'How can he find time,' said he, 'to set such long poems, many of them containing ten others?' i.e. as long as ten separate ones; and said over and over again, 'If I had had this poem I would have set it myself'; 'Truly Schubert has the divine fire in him.' He pored over them for days, and asked to see Schubert's operas and PF. pieces, but the illness returned and it was too late. But from this time till his death he spoke often of Schubert, regretting that he had not sooner known his worth, and prophesying that he would make much stir in the world.³ Schubert was sure to hear of these gratifying utterances, and they would naturally increase his desire to come into close contact with the master whom he had long worshipped at a distance. It is possible that this emboldened him to visit the dying man. He seems to have gone twice; first with Anselm Hüttenbrenner and Schindler. Schindler told Beethoven that they were there, and asked whom he would see first. 'Schubert may come in first' was the answer. At this visit, perhaps, if ever, it was that he said, in his affectionate way, 'You, Anselm, have my mind (Geist), but Franz has my soul (Seele).'⁴ The second time he went with Josef Hüttenbrenner and Teltscher the painter. They stood round the bed. Beethoven was aware of their presence, and fixing his eyes on them, made some signs with his hand. No one, however, could explain what was meant, and no words passed on either side. Schubert left the room overcome with emotion. In about three weeks came the end, and then the funeral. Schubert was one of the torch-bearers. Franz

Lachner and Randhartinger walked with him to and from the cemetery. The way back lay by the Himmelfortgrund, and close by the humble house in which he had drawn his first breath. They walked on into the town, and stopped at the 'Mehlgrube,' a tavern in the Kärnthnerthorstrasse, now the Hotel Munch. There they called for wine, and Schubert drank off two glasses, one to the memory of Beethoven, the other to the first of the three friends who should follow him. It was destined to be himself.

Lablache was also one of the torch-bearers at the funeral. This and the part which he took in the Requiem for Beethoven (Vol. I. p. 303) may have induced Schubert to write for him the 'three Italian Songs for a Bass voice,' which form op. 83, and are dedicated to the great Italian basso.

Hummel and Hiller were in Vienna during Mar. 1827, and Hiller describes meeting Schubert and Vogl at Madame Lacsony-Buchwieser's, and his astonishment at their joint performance. 'Schubert,' says Hiller,⁵

'Had little technique, and Vogl but little voice; but they had both so much life and feeling, and went so thoroughly into the thing, that it would be impossible to render these wonderful compositions more clearly and more splendidly. Voice and piano became as nothing; the music seemed to want no material help, but the melodies appealed to the ear as a vision does to the eye.'

Not only did the boy think it the deepest musical impression he had ever received, but the tears coursed down the cheeks even of the veteran Hummel. Either then or a few evenings afterwards, Hummel showed his appreciation by extemporising on Schubert's 'Blinde Knabe,' which Vogl had just sung—to Franz's delight.

In April Schubert wrote the beautiful 'Nachtgesang im Walde' (op. 139b) for four men's voices and four horns; and a 'Spring Song,' also for men's voices. In July we have the very fine and characteristic serenade 'Zögernd leise' (op. 135) for alto solo and female voices, a worthy pendant to the 'Nachtelle,' and written almost à l'improviste.⁶ A fête was to be held for the birthday of a young lady of Döbling. Grillparzer had written some verses for the occasion, and Schubert, who was constantly in and out of the Fröhlich's house, was asked by Anna to set them for her sister Josephine and her pupils. He took the lines, went aside into the window, pushed up his spectacles on to his brow, and then, with the paper close to his face, read them carefully twice through. It was enough: 'I have it,' said he, 'it's done, and will go famously.' A day or two afterwards he brought the score, but he had employed a male chorus instead of a female one, and had to take it away and transcribe it. It was sung in the garden by moonlight, to the delight of every one, the villagers thronging round the gate. He alone was absent.

1827 witnessed another attempt at an opera—the ‘Graf von Gleichen,’ written by Bauernfeld, apparently in concurrence¹ with Mayrhofer. Schubert had the libretto in August 1826, submitted it to the management of the Royal Opera-house, and arranged with Grillparzer, in case the Censure should cause its rejection, to have it accepted by the Königstadt Theatre. Owing possibly to the delay of the Censure it was nearly a year before he could begin the composition. The MS. sketch,² is dated at the beginning ‘17 Juni 1827.’ The opera is sketched throughout, and he played portions of it to Bauernfeld. Forty years later the sketch came into the hands of Herbeck, and he began to score it after Schubert’s indications—of which there are plenty—but was prevented by death.

VISIT TO GRAZ.—A correspondence had been going on for long between the Schubert circle at Vienna and the Pachler family in Graz, the capital of Styria, as to an expedition thither by Schubert, and at length it was arranged for the autumn of this year. Carl Pachler was one of those cultivated men of business who are such an honour to Germany; an advocate, and at the head of his profession, yet not ashamed to be an enthusiastic lover of music and musicians, and proud to have them at his house and to admit them to his intimate friendship. Amongst his circle was Anselm Hüttenbrenner, the brother of Schubert’s friend Josef, himself an earnest admirer of Franz, whose last visit to Vienna had been to close the eyes of his old friend Beethoven. The house was open to painters, singers, actors and poets, ‘the scene of constant hospitalities, the headquarters of every remarkable person visiting Graz.’ Such was the family whose one desire was to receive Schubert and Jenger. The journey was an affair of two days and a night, even in the fast coach. They left on Sunday morning, Sept. 2, and reached Graz on Monday night.

The next three weeks were spent in the way which Schubert most enjoyed, excursions and picnics by day through a beautiful country, and at night incessant music; good eating and drinking, clever men and pretty women, no fuss, a little romping, a good piano, a sympathetic audience and no notice taken of him—such were the elements of his enjoyment. The music was made mostly by themselves, Schubert singing, accompanying and playing duets with Jenger, and extemporising endless dance tunes. He does not appear to have composed anything of great moment during the visit. A galop and twelve waltzes, published under the titles of the ‘Grätzer Waltzer’ (op. 91) and the ‘Grätzer

Galoppe’³; three songs (op. 106, 1, 2, 3—the last a particularly fine one) to words by local poets—and the ‘Old Scottish Ballad’ by Herder (op. 165, No. 5), were probably all that he penned during this festive fortnight; unless perhaps some of those exquisite little pieces published in 1828 and 1838 as ‘Impromptus’ and ‘Moments musicaux’ are the result of this time. Two songs, written a couple of years before, ‘Im Walde,’ and ‘Auf der Bruck,’ of the purest Schubert, proved, and justly proved, such favourites that he had them lithographed and published in the place.⁴ The visit is further perpetuated by the titles of the dances just mentioned, and by the dedication to Mme Pachler of op. 106, a collection of four songs, the three already named and the lovely ‘Sylvia.’ Schubert seems to have had this set of songs lithographed without name of place or publisher, shortly after his return, on purpose for his hostess.⁵

The journey home was a triumphal progress, and by the 27th they were back in Vienna. Schubert then wrote the second part of the ‘Winterreise’ (Nos. 13-24), completing that immortal work. The shadows lie much darker on the second than on the first part, and the ‘Wegweiser,’ ‘Das Wirthshaus,’ ‘Die Krähe,’ ‘Die Nebensonnen,’ and ‘Der Leiermann,’ are unsurpassed for melancholy among all the songs. Even in the extraordinary and picturesque energy of ‘Die Post’ there is a deep vein of sadness. Schubert here only followed faithfully, as he always does, the character of the words.

On Oct. 12 he wrote a little four-hand march as a souvenir for Faust Pachler, the son of his host, a trifle interesting only from the circumstances of its composition. In the same month he composed his first PF. trio, in B \flat (op. 99), and in November the second, in E \flat (op. 100). They were both written for Boeckl, Schuppanzigh, and Lincke, and were first heard in public, the one early in January, the other on Mar. 26, 1828. The year was closed with an Italian cantata, dated Dec. 26, ‘alla bella Irene,’ in honour of Frä. Kresewetter (afterwards Mme. Prokesch v. Osten), the daughter of his friend the Hofrath, sponsor to the Gastein symphony (p. 608). It is probably more interesting for its accompaniment for two pianos than for anything else.

The communications with Probst of Leipzig went on. There is a letter from him dated Jan. 15, and he himself paid a visit to Vienna later in the season, and made Schubert’s⁶ personal acquaintance, but the negotiations were not destined to bear fruit till next year.

² They stood originally in B \flat minor and A \flat , but on republication by Diabelli after his death, as op. 93 the keys were changed to G minor and G major.

But a proof that Schubert was making his mark in North Germany is afforded by a letter from Rochlitz, the critic—editor of the Leipzig Allgemeine musikalische Zeitung, and a great personage in the musical world of Saxony—dated Nov. 7, 1827, proposing that Schubert should compose a poem by him, called 'Der erste Ton,' or 'The first Sound,' a poem which Weber had already set without success, and which Beethoven had refused. Rochlitz's letter was probably inspired by the receipt of three of his songs set by Schubert as op. 81, and published on May 27. The proposition, however, came to nothing.

Coincident with these communications from abroad came a gratifying proof of the improvement in his position at home, in his election as a member of the representative body of the Musical Society of Vienna. The date of election is not mentioned: but Schubert's reply, as given by Pohl,¹ is dated Vienna, June 12, 1827, and runs as follows:

'The Managing Committee of the Society of Friends of Music of the Austrian Empire having thought me worthy of election as a Member of the Representative Body of that excellent Society, I beg herewith to state that I feel myself greatly honoured by their choice, and that I undertake the duties of the position with much satisfaction. FRANZ SCHUBERT, Compositeur.'

We have mentioned the more important compositions of 1827. There remain to be named two songs by Schober (op. 96, No. 2); and one by Reil (op. 115, No. 1); a comic trio, 'Die Hochzeitsbraten' (op. 104), also by Schober; and an allegretto in C minor for PF. solo, written for his friend Walcher, 'in remembrance of Apr. 26, 1827,' and not published till 1870.

The publications of 1827 are as follows: the overture to 'Alfonso und Estrella' (op. 69); 'Rondeau brillant,' for PF., and violin (op. 70); songs—'Der Wachtelschlag' (op. 68, Mar. 2), 'Drang in die Ferne' (op. 71, Feb.), 'Auf dem Wasser zu singen' (op. 72, Feb.), 'Die Rose' (op. 73, May 10)—all four songs previously published in the Vienna Zeitschrift für Kunst; four polonaises, for PF. four hands (op. 75); overture to 'Fierabras,' for PF. four hands, arranged by Czerny (op. 76); twelve 'Valse nobles,' for PF. solo (op. 77, Jan.); Fantasie, etc. for PF. in G (op. 78); two songs, 'Das Heimweh,' 'Die Allmacht' (op. 79, 'May 16'); three songs (op. 80, May 25); three ditto (op. 81, May 28); variations on theme of Hérold's (op. 82, Dec.); three Italian songs (op. 83, Sept. 12); four songs (op. 88, Dec. 12).

LAST COMPOSITIONS.—We have now arrived at Schubert's last year, 1828. It would be wrong to suppose that he had any presentiment of his end; though, if a passion for work, an eager use of the 'day,' were any sign that the 'night' was coming 'in which no man could work,' we might also be justified in doing so.

We hear of his suffering from blood to the head, but it was not yet enough to frighten any one. He returned to the extraordinary exertions, or rather to the superabundant productions of his earlier years, as the following full list of the compositions of 1828, in order, as far as the dates permit, will show.

This truly extraordinary list includes his greatest known symphony, his greatest and longest mass, his first oratorio, his finest piece of chamber music, three noble PF. sonatas and some astonishingly fine songs. The autograph of the symphony, 218 pages in oblong quarto, is now one of the treasures of the Library of the Musikverein at Vienna. It has no title or dedication, nothing beyond the customary heading to the first page of the score 'Symfonie März 1828, Frz. Schubert Mpa.' marking the date at which it was begun. If it may be taken as a specimen, he took more pains this year than he did formerly. In the first three movements of this great work there are more afterthoughts than usual. The subject of the introduction and the first subject of the allegro have both been altered. In several passages an extra bar has been stuck in—between the scherzo and the trio, two bars; in the development of the scherzo itself sixteen bars of an exquisite episode—first sketched in the octet—have been substituted. The finale alone remains virtually untouched.² But such alterations, always rare in Schubert, are essentially different from the painful writing and erasing and rewriting, which we are familiar with in the case of Beethoven's finest and most spontaneous music. This, though the first draft, is no rough copy; there are no traces of sketches or preparation; the music has evidently gone straight on to the paper without any intervention, and the alterations are merely a few improvements en passant.³ It is impossible to look at the writing of the autograph, after Schubert has warmed to his work, especially that of the finale, and not see that it was put down as an absolute impromptu, written as fast as the pen could travel on the paper.

³ Die Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, etc., p. 16.

It seems that Schubert's friends used to lecture him a good deal on the diffuseness and want of consideration which they discovered in his works, and were continually forcing Beethoven's laborious processes of composition down his throat. This often made him angry, and when repeated, evening after evening, he would say, 'So you're going to set upon me again to-day! Go it, I beg you!' But, for all his annoyance, the remonstrances appear to have had some effect; and after Beethoven's death he asked Schindler to show him the MS. of 'Fidelio'.¹ He took it to the piano, and pored over it a long time, making out the passages as they had been, and comparing them with what they were; but it would not do; and at last he broke out and exclaimed that for such drudgery he could see no reason under any circumstances; that he thought the music at first just as good as at last; and that for his part he had really no time for such corrections. Whether the amendments to the great symphony were a remorseful attempt on Schubert's part to imitate Beethoven and satisfy the demands of his friends we cannot tell; but if so they are very unlike the pattern.

The autograph of the E \flat Mass, in the Bibliothek at Berlin, does not show at all the same amount of corrections as that in A \flat (see p. 600), nor do the fugal movements appear to have given any special trouble. True, the 'Cum Sancto' was recommenced after the erasure of seven bars,² but apparently merely for the sake of changing the tempo from C to C \flat , and the larger part of the movement was evidently written with great rapidity. In the 'Et vitam' there are barely a dozen corrections, and the 'Osanna' has every mark of extreme haste. Some of the erasures in this work are made with the penknife—surely an almost unique thing with Schubert! The four-hand PF. fugue in E minor (op. 152, dated 'Baden, June 1828') is not improbably a trial of counterpoint with reference to this Mass.

The songs of 1828 are splendid. It does not appear that the fourteen which were published after his death with the publisher's title of 'Schwanengesang'—the Swan's song—were intended by him to form a series of the same kind as the 'Schöne Mullerin' and 'Winterreise'; but no lover of Schubert can dissociate them, and in the 'Liebesbotschaft,' 'Aufenthalt,' 'Ständchen,' etc., we have some of the most beautiful, and in the 'Atlas,' 'Am Meer,' 'Doppelgänger,' etc., some of the most impressive, of his many songs. The words of some are by Relstab, and the origin of these is thus told by Schindler.³ Schubert had been much touched by Schindler's efforts to make Beethoven acquainted with his music, and after the great master's death the two gradually became intimate. Schindler had possession of many of Beethoven's papers, and Schubert used to visit him in familiar style, to look over them. Those which specially attracted him were the poems and dramas sent in at various times for consideration; amongst others a bundle of some twenty anonymous lyrics which Beethoven had intended to set, and which therefore attracted Schubert's particular notice.⁴ He took them away with him, and in two days brought back the 'Liebesbotschaft,' 'Kriegers Ahnung,' and 'Aufenthalt,' set to music. This account, which is perfectly natural and consistent, and which Mr. Thayer allows me to say he sees no reason to question, has been exaggerated into a desire expressed by Beethoven himself that Schubert should set these particular songs; but for this there is no warrant. Ten more quickly followed the three just mentioned; and these thirteen—seven to Relstab's and six to Heine's words (from the *Buch der Lieder*⁵), were, on Nottebohm's authority, written in August. The last is by Seidl; it is dated 'Oct. 1828,' and is probably Schubert's last song.

But it is time to return to the chronicle of his life during its last ten months. Of his doings in January we know little more than can be gathered from the following letter to Anselm Hüttenbrenner, the original of which is in the British Museum (Add. MS. 29,804, f. 24).

'VIENNA, Jan. 18, 1828.

'MY DEAR OLD HÜTTENBRENNER—You will wonder at my writing now? So do I. But if I write it is because I am to get something by it. Now just listen; a drawing-master's place near you at Graz is vacant, and competition is invited. My brother Karl, whom you probably know, wishes to get the place. He is very clever, both as a landscape-painter and a draughtsman. If you could do anything for him in the matter I should be eternally obliged to you. You are a great man in Graz, and probably know some one in authority, or some one else who has a vote. My brother is married, and has a family, and would therefore be very glad to obtain a permanent appointment. I hope that things are all right with you, as well as with your dear family, and your brothers. A Trio of mine, for Piano-forte, Violin, and Violoncello, has been lately performed by Schuppanzigh, and was much liked. It was splendidly executed by Böckel, Schuppanzigh, and Link. Have you done nothing new? Apropos, why doesn't Greiner, or whatever his name is, publish the two songs? What's the reason? Sapperment!

I repeat my request; recollect, what you do for my brother, you do for me. Hoping for a favorable answer, I remain your true friend, till death,

FRANZ SCHUBERT Mpla, of Vienna.'

The expression 'till death,' which appears here for the first time in his letters, and the words 'of Vienna,' added to his name, are both singular.

² See Relstab's Asa in Leben, II. 245.

³ Baron Reichenstein relates—N. H. p. 447 (II. 135)—that he found Heine's 'Buch der Lieder' on Schubert's table some years before this date, and that Schubert lent them to him with the remark, 'that he should not want them again.' But such reminiscences are often wrong in point of date. The fact remains ineffaceable in the mind, and the late essay gets altered. In fact Heine's 'Buch der Lieder' was first published in 1827. The six songs which Schubert took from it are all from the section entitled 'Die Heimkehr.'

² The completion of the words 'Jesu Christe' at the end of the 'Quoniam,' and other omissions, show that he had not conquered the carelessness so frequent in his early Masses as to the treatment of the words.

On the 24th, at an evening concert at the Musikverein, the serenade for contralto solo and female chorus just mentioned was performed, and is spoken of by the correspondent of the Leipzig A.M.Z. as 'one of the most charming works of this favourite writer.' In February we find three letters from North Germany, one from Probst of Leipzig and two from Schott. They show how deep an impression Schubert was making outside Austria. Both firms express warm appreciation of his music, both leave the terms to be named by him, and Schott orders a list of nine important pieces.

On March 26 Schubert gave, what we wonder he never gave before, an evening concert on his own account in the hall of the Musikverein. The following is the programme exactly reprinted from the original:

This programme attracted 'more people than the hall had ever before been known to hold,' and the applause was very great. The net result to Schubert was 800 gulden, Vienna currency, equal to about £32. This put him in funds for the moment, and the money flowed freely. Thus, when, three days later, Paganini gave his first concert in Vienna, Schubert was there, undeterred, in his wealth, by a charge of five gulden. Nay, he went a second time, not that he cared to go again, but that he wished to treat Bauernfeld, who had not five farthings, while with him 'money was as plenty as blackberries.'¹

This month he wrote, or began to write, his last and greatest symphony, in C. He is said to have offered it to the society for performance, and in so doing to have expressed himself to the effect that henceforth he wished to have nothing more to do with songs, as he was now planted firmly in opera and symphony. This rests on the authority of Kreissle²; the silence of Pohl in his history of the society shows that its minute-books contain no express mention of the reception of the work, as they do that of the symphony in October 1826. There is no doubt, however, that it was adopted by the society, and is entered in the Catalogue, under the year 1828, as xiii. 8024.³ But this prodigious work was far beyond the then powers of the chief musical institution of Vienna. The parts were copied and some rehearsals held; but both length and difficulty were against it, and it was soon withdrawn, on Schubert's own advice, in favour of his earlier symphony, No. 6, also in C. Neither the one nor the other was performed till after his death.

March also saw the birth of the interesting oratorio 'Miriam's Song of Victory,' to Grillparzer's words.⁴ It is written, as so many of Schubert's choral pieces are, for a simple pianoforte accompaniment; but this was merely to suit the means at his disposal, and is an instance of his practical sagacity. It is unfortunate, however, since the oratorio has become a favourite, that we have no other orchestral accompaniment than that afterwards adapted by Lachner, which is greatly wanting in character, and in the picturesque elements so native to Schubert.⁵ A song to Rellstab's words, 'Auf dem Strom' (op. 119), for soprano, with obligato horn and PF. accompaniment, written for Lewy, a Dresden horn-player, belongs to this month and was indeed first heard at Schubert's own concert, on

⁵ See Bauernfeld's Letter in the Presse, Apr. 17, 1869. Nachricht. 'chaf.' is Schubert's word the 26th and afterwards repeated at a concert of Lewy's, on April 20, Schubert himself playing the accompaniment each time.

To April no compositions can be ascribed unless it be the quintet in C for strings (op. 163), which bears only the date '1828.' This is now universally accepted not only as Schubert's finest piece of chamber music, but as one of the very finest of its class. The two violoncellos in themselves give it distinction; it has all the poetry and romance of the G major quartet, without the extravagant length which will always stand in the way of that noble production; while the adagio is so solemn and yet so beautiful in its tone, so entrancing in its melodies, and so incessant in its interest, and the trio of the scherzo, both from itself and its place in the movement, is so eminently dramatic, that it is difficult to speak of either too highly.

In May we have a grand battle-piece, the 'Hymn to the Holy Ghost,' for eight male voices, written for the Concert Spirituel of Vienna, at first with PF. In October scored by the composer for a wind band, and in 1847 published as op. 154. Also a 'Characteristic Allegro' for the PF. four hands, virtually the first movement of a sonata—issued some years later with the title 'Lebensstürme' (op. 144); an allegro vivace and allegretto, in E_b minor and major, for PF. solo, published in 1868 as first and second of '3 Clavierstücke'; and a song 'Widerschein.'

In June, probably at the request of the publisher, he wrote a four-hand rondo for PF. in A, since issued as 'Grand Rondeau, op. 107'; and began his sixth Mass, that in E_b. In this month he paid a visit to Baden—Beethoven's Baden—since a fugue for four hands in E minor is marked as written there in 'June 1828.' In the midst of all this work a letter¹ from Mosewius of Breslau, a prominent Prussian musician, full of sympathy and admiration, must have been doubly gratifying as coming from North Germany.

In July he wrote the 92nd Psalm in Hebrew for the synagogue at Vienna, of which Sulzer was precentor. In August, notwithstanding his declaration on completing his last symphony, we find him (under circumstances already described) composing seven songs of Rollstab's, and six of Heine's, afterwards issued as 'Schwanengesang.'

He opened September with a trifle in the shape of a short chorus,² with accompaniment of wind band, for the consecration of a bell in the church of the Alservorstadt. A few days after, the memory of Hummel's visit in the spring of 1827 seems to have come upon him like a lion, and he wrote off three fine PF. solo sonatas, with the view of dedicating them to that master. These pieces, though very unequal and in parts extraordinarily diffuse, are yet highly characteristic of Schubert. They contain some of his finest and most original music, and also his most affecting (e.g. andantino, scherzo and trio of the A minor sonata); and, if full of disappointment and wrath and the gathering gloom of these last few weeks of his life, they are also saturated with that nameless personal charm that is at once so strong and so indescribable. The third of the three, that in B₇, dated Sept. 26, has perhaps more of grace and finish than the other two. The sonatas were not published till a year after Hummel's death, and were then dedicated by Diabelli-Spina to Robert Schumann, who acknowledges the dedication by a genial though hardly adequate article in his Ges. Schriften, ii. 239. The second part of the 'Winterreise' was put into Haslinger's hands for engraving before the end of this month.³

In October, prompted by some occasion which has eluded record, he wrote a new 'Benedictus' to his early Mass in C, a chorus of great beauty and originality in A minor, of which a competent critic⁴ has said that 'its only fault consists in its immeasurable superiority to the rest of the Mass.' To the same period may be assigned a fine offertorium, 'Intende voci orationis mee,' and an extremely beautiful 'Tantum ergo' in E_b, for chorus and orchestra. For some other occasion, which has also vanished, he wrote accompaniments for thirteen wind instruments to his grand 'Hymn to the Holy Ghost'; a long scena or song for soprano—probably his old admirer, Anna Milder—with pianoforte and obbligato clarinet (op. 129); and a song called 'Die Taubenpost' ('The carrier pigeon') to Seidl's words. The succession of these pieces is not known. It is always assumed that the Taubenpost, which now closes the Schwanengesang, was the last. Whichever of them was the last was the last piece he ever wrote.

The negotiations with Probst and Schott, and also with Brüggemann of Halberstadt, a publisher anxious for some easy PF. pieces for a series called 'Mühling's Museum,' by no means fulfilled the promise of their commencement. The magnificent style in which the Schotts desired Schubert to name his own terms⁵ contrasts badly with their ultimate refusal (Oct. 30) to pay more than 30 florins (or about 25s.) for the PF. quintet (op. 114) instead of the modest sixty demanded by him. In fact the sole result was an arrangement with Probst to publish the long and splendid E_b trio, which he did, according to Nottebohm,⁶

⁴ Probst announces two long lists of new music in the A.M.Z. for Oct., but makes no mention of the trio. It is reviewed most favourably in the A.M.Z. for Dec. 10, 1828. Alas! he was thus beyond the reach of praise or blame.

in September, and for which the composer received the incredibly small sum of 21 Vienna florins, or just 17s. 6d. ! Schubert's answer to Probst's inquiry as to the 'Dedication' is so characteristic as to deserve reprinting :

'VIENNA, Aug. 1.

'Euer Wohlgeboren, the opus of the Trio is 100. I entreat you to make the edition correct; I am extremely anxious about it. The work will be dedicated to no one but those who like it. That is the most profitable dedication. With all esteem,

'FRANZ SCHUBERT.'

The home publications of 1828 are not so important as those of former years. The first part of the 'Winterreise' (op. 89) was issued in January by Haslinger; Mar. 14, three songs by Sir W. Scott (opp. 85, 86) by Diabelli; at Easter (Apr. 6) six songs (opp. 92 and 108), and one set of 'Moments musicaux,' by Leidesdorf; in May, two songs (op. 93) by Kienreich¹ of Graz; in June or July ('Sommer'), four songs (op. 96) by Diabelli; Aug. 13, four Refrain-Lieder (op. 95), Weigl. Also the following, to which no month can be fixed: 'Andantino varié and Rondeau brillant' (op. 84), PF. four hands, on French motifs, forming a continuation of op. 63, Weigl; three songs (op. 87), Pennauer; four impromptus (op. 90), and twelve Gratzler Waltzer (op. 91) for PF. solo, Diabelli; Gratzler Galoppe, do. Haslinger; four songs (op. 106) lithographed without publisher's name.

POVERTY.—There is nothing in the events already catalogued to have prevented Schubert's taking an excursion this summer. In either Styria or Upper Austria he would have been welcomed with open arms, and the journey might have given him a stock of health sufficient to carry him on for years. And he appears to have entertained the idea of both.² But the real obstacle, as he constantly repeats, was his poverty.³ 'It's all over with Graz for the present,' he says, with a touch of his old fun, 'for money and weather are both against me.' Franz Lachner, at that time his constant companion, told the writer that he had taken half a dozen of the 'Winterreise' songs to Haslinger and brought back half a dozen gulden—each gulden being then worth a franc. Let the lover of Schubert pause a moment, and think of the 'Post' or the 'Wirthshaus' being sold for tenpence! of that unrivalled imagination and genius producing those deathless strains and being thus rewarded! When this was the case, when even a great work like the E♭ trio, after months and months of negotiation and heavy postage, realises the truly microscopic amount of '20 florins 60 kreutzers' (as with true Prussian businesslike minuteness Probst specifies it), of 17s. 6d. as our modern currency has it—not even Schubert's fluency and rapidity could do more than keep body and soul together. It must have been hard not to apply the words of Müller's 'Leiermann' to his own case—

'Barfuss auf dem Eise
Wankt er hin und her,
Und sein kleiner Teller
Bleibt ihm immer leer.'

In fact so empty was his little tray that he could not even afford the diligence-fare to Pest, where Lachner's 'Bürgschaft' was to be brought out, and where, as Schindler reminds him, he would be safe to have a lucrative concert of his own music, as profitable as that of Mar. 26. Escape from Vienna by that road was impossible for him this year.

LAST RESIDENCE.—Schubert had for some time past been living with Schober at the 'Blaue Igel' (or Blue Hedgehog), still a well-known tavern and resort of musicians in the Tuchlauben; but at the end of August he left and took up his quarters with Ferdinand in a new house in the Neue Wieden suburb, then known as No. 694 Firmian, or Lumpert,⁴ or Neugebauten, Gasse, now (1881) No. 6 Kettenbrücken Gasse; a long house with three rows of nine windows in front; a brown sloping tiled roof; an entry in the middle to a quadrangle behind; a quiet, clean, inoffensive place. Here, on the second floor, to the right hand, lived Schubert for the last five weeks of his life, and his death is commemorated by a stone tablet over the entry, placed there by the Männergesang Verein in Nov. 1869, and containing these words :

'In diesem Hause starb am 19 November 1828 der Tonichter Franz Schubert.'

Ferdinand had removed there, and Franz went there too. He made the move with the concurrence of his doctor, von Rinna, in the hope that as it was nearer the country—it was just over the river in the direction of the Belvedere—Schubert would be able to reach fresh air and exercise more easily than he could from the heart of the city. The old attacks of giddiness and blood to the head had of late been frequent, and soon after taking up his new quarters he became seriously unwell. However, this was so far relieved that at the beginning of October he made a short walking tour with Ferdinand and two other friends to Über-Waltersdorf, and thence to Haydn's old residence and grave at Eisenstadt, some 25 miles from Vienna. It took them three days, and during that time he was very careful as to eating and drinking, regained his old cheerfulness, and was often very gay. Still he was far from well, and after his return the bad symptoms revived, to the great alarm of his friends. At length, on the evening of Oct. 31, while at supper at the Rothen Kreuz in the Himmelstortgrund, an eating-house much frequented by himself and his friends, he took some fish on his plate, but at the first mouthful threw down the knife and fork, and exclaimed that it tasted like poison. From that moment hardly anything but medicine passed his lips; but he still walked a good deal. About this time Lachner returned from Pest in all the glory of the success of his opera; and though only in Vienna for a few days, he called on his friend, and they had two hours' conversation. Schubert was full of plans for the future, especially for the completion of 'Graf von Gleichen,' which, as already mentioned, he had sketched in the summer of 1827. He discussed it also with Bauernfeld during the next few days, and spoke of the brilliant style in which he intended to score it. About this time Carl Holz, Beethoven's old friend, at Schubert's urgent request, took him to hear the great master's C₆ minor quartet, still a novelty in Vienna. It agitated him extremely. 'He got (says Holz) into such a state of excitement and enthusiasm that we were all afraid for him.'¹ On Nov. 3, the morrow of All Souls' day, he walked early in the morning to Hernals—then a village, now a thickly built suburb outside the Gurtelstrasse—to hear his brother's Latin Requiem in the church there. He thought it simple, and at the same time effective, and on the whole was much pleased with it. After the service he walked for three hours, and on reaching home complained of great weariness.

ILLNESS AND DEATH.—Shortly before this time the scores of Handel's oratorios had come into his hands—not impossibly some of the set of Arnold's edition given to Beethoven before his death, and sold in his sale for 102 florins; and the study of them had brought home to him his deficiencies in the department of counterpoint. 'I see now,' said he² to the Frohlichs, 'how much I have still to learn; but I am going to work hard with Sechter, and make up for lost time'—Sechter being the recognised authority of the day on counterpoint. So much was he bent on this that on the day after his walk to Hernals, i.e. on Nov. 4, notwithstanding his weakness, he went into Vienna and, with another musician named Lanz, called on Sechter to consult him on the matter, and they actually decided on Marburg as the textbook and on the number and dates of the lessons.³ But he never began the course. During the next few days he grew weaker and weaker; and when the doctor was called in it was too late. About the 11th he wrote a note⁴ to Schober—doubtless his last letter.

'DEAR SCHOBOR,

'I am ill. I have eaten and drunk nothing for eleven days, and am so tired and shaky that I can only get from the bed to the chair, and back. Rinna is attending me. If I taste anything, I bring it up again directly.

'In this distressing condition, be so kind as to help me to some reading. Of Cooper's I have read The Last of the Mohicans, The Spy, The Pilot and The Pioneers. If you have anything else of his, I entreat you to leave it with Frau von Bogner at the Coffee house. My brother, who is conscientiousness itself, will bring it to me in the most conscientious way. Or anything else. Your friend, SCHUBERT.'

What answer Schober made to this appeal is not known. He is said to have had a daily report of Schubert's condition from the doctor, but there is no mention of his having called. Spaun, Randhartinger,⁵ Bauernfeld and Josef Huttenbrenner are all said to have visited him; but in those days there was great dread of infection, his new residence was out of the way, and dangerous illness was such a novelty with Schubert that his friends may be excused for not thinking the case so grave as it was. After a few days Rinna himself fell ill, and his place was filled by a staff-surgeon named Behring.

On the 14th Schubert took to his bed.⁶ He was able to sit up a little for a few days longer, and thus to correct the proofs of the second part of the 'Winterreise,' probably the last occupation of those inspired and busy fingers. He appears to have had no pain, only increasing weakness, want of sleep and great depression. Poor fellow! no wonder he was depressed! everything was against him, his weakness, his poverty, the dreary house, the long lonely hours, the cheerless future—all concentrated and embodied in the hopeless images of Müller's poems, and the sad gloomy strains in which he has clothed them for ever and ever—the 'Letzte Hoffnung,' the 'Krähe,' the 'Wegweiser,' the 'Wirthshaus,' the 'Nebensonnen,' the 'Leiermann'—all breathing of solitude, broken hopes, illusions, strange omens, poverty, death, the grave! As he went through the pages, they must have seemed like pictures of his own life; and such passages as the following from the 'Wegweiser' (or Signpost), can hardly have failed to strike the dying man as aimed at himself:

'Einen Weiser seh' ich stehen, Unverrückt vor meinem Blick,
Eine Strasse muss ich gehen,
Die noch keiner ging zurück.'

Alas! he was indeed going the road which no one e'er retraces! On Sunday the 16th the doctors had a consultation; they predicted a nervous fever, but had still hopes of their patient. On the afternoon of Monday, Bauernfeld saw him for the last time. He was in very bad spirits, and complained of great weakness and of heat in his head, but his mind was still clear and there was no sign of wandering; he spoke of his earnest wish for a good opera-book. Later in the day, however, when the doctor arrived, he was quite delirious, and typhus had unmistakably broken out. The next day, Tuesday, he was very restless throughout, trying continually to get out of bed, and constantly fancying himself in a strange room. That evening he called Ferdinand on to the bed, made him put his ear close to his mouth, and whispered mysteriously, 'What are they doing with me?' 'Dear Franz,' was the reply, 'they are doing all they can to get you well again, and the doctor assures us you will soon be right, only you must do your best to stay in bed.' He returned to the idea in his wandering—'I implore you to put me in my own room, and not to leave me in this corner under the earth; don't I deserve a place above ground?' 'Dear Franz,' said the agonised brother, 'be calm; trust your brother Ferdinand, whom you have always trusted, and who loves you so dearly. You are in the room which you always had, and lying on your own bed.' 'No,' said the dying man, 'that's not true; Beethoven is not here.' So strongly had the great composer taken possession of him! An hour or two later the doctor came, and spoke to him in the same style. Schubert looked him full in the face and made no answer: but turning round clutched at the wall with his poor tired hands, and said in a slow earnest voice, 'Here, here, is my end.' At three in the afternoon of Wednesday, Nov. 19, 1828, he breathed his last, and his simple earnest soul took its flight from the world. He was thirty-one years, nine months and nineteen days old. There never has been one like him, and there never will be another.

His death, and the letters of the elder Franz and of Ferdinand, bring out the family relations in a very pleasant light. The poor pious bereaved father, still at his drudgery as 'school teacher in the Rossau,' afflicted, yet strengthened by faith in God and the Blessed Sacraments, writing to announce the loss of his 'beloved son, Franz Schubert, musician and composer'; the good innocent Ferdinand, evidently recognised as Franz's peculiar property, clinging to his brother as the one great man he had ever known; thinking only of him, and of fulfilling his last wish to lie near Beethoven—these form a pair of interesting figures. Neither Ignaz nor Carl appear at all in connection with the event, the father and Ferdinand alone are visible.

The funeral took place on Friday Nov. 21. It was bad weather, but a number of friends and sympathisers assembled. He lay in his coffin, dressed, as the custom then was, like a hermit, with a crown of laurel round his brows. The face was calm, and looked more like sleep than death. By desire of the family Schober was chief mourner. The coffin left the house at half-past two, and was borne by a group of young men, students and others, in red cloaks and flowers, to the little church of S. Joseph in Margarethen, where the funeral service was said, and a motet by Gänsbacher, and a hymn of Schober's, 'Der Friede sey mit dir, du engelreine Seele'—written that morning in substitution for his own earlier words, to the music of Schubert's 'Pax vobiscum'—were sung over the coffin. It was then taken to the Ortsfriedhof in the village of Währing, and committed to the ground, three places higher up than the grave of Beethoven.¹ In ordinary course he would have been buried in the cemetery at Matzleinsdorf, but the appeal which he made almost with his dying breath was naturally a law to the tender heart of Ferdinand, and through his piety and self-denial his dear brother rested if not next, yet near, to the great musician whom he so deeply revered and admired. Late in the afternoon Wilhelm von Chezy, son of the authoress of 'Euryanthe' and 'Rosamunde,' who though not in Schubert's intimate circle was yet one of his acquaintances, by some accident remembered that he had not seen him for many months, and he walked down to Bogner's coffee-house, where the composer was usually to be found between five and seven, smoking his pipe and joking with his friends, and where the Cooper's novels mentioned in his note to Schober were not improbably still waiting for him. He found the little room almost empty, and the familiar round table deserted. On entering he was accosted by the waiter—'Your honour is soon back from the funeral!' 'Whose funeral?' said Chezy in astonishment. 'Franz Schubert's,' replied the waiter, 'he died two days ago, and is buried this afternoon.'²

He left no will. The official inventory³ of his possessions at the time of his death, in which he is described as 'Tonkünstler und Compositeur'—musician and composer—is as follows:

'Three dress coats, 3 walking coats, 10 pairs of trousers, 9 waistcoats—together worth 37 florins; 1 hat, 5 pairs of shoes and 2 of boots—valued at 2 florins; 4 shirts, 9 cravats and pocket handkerchiefs, 13 pairs of socks, 1 towel, 1 sheet, 2 bedcases—6 florins; 1 mattress, 1 bolster, 1 quilt—6 florins; a quantity of old music valued at 10 florins—63 florins (say £2: 10s.) in all. Beyond the above there were no effects.'

Is it possible, then, that in the 'old music, valued at 8s. 6d.,' are included the whole of his unpublished manuscripts? Where else could they be but in the house he was inhabiting?

The expenses of the illness and funeral amounted in all to 269 silver florins, 19 kr. (say £27). Of this the preliminary service cost 84 fl. 35 kr.; the burial 44 fl. 45 kr.; and the ground 70 fl.; leaving the rest for the doctor's fees and incidental disbursements. Illness and

On Nov. 27, the Kirchenmusikverein performed Mozart's Requiem in his honour; and on Dec. 23 a Requiem by Anselm Hüttenbrenner was given in the Augustine church. On Dec. 14, his early symphony in C, No. 6, was played at the Gesellschaftskonzert, and again on March 12, 1829. At Linz on Christmas Day there was a funeral ceremony with speeches and music. Articles in his honour appeared in the Wiener Zeitschrift of Dec. 25 (by von Zedlitz), in the Theaterzeitung of Vienna of the 20th and 27th (by Blahetka); in the Vienna Zeitschrift für Kunst of June 9, 11, 13, 1829 (by Bauernfeld); in the Vienna Archiv für Geschichte by Mayrhofer; and memorial poems were published by Seidl, Schober, and others. On Jan. 30, 1829, a concert was given by the arrangement of Anna Fröhlich in the hall of the Musikverein; the programme included 'Miriam,' and consisted entirely of Schubert's music, excepting a set of flute variations by Gabrielsky, and the first finale in 'Don Juan'; and the crowd was so great that the performance had to be repeated shortly afterwards. The proceeds of these concerts and the subscriptions of a few friends sufficed to erect the monument which now stands at the back of the grave. It was carried out by Anna Fröhlich, Grillparzer and Jenger. The bust was by Franz Daller, and the cost of the whole was 360 silver florins, 46 kr. The inscription¹ is from the pen of Grillparzer:

The allusion to fairer hopes has been much criticised, but surely without reason. When we remember in how many departments of music Schubert's latest productions were his best, we are undoubtedly warranted in believing that he would have gone on progressing for many years, had it been the will of God to spare him.

In 1863, owing to the state of dilapidation at which the graves of both Beethoven and Schubert had arrived, the repair of the tombs, and the exhumation and reburial of both, were undertaken by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. The operation was begun on the 12th of October and completed on the 13th. The opportunity was embraced of taking a cast and a photograph of Schubert's skull, and of measuring the principal bones of both skeletons.

² MUSIC HAS HERE ENTOMBED A RICH TREASURE,

BUT MUCH FAIRER HOPE.

FRANZ SCHUBERT LIES HERE.

BORN JAN. 31, 1797.

DIED NOV. 19, 1828.

31 YEARS OLD.

The lengths in Schubert's case were to those in Beethoven's as 27 to 29,³ which implies that as Beethoven was 5 ft. 5 in. high, he was only 5 ft. and $\frac{1}{2}$ an inch. Schubert was reburied in the central cemetery of Vienna on Sept. 23, 1888.

Various memorials have been set up to him in Vienna. The tablets on the houses in which he was born and died have been noticed. They were both carried out by the Mannergesang Verein, and completed, the former Oct. 7, 1858, the latter in Nov. 1869. The same Society erected by subscription a monument to him in the Stadt-Park, a sitting figure in Carrara marble by Carl Kuntmann, with the inscription 'Franz Schubert, seinem Andenken der Wiener Männergesangverein, 1872.' It cost 42,000 florins, and was unveiled May 15, 1872.

POSTHUMOUS PUBLICATIONS.—Outside of Austria his death created at first but little sensation. Robert Schumann, then 18, is said to have been deeply affected, and to have burst into tears when the news reached him at Leipzig; Mendelssohn too, though unlike Schubert in temperament, circumstances and education, doubtless fully estimated his loss; and Rellstab, Anna Milder and others in Berlin who knew him, must have mourned him deeply; but the world at large did not yet know enough of his works to understand either what it possessed or what it had lost in that modest reserved young musician of thirty-one. But death always brings a man, especially a young man, into notoriety, and increases public curiosity about his works: and so it was now; the stream of publication at once began and is even yet flowing,⁴ neither the supply of works nor the eagerness to obtain them having ceased. The world has not yet recovered from its astonishment as, one after another, the stores accumulated in those dusky heaps of music paper (valued at 8s. 6d.) were made public, each so astonishingly fresh, copious and different from the last. As songs, masses, part-songs, operas, chamber-music of all sorts and all dimensions—pianoforte-sonatas, impromptus and fantasias, duets, trios, quartets, quintet, octet, issued from the press or were heard in manuscript; as each season brought its new symphony, overture, entr'acte, or ballet-music, people began to be staggered by the amount.

A deep shade of suspicion is beginning to be cast over the authenticity of posthumous compositions. All Paris has been in a state of amazement at the posthumous diligence of the song-writer, F. Schubert who, while one would think that his ashes repose in peace in Vienna, is still making eternal new songs.⁵

We know better now, but it must be confessed that the doubt was not so unnatural then.

Of the MS. music—an incredible quantity, of which no one then knew the amount or the particulars, partly because there was so much of it, partly because Schubert concealed, or rather forgot, a great deal of his work—a certain number of songs and pianoforte pieces were probably in the hands of publishers at the time of his death, but the great bulk was in the possession of Ferdinand, as his heir. A set of four songs (op. 105) was issued on the day of his funeral. Other songs—opp. 101, 104, 106, 110-112, 116-118; and two PF. duets, the fantasia in F minor (op. 103) and the 'Grand Rondeau' (op. 107)—followed up to April 1829. But the first important publication was the well-known 'Schwanengesang,' so entitled by Haslinger—a collection of fourteen songs, seven by Rellstab, six by Heine, and one by Seidl— unquestionably Schubert's last. They were issued in May 1829, and, to judge by the lists of arrangements and editions given by Nottebohm, have been as much appreciated as the 'Schöne Müllerin' or the 'Winterreise.' A stream of songs followed—for which we must refer the student to Nottebohm's catalogue.

The early part of 1830¹ saw the execution of a bargain between Diabelli and Ferdinand, by which that firm was guaranteed the property of the following works: opp. 1-32, 35, 39-59, 62, 63, 64, 66-69, 71-77, 84-88, 92-99, 101-104, 106, 108, 109, 113, 115, 116, 119, 121-124, 127, 128, 130, 132-140, 142-153; also 154 songs; 14 vocal quartets; the canons of 1813; a cantata in C for three voices; the 'Hymn to the Holy Ghost'; Klopstock's 'Stabat Mater' in F minor, and 'Grosses Halleluja'; Magnificat in C; the string quintet in C; four string quartets in C, B \flat , G, B \flat ; a string trio in B \flat ; two sonatas in A and A minor, variations in F, an adagio in D \flat , and allegretto in C \sharp —all for PF. solo; sonata for PF. and Arpeggione; sonata in A, and fantasia in C—both for PF. and violin; rondo in A for violin and quartet; adagio and rondo in F for PF. and quartet; a concert-piece in D for violin and orchestra; overture in D for orchestra; overture to third act of the 'Zauberharfe'; 'Lazarus'; 'Tantum ergo' in E \flat for four voices and orchestra; an offertorium in B \flat for tenor solo, chorus and orchestra.

Another large portion of Ferdinand's possessions came, sooner or later, into the hands of Dr. Eduard Schneider, son of Franz's sister Theresia. They comprised the autographs of symphonies 1, 2, 3 and 6, and copies of 4 and 5; Autographs of operas: The 'Teufels Lustschloss,' 'Fernando,' 'Der vierjährige Posten,' 'Die Freunde von Salamanka,' 'Die Bürgschaft,' 'Fierrabras,' and 'Sakontala'; the Mass in F:

and the original orchestral parts of the whole of the music to 'Rosamunde.'²

On July 10, 1830, Diabelli began the issue of what was entitled 'Franz Schuberts nachgelassene musikalische Dichtungen'; and continued it at intervals till 1850, by which time 50 Parts (Lieferungen), containing 137 songs, had appeared. In 1830 he also issued the two astonishing 4-hand marches (op. 121); and a set of 20 waltzes (op. 127); whilst other houses published the PF. sonatas in A and E \flat (opp. 120, 122); the two string quartets of the year 1824 (op. 125); the D minor quartet, etc. For the progress of the publication after this date we must again refer the reader to Nottebohm's invaluable Thematic Catalogue (Vienna, Schreiber, 1874), which contains every detail, and may be implicitly relied on; merely mentioning the principal works, and the year of publication: 'Miriam,' Mass in B \flat , three last sonatas and the Grand Duo, 1838; symphony in C, 1840; fantasia in C, PF. and violin, 1850; quartet in G, 1852; quintet in C, and octet, 1854; 'Gesang der Geister,' 1858; 'Verschworenen,' 1862; Mass in E \flat , 1865; 'Lazarus,' 1866; symphony in B minor, 1867; Mass in A \flat , 1875.

There were many other publications of songs, pianoforte pieces, etc., for which the reader is referred to Nottebohm's Thematic Catalogue. Of the songs two collections may be signalled as founded on the order of opus numbers: that of Senff of Leipzig, edited by Julius Reitz, 361 songs in 20 vols. and that of Litloff of Brunswick—songs in 10 vols. But neither of these, though styled 'complete' are so. For instance, each omits opp. 83, 110, 129, 165, 172, 173; the six songs published by Müller, the forty by Gotthard; and Litloff also omits opp. 21, 60. A complete edition of Schubert's works was announced by Breitkopf & Hartel on 'Schubert's death-day 1884.' It appeared between 1885 and 1897. For its classification see p. 636.

SCHUMANN'S PROPAGANDA. — Schumann's visit to Vienna in the late autumn of 1838 formed an epoch in the history of the Schubert music. He saw the immense heap of MSS. which remained in Ferdinand's hands even after the mass bought by Diabelli had been taken away, and amongst them several symphonies. Such sympathy and enthusiasm as his must have been a rare delight to the poor desponding brother. His eagle eye soon discovered the worth of these treasures. He picked out several works to be recommended to publishers, but meantime one beyond all the rest riveted his attention—the great symphony of March 1828 (was it the autograph, not yet deposited in the safekeeping of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreund, or a copy?) and he arranged with Ferdinand to send a transcript of it to Leipzig to Mendelssohn for the Gewandhaus Concerts, where it was produced Mar. 21, 1839,¹ and repeated no less than three times during the following season. His chamber-music was becoming gradually known in the North, and as early as 1833 is occasionally met with in the Berlin and Leipzig programmes. David, who led the taste in chamber music in the latter place, was devoted to Schubert. He gradually introduced his works, until there were few seasons in which the quartets in A minor, D minor (the score of which he edited for Senff), and G, the string quintet in C (a special favourite), the octet, both trios, the PF. quintet and the 'Rondeau brillant,' were not performed amid great applause at his concerts. Schumann had long been a zealous Schubert propagandist. From an early date his Zeitschrift contains articles of more or less length, always inspired by an ardent admiration; Schubert's letters and poems and his brother's excellent short sketch of his life, printed in vol. x. (Apr. 23 to May 3, 1839)—obvious fruits of Schumann's Vienna visit—are indispensable materials for Schubert's biography; when the symphony was performed he dedicated to it one of his longest and most genial effusions,² and each fresh piece was greeted with a hearty welcome as it fell from the press. One of Schumann's special favourites was the E♭ trio; he liked it even better than that in B♭, and has left a memorandum of his fondness in the opening of the adagio of his symphony in C, which is identical, in key and intervals, with that of Schubert's andante. The enthusiasm of these prominent musicians, the repeated performances of the symphony and its publication by Breitkopf (in Jan. 1850), naturally gave Schubert a strong hold on Leipzig, at that time the most active musical centre of Europe; and after the foundation of the Conservatorium in 1843 many English and American students must have carried back the love of his romantic and tuneful music to their own countries.

SPREAD OF SCHUBERT'S MUSIC.—Several performances of large works had taken place in Vienna since Schubert's death, chiefly through the exertions of Ferdinand and of a certain Leitmayr, one of Franz's early friends; such as the E♭ Mass at the parish church of Maria Trost on Nov. 15, 1829; 'Miriam,' with Lachner's orchestration, at a Gesellschaft concert in 1830; two new overtures in 1833; an overture in E, the chorus of spirits from 'Rosamunde,' the 'Grosses Halleluja,' etc., early in 1835, and four large concerted pieces from 'Fierrabras' later in the year; an overture in D; the finale of the last symphony; a march and chorus, and an air and chorus, from 'Fierrabras,' in April 1836; another new overture, and several new compositions from the 'Remains,' in the winter of 1837-38. As far as can be judged by the silence of the Vienna newspapers, these passed almost unnoticed. Even the competition with North Germany failed to produce the effect which might have been expected. It did indeed excite the Viennese to one effort. On the 15th of the December following the production of the symphony at Leipzig its performance was attempted at Vienna, but though the whole work was announced,³ such had been the difficulties at rehearsal that the first two movements alone were given, and they were only carried off by the interpolation of an air from 'Lucia' between them.

But symphonies and symphonic works can hardly be expected to float rapidly; songs are more buoyant, and Schubert's songs soon began to make their way outside, as they had long since done in his native place. Wherever they once penetrated their success was certain. In Paris, where spirit, melody and romance are the certain criterions of success, and where nothing dull or obscure is tolerated, they were introduced by Nourrit, and were so much liked as actually to find a transient place in the programmes of the concerts of the Conservatoire, the stronghold of musical torism.⁴ The first French collection was published in 1834, by Richault, with translation by Bélanger. It contained six songs—'Die Post,' 'Ständchen,' 'Am Meer,' 'Das Fischermädchen,' 'Der Tod und das Mädchen,' and 'Schlummerlied.' The 'Erl King' and others followed. A larger collection, with translation by Emil Deschamps, was issued by Brandus in 1838 or 1839. It is entitled 'Collection des Lieder de Franz Schubert,' and contains sixteen—'La jeune religieuse,' 'Marguerite,' 'Le roi des aulnes,' 'La rose,' 'La sérénade,' 'La poste,' 'Ave Maria,' 'La cloche des agonisants,' 'La jeune fille et la morte,' 'Rosemonde,' 'Les plaintes de la jeune fille,' 'Adieu,' 'Les astres,' 'La jeune mère,' 'La Berceuse,' 'Éloge des larmes.'⁵ Except that one—'Adieu'⁶—is spurious, the selection does great credit to Parisian taste. This led the way to the 'Quarante mélodies de Schubert' of Richault, Launer, etc., a thin 8vo volume, to which many an English amateur is indebted for his first acquaintance with these treasures of life. By 1845 Richault had published as many as 150 with French words.

² 'La jeune religieuse' and 'Le roi des aulnes' were sung by Nourrit, at the concerts of Jan. 18 and Apr. 26, 1835, respectively—the latter with orchestral accompaniment. On Mar. 20, 1836 'Marguerite' was sung by Mlle Falcon, and there the list stops.

³ This list is copied from the Paris correspondence of the A.M.S. 1839, p. 594.

² See Schriften, III. 195. Schumann's expressions leave no doubt that the symphony in C was in Ferdinand's possession at the time of his visit. This and many others of his articles on Schubert have been translated into English by Miss M. E. von Glehn and Mrs. Ritter.

Some of the chamber music also soon obtained a certain popularity in Paris, through the playing of Tilmant, Urban and Alkan, and later of Alard and Franchomme. The trio in B \flat , issued by Richault in 1838, was the first instrumental work of Schubert's published in France. There is a 'Collection complète' of the solo PF. works published by Richault in 8vo, containing the Fantasia (op. 15), ten sonatas, the two Russian marches, Impromptus, Moments musicaux, five single pieces, and nine sets of dances. Liszt and Heller kept the flame alive by their transcriptions of the songs and waltzes. Habeneck attempted to rehearse the symphony in C in 1842, but the band refused to go beyond the first movement, and Schubert's name up to this date (1881) appears in the programmes of the concerts of the Conservatoire attached to three songs only. Pásdeloup introduced the symphony in C and the fragments of that in B minor.

Liszt's devotion to Schubert was great and unceasing. We have already mentioned his production of 'Alfonso und Estrella' at Weimar in 1854, but it is right to give a list of his transcriptions, which have done a very great deal to introduce Schubert into many quarters where his compositions would otherwise have been a sealed book. His first transcription—'Die Rose,' op. 73—was made in 1834, and appeared in Paris the same year.¹ It was followed in 1838 by the 'Ständchen,' 'Post,' and 'Lob der Thränen,' and in 1839 by the 'Erl King' and by twelve Lieder. These again by six Lieder; four 'Geistliche Lieder'; six of the 'Müllerlieder'; the 'Schwanengesang,' and the 'Winterreise.' Liszt also transcribed the 'Divertissement à la hongroise,' three marches and nine 'Valse-caprices,' or 'Soirées de Vienne,' after Schubert's op. 67. All the above are for PF. solo. He also scored the accompaniment to the 'Junge Nonne,' 'Gretchen am Spinnrade,' 'So lasst mich scheinen' and the 'Erl King,' for a small orchestra; adapted the 'Allmacht' for tenor solo, male chorus and orchestra, and converted the fantasia in C (op. 15) into a concerto for PF. and orchestra. Some will think these changes indefensible, but there is no doubt that they are done in a masterly manner, and that many of them have become very popular. Heller's arrangements are confined to six favouritesongs.

ENGLISH PUBLICATIONS AND PERFORMANCES.

—England made an appearance in the field with the 'Moment musical' in F minor in 1831, followed in 1832 by the 'Erl King' and the 'Wanderer.' In 1836 Mr. Ayrton printed 'The Letter of Flowers' and 'The Secret,' in the Musical Library, to Oxenford's translation. Mr. Wessel (Ashdown & Parry) had begun his 'Series of German Songs' earlier than this, and by 1840, out of a total of 197, the list included 38 of Schubert's, remarkably well chosen, and including several of the finest though less known ones, e.g. 'Ganymed,' 'An den Tod,' 'Sei mir gegrüßet,' 'Die Rose,' etc. etc. Ewer's 'Gems of German Song,' containing many of Schubert's, were begun in Sept. 1837. Schubert's music took a long time before it obtained any public footing in this country. The first time it appears in the Philharmonic programmes—then so ready to welcome novelties—is on May 20, 1839, when Ivanoff sang the Serenade in the 'Schwanengesang' to Italian words, 'Quando avvolta.' Staudigl gave the 'Wanderer,' May 8, 1843. On June 10, 1844, the overture to 'Fierrabras' was played under Mendelssohn's direction, and on June 17 the 'Junge Nonne' was sung to French words by M. de Reval, Mendelssohn playing the magnificent accompaniment. We blush to say, however, that neither piece met with approval.² Mendelssohn conducted the last five Philharmonic concerts of that season (1844), and amongst other orchestral music now to England had brought with him Schubert's symphony in C and his own overture to 'Ruy Blas.' At the rehearsal on June 10, however, the behaviour of the band towards the symphony—excited, it is said, by the continual triplets in the finale—was so insulting that he refused either to go on with it or to allow his own overture to be tried. But the misbehaviour of our leading orchestra did not produce the effect which it had done in Paris; others were found to take up the treasures thus rudely rejected, and Schubert has had an ample revenge.

The centres for his music in England have been—for the orchestral and choral works, the Crystal Palace, Sydenham and Hallé's Concerts, Manchester; and for the chamber music, the Popular Concerts and Hallé's Recitals. At the Crystal Palace the symphony in C was in the repertory of the Saturday Concerts from Apr. 5, 1856; the two movements of the B minor symphony were first played Apr. 6, 1867, and constantly repeated. The six other MS. symphonies were obtained from Dr. Schneider in 1867 and since, and have been played at various dates, a performance of the whole eight in chronological order forming a feature in the series of 1880-81. The 'Rosa-munde' music was first played Nov. 10, 1866, and the 'air de ballet' in G, Mar. 16, 1867. Joachim's orchestration of the Grand Duo (op. 140) was given Mar. 4, 1876. The overtures to 'Alfonso und Estrella,' 'Fierrabras,' 'Freunde von Salamanka,' 'Teufels Lustschloss,' and that 'in the Italian style' have been frequently heard. 'Miriam's Song' was first given Nov. 14, 1868 (and three times since); the 'Conspirators,' Mar. 2, 1872; the 23rd Psalm, Feb. 21, 1874; the E \flat Mass, Mar. 29,

1879.¹ At the Popular Concerts a beginning was made May 16, 1859, with the A minor quartet, the D major sonata and the 'Rondeau brillant.' Afterwards the D major and G major quartets, many sonatas and other PF. pieces were added, and the octet, the quintet in C and the two trios were repeated season by season, and enthusiastically received. The quartet in B \flat , the trio in the same key, the sonata for PF. and arpeggione, etc., were brought to a hearing. A large number of songs were made familiar to the subscribers to these concerts through the fine interpretation of Stockhausen, Mme. Joachim, Miss Sophie Löwe, Santley, Henschel and other singers. At Hallé's admirable recitals at St. James's Hall, from their commencement in 1861 all the published sonatas were repeatedly played; not only the popular ones, but of those less known none were given less than twice; the fantasia in C, op. 15, three times; the PF. quintet, the fantasia for PF. and violin, the impromptus and Moments musicaux, the '5 pieces,' the '3 pieces,' the adagio and rondo, the valse nobles, and other numbers of this fascinating music were heard again and again.

The other principal publications in England are the vocal scores of the six masses, the PF. accompaniment arranged from the full score by Ebenezer Prout, published by Augener—the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th in 1871, the 6th (E \flat) in 1872, and the 5th (A \flat) in 1875.² The masses have been also published by Novello, both with Latin and English words ('Communion Service'); and the same firm published 'Miriam,' in two forms, and the 'Rosamunde' music, both vocal score and orchestral parts. Augener also published editions of the PF. works, and of a large number of songs, by Pauer.

PORTRAITS.—Schubert was not sufficiently important during his lifetime to attract the attention of painters, and although he had more than one artist in his circle there are but three portraits of him known. 1. A poor stiff head by Leopold Kupelwieser, full face, taken July 10, 1821, photographed by Mietke and Wawra of Vienna, and wretchedly engraved as the frontispiece to Kreissle's biography. 2. A very characteristic half-length, three-quarter-face, in water-colours, by W. A. Rieder, taken in 1825, in possession of Dr. Granitsch of Vienna.³ A replica by the artist, dated 1840, is now in the Musikverein. It has been engraved by Passini, and we here give the head, from a photograph expressly taken from the original (PLATE LXXI.). 3. The bust on the tomb, which gives a very prosaic version of his features.

² Reviewed by E. Prout in Concordia for 1875, pp. 8, 29, 109, etc.

PERSONALIA.—His exterior by no means answered to his genius. His general appearance was insignificant. As we have already said, he was probably not more than 5 feet and 1 inch high, his figure was stout and clumsy, with a round back and shoulders (perhaps due to incessant writing) fleshy arms and thick short fingers. His complexion was pasty, nay even tallowy; his cheeks were full, his eyebrows bushy and his nose insignificant. But there were two things that to a great extent redeemed these insignificant traits—his hair, which was black,⁴ and remarkably thick and vigorous,⁵ as if rooted in the brain within; and his eyes, which were truly 'the windows of his soul,' and even through the spectacles he constantly wore were so bright as at once to attract attention.⁶ If Rieder's portrait may be trusted—and it is said to be very faithful, though perhaps a little too fine—they had a peculiarly steadfast penetrating look, which irresistibly reminds one of the firm rhythm of his music. His glasses are inseparable from his face. One of our earliest glimpses of him is 'a little boy in spectacles' at the Concist; he habitually slept in them; and within eighteen months of his death we see him standing in the window at Döbling, his glasses pushed up over his forehead, and Grillparzer's verses held close to his searching eyes. He had the broad strong jaw of all great men, and a marked assertive prominence of the lips. He had a beautiful set of teeth (Benedict). When at rest the expression of his face was uninteresting, but it brightened up at the mention of music, especially that of Beethoven. His voice was something between a soft tenor and a baritone. He sang 'like a composer,' without the least affectation or attempt.⁷

A CHARACTER STUDY.—His general disposition was in accordance with his countenance. His sensibility, though his music shows it was extreme, was not roused by the small things of life. He had little of that jealous susceptibility which too often distinguishes musicians, more irritable even than the 'irritable race of poets.' His attitude towards Rossini and Weber proves this. When a post which he much coveted was given to another,⁸ he expressed his satisfaction at its being bestowed on so competent a man. Transparent truthfulness, good-humour, a cheerful contented evenness, fondness for a joke and a desire to remain in the background—such were his prominent characteristics in ordinary life. But we have seen how this apparently impassive man could be moved by a poem which appealed to him, or by such music as Beethoven's C# minor quartet.¹ This unflinching good-nature, this sweet loveliness, doubtless enhanced by his reserve, was what attached Schubert to his friends. They admired him; but they loved him still more. Ferdinand perfectly adored him, and even the derisive Ignaz melts when he takes leave.² Hardly a letter from Schwind, Schober, or Bauernfeld, that does not amply testify to this. Their only complaint is that he will not return their passion, that 'the affection of years is not enough to overcome his distrust and fear of seeing himself appreciated and beloved.'³ Even strangers who met him in this entourage were as much captivated as his friends. J. A. Berg of Stockholm, who was in Vienna in 1827, as a young man of twenty-four, and met him at the Bogners', speaks of him⁴ with the clinging affection which such personal charm inspires.

He was never really at his ease except among his chosen associates. When with them he was genial and compliant. At the dances of his friends he would extemporise the most lovely waltzes for hours together, or accompany song after song. He was even boisterous—playing the 'Mrl King' on a comb, fencing, howling and making many practical jokes. But in good society he was shy and silent, his face grave; a word of praise distressed him, he would repel the admiration when it came, and escape into the next room, or out of the house, at the first possible moment. In consequence he was overlooked, and of his important friends few knew, or showed that they knew, what a treasure they had within their reach. A great player like Bocklet, after performing the Bb trio, could kneel to kiss the composer's hand in rapture, and with broken voice stammer forth his homage, but there is no trace of such tribute from the upper classes. What a contrast to Beethoven's position among his aristocratic friends—their devotion and patience, his contemptuous behaviour, the amount of pressing necessary to make him play, his scorn of emotion and love of applause after he had finished! (See Vol. I. p. 265.) The same contrast is visible in the dedications of the music of the two—Beethoven's chiefly to crowned heads and nobility, Schubert's in large proportion to his friends. It is also evident in the music itself, as we shall endeavour presently to bring out.

He played, as he sang, 'like a composer,' that is, with less of technique than of knowledge and expression. Of the virtuoso he had absolutely nothing. He improvised in the intervals of throwing on his clothes, or at other times when the music within was too strong to be resisted, but as an exhibition or performance never, and there is no record of his playing any music but his own. He occasionally accompanied his songs at concerts (always keeping very strict time), but we never hear of his having extemporised or played a piece in public in Vienna. Notwithstanding the shortness of his fingers, which sometimes got tired,⁵ he could play most of his own pieces, and with such force and beauty as to compel a musician⁶ who was listening to one of his latest sonatas to exclaim, 'I admire your playing more than your music,' an exclamation susceptible of two interpretations, of which Schubert is said to have taken the unfavourable one. But accompaniment was his forte, and of this we have already spoken (see pp. 606, 611, etc.). Duet-playing was a favourite recreation with him. Schober Gahy and others were his companions in this, and Gahy has left on record his admiration of the clean rapid playing, the bold conception and perfect grasp of expression, and the clever droll remarks that would drop from him during the piece.

His life as a rule was regular, even monotonous. He composed or studied habitually for six or seven hours every morning. This was one of the methodical habits which he had learned from his good old father; others were the old-fashioned punctilious style of addressing strangers which struck Hiller⁷ with such consternation and the dating of his music. He was ready to write directly he tumbled out of bed, and remained steadily at work till two. 'When I have done one piece I begin the next' was his explanation to a visitor in 1827; and one of these mornings produced six of the songs in the 'Winterreise'! At two he dined—when there was money enough for dinner—either at the Gasthaus, where in those days it cost a 'Zwanziger' (8½d.), or with a friend or patron; and the afternoon was spent in making music, as at Mme. Lacsny-Buchwieser's (p. 611), or in walking in the environs of Vienna. If the weather was fine the walk was often prolonged till late, regardless of engagements in town; but if this was not the case, he was at the coffee-house by five, smoking his pipe and ready to joke with any of his set; then came an hour's music, as at Sofie Muller's (p. 605); then the theatre, and supper at the Gasthaus again, and the coffee-house, sometimes till far into the morning. In those days no Viennese, certainly no young bachelor, dined at home; so that the repeated visits to the Gasthaus need not shock the sensibilities of any English lover of Schubert. (See p. 609.) Nor let any one be led away with the notion that he was a sot, as some seem prone to believe. How could a sot—how could any one who even lived freely, and woke with a heavy head or a disordered stomach—have worked as he worked, and have composed nearly 1000 such works as his in eighteen years, or have performed the feats of rapidity that Schubert did in the way of opera, symphony, quartet, song, which we have enumerated? No set could write six of the 'Winterreise' songs—perfect, enduring works of art—in one morning, and that no singular feat! Your Morlands and Poes are obliged to wait their time, and produce a few works as their brain and their digestion will allow them, instead of being always ready for their greatest efforts, as Mozart and Schubert were. Schubert—like Mozart—loved society and its accompaniments; he would have been no Viennese if he had not; and he may have been occasionally led away; but such escapades were rare. He does not appear to have cared for the other sex, or to have been attractive to them as Beethoven was notwithstanding his ugliness. This simplicity curiously characterises his whole life; no feats of memory are recorded of him as they so often are of other great musicians; the records of his life contain nothing to quote. His letters, some forty in all, are evidently forced from him. 'Heavens and Earth,' says he, 'it's frightful having to describe one's travels; I cannot write any more.' 'Dearest friend'—on another occasion—you will be astonished at my writing: I am so myself.¹ Strange contrast to the many interesting epistles of Mozart and Mendelssohn, and the numberless notes of Beethoven! Beethoven was well read, a politician, thought much and talked eagerly on many subjects. Mozart and Mendelssohn both drew; travelling was a part of their lives; they were men of the world, and Mendelssohn was master of many accomplishments. Schumann too, though a Saxon of Saxons, had travelled much, and while a most prolific composer, was a practised literary man. But Schubert has nothing of the kind to show. He not only never travelled out of Austria, but he never proposed it, and it is difficult to conceive of his doing so. To picture or work of art he very rarely refers. He expressed himself with such difficulty that it was all but impossible to argue with him.² Besides the letters just mentioned, a few pages of diary and four or five poems are all that he produced except his music. In literature his range was wide indeed, but it all went into his music; and he was strangely uncritical. He seems to have been hardly able—at any rate he did not care—to discriminate between the magnificent songs of Goethe, Schiller and Mayrhofer, the feeble domesticities of Kosegarten and Hölty and the turgid couplets of the authors of his librettos. All came alike to his omnivorous appetite. But the fact is that, apart from his music, Schubert's life was little or nothing, and that is its most peculiar and most interesting fact. Music and music alone was to him all in all. It was not his principal mode of expression, it was his only one; it swallowed up every other.

His afternoon walks, his evening amusements, were all so many preparations for the creations of the following morning. No doubt he enjoyed the country, but the effect of the walk is to be found in his music and his music only. He left, as we have said, no letters to speak of, no journal; there is no record of his ever having poured out his soul in confidence, as Beethoven did in the 'Will,' in the three mysterious letters to some unknown Beloved, or in his conversations with Bettina. He made no impression even on his closest friends beyond that of natural kindness, goodness, truth and reserve. His life is all summed up in his music. No memoir of Schubert can ever be satisfactory, because no relation can be established between his life and his music; or rather, properly speaking, because there is no life to establish a relation with. The one scale of the balance is absolutely empty, the other is full to overflowing. In his music we have fluency, depth, acuteness and variety of expression, unbounded imagination, the happiest thoughts, never-tiring energy and a sympathetic tenderness beyond belief. And these were the result of natural gifts and of the incessant practice to which they forced him; for it seems certain that of education in music—meaning by education the severe course of training in the mechanical portions of their art to which Mozart and Mendelssohn were subjected—he had little or nothing. As we have already mentioned, the two musicians who professed to instruct him, Holzer and Ruzicka, were so astonished at his ability that they contented themselves with wondering and allowing him to go his own way. And they are responsible for that want of counterpoint which was an embarrassment to him all his life, and drove him, during his last illness, to seek lessons. (Sec p. 618.) What he learned, he learned mostly for himself, from playing in the Convict orchestra, from incessant writing, and from reading the best scores he could obtain; and, to use the expressive term of his friend Mayrhofer, remained a 'Naturalist' to the end of his life. From the operas of the Italian masters, which were recommended to him by Salieri, he advanced to those of Mozart, and of Mozart abundant traces appear in his earlier instrumental works. In 1814 Beethoven was probably still tabooed in the Convict; and beyond the 'Prometheus' music and the first two symphonies, a pupil there would not be likely to encounter anything of his.

A STUDY OF THE MUSIC

INSTRUMENTAL.—The first symphony dates from 1814 (his 18th year), and between that and 1818 we have five more. These are all much tinged by what he was hearing and reading—Haydn, Mozart, Rossini, Beethoven (the last but slightly, for reasons just hinted at). Now and then—as in the second subjects of the first and last allegros of symphony 1, the first subject of the opening allegro of symphony 2, and the andante of symphony 5, the themes are virtually reproduced—no doubt unconsciously. The treatment is more his own, especially in regard to the use of the wind instruments, and to the ‘working out’ of the movements, where his want of education drives him to the repetition of the subject in various keys, and similar artifices, in place of contrapuntal treatment. In the slow movement and finale of the ‘Tragic’ symphony, No. 4, we have exceedingly happy examples, in which, without absolutely breaking away from the old world, Schubert has revealed an amount of original feeling and an extraordinary beauty of treatment which already stamp him as a great orchestral composer. But whether always original or not in their subjects, no one can listen to these first six symphonies without being impressed with their individuality. Single phrases may remind us of other composers, the treatment may often be traditional, but there is a fluency and continuity, a happy cheerfulness, an earnestness and want of triviality and an absence of labour, which proclaim a new composer. The writer is evidently writing because what he has to say must come out, even though he may occasionally couch it in the phrases of his predecessors. Beauty and profusion of melody reign throughout. The tone is often plaintive but never obscure, and there is always the irrepressible gaiety of youth and of Schubert’s own Viennese nature, ready and willing to burst forth. His treatment of particular instruments, especially the wind, is already quite his own—a happy conversational way which at a later period becomes highly characteristic. At length, in the B minor symphony (Oct. 30, 1822), we meet with something which never existed in the world before in orchestral music—a new class of thoughts and a new mode of expression which distinguish him entirely from his predecessors, characteristics which are fully maintained in the ‘Rosamunde’ music (Christmas 1823), and culminate in the great C major symphony (March 1828).

The same general remarks apply to the other instrumental compositions—the quartets and PF. sonatas. These often show a close adherence to the style of the old school, but are always effective and individual, and occasionally, like the symphonies, varied by original and charming movements, as the trio in the E \flat quartet, or the minuet and trio in the E major one (op. 125, 1 and 2), the sonata in A minor (1817), etc. The visit to Zselécz in 1824, with its Hungarian experiences, and the pianoforte proclivities of the Esterhazys, seem to have given him a new impetus in the direction of chamber music. It was the immediate or proximate cause of the ‘Grand Duo’—that splendid work in which, with Beethoven in his eye, Schubert was never more himself—and the ‘Divertissement à la hongroise’; as well as the beautiful and intensely personal string quartet in A minor, which has been not wrongly said to be the most characteristic work of any composer; ultimately also of the D minor and G major quartets, the string quintet in C, and the last three sonatas, in all of which the Hungarian element is strongly perceptible—all the more strongly because we hardly detect it at all in the songs and vocal works.

Here then, at 1822 in the orchestral works, and 1824 in the chamber music, we may perhaps draw the line between Schubert’s mature and immature compositions. The step from the symphony in C of 1818 to the unfinished symphony in B minor, or to the ‘Rosamunde’ entr’acte in the same key, is quite as great as Beethoven’s was from No. 2 to the Eroica, or Mendelssohn’s from the C minor to the Italian symphony. All trace of his predecessors is gone, and he stands alone in his own undisguised and pervading personality. All trace of his youth has gone too. Life has become serious, nay cruel; and a deep earnestness and pathos animate all his utterances. Similarly in the chamber music, the octet stands on the line, and all the works which have made their position and are acknowledged as great are on this side of it—the Grand Duo, the Divertissement à la hongroise, the PF. sonatas in A minor, D and B \flat , the fantasie-sonata in G; the impromptu and moments musicals; the string quartets in A minor, D minor and G; the string quintet in C; the ‘Rondo brillant’—in short, all the works which the world thinks of when it mentions Schubert (we are speaking now of instrumental music only) are on this side of 1822. On the other side of the line, in both cases, orchestra and chamber, are a vast number of works full of beauty, interest and life; breathing youth in every bar, absolute Schubert in many movements or passages, but not completely saturated with him, not of sufficiently independent power to assert their rank with the others, or to compensate for the diffuseness and repetition which remained characteristics of their author to the last, but which in the later works are hidden or atoned for by the astonishing force, beauty, romance and personality inherent in the contents of the music. These early works will always be more than interesting; and no lover of Schubert but must regard them with the strong affection and fascination which his followers feel for every bar he wrote. But the judgment of the world at large will probably always remain what it now is.

He was, as Liszt so finely said, ‘le musicien le plus poète que jamais’—the most poetical musician that ever was; and the main characteristics of his music will always be its vivid personality, fullness and poetry. In the case of other great composers, the mechanical skill and ingenuity, the very ease and absence of effort with which many of their effects are produced, or their pieces constructed, is a great element in the pleasure produced by their music. Not so with Schubert. In listening to him one is never betrayed into exclaiming 'How clever!' but very often 'How poetical, how beautiful, how intensely Schubert!' The impression produced by his great works is that the means are nothing and the effect everything. Not that he had no technical skill. Counterpoint he was deficient in, but the power of writing whatever he wanted he had absolutely at his fingers' end. No one had ever written more, and the notation of his ideas must have been done without an effort. In the words of Macfarren,¹ 'the committing his works to paper was a process that accompanied their composition like the writing of an ordinary letter that is indited at the very paper.' In fact we know, if we had not the manuscripts to prove it, that he wrote with the greatest ease and rapidity, and could keep up a conversation, not only while writing down but while inventing his best works; that he never hesitated; very rarely revised—it would often have been better if he had; and never seems to have aimed at making innovations or doing things for effect. For instance, in the number and arrangement of the movements, his symphonies and sonatas never depart from the regular Haydn pattern. They rarely show æsthetic artifices, such as quoting the theme of one movement in another movement,² or running them into each other; changing their order, or introducing extra ones; mixing various times simultaneously—or similar mechanical means of producing unity or making novel effects, which often surprise and please us in Beethoven, Schumann, Mendelssohn and Spohr. Nor did he ever indicate a programme, or prefix a motto to any of his works. His matter is so abundant and so full of variety and interest that he never seems to think of enhancing it by any devices. He did nothing to extend the formal limits of symphony or sonata, but he endowed them with a magic, a romance, a sweet naturalness, which no one has yet approached (see SONATA and SYMPHONY). And as in the general structure so in the single movements. A simple canon, as in the E♭ trio, the andante of the B minor or the scherzo of the C major symphonies; an occasional round, as in the masses and part-songs;—such is pretty nearly all the science that he affords. His vocal fugues are notoriously weak, and the symphonies rarely show those piquant fugatos which are so delightful in Beethoven and Mendelssohn. On the other hand, in all that is necessary to express his thoughts and feelings, and to convey them to the hearer, he is inferior to none. Such passages as the return to the subject in the andante of the B minor symphony, or in the ballet air in G of 'Rosamunde'; as the famous horn passage in the andante of the C major symphony—which Schumann happily compares to a being from the other world gliding about the orchestra—or the equally beautiful violoncello solo farther on in the same movement, are unsurpassed in orchestral music for felicity and beauty, and have an emotional effect which no learning could give. There is a place in the working-out of the Rosamunde Entr'acte in B minor (change into G♯) in which the combination of modulation and scoring produces a weird and overpowering feeling quite exceptional, and the change to the major near the end of the same great work will always astonish. One of the most prominent beauties in these orchestral works is the exquisite and entirely fresh manner in which the wind instruments are combined. Even in his earliest symphonies he begins that method of dialogue by interchange of phrases, which rises at last to the well-known and lovely passages in the overture to 'Rosamunde' (2nd subject), the trios of the B♭ entr'acte, and the 'Air de ballet' in the same music, and in the andantes of the B minor and C major symphonies. No one has ever combined wind instruments as these are combined. To quote Schumann once more—they talk and intertalk like human beings. It is no artful concealment of art. The artist vanishes altogether, and the loving, simple, human friend remains. It were well to be dumb in articulate speech with such a power of utterance at command! If anything were wanting to convince us of the absolute inspiration of such music as this it would be the fact that Schubert never can have heard either of the two symphonies which we have just been citing.

But to return to the orchestra. The trombones were favourite instruments with Schubert in his later life. In the fugal movements of his two last masses he makes them accompany the voices in unison with a persistence which is sometimes almost unbearable for its monotony. In portions of the C major symphony also some may possibly find them too much used.³ But in other parts of the masses they are beautifully employed, and in the introduction and allegro of the symphony they are used with a noble effect, which not improbably suggested to Schumann the equally impressive use of them in his B♭ symphony. The accompaniments to his subjects are always of great ingenuity and originality, and full of life and maracter. The triplets in the finale to the C major symphony, which excited the mal à propos merriment of the Philharmonic orchestra (see p. 623), are a very striking instance. Another is the incessant run of semiquavers in the second violins and violas which accompany the second theme in the finale of the Tragic symphony. Another, of which he is very fond, is the employment of a recurring monotonous figure in the inner parts:

often running to great length, as in the andantes of the Tragic and B minor symphonies; the moderato of the B \flat sonata; the fine song 'Viola' (op. 123, at the return to A \flat in the middle of the song), etc. etc. In his best PF. music, the accompaniments are most happily fitted to the leading part, so as never to clash or produce discord. Rapidly as he wrote he did these things as if they were calculated. But they never obtrude themselves or become prominent. They are all merged and absorbed in the gaiety, pathos, and personal interest of the music itself, and of the man who is uttering through it his griefs and joys, his hopes and fears, in so direct and touching a manner as no composer ever did before or since, and with no thought of an audience, of fame, or success, or any other external thing. No one who listens to it can doubt that Schubert wrote for himself alone. His music is the simple utterance of the feelings with which his mind is full. If he had thought of his audience, or the effect he would produce, or the capabilities of the means he was employing, he would have taken more pains in the revision of his works. Indeed the most affectionate disciple of Schubert must admit that the want of revision is often but too apparent.

In his instrumental music he is often very diffuse. When a passage pleases him he generally repeats it at once, almost note for note. He will reiterate a passage over and over in different keys, as if he could never have done. In the songs this does not offend; and even here, if we knew what he was thinking of, as we do in the songs, we might possibly find the repetitions just. In the E \flat trio he repeats in the finale a characteristic accompaniment which is very prominent in the first movement and which originally belongs perhaps to the A \flat impromptu (op. 90, No. 4)—and a dozen other instances of the same kind might be quoted.¹ This arose in great part from his imperfect education, but in great part also from the furious pace at which he dashed down his thoughts and feelings, apparently without previous sketch, note, or preparation; and from his habit of never correcting a piece after it was once on paper. Had he done so he would doubtless have taken out many a repetition and some trivialities which seem terribly out of place amid the usual nobility and taste of his thoughts. It was doubtless this diffuseness and apparent want of aim, as well as the jolly, untutored naïveté of some of his subjects (rondo of D major sonata, etc.), and the incalculable amount of modulation, that made Mendelssohn shrink from some of Schubert's instrumental works, and even go so far as to call the D minor quartet schlechte Musik—i.e. 'nasty music.' But unless to musicians whose fastidiousness is somewhat abnormal—as Mendelssohn's was—such criticisms only occur afterwards, on reflection; for during the progress of the work all is absorbed in the intense life and personality of the music. And what beauties there are to put against these redundances! Take such movements as the first allegro of the A minor sonata or the B \flat sonata; the G major fantasia-sonata; the two characteristic marches; the impromptus and Moments musicals; the minuet of the A minor quartet; the variations of the D minor quartet; the finale of the B \flat trio; the first two movements, or the trio, of the string quintet; the two movements of the B minor symphony, or the wonderful entr'acte in the same key in 'Rosamunde'; the finale of the last symphony—think of the abundance of the thoughts, the sudden surprises, the wonderful transitions, the extraordinary pathos of the turns of melody and modulation, the absolute manner (to repeat once more) in which they bring you into contact with the affectionate, tender, suffering personality of the composer—and who in the whole realm of music has ever approached them? For the magical expression of such a piece as the andantino in A \flat (op. 94, No. 2), any redundancy may be pardoned.

In Schumann's words,

'he has strains for the most subtle thoughts and feelings, nay even for the events and conditions of life; and innumerable as are the shades of human thought and action, so various is his music.'

Another equally true saying of Schumann's is that, compared with Beethoven, Schubert is as a woman to a man. For it must be confessed that one's attitude towards him is almost always that of sympathy, attraction and love, rarely that of embarrassment or fear. Here and there only, as in the 'Rosamunde' B minor entr'acte, or the finale of the last symphony, does he compel his hearers with an irresistible power; and yet how different is this compulsion from the strong, fierce, merciless coercion with which

Beethoven forces you along, and bows and bends you to his will, in the finale of the eighth or, still more, that of the seventh symphony.

THE SONGS.—We have mentioned the gradual manner in which Schubert reached his own style in instrumental music (see pp. 626-8). In this, except perhaps as to quantity, there is nothing singular, or radically different from the early career of other composers. Beethoven began on the lines of Mozart, and Mendelssohn on those of Weber, and gradually found their own independent style. But the thing in which Schubert stands alone is that while he was thus arriving by degrees at individuality in sonatas, quartets and symphonies, he was pouring forth songs by the dozen, many of which were of the greatest possible novelty, originality and mastery, while all of them have that peculiar cachet which is immediately recognisable as his. The chronological list of his works shows that such masterpieces as the 'Gretchen am Spinnrade,' the 'Erl King,' the Ossian Songs, 'Gretchen im Dom,' 'Der Taucher,' 'Die Bürgschaft,' were written before he was nineteen, and were contemporary with his very early efforts in the orchestra and chamber music; and that by 1822—in the October of which he wrote the two movements of his eighth symphony, which we have named as his first absolutely original instrumental music—he had produced in addition such ballads as 'Ritter Toggenburg' (1816), and 'Einsamkeit' (1818); such classical songs as 'Memnon' (1817), 'Antigone und Oedip' (1817), 'Iphigenie' (1817), 'Ganymed' (1817), 'Fahrt zum Hades' (1817), 'Prometheus' (1819), 'Gruppe aus dem Tartarus' (1817); Goethe's 'Wilhelm Meister' songs, 'An Schwager Kronos' (1816), 'Grenzen der Menschheit' (1821), Suleika's two songs (1821), 'Geheimes' (1821); as well as the 'Wanderer' (1816), 'Sei mir gegrüsst' (1821), 'Waldesnacht' (1820), 'Greisengesang' (1822), and many more of his very greatest and most immortal songs.

And this is very confirmatory of the view already taken in this article (p. 500) of Schubert's relation to music. The reservoir of music was within him from his earliest years, and songs being so much more direct a channel than the more complicated and artificial courses and conditions of the symphony or the sonata, music came to the surface in them so much the more quickly. Had the orchestra or the piano been as direct a mode of utterance as the voice, and the forms of symphony or sonata as simple as that of the song, there seems no reason why he should not have written instrumental music as characteristic as his eighth symphony, his sonata in A minor and his quartet in the same key, eight years earlier than he did; for the songs of that early date prove that he had then all the original power, imagination and feeling that he ever had. That it should have been given to a comparative boy to produce strains which seem to breathe the emotion and experience of a long life is only part of the wonder which will also surround Schubert's songs.

After 1822, when his youth was gone and health had begun to fail, and life had become a terrible reality, his thoughts turned inwards, and he wrote the two great cycles of the 'Müllerlieder' (1823) and the 'Winterreise' (1827); the Walter Scott and Shakespeare songs; the splendid single songs of 'Im Walde' and 'Auf der Bruck,' 'Todtengräbers Heimweh,' 'Der Zwerg,' 'Die junge Nonne'; the Barcarolle, 'Du bist die Ruh,' and the lovely 'Dass sie hier gewesen'; the 'Schifers Scheidelied,' those which were collected into the so-called 'Schwanengesang' and many more.

It is very difficult to draw a comparison between the songs of this later period and those of the earlier one, but the difference must strike every one, and it resides mainly perhaps in the subjects themselves. Subjects of romance—of ancient times and remote scenes, and strange adventures and desperate emotion—are natural to the imagination of youth. But in maturer life the mind is calmer, and dwells more strongly on personal subjects. And this is the case with Schubert. After 1822 the classical songs and ballads are rare, and the themes which he chooses belong chiefly to modern life and individual feeling, such as the 'Müllerlieder' and the 'Winterreise,' and others in the list just given. Walter Scott's and Shakespeare's form an exception, but it is an exception which explains itself. We no longer have the exuberant dramatic force of the 'Erl King,' 'Ganymed,' the 'Gruppe aus dem Tartarus,' 'Cronnan,' or 'Kolma's Klage'; but we have instead the condensation and personal point of 'Pause,' 'Die Post,' 'Das Wirthshaus,' 'Die Nebensonnen,' the 'Doppelgänger' and the 'Junge Nonne.' And there is more maturity in the treatment. His modulations are fewer. His accompaniments are always interesting and suggestive, but they gain in force and variety and quality of ideas in the later songs.

In considering the songs themselves somewhat more closely, their most obvious characteristics are: Their number; their length: the variety of the words; their expression, and their other musical and poetical peculiarities.

1. Their number. The published songs, that is to say the compositions for one and two voices, excluding offertories and songs in operas, amount to 603.¹

2. Their length. This varies very much. The shortest, like 'Klage um Aly Bey,' 'Der Goldschmiedsgesell,' and 'Die Spinnerin' (op. 118, 6), are strophic songs (that is, with the same melody and harmony unchanged verse after verse), in each of which the voice part is only eight bars long, with a bar or two of introduction or ritornel. The longest is Bertrand's 'Adelwold und Emma' (June 5, 1815), a ballad the autograph of which contains fifty-five pages. Others of almost equal length and of about the same date are: 'Minona,' 'Die Nonne,' 'Amphiarao,' etc. Another is Schiller's 'Der Taucher,' which fills thirty-six pages of close print. Schiller's 'Bürgschaft' and the Ossian-songs are all long, though not of the same extent as 'Der Taucher.' These vast ballads are extremely dramatic; they contain many changes of tempo and of signature, dialogues, recitatives, and airs. The 'Ritter Togenburg' ends with a strophic song in five stanzas. 'Der Taucher' contains a long piano-forte passage of thirty bars, during the suspense after the diver's last descent. 'Der Liedler' contains a march. The ballads mostly belong to the early years, 1815, 1816. The last is Mayrhofer's 'Einsamkeit,' the date of which Schubert has fixed in his letter of Aug. 3, 1818. There are long songs of later years, such as Collin's 'Der Zwerg' of 1823; Schober's 'Viola' and 'Vergissmeinnicht' of 1823, and 'Schiffers Scheidelied' of 1827, and Leitner's 'Der Winterabend' of 1828; but these are essentially different from the ballads; they are lyrical, and evince comparatively few mechanical changes.

It tends to reason that in 603 songs collected from all the great German poets, from Klopstock to Heine, there must be an infinite variety of material, form, sentiment and expression. And one of the most obvious characteristics in Schubert's setting of this immense collection is the close way in which he adheres to the words.¹ Setting a song was no casual operation with him, rapidly as it was often done; but he identified himself with the poem, and the poet's mood for the time was his. Indeed he complains of the influence which the gloom of the 'Winterreise' had had upon his spirits. He does not, as is the manner of some song-composers, set the poet at naught by repeating his words over and over again. This he rarely does; but he goes through his poem and confines himself to enforcing the expression as music alone can do to poetry. The music changes with the words as a landscape does when sun and cloud pass over it. And in this Schubert has anticipated Wagner, since the words to which he writes are as much the absolute basis of his songs as Wagner's librettos are of his operas. What this has brought him to in such cases as the 'Erl King,' the 'Wanderer,' 'Schwager Kronos,' the 'Gruppe aus dem Tartarus,' the Shakespeare songs of 'Sylvia' and 'Hark, hark, the lark!' those of Ellen and the Huntsman in 'The Lady of the Lake,' even Englishmen can judge; but what he did in the German literature generally may be gathered from the striking passage already quoted from Vogl (p. 590), and from Mayrhofer's confession—doubly remarkable when coming from a man of such strong individuality—who somewhere says that he did not understand the full force even of his own poems until he had heard Schubert's setting of them.

One of his great means of expression is modulation. What magic this alone can work may be seen in the trio of the sonata in D. As in his PF. works, so in the songs, he sometimes carries it to an exaggerated degree. Thus in the short song 'Liedesend' of Mayrhofer (Sept. 1816), he begins in C minor, and then goes quickly through F₇ into C₇ major. The signature then changes, and we are at once in D major; then C major. Then the signature again changes to that of A₇, in which we remain for fifteen bars. From A₇ it is an easy transition to F minor, but a very sudden one from that again to A minor. Then for the breaking of the harp we are forced into D₇, and immediately, with a further change of signature, into F₇. Then for the King's song, with a fifth change of signature, into B major; and lastly, for the concluding words, a sixth change, with eight bars in E minor, thus ending the song a third higher than it began.

'Und immer näher schreitet

In Schiller's 'Der Pilgrim' (1825), after two strophes (four stanzas) of a Choral-like melody in D major, we come, with the description of the difficulties of the pilgrim's road—mountains, torrents, ravines—to a change into D minor, followed by much extraneous modulation, reaching A₇ minor, and ending in F, in which key the first melody is repeated. At the words 'näher bin ich nicht zum Ziel'—we have a similar phrase and similar harmony (though in a different key) to the well-known complaint in the 'Wanderer,' 'Und immer fragt der Seufzer, Wo?' The signature then changes, and the song ends very impressively in B minor.

These two are quoted, the first as an instance rather of exaggeration, the second of the mechanical use of modulations to convey the natural difficulties depicted in the poem. But if we want examples of the extraordinary power with which Schubert wields this great engine of emotion, we would mention another song which contains one of the best instances to be found of propriety of modulation. I allude to Schubert's short poem to death, 'An den Tod,' where the gloomy subjects and images of the poet have tempted the composer to a series of successive changes so grand, so sudden, and yet so easy and so thoroughly in keeping with the subject, that it is impossible to hear them unmoved.

But modulation, though an all-pervading means of expression in Schubert's hands, is only one out of many. Scarcely inferior to the wealth of his modulation is the wealth of his melodies. The beauty of these is not more astonishing than their variety and their fitness to the words. Such tunes as those of 'Ave Maria,' or the serenade in the 'Schwanengesang,' or 'Ungehduld,' or the 'Grünen Lautenband,' or 'Anna Lyle,' or the 'Dithyrambe,' or 'Geheimes,' or 'Sylvia,' or the 'Lindenbaum,' or 'Du bist die Ruh,' or the 'Barcarolle,' are not more lovely and more appropriate to the text than they are entirely different from one another. One quality only, spontaneity, they have in common. With Beethoven, spontaneity was the result of labour, and the more he polished the more natural were his tunes. But Schubert read the poem, and the appropriate tune, married to immortal verse (a marriage, in his case, truly made in heaven), rushed into his mind, and to the end of his pen. It must be confessed that he did not always think of the compass of his voices. In his latest songs, as in his earliest (see p. 583), we find him taking the singer from the low B \flat to F, and even higher.

The tune, however, in a Schubert song is by no means an exclusive feature. The accompaniments are as varied and as different as the voice-parts, and as important for the general effect. They are often extremely elaborate, and the publishers' letters contain many complaints of their difficulty.¹ They are often most extraordinarily suitable to the words, as in the 'Erl King,' or the beautiful 'Dass sie hier gewesen,' the 'Gruppe aus dem Tartarus,' the 'Waldesnacht' (and many others); where it is almost impossible to imagine any atmosphere more exactly suitable to make the words grow in one's mind than is supplied by the accompaniment. Their unerring certainty is astonishing. Often, as in 'Heliopolis,' or 'Auflösung,' he seizes at once on a characteristic impetuous figure, which is then carried on without intermission to the end. In 'Anna Lyle,' how exactly does the sweet monotony of the repeated figure fall in with the dreamy sadness of Scott's touching little lament! Another very charming example of the same thing, though in a different direction, is found in 'Der Einsame,' a fireside piece, where the frequently-recurring group of four semiquavers imparts an indescribable air of domesticity to the picture.² In the 'Winterabend'—the picture of a calm moonlit evening—the accompaniment, aided by a somewhat similar little figure, conveys imitatively the very breath of the scene. Such atmospheric effects as these are very characteristic of Schubert.

The voice-part and the accompaniment sometimes form so perfect a whole that it is impossible to disentangle the two; as in 'Sylvia,' where the persistent dotted quaver in the bass, and the rare but delicious ritornel of two notes in the treble of the piano-part (bars 7, 14, etc.), are essential to the grace and sweetness of the portrait, and help to place the lovely English figure before us. This is the case also in 'Anna Lyle' just mentioned, where the ritornel in the piano-part (bar 20, etc.) is inexpressibly soothing and tender in its effect, and sounds like the echo of the girl's sorrow. The beautiful serenade in the 'Schwanengesang,' again, combines an incessant rhythmical accompaniment with ritornels (longer than those in the last case), both uniting with the lovely melody in a song of surpassing beauty. In the 'Liebesbotschaft,' the rhythm is not so strongly marked, but the ritornels are longer and more frequent, and form a charming feature in that exquisite love-poem. Schubert's passion for rhythm comes out as strongly in many of the songs as it does in his marches and scherzos. In the two just named, though persistent throughout, the rhythm is subordinated to the general effect. But in others, as 'Suleika,' 'Die Sterne,' the 'Nachtgesang im Walde,' 'Erstarrung,' or 'Frühlingsehnsucht,' it forces itself more on the attention.

Schubert's basses are always splendid, and are so used as not only to be the basis of the harmony but to add essentially to the variety and effect of the songs. Sometimes, as in 'Die Krahe,' they are in unison with the voice-part. Often they share with the voice-part itself in the melody and structure of the whole. The wealth of ideas which they display is often astonishing. Thus in 'Waldesnacht,' a very long song of 1820, to a fine imaginative poem by F. Schlegel, describing the impressions produced by a night in the forest, we have a splendid example of the organic life which Schubert can infuse into a song. The pace is rapid throughout; the accompaniment for the right hand is in arpeggios of semiquavers throughout, never once leaving off; the left hand, where not in semiquavers also, has a succession of noble and varied rhythmical melodies, independent of the voice, and the whole is so blended with the voice-part—itsself extraordinarily broad and dignified throughout; the spirit and variety and the poetry of the whole are so remarkable, and the mystery of the situation is so perfectly conveyed, as to make the song one of the finest of that class in the whole Schubert collection. The same qualities will be found in 'Auf der Bruck' (1825).

We do not say that this is the highest class of his songs. The highest class of poetry, and of music illustrating and enforcing poetry, must always deal with human joys and sorrows, in their most individual form, with the soul loving or longing, in contact with another soul, or with its Maker; and the greatest of Schubert's songs will lie amongst those which are occupied with those topics, such as 'Gretchen am Spinnrade,' the 'Mignon' songs, the 'Wanderer,' the 'Müllerlieder,' and 'Winterreise,' and perhaps highest of all, owing to the strong religious element which it contains, the 'Junge Nonne.'¹ In that wonderful song the personal feelings and the surroundings are so blended—the fear, the faith, the rapture, the storm, the swaying of the house, are so given, that for the time the hearer becomes the Young Nun herself. Even the convent bell, which in other hands might be a burlesque, is an instrument of the greatest beauty.

We have spoken of the mental atmosphere which Schubert throws round his poems; but he does not neglect the representation of physical objects. He seems to confine himself to the imitation of natural noises, and not to attempt things which have no sound. The triplets in the 'Lindenbaum' may be intended to convey the fluttering leaves of the lime-tree, and the accompaniment-figure in 'Die Forelle' may represent the leaps of the trout; but there are other objects about which no mistake can be made. One imitation of the bell we have just referred to. Another is in the 'Abendbilder,' where an F♯ sounds through sixteen bars to represent the 'evening bell'; in the 'Zügenglocklein' the upper E is heard through the whole piece; and the bell of St. Mark's is a well-known feature in the part-song of the 'Gondelfahrer.' The post-horn forms a natural feature in 'Die Post,' and the hurdy-gurdy in 'Der Leiermann.' Of birds he gives several instances; the nightingale in 'Ganymed' and 'Die gefangene Sänger'; the raven in 'Abendbilder,' and perhaps in 'Frühlings-straum'; the cuckoo in 'Einsamkeit,' the quail in 'Der Wachtelschlag'; and the cock in 'Frühlingsstraum.'

That hesitation between major and minor which is so marked in Beethoven is characteristic also of Schubert, and may be found in nearly every piece of his. A beautiful instance may be mentioned en passant in the trio of the G major fantasia sonata (op. 78), where the two bars in E minor which precede the E major have a peculiarly charming effect. Another is supplied by the four bars in A minor, for the question which begins and ends the beautiful fragment from Schiller's 'Gods of ancient Greece.' He also has an especially happy way—surely peculiarly his own—of bringing a minor piece to a conclusion in the major. Two instances of it, which all will remember, are in the romance from 'Rosamunde':

and in the 'Moment musical,' No. 3, in F minor. This and the ritornels already spoken of strike one like personal features or traits of the composer. But apart from these idiosyncrasies, the changes from minor to major in the songs are often superb. That in the 'Schwager Kronos' (astonishing production for a lad under twenty), where the key changes into D major, and farther on into F major, to welcome the girl on the threshold, with the sudden return to D minor for the onward journey and the sinking sun—can be forgotten by no one who hears it, nor can that almost more beautiful change to D major in the 'Gute Nacht' on the mention of the dream. This latter, and the noble transition to F major in the 'Junge Nonne' are too familiar to need more than a passing reference, or that to G major in the 'Rückblick,' for the lark and nightingale and the girl's eyes, or to D major in the Serenade. 'Irisches Glück' is in alternate stanzas of major and minor. In Schiller's 'Rose' (op. 73) every shade in the fate of the flower is thus indicated; and this is no solitary instance, but in almost every song some example of such faithful painting may be found. A word will often do it. With Schubert the minor mode seems to be synonymous with trouble, and the major with relief; and the mere mention of the sun, or a smile or any other emblem of gladness is sure to make him modulate. Some such image was floating before his mind when he made the beautiful change to A major near the beginning of the A minor quartet (bar 23).

I end my imperfect sketch of the life and works of this wonderful musician, by recalling the fact that Schubert's songs, regarded as a department of music, are absolutely and entirely his own. Songs there were before him, those of Schulz for instance, and of Zumsteeg, which he so greatly admired, and of Haydn and Mozart—touching, beautiful expressions of simple thought and feeling. But the song, as we know it in his hands—full of dramatic fire, poetry and pathos; set to no simple Volkslied, but to long complex poems, the best poetry of the greatest poets, and an absolute reflection of every change and breath of sentiment in that poetry; with an accompaniment of the utmost force, fitness and variety—such songs were his and his alone. With one exception. Beethoven left but one song of importance, his 'Liederkreis' (op. 98), but that is of superlative excellence. The 'Liederkreis,' however, was not published till Dec. 1816, and even if Schubert made its acquaintance immediately, yet a reference to the chronological List will show that by that time his style was formed, and many of his finest songs written.

He may have gained the idea of a connected series of songs from Beethoven, though neither the 'Schöne Müllerin' nor the 'Winterreise' have the same intimate internal connection as the 'Liederkreis'; but the character and merits of the single songs remain his own. When he wrote 'Loda's Gespenst' and 'Kolma's Klage' in 1815, he wrote what no one had ever attempted before. There is nothing to detract from his just claim to be the creator of German song as we know it, and the direct progenitor of those priceless treasures in which Schumann, Mendelssohn and Brahms have followed his example.

SUMMARY.—Of Schubert's religion it is still more difficult to say anything than it was of Beethoven's, because he is so much more reticent. A little poem of Sept. 1820, one of two preserved by Robert Schumann (Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, Feb. 5, 1839), is as vague a confession of faith as can well be imagined.

THE SPIRIT OF THE WORLD

Leave them, leave them, to their dream
I hear the Spirit say:—
It and only it can keep them
Near me on their darkling way.

Leave them racing, hurrying on
To some distant goal,
Building creeds and proofs upon
Half-seen flashes in the soul.

Not a word of it is true.
Yet what loss is theirs or mine?
In the maze of human systems
I can trace the thought divine.

The other, three years later, May 8, 1823, is somewhat more definite. It calls upon a 'mighty Father' to look upon His son lying in the dust; and implores Him to pour upon him the everlasting beams of His love; and, even though He kill him, to preserve him for a purer and more vigorous existence. It expresses—very imperfectly, it is true, but still unmistakably—the same faith that has been put into undying words in the prologue to In Memoriam.

Franz may not have gone the length of his brother Ignaz¹ in vulgar scoffing at religious forms and persons, which no doubt were very empty in Vienna at that date; but still of formal or dogmatic religion we can find no traces, and we must content ourselves with the practical piety displayed in his love for his father and Ferdinand, and testified to by them in their touching words and acts at the time of his death (pp. 618, 619); and with certainty that, though irregular after the irregularity of his time, Schubert was neither selfish, sensual, nor immoral. What he was in his inner man we have the abundant evidence of his music to assure us. Whatever the music of other composers may do, no one ever rose from hearing a piece by Schubert without being benefited by it. Of his good-nature to those who took the bread out of his mouth we have already spoken. Of his modesty we may be allowed to say that he was one of the very few musicians who ever lived who did not behave as if he thought himself the greatest man in the world.² And these things are all intrinsic parts of his character and genius.

That he died at an earlier age³ even than Mozart or Mendelssohn, or our own Purcell, must be accounted for on the ground partly of his extraordinary exertions, but still more of the privations to which he was subjected from his very earliest years. His productions are enormous, even when measured by those of the two great German composers just named, or even of Beethoven, who lived to nearly double his years. At an age when Beethoven had produced one symphony he had written ten,⁴ besides a mass of works great and small. 'Fairer hopes'? Had he lived, who can doubt that he would have thrown into the shade all his former achievements? But as we have endeavoured to explain, his music came so easily and rapidly that it was probably not exhausting. It was his privations, his absolute poverty and the distress which he naturally felt at finding that no exertions could improve his circumstances, or raise him in the scale of existence, that in the end dragged him down. Nearly the first distinct glimpse we catch of him is in the winter of 1812, supplicating his brother for a roll, some apples, or a few halfpence, to keep off the hunger of the long fast in the freezing rooms of the Convict. Within a year of his death we catch sight of him again, putting up with coffee and biscuits because he has not 8d. to buy his dinner with; selling his great trio for 18s. 6d. and his songs at 10d. each, and dying the possessor of effects which were valued at little more than two pounds. Beside this the poverty of Mozart—the first of the two great musicians whom Vienna has allowed to starve—was wealth.

Such facts as these reduce the so-called friendship of his associates to its right level. With his astonishing power of production the commonest care would have ensured him a good living; and that no one of his set was found devoted enough to take this care for him, and exercise that watch over ways and means which Nature had denied to his own genius, is a discredit to them all. They prate of their devotion to their friend, when not one of them had the will or the wit to prevent him from starving; for such want as he often endured must inevitably have injured him, and we cannot doubt that his death was hastened by the absence of those comforts, not to say necessities, which should have nursed and restored the prodigal expenditure of his brain and nerves.

² This modesty comes out in a letter to Ferdinand of July 16-18, 1824, where Schubert says, 'It would be better to play some other quartets than mine' (probably referring to those in E and E♭), 'since there is nothing in them except perhaps the fact that they please you, as everything of mine pleases you. True, he goes on, 'you do not appear to have liked them so much as the waltzes at the Ungarische Krone,' alluding to a clock at that eating-house of which Ferdinand had told him, which was set to play Franz's waltzes. The clock shows how popular Schubert was among his own set, and I regret having overlooked the fact in its proper place.

⁴ This number includes the sketch in E major, the 'Garten' symphony and the unfinished symphony in B minor.

We are accustomed to think of Beethoven's end as solitary and his death as miserable, but what was his last illness compared to Schubert's. Officious friends, like Pasqualati, sending him wine and delicacies; worshipping musicians, like Hummel and Hiller, coming to his death-bed as if to a shrine; his faithful attendants, Schindler, Huttenbrenner and Breuning, waiting on his every wish; the sense of a long life of honour and renown; of great works appreciated and beloved; the homage of distant countries, expressed in the most substantial forms—what a contrast to the early death-bed and the apparent wreck of such an end as Schubert's! Time has so altered the public sense of his merits that it is all but impossible to place oneself in the forlorn condition in which he must have resigned himself to his departure, and to realise the darkness of the valley of the shadow of death through which his simple, sincere, guileless soul passed to its last rest, and to the joyful resurrection and glorious renown which have since attended it. Then an intelligent and well-informed foreign musician could visit the Austrian capital and live in its musical circles without so much as hearing Schubert's name.¹ Now memorials are erected to him in the most public places of Vienna, institutions are proud to bear his name, his works go through countless editions and publishers grow rich upon the proceeds even of single songs, while faces brighten and soften, and hands are clasped, as we drink in the gay and pathetic accents of his music.

For even his privations and his obscurity have now been forgotten in the justice since done to him, and in the universal affection with which he was regarded as soon as his works reached the outside world—an affection which, as we have conclusively shown, has gone on increasing ever since his death. In the whole range of composers it may be truly said that no one is now so dearly loved as he, no one has the happy power so completely of attracting both the admiration and the affection of his hearers. To each one he is not only a great musician, not only a great enchanter, but a dear personal friend. If in his 'second state sublime' he can know this, we may feel sure that it is a full compensation to his affectionate spirit for the many wrongs and disappointments that he endured while on earth.

The very wide field over which Schubert

ranged in poetry has been more than once alluded to in the foregoing. It would be both interesting and profitable to give a list of the poems which he has set. Such a list, not without inaccuracies, will be found in Wurz- bach's Biographisches Lexicon, vol. xxxii. p. 94. Here we can only say that it includes over 600 poems by 100 authors, of whom the principal are:

Goethe, 72; Schiller, 54; Mayrhofer, 48; W. Müller, 44; Hölty, 25; Matthiessen, 27; Kosegarten, 20; F. Schlegel, 19; Klopstock, 19; Körner, 16; Schober, 15; Seidl, 15; Salis, 14; Claudius, 13; Walter Scott, 10; Rellstab, 9; Uz, 8; Ossian, 7; Heine, 6; Shakespeare, 3; Pope, 1; Colley Cibber, 1; etc. etc.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

1. The first place must be given to Ferdinand Schubert's sketch, entitled 'Aus Franz Schuberts Leben,' four short papers which appeared in Schumann's periodical, the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, in Nos. 33 to 36 (Apr. 23-May 3), 1839. These are written with great simplicity and apparently great exactness; but might have been extended to double the length with great advantage.

2. Mayrhofer contributed a short article of recollections, Erinnerungen, to the Neues Archiv für Geschichte, Literatur und Kunst (Vienna) Feb. 23, 1829; and Baurmeister a longer paper, Franz Schubert, to Nos. 69, 70, 71, of the Wiener Zeitschrift für Kunst, Literatur, Theater und Mode, for June 9, 11, 13, 1829. These papers, written so shortly after Schubert's death by men extremely intimate with him, are very valuable.

3. Baurmeister also made two interesting communications to the Freie Presse of Vienna, for Apr. 17 and 21, 1869, containing six letters and parts of letters by Schütz to Schubert, and the latter articles were reprinted in the Leipzig Signale for Nov. 15, 22, 26, 28, 1869; translated in the Musical World, Jan. 8, 15, Feb. 1, 18, 1870, and in Baurmeister's Erinnerungen an Schubert, vol. all. (Vienna, 1873). But recollections written so long after the event must always be taken cum grano.

4. Schindler wrote an article in Edurke's Wiener Theaterzeitung, for May 3, 1831, describing Beethoven's making acquaintance with Schubert's songs on his death-bed; and other articles in the Niederheische Musikzeitung, for 1837. He also mentions Schubert in his Life of Beethoven, 3rd ed., II. 130.

5. Schumann printed four letters (incomplete), two poems, and a Dream, by Schubert, as 'Belliquen' in his Neue Zeitschrift für Musik for Feb. 1 and 3, 1839.

6. One of the same letters was printed complete in the Signale, No. 2, for 1878.

7. The Diary of Sofie Müller (Vienna, 1832), the Unvergessenes of Frau von Chery (Leipzig, 1838), and the Erinnerungen of her son W. von Chery (Schaffhausen, 1853), all afford original facts about Schubert by those who knew him.

8. Ferd. Luller's Erinnerungen (Cologne, 1860), contains a paper—'Vienna 52 years since'—embodying a few interesting and helike notices of the year 1827. Of all these, use has been made in the foregoing pages.

9. The first attempt to write a life of Schubert was made by von Kreisler, who, in 1861 published a small 8vo pamphlet of 165 pages entitled Franz Schubert, eine biographische Skizze; von Dr. Heinrich von Kreisler. This is a very interesting little book, and the work nearly so long as the second edition, it contains some facts which have dropped out of that.

10. The second edition, Franz Schubert, von Dr. Heinrich Kreisler von Heilborn (Vienna, Gerold, 1865), is a large 8vo of 619 pages, with portrait after Kupelwieser. This is a thoroughly honest, affectionate book, but it is deformed, like many German biographies, by a very diffuse style and a want of unnecessary matter in the shape of detailed notices of every one who came into contact with Schubert; and some of the letters appear to be garbled; but the analyses of the operas and the lists of works are valuable, and there are some interesting facts gathered from the Prohla, Ferdinand Schubert, Spaur, Huttenbrenner and others. It has been translated into English, by Mr. A. D. Coleridge (two vols. 8vo, Longman, 1869), with an Appendix by the present writer, containing the themes and particulars of the MS. Symphonies and other MS. music of Schubert, as seen by Arthur Sullivan and him in Vienna in 1867. A résumé of the whole is given in English by Willforace, Franz Schubert, etc. (London, 1867).

11. Both Kreisler's works have been largely utilized by H. Barbedette, in F. Schubert, sa vie, etc. (Paris, 1868). This contains an atrocious version of Rieder's portrait, and one new fact—a facsimile of Schober's song 'An die Musik,' valuable because, being dated Apr. 24, 1827, while the song was composed in 1817, it gives comparative early songs with later revisions of the same (pp. 24, 154, etc.), five pieces printed for the first time, and facsimile of a MS. page.

12. The chief value of Reissmann's book, Franz Schubert, sein Leben u. seine Werke (Berlin, 1873), consists in the extracts from the juvenile MS. songs, Quartet, etc. (pp. 1-30), the comparisons of early songs with later revisions of the same (pp. 24, 154, etc.), five pieces printed for the first time, and facsimile of a MS. page.

13. Gumprecht, L. Marx, and others have included sketches of Schubert in their works.

SCHUBERT, LOUIS (b. Dessau, Jan. 27, 1828; d. Dresden, Sept. 17, 1884), violinist and singing-master, went in his eighteenth year to St. Petersburg, and then as Konzertmeister to Königsberg, where he remained till 1862. He then returned to Dresden, where he enjoyed a great reputation as a teacher of singing. He published a method of singing in the form of songs, and four of his operettas became favourites.

G.

SCHUBERTH, (1) GOTTLÖB (b. Carsdorf, Aug. 11, 1778; d. Feb. 18, 1846), received his musical education at Jena, and learnt the violin from Stamitz. In 1804 he went to Magdeburg, resided there for some years, and was distinguished as an excellent clarinet and oboe player. In 1833 he moved to Hamburg. His eldest son,

(2) JULIUS FERDINAND GEORG (b. Magdeburg, July 14, 1804; d. Leipzig, June 9, 1875), was the founder of the well-known firm of J. Schuberth & Co. in Leipzig and New York. After learning the business of a music publisher in Magdeburg, he started in 1826 on his own account at Hamburg, whence he was enabled to found branch establishments at Leipzig (1832) and New York (1850). In 1854 he gave up the Hamburg business to his brother FRIEDRICH (5) and devoted himself entirely to Leipzig and New York. Besides his publishing business, Julius was an indefatigable student of language, literature and music. He was publisher, editor and proprietor of a Musikalisches Conversationslexicon (which has gone through ten editions, and from which the details of the present article have been obtained), the Kleine Hamburger Musik Zeitung (1840-50), the New York Musik Zeitung (1867), and Schubert's kleiner Musik Zeitung (1871-72). In 1840 he founded the Norddeutscher Musikverein and Preis Institut at Hamburg. He received many decorations from the crowned heads of Germany in recognition of his services to music. In 1874 he settled at Leipzig. His business, which in 1877 comprised over 6000 publications, was carried on after his death with increasing success by his widow and nephew until 1891, when it was bought by F. Siegel.

(3) LUDWIG (b. Magdeburg, Apr. 18, 1806; d. St. Petersburg, 1850), the second son of Gottlob, studied under his father and C. M. von Weber, and when only 16 was music-director at the Stadt Theater of his native town. He was subsequently court Kapellmeister at Oldenburg, and after living at Riga and Königsberg (1835) became (1845) conductor of the German Opera at St. Petersburg. His compositions include some published chamber music, besides operas and symphonies which remain in MS. His younger brother,

(4) CARL (b. Magdeburg, Feb. 25, 1811; d. Zürich, July 22, 1863), learnt the piano from his father, and the violoncello from L. Hesse. In 1825 he was placed under Dotzauer at Dresden, and in 1828 made his first concert tour to Ludwigslust and Hamburg. In 1829 he played at Copenhagen and Gothenburg, but a series of misfortunes drove him back to Magdeburg, where he occupied the post of first violoncello in the theatre orchestra. In 1833 he again played in Hamburg with success, and during the next few years gave concerts in all the principal towns of North Germany, Belgium and Holland, besides visiting Paris and London (1835). In the autumn of the latter year he was appointed solo violoncellist to the Czar. He remained for twenty years at St. Petersburg, occupying the posts of musical director at the University, conductor of the Imperial Court Orchestra, and inspector of the Imperial Dramatic College. His compositions include chamber music and concertos for the violin-cello, etc.

(5) FRIEDRICH WILHELM AUGUST (b. Magdeburg, Oct. 27, 1817), fifth son of Gottlob Schubert, was the head of the firm of 'Fritz Schubert' at Hamburg from 1853. w. b. s.

SCHUCH, ERNST VON (b. Graz, Nov. 23, 1847; d. Dresden, May 3, 1914), was at first intended for the legal profession, but music was too strong (he had appeared as a violinist at the age of 7, and at 9 years old played solos on the piano and violin in public), and he received instruction from Eduard Stoltz at Graz, and afterwards from Dessoff in Vienna. In 1867 he was appointed conductor of Lobe's theatre at Breslau, and after short engagements at Würzburg, Graz and Basle he was engaged by Pollini to conduct a series of Italian operas in different parts of Germany. In Mar. 1872 he conducted his first opera in Dresden, and in August following was appointed Kapellmeister there. In 1873 he was made court Kapellmeister, and very soon his great gifts began to make the Dresden opera famous throughout the world for the catholicity of its repertory, the broad views of its conductor, and the excellence of individual performances. Schuch always gave due regard to the art of the bel canto, and as an operatic conductor he had few rivals. In 1897 he was ennobled by the Emperor of Austria, and in 1899 he was given the title of privy councillor.

In 1875 he married the singer Clementine SCHUCH-PROSKA (her maiden name was accurately Procházka) (b. Vienna, Feb. 12, 1853), a pupil of Mme. Mathilde Marchesi at the Vienna Conservatoire, and a member of the opera company at Dresden from 1873. Her voice was a light soprano, and she sang florid music with great skill. She appeared in London at some of the early Richter Concerts, and at the Crystal Palace; she sang the part of Aennchen in 'Der Freischütz' at the German Opera under Richter in 1884, with much success, and also appeared as Eva in 'Die Meistersinger.' She retired from the stage in 1895. M.

SCHÜRMANN, GEORG CASPAR (b. circa 1672; d. Wolfenbüttel, Feb. 25, 1751¹), one of the early composers of German opera, was the son of a Lutheran pastor in Hanover. He early showed a decided talent for music, first as singer and afterwards as composer. From 1693-97 he was engaged as falsetto singer at the Hamburg Opera, and also for church services. In 1697 the Duke of Brunswick invited him to Wolfenbüttel, and shortly afterwards, at the Duke's expense, he visited Italy for the further cultivation of his musical talent. From 1702-1707, with the Duke of Brunswick's permission, he entered the service of the Duke of Meiningen, but in the latter year he was recalled to Wolfenbüttel, where he remained till his death, busily engaged in the composition and production of German operas, in which he himself took a leading part as alto singer, and also from time to time acted as Kapellmeister. Many of these operas² were also produced at Hamburg, but none of them were ever printed during his lifetime, and most of them are only known from their libretti. Of a few only has the music survived. One of them, entitled 'Ludovicus Pius,' or 'Ludewig der fromme,' first produced in 1726, has now been reprinted, though not complete, by Dr. Hans Sommer, from a MS. in his possession, and appears as Band xvii. in Eitner's Publikation älterer Musikwerke. As a Beilage to the Monatshefte of 1885, Eitner has also printed an aria from another opera of Schürmann's, entitled 'Henricus Anceps,' or 'Heinrich der Vogler,' besides a complete Church Cantata for the New Year, both of which are calculated to give a very favourable idea of Schürmann's powers as a composer. Eitner is disposed to assign him a very high place even in association with Handel and Bach, both for genuine feeling and contrapuntal skill.

SCHÜTT, EDUARD (b. St. Petersburg, Oct. 22, 1856), was intended for a mercantile career, but relinquished it for music, which he learned from Petersen and Stein sufficiently to pass the examination at the St. Petersburg Conservatoire, with honour, in 1876. He then entered the Conservatorium at Leipzig, passed the final examination there in 1878, and went to Vienna, where he was elected conductor of the Akademische Wagner-Verein. In Jan. 1882 he played his concerto (op. 7) in G minor, before the Russian Musical Society at St. Petersburg. It was performed at the Crystal Palace, Sydenham, Apr. 15, 1882, by Mme. Frickenhaus. Later, he composed a second piano concerto, op. 47, in F minor, also a comic opera, 'Signor Formica.' His published works include—Serenade for strings, op. 6; Variations for 2 pianos, op. 9; numerous songs, piano pieces, transcription of songs by Brahms, Strauss's Fledermaus waltz, etc. G., with addns.

SCHÜTZ, HEINRICH (name sometimes latinised SAGITTARIUS) (b. Köstritz, Saxony, Oct. 8, 1585; d. Dresden, Nov. 6, 1672), 'the father of German music,' as he has been styled. His father and grandfather occupied a good social position at Weissenfels, whither his father removed with his family on the death of the grandfather in 1591. Admitted in 1599 as a chorister into the chapel of the Landgraf Maurice of Hesse-Cassel, Schütz had, besides a thorough musical training, the advantage of a good general education in the arts and sciences of the time, which enabled him in 1607 to proceed to the University of Marburg, where he pursued with some distinction the study of law. The Landgraf, when on a visit to Marburg, observing in his protégé a special inclination and talent for music, generously offered to defray the expense of his further musical cultivation at Venice under the tuition of Giovanni Gabrieli, the most distinguished musician of the age. Schütz accordingly proceeded to Venice in 1609, and already in 1611 published the first-fruits of his studies under Gabrieli, a book of 5-part madrigals dedicated to his patron. On the death of Gabrieli in 1612, Schütz returned to Cassel and was appointed organist to the Landgraf, but, either uncertain himself as to his real vocation for music, or induced by his friends, he had still some thoughts of taking up again the profession of law. Perhaps the Landgraf's chapel was too narrow a sphere for him to work in; it was fortunate therefore that in 1614 he received the invitation to undertake the entire direction of the Kapelle of the Elector Johann Georg of Saxony at Dresden, at a salary of 400 gulden. The Landgraf was unwilling to part with him, and would at first only allow him to accept this position temporarily. He recalled Schütz in 1616, but on the earnest petition of the Elector finally consented to his remaining permanently at Dresden. Schütz's first endeavour at Dresden was to reorganise the electoral music, and, indeed, as he had been engaged to do, on the Italian model, for the purpose of introducing the new concerted style of music, vocal and instrumental. He procured good Italian instruments and players, and sent qualified members of the Kapelle to Italy for a time to perfect themselves in the new style of singing and playing.

His first work of importance appeared in 1619, 'Psalmen Davids sammt etlichen Motetten und Concerten mit 8 und mehr Stimmen,' a work which shows the influence of the new monodic or declamatory style which Schütz had learned in Italy.

For his purpose Schütz uses the means of expression afforded by contrast of different choirs, or contrast of solo voices with full choir, or contrast of voices with instruments, either the simple basso continuo, i.e. for organ, lute or theorbo, or strings with occasional trumpets, etc. His next work, in 1623, was an oratorio on the subject of the Resurrection, entitled 'Historia der fröhlichen und seligmachen Auferstehung unsers einigen Erlösers und Seligmachers Jesu Christi.'

The occasion for the composition of this work would seem to have been the practice, still kept up at Dresden, Leipzig and other churches in Saxony, of singing the story of the Resurrection at Easter as that of the Passion in Holy Week. A 'Geistliches Gesangbuch' of 1612 informs us that 'Every year on Easter-day at Vespers, before the sermon, there is sung in our Christian congregations the Resurrection, so splendidly set by Antonius Scandellus.' This Antonius Scandellus, Scandello or Scandelli, had been one of Schütz's own predecessors at Dresden from 1568-80, and had written both a Passion and a Resurrection. (See SCANDELLO.) His 'Resurrection' must have continued in use even beyond Schütz's time, since it even appears in Vopelius's 'Leipziger Gesangbuch' of 1682. It may be seen in Schöberlein and Riegel's 'Schatz des liturgischen Chorgesang,' ii. 619-47.¹ Schütz's 'Resurrection' follows the line of Scandello's; only whereas Scandello's composition is purely vocal, that of Schütz is adapted to instrumental accompaniment. Both works begin with a setting (in Scandello 5-part, in Schütz 6-part) of the words 'Die Auferstehung unsers Herrn Jesu Christi, wie uns die von den Evangelisten beschrieben wird,' and conclude with a setting (Scandello 5-part, Schütz 8-part) of the words 'Gott sei Dank, der uns den Sieg gegeben hat,' etc. In Scandello, the part of the Evangelist is altogether liturgical; but in Schütz, while it is mostly based on the liturgical melody, the more important passages have given to them a more characteristic and expressive form of declamation, which sometimes rises up to actual melody in the more modern sense of the term, and the Evangelist's part is accompanied throughout either by the organ or preferably by four viola da gamba, which are called upon at certain pauses in the narrative to execute appropriate runs or passages ('Zierlicke und appropriierte Läufe oder Passaggi machen'). The words of other personages are set for two or more voices, according to their number—as, for instance, the words of the three Marias as a trio, of the two angels as a duet, of the eleven disciples as a 6-part chorus; only that usually for single personages two parts are employed (as in Scandello), though Schütz permits one of these parts to be taken, as he expresses it, instrumentaliter.

This work of Schütz is altogether remarkable, as being a highly successful endeavour to unite dramatic expressiveness with reverence for ecclesiastical tradition. The same spirit is shown in another form in his next work of importance, 'Cantiones sacrae,' for four voices with bass accompaniment for organ. The endeavour here is to unite the older form of the motet with the newer form of the concerto, and the diatonic church modes with the use of chromatic harmonies.

In 1627 Johann Georg I. of Saxony wished to signalise the occasion of the marriage of his daughter to the Landgraf of Hesse-Darmstadt by giving the first performance of opera in Germany. The opera had just sprung into life in connexion with the new musical movement in Italy, as a supposed revival of the antique music-drama. Schütz was commissioned to procure from Italy Peri's opera 'Dafne.' The poet Opitz was set to the task of translating the Italian text by Rinuccini into German, and as it was found that Peri's music would not quite fit the new German words, Schütz had to adapt them to new music of his own. The opera 'Dafne,' as thus set by Schütz, was performed at Torgau on Apr. 13, 1627. Unfortunately the music of this first German opera has not been preserved, and no further account of it has been given. It is probable, however, that Schütz did little else on this occasion than rearrange Peri's music and add something in exactly the same style. In any case, the result was not such as to induce Schütz to make any further attempts in music for the theatre, if we except another occasional piece, a ballet, 'Orpheus und Euridice,' written in 1638, the music of which appears also to be lost. In 1625 appeared his 'Geistliche Gesänge,' and in 1628 Schütz, having lost his wife, found some comfort in his sorrow, as he tells us, by occupying himself with the task of composing melodies with simple 4-part harmony to a rhymed version of the Psalms by Dr. Cornelius Becker. This version by Becker was meant to be a Lutheran rival to an earlier Calvinistic version by Lobwasser, based on the French Psalter of Marot and Beza, and adapted to the same melodies. Later on, Johann Georg II., with a view to the introduction of the Becker Psalter in place of Lobwasser's in the schools and churches of Saxony, urged Schütz to complete his composition of melodies for the work. The task was hardly congenial to our composer, as he himself confesses in the preface to the complete work when it appeared in 1661. Two further editions, however, of this Psalter, with Schütz's melodies, appeared in 1676 and 1712. Some of these melodies passed into later Cantionals, though none has ever taken the same place in general use or esteem that similar work by less eminent composers has done.

Partly to distract himself from his great sorrow, partly to familiarise himself with the still newer development of music in Italy, with which the name of Claudio Monteverdi is chiefly associated, Schütz set out on a second visit to Italy in 1629. He found musical taste in Venice greatly changed since the time of his first visit (1612), 'modern ears were being regaled with a new kind of sensation' ('recente titillatione'). The new style consisted in the greater prominence given to solo singing, and to intensity of expression in solo singing, the freer use of dissonances, and greater richness and variety in instrumental accompaniment. In a series of works entitled 'Symphoniae sacrae,' Schütz endeavoured to turn to account the new experiences he had gained, without, however, like his new Italian models, turning his back upon his earlier polyphonic training. He never altogether forgot to unite the solidity of the old school with the piquancy of expression of the new. The first part of 'Symphoniae sacrae' appeared at Venice in 1629, and consists of 20 settings of Latin texts, chiefly from the Psalms and the Song of Songs. A second part of 'Symphoniae sacrae,' with the subtitle 'Deutsche Concerten,' appeared at Dresden in 1657; a third part also at Dresden in 1650. The two later parts are settings of German Bible texts. They may be described as brief dramatic cantatas for various combinations of voices and instruments, and in virtue of them Schütz may be considered joint-founder with Carissimi of the dramatic oratorio. Winterfeld¹ singles out for special notice from the first part, 'Fili, fili mi, Absalom' (David's lament over Absalom), written for bass solo with accompaniment of four trombones, and from the third part, 'Saul, Saul, was verfolgtst du mich?' (a cantata for the festival of the Conversion of St. Paul), and 'Mein Sohn, warum hast du uns das gethan?' (for the first Sunday after Epiphany).

In 1631 and following years Saxony became the scene of war, and one result was the complete disorganisation of the Elector's Kapelle, means failing for the payment of musicians, and the attention of the Elector and his court being occupied with more serious matters than music. Schütz obtained leave in 1633 to accept an invitation to Copenhagen from King Christian IV. of Denmark. The years 1635-41 were spent in wanderings to and fro between different courts with occasional returns to Dresden, Schütz being still nominally in the service of the Elector. The chief works worthy of notice published during these years are two sets of Geistliche Concerte for one to five voices, with basso continuo (1636, 1639), the second set being especially remarkable by the composer's frequent directions for the securing of proper expression in his music. (It is to be remembered that marks and terms of expression were not then in common use.) In 1641 Schütz returned to Dresden to make an effort to reorganise the music, but from want of means his efforts were not crowned with anything like success till 1645 or 1647. A work of importance was written and produced about 1645, though strangely enough it was never printed or published in Schütz's lifetime, and only appeared in print for the first time in 1873, edited by Carl Riedel of Leipzig. It is a small Passion oratorio on the Seven Words from the Cross. This work is of importance as contributing some new elements to the development of the later Passion music. First, the part of the Evangelist is no longer based on the liturgical intonation, as in the 'Resurrection' oratorio of 1623, but takes the form of the new 'Arioso recitative.' For the sake of variety Schütz divides this part among different solo voices, and sets it twice in the form of a quartet. Next, the work is opened and concluded with a chorus (5-part with basso continuo) expressive of the feelings of Christians at the contemplation of our Lord upon the Cross. After the opening, and again before the concluding chorus, there occurs a short 5-part instrumental symphony, which has been aptly described as an ideal raising and dropping of the curtain before and after the action. The instruments to be used are not specified, but strings are probably more intended than anything else. The part of our Lord differs from the other parts in having a 3-part instrumental accompaniment. This probably originated out of the custom in previous 'Passions' (as followed in Scandello's 'Resurrection,' for instance), of setting the words of our Lord in four vocal parts. Schütz here improved upon the idea, first timidly suggested by himself in his 'Resurrection,' of giving the words of a single character to a single voice, for the sake of dramatic consistency, and assigning the accompanying parts to the instruments. The way in which this accompaniment is carried out deserves to be noticed. It is neither in the old style nor in the new, but a curious combination of both; the lower part is identical with the basso continuo for sustaining the harmony throughout: the other two parts are written in the polyphonic style with the voice, consisting of imitations either preceding or following the vocal phrase. It is well known how Bach in his 'Matthew-Passion' developed this idea of a special accompaniment to the words of our Lord, surrounding Him as it were with a halo. Naturally there are no arias in the modern sense in Schütz's work, all is in the form of expressive recitative. A touching simplicity and tenderness distinguish the whole work. (See PASSION MUSIC.)

In 1648 appeared his 'Musicalia ad Chorum sacrum,' a work in quite a different style from those last mentioned, and showing a reaction in Schütz's mind against the exclusive claims of the modern 'Manier.' It consists of twenty-nine pieces to German words, for five, six and seven voices, in the old motet or strictly polyphonic style, in which the bassus generalis or continuus may be dispensed with (as the title says, 'Wobei der Bassus Generalis auf Gutachten und Begehren, nicht aber aus Nothwendigkeit zugleich auch zu befinden ist'). In the preface he expresses the opinion that no one will become a capable musician who has not first acquired skill in strict contrapuntal work without the use of the basso continuo. Personal reasons to some extent combined with artistic reasons to produce the reaction in favour of the older school of music as against the new, to which we have referred. From 1641 onwards, in spite of the many personal sacrifices he had made on behalf of the Elector's Kapelle, as for instance by paying or increasing out of his own salary the salaries of others of the musicians, he appears to have suffered so many annoyances in connexion with it as caused him to have almost a disgust for the further cultivation of music at Dresden, and induced him to solicit over and over again in 1651-55 dismissal from the Elector's service. The new Italian element in the chapel was very different from the old; Schütz was getting involved in continual differences and squabbles with a new Italian colleague Bontempi. Italian art was losing its earlier seriousness of purpose, turning its back upon its older traditions, and aiming simply at the amusement of princes and their courts, and thus acquiring a popularity dangerous to higher ventures of art. The Elector, however, refused to accept the resignation of his Kapellmeister, and after 1655 affairs improved somewhat, so far as Schütz was personally concerned, so that he continued quietly at his post for the remaining sixteen years of his life.

In 1657 he published 'Zwölf geistliche Gesänge' a 4 for small choirs, a work which we might call a German Communion and Evening Service, consisting, as it does, mainly of settings of the chief portions of the liturgy in order, viz. the Kyrie, Gloria, Nicene Creed, Words of Institution (usually appointed to be sung in early Lutheran liturgies), a Communion Psalm, Post-Communion Thanksgiving, then a Magnificat and Litany, etc. From 1657-61 our composer would seem to have been occupied with the task enjoined on him by the new Elector, that of composing additional melodies for Becker's Psalter, already mentioned; work which apparently gave him more trouble than it was worth, and hindered him from devoting himself to other more congenial work. In the preface to this Psalter, 1661, he says that 'to confess the truth, he would rather have spent the few remaining years of his life in revising and completing other works which he had begun, requiring more skill and invention' ('mehr sinnreichen Inventionen').

In 1664, at the instance of the Elector Johann Georg II., Schütz composed what may be described as a Christmas Oratorio. Its original title is 'Historia der freuden- und gnaden-reichen Geburt Gottes und Mariens Sohn Jesu Christi,' etc. It is a work conceived on a larger scale—vocal and instrumental—than his other works of the kind, but, unfortunately, Schütz only had printed the part of the Evangelist in recitative with figured bass. In this imperfect form it was republished by Philipp Spitta in 1885 in the first volume of his complete edition of the works of Schütz. Since then the other vocal and nearly all the instrumental parts have been discovered in MS.

in the university library of Upsala in Sweden. The introduction, consisting of the title 'Die Geburt,' etc., is set for four vocal and five instrumental parts. This is followed by 'The Message of the Angel,' set for soprano solo with accompaniment of two violettas and one violone, introducing a simple cradle song; the 'Chorus of Angels,' for six voices with violins and violas; the words of the Shepherds set for three alto voices accompanied by two flutes and bassoon; the words of the Wise Men, for three tenor voices with two violins and bassoon; the High Priests for four bass voices and two trombones; and so on with the rest of the work to its conclusion with a Thanksgiving Chorus. The whole work has now been edited in score for practical use by A. Schering as a supplement to Spitta's complete edition.

The last work of Schütz preserved to us, and perhaps his most famous work, is his setting of the story of the Passion, four settings in all, after the four Evangelists, 'Historia des Leidens und Sterbens unserer Herrn und Heylandes Jesu Christi' (1665-66). This work was never published in his own lifetime, and the only original copy extant is that of the St. John Passion, presented by the composer himself to the Duke of Wolfenbüttel, and now in the library at Wolfenbüttel. The only copy of the other settings is that made by a later hand in 1690, regarding which see below in list of Schütz's works. As we now have the work, it is for voices alone without instruments. It is, therefore, as if the composer here wished to renounce the mere external advantages of the newer concerted and dramatic style for the sake of showing how the spirit of it could be retained and applied to the purely vocal and older polyphonic style. For what specially distinguishes this Passion Music is the series of brief choruses of surprising dramatic energy and truth of expression, yet never overstepping the bounds of devout reverence inspired by the subject. Otherwise the work is more purely liturgical than later Passions, not having arias and Chorals to interrupt the narrative and give that variety of interest so needed for modern concert performance. Each Passion is opened according to old custom with a setting of the title ('the Passion, etc.') and closed with a devotional chorus in motet style, the text taken from some familiar church hymn. The rest of the work is written in unaccompanied recitative, though parts of it may have been meant to be accompanied in the manner suggested by Schütz himself in his 'Resurrection.' In the 'St. Matthew' the recitative has more of melodic expressiveness than in the other Passions. The 'St. Mark' is peculiar in combining the greatest monotony of recitative with the richest dramatic character in the choruses. Spitta, the editor of the complete edition of Schütz's works, is inclined, on this and other grounds, to doubt the authenticity of the 'St. Mark Passion' (see his Preface, pp. xx, xxi). But the fact of its being joined with the other undoubtedly authentic Passions without anything to indicate its being by a different author, is sufficient to outweigh mere suspicions. These 'Passions,' compressed by Carl Riedel and so far adapted to the requirements of modern performance, have been repeatedly produced with considerable success by the Riedelsche Verein of Leipzig.

In his later years Schütz's powers began to fail, especially his sense of hearing; and we are told, when he could no longer go out, he spent the most of his time in the reading of Holy Scripture and spiritual books. His last attempts at composition were settings of portions of the 119th Psalm; and no verse indeed of that Psalm could have been more fittingly chosen as the motto of both his personal life and his art-work than that on which he was last engaged, but left unfinished: 'Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage.' He is the true predecessor of Handel and Bach, not so much in the mere form of his work as the spirit. If in the dramatised Biblical scenes of his 'Symphoniae sacrae' he is more especially Handel's predecessor, in his Passion Music he is Bach's. Both Handel and Bach simply brought to perfection what lay in germ in Heinrich Schütz. His great merit consists in this, that at a time when the new dramatic style was threatening the complete overthrow of the older polyphonic style, he saw how to retain the advantages of both, and laboured to engraft the one upon the other. The rather singular coincidence of Schütz's birth-year being exactly a hundred years earlier than the birth-year of Handel and Bach, brought about, on the occasion of the keeping of the bicentenary of the two latter, in 1885, a great revival of interest in the work of their forerunner, which has had this practical result at least, the publication of a monumental edition of his works by Breitkopf & Härtel of Leipzig.

SCHULHOFF, (1) JULIUS (b. Prague, Aug. 2, 1825; d. Berlin, Mar. 13, 1898), once dear to player and dancer for his Galop di Bravura, Impromptu Polka and many more brilliant and clever PF. pieces. He learned the piano from Kischer, and counterpoint from Tomaschek, and before he was 14 made a successful appearance as a player. Notwithstanding his success, the boy's ambition was too great to allow him to remain in Prague, and in 1842 he went to Paris, then a hotbed of pianoforte virtuosity. Here a fortunate interview with Chopin gave him his opportunity. He played in public (Nov. 2, 1845) and published his first two works, of which op. 1, an Allegro Brillant, was dedicated to Chopin. After a lengthened residence in Paris he took a very extended tour through France, Austria (1849-50), England, Spain (1851) and even south Russia and the Crimea (1853). He lived in Dresden from 1870, and in Berlin from about 1897. A sonata in F minor and twelve études are among his more earnest compositions. G.

(2) ERWIN (b. Prague, June 8, 1894), great-grandnephew of the above, studied at the Conservatoires of Prague, Vienna, Leipzig and Cologne and is a pianist who devotes himself to the furtherance of modern art and a composer who aims at naturalism. He has published much piano music and composed a considerable quantity of chamber music. His op. 26 is a symphony for soprano voice and orchestra, his op. 28 for alto and orchestra (Riemann.)

SCHULTHEISS, BENEDICT (d. Mar. 1, 1693), was the younger son of Hieronymus Schultheiss (1600-69) and his second wife, whom he married in 1648. Benedict became organist at S. Egidius, Nuremberg, but he died at a comparatively early age. He published first a set of clavier pieces:

'Muth und Geist ermunternder Clavier-Lust. Erster Theil, Nürnberg, 1679; Ander Theil, 1690.'

Later he seems to have devoted himself entirely to church music, and composed many Chorals which are still included in the evangelical church-song; they will be found in the following works, all published in his lifetime:

Heiliger Sonntags-Handel und Kirch-Wandel. . . durch Sigmund von Birken. Nürnberg, 1681. Contains two melodies with figured bass by 'Ben. Schultheiss.'

Der geistlichen Erquick-Stunden des. . . Hehr. Müllers. Postlicher Andacht-Riang von denen Blinngewissen verfasst, anjetzo mit 60 Lieder verordnet. und von unterschiedlichen Tön-Künstlern in Klange gesetzt. Nürnberg, 1691. Contains thirteen melodies with figured bass by Schultheiss.

Gott-geheiliger Christen nützlich erquickende Seelen-Lust. mit Heilich in Noten gesetzten neuen Arien. vorgestellet vo. W. C. D. [W. C. Döbler]. Nürnberg, 1692.

It contains twenty-five melodies with figured bass; Zahn included nine of them in his great work Die Melodien der deutschen evangelischen Kirchenlieder, 1893, and thinks Schultheiss composed all twenty-five, although only the first eleven are initialled B. S. C. s.

SCHULTHESIUS, JOHANN PAUL (b. Fechenheim, Saxe-Coburg, Sept. 14, 1748; d. Leghorn, Apr. 18, 1816), received his first lessons in music from his father, a schoolmaster; in 1764 he entered the local college to follow a course of theology, became a member of the choir, and remained there six years, acquiring a thorough knowledge of music. From 1770-73 he was at the University of Erlangen, where he completed his theological studies, while he was able to obtain organ lessons from Kehl, an excellent organist. He was then offered a post at Leghorn, as Protestant minister to the colony of Germans and Dutch settled there; he accepted and went to Italy, where he remained for the rest of his life. Checchi was organist at that time, and gave him lessons in counterpoint and composition. Schulthesius was an excellent performer on the clavier, and in 1782 he was called upon to play some of his own compositions before the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and was very favourably received. He became one of the most erudite musicians of his time, and in 1807 was nominated secretary of the fourth class of the Accademia di scienze, lettere ed arti di Livorno. His treatise on the quality and character of church music: was also published in the first volume of the Proceedings of his Accademia. Letters of his to Marco Santucci are in existence; in one of them he mentions his work, and expresses his desire to hear Santucci's opinion of it. The following compositions were also published:

Sulla musica da chiesa. Memoria di Gio. Paolo Schulthesius. Livorno, presso Tommasi, 1810, 4to.

Tre sonate per il Cimbalo o piano-forte con l' accompagnamento d' un violino obbligato. Composte da Gio. Paolo Schulthesius. Opera 1. Livorno, 1780, obl. folio. A copy of the second edition is in the British Museum.

Sonate a solo per il cimbalo o pianoforte. Op. 2. Livorno, obl. fol.

Allrepetto a vece 12 variazioni pour le Clavecin ou pianoforte, violon, viola et violoncello obligato. Op. 6. Augsburg (Gombart).

Andante gracioso de Pleyel varié pour le clavecin ou pianoforte, violon et violoncello obligato. Op. 7. Augsburg (Gombart).

SCHULTZ, see PRAETORIUS.

SCHULTZ (SCHULTZE), CHRISTOPH (b. Sorau, 1606; d. Delitzsch, Aug. 28, 1683), a pupil of Schein at Leipzig, cantor at the Neumarkt Halle, and in 1633 cantor at Delitzsch. He composed several books of sacred songs, some in madrigal form, and a Passion according to St. Luke (1653) (Riemann; Q.-L.).

SCHULTZ (SCOUTETUS), JOHANN (b. Lüneburg, late 16th cent.; d. Dannenberg, Brunswick, Feb. 1653), was organist to the Prince of Brunswick, Lüneburg. He composed several books of motets, madrigals, etc., and instrumental pieces (Riemann; Q.-L.; Dr. Rob. Siebeck).

SCHULZ (SCHULZ-BEUTHEN), HEINRICH (b. Beuthen, June 19, 1838; d. Dresden, Mar. 12, 1915), was a voluminous composer of works on a large scale, which, however, have not gained any very widespread acceptance.

He studied at the Leipzig Conservatorium (1862-65) and privately with Karl Riedel, and at that time composed Psalm xxix. for three choirs, wind and organ, with other choral settings of psalms and two symphonic poems. He then settled (1866) as a teacher in Zürich, where six of his eight symphonies were written, together with many other works both vocal and instrumental. A nervous break-down brought a temporary cessation of composition. From 1881 he lived in Dresden, from 1893-95 in Vienna, when he returned to Dresden again, and in 1911 was made Royal Professor. The works of his first Dresden period include four operas (not, apparently, performed), a Requiem (ch. and orch.), and further symphonic poems. His eighth symphony ('Sieges-sinfonie') and movements for further symphonies belong to his second Dresden period. Most of his larger works remain in M.S.

C. (information from Riemann).

SCHULZ, JOHANN ABRAHAM PETER (b. Lüneburg, Mar. 30, 1747; d. Schwedt, June 10, 1800), son of a baker. His master was Schmutz, a local organist of ability, whose descriptions of Berlin and of Kirnberger's labours so excited him that at the age of 15, without money and against the wish of his family, he went thither and put himself under the protection of Kirnberger, who was very good to him, under whom he studied and to whom he became greatly attached. In 1768 he was fortunate enough to travel in France, Italy and Germany under good auspices. In 1773 he returned to Berlin, and found his old master and Sulzer at work on their Allgem. Theorie der schönen Künste, and undertook the musical portion of it from S to the end. In 1776-78 he was also Kapellmeister to the French theatre at Berlin, and afterwards to the private theatre of the Crown Princess at Berlin and that of Prince Henry at Reinsberg, where he stayed for seven years from Apr. 1, 1780. His choruses to 'Athalia,' produced while there, were translated and brought out at Copenhagen, and the result was an offer from the King of Denmark to be his Kapellmeister at a salary of 2000 thalers. This he accepted and held for eight years, from 1787, with great credit and advantage to the place. His health at length obliged him to leave, and he departed, Sept. 29, 1795, for Hamburg, Lüneburg and Berlin. He lost his wife, and at length died at Schwedt deeply and widely lamented. Schulz was a prolific composer; his operas are 'Clarisse' (1775), 'La Fée Urgèle' (1782), 'Minona,' and 'Le Barbier de Séville' (1786), 'Aline' (1789); besides, he wrote music to plays, and sacred music such as 'Christi Tod,' 'Maria und Johannes,' etc. Q.-L. gives the names of many church and chamber works, as well as of his important song collections. His literary works include a treatise on a new mode of writing music. He also edited Kirnberger's Wahre Grundsätze zum Gebrauch der Harmonie (1783). But his true claim to notice rests on his songs. He was the first to give the Volkslied an artistic turn. He was very careful to get good words, and as a considerable move was taking place among the poets at that date (1770-80), and Burger, Claudius, Hölty, and others were writing, he had good opportunities, and many of his settings were published in the Göttingen Musenalmanach and Voss's Almanach. He published also 'Lieder in Volkston bey dem Klavier zu singen' (1782), containing forty-eight songs, 2nd ed. (1785) in two parts, and a third part in 1790. (See Reissmann, Gesch. d. deutschen Lieder, p. 149.)

BRIT.—MAX BRÜNNERT, J. A. P. Schulz's deutsche Oper, A.M. 18, 1819; HERNIMANN VON HASE, Beiträge zur Breitkopf'schen Geschichtsschreibung, Z.M.W., May 1920, pp. 463-5; Schulz.

SCHULZ (SCHULZE), JOHANN PHILIPP CHRISTIAN (b. Langensalza, Thuringia, Feb. 1, 1773; d. Leipzig, Jan. 30, 1827), was a student at Leipzig University and studied music under Engler and Schicht. From 1795 he conducted the performances of Sekonda's theatrical company, and on July 31, 1810, was appointed director and conductor of the Gewandhaus concert, which position he held to the time of his death. He composed overtures, marches, etc., for orchestras and a number of vocal compositions for chorus as well as for solo voices. His music library, including the MS. of Beethoven's 'Wiener Tänze,' he bequeathed to the School of St. Thomas (Riemann; Q.-L.).

SCHULZE, J. F. & SONS, a firm of organ-builders, whose founder, (1) J. F. SCHULZE (b. Milbitz-bei-Paulinzella, Thuringia, 1794; d. 1858), began his manufactory in his birth-place, 1825. His first organs were for Horba (with ten stops) and Milbitz (twenty-one stops). In 1825 he moved to Paulinzella, where his business largely increased. At this period his principal organs were those for Bremen Cathedral and Solingen. In 1851 the firm sent an organ to the International Exhibition in Hyde Park, which obtained a prize medal and was the beginning of much work done for England. In 1854 they built the great organ in the Marienkirche at Lübeck.

J. F. Schulze was succeeded by his three sons, the most distinguished of whom was (2) HEINRICH EDMUND (b. circa 1824; d. 1878), who introduced many improvements. On the rebuilding of the parish church of Doncaster, after the fire in 1853, the organ was rebuilt by the Schulze firm, with great success. Besides this fine instrument, their most important organs are in Bremen, Düsseldorf, Söst and Aplerbeck. H. E. Schulze died at the age of 54, and shortly after, on the death of the surviving brother, the firm ceased to exist.

The Schulzes' organs are most celebrated for their flute-pipes, which are constructed so as to admit as much wind as possible. In order to do this the feet are opened very wide, and the pipes are in consequence cut up unusually high. By this means, with a comparatively low pressure of wind an extraordinarily rich quantity of tone is produced. The Schulzes carried the same principles into their wooden flute pipes. Their organs are also celebrated for their string-toned stops, but the drawback in all of these is a certain slowness in their speech. Besides the organs at Doncaster and Northampton, the Schulzes have instruments in England at churches at Armley; Leeds (in conjunction with Hill); Hindley, Wigan; Tyne Dock, South Shields; Harrogate; also at Northampton Town Hall; Charter-house School, Godalming; Seaton Carew (Thos. Walker, Esq.).

W. B. S.

SCHUMANN, CLARA JOSEPHINE (b. Leipzig, Sept. 13, 1819; d. Frankfurt, May 20, 1896), wife of Robert Schumann, one of the greatest pianoforte-players that the world has ever heard, was the daughter of Friedrich WIECK (q.v.).

She began the pianoforte at a very early age under her father's guidance; and on Oct. 20, 1828, when she had just completed her ninth year made her début in public at a concert of Frä. Perthaler's, where she played with Emilie Reinhold in Kalkbrenner's 4-hand variations on the march from 'Moise.' The notices in the Leipzig Tageblatt and A.M.Z. show that she was already an object of much interest in the town. At this time she was accustomed to play the concertos of Mozart and Hummel with orchestra by heart, and thus early did she lay the foundation of that sympathy with the orchestra which so distinguished her. On Nov. 8, 1830, when just over 11, she gave her first concert at the Gewandhaus under the good old name of 'Musikalische Akademie'; and her performance is cited by the A.M.Z. as a proof of how far application and good teaching can bring great natural gifts at so early an age. Her solo pieces were 'Rondo brillant' (op. 101), Kalkbrenner; 'Variations brillantes' (op. 23), Herz; and variations of her own on an original theme; and she is praised by the critic just referred to for already possessing the brilliant style of the greatest players of the day. Her next appearance was on May 9, 1831, in pieces by Pixis and Herz—still bravura music.

In the same year a set of four polonaises by her was published by Hofmeister. About this time she was taken to Weimar, Cassel and Frankfort, and in the spring of 1832 to Paris, where she gave a concert on Apr. 9 at which she extemporised for the first time in public. Mendelssohn was there at the time, but was suffering from an attack of cholera, and thus the meeting of these two great artists—destined to become such great friends—was postponed. On July 9, and July 31, 1832, she gives two other 'Musikalische Akademien' in Leipzig, at which, besides Pixis and Herz, we find Chopin's variations on 'La ci darem' (op. 2), a piece which, only a few months before, Robert Schumann had welcomed with his first and one of his most spirited reviews. At the former of these two concerts Fräulein Livia Gerhardt (Mme. Frege) sang in public for the first time.

On Sept. 30, 1832, Clara Wieck seems to have made her début at the Gewandhaus concerts in Moscheles's G minor concerto, and from that time forward her name is regularly found in the programmes of those famous subscription concerts, as well as of others held in the same hall. In the winter of 1837 she made her first visit to Vienna, and remained during the winter playing with great success, and receiving the appointment of 'Kk. Kammer-virtuosin'.

Schumann had been on a very intimate footing in the Wiecks's house for some years, but it was not till the end of 1835 that his attachment to Clara was openly avowed, and it was not till Sept. 12, 1840 (the eve of her birthday), after a series of delays and difficulties which are sufficiently touched upon in the article on Robert Schumann, that they were married. For eighteen months after this event Mme. Schumann remained in Leipzig. We find her name in the Gewandhaus programmes attached to the great masterpieces, but occasionally playing more modern music, as on Dec. 6, 1841, when she twice played with Liszt in a piece of his for two pianos. In the early part of 1842 she and her husband made a tour to Hamburg, which she continued alone as far as Copenhagen. Early in 1844 they went together to St. Petersburg, and at the end of the year Schumann's health made it necessary to leave Leipzig and remove to Dresden, where they resided till 1850. During all this time Mme. Schumann's life was bound up with her husband's, and they were separated only by the exigencies of her profession. She devoted herself not only to his society, but to the bringing out of his music, much of which—such as the P.F. concerto, the quintet, quartet and trios, etc.—owed its first reputation to her. In 1846 she met Jenny Lind for the first time at Leipzig, and in the winter of the same year they met again at Vienna, when the two great artists appeared together at a concert in December.

England, though at one time in view, was reserved to a later day. At Paris she never played after the early visit already spoken of. The trials which this faithful wife must have undergone during the latter part of her husband's life, from his first attempt at self-destruction to his death, July 29, 1856, need only be alluded to here. It was but shortly before the fatal crisis that she made her first visit to England, playing at the Philharmonic on Apr. 14 and 28, at the Musical Union on four separate occasions, and elsewhere, her last appearance being on June 24. On June 17 she gave an afternoon 'Recital' at the Hanover Square rooms, the programme of which is worth preserving.

1. Beethoven, Variations in E♭ on theme from the Eroica; 2. Sterndale Bennett, Two Diversions (op. 17), Suite de pièces (op. 24, No. 1); 3. Clara Schumann, Variations on theme from Schumann's 'Bunte Blätter'; 4. Brahms, Sarabande and Gavotte in the style of Bach; 5. Scarlatti, Piece in A major; 6. R. Schumann's Carnival (omitting Eusebius, Florestan, Coquette, Replique, Estrella and Aveu).

She returned from London to Bonn just in time to receive her husband's last breath (July 29, 1856).

After this event she and her family resided for some years in Berlin with her mother, who had separated from Wieck and had married a musician named Bargiel; and in 1863 she settled at Baden-Baden, in the Lichtenthal, which then became her usual headquarters till 1874.

Her reception in this conservative country was hardly such as to encourage her to repeat her visit; she appeared again at the Philharmonic on June 29, 1857, and on June 27, 1859. In a few years the appreciation of Schumann's music had greatly increased on this side the Channel; and the anxiety of amateurs to hear an artist whose fame on the Continent was so great, became so loudly expressed, that Mme. Schumann was induced to make another visit. She played at the Philharmonic, May 29, 1865, Musical Union, Apr. 18, 25, and June 6, etc. etc. In 1867 she returned again, and after this her visit became an annual one up to 1882, interrupted only in 1878, 1879, 1880, when health and other circumstances did not permit her to travel. She came again in 1885, 1886, 1887 and 1888. In 1886 she again visited Austria, and gave six concerts at Vienna; and any coldness that the Viennese may have previously shown towards her husband's compositions was then amply atoned for.

In 1878 she accepted the post of principal teacher of the pianoforte in the Conservatoire founded by Dr. Hoch at Frankfort, where she lived and worked with great success until the end of her life.

This is not the place or the time to speak of the charm of Madame Schumann's personality, of the atmosphere of noble and earnest simplicity which surrounded her in private life no less than in her public performance. Those who had the privilege of her acquaintance do not need such description, and for those who had not it is unnecessary to make the attempt. She was deeply and widely beloved, and at a time when there appeared to be a prospect of her being compelled by ill-health to abandon her public appearances, the esteem and affection of her numerous friends took the practical form of a subscription, and a considerable sum of money was raised in Germany and England for her use.

As an artist,¹ Mme. Schumann's place was indubitably in the very first rank; indeed she may perhaps be considered to stand higher than any of her contemporaries, if not as regards the possession of natural or acquired gifts, yet in the use she made of them. Her playing was characterised by an entire absence of personal display, a keen perception of the composer's meaning, and an unflinching power of setting it forth in perfectly intelligible form. These qualities would lead one to pronounce her one of the most intellectual of players, were it not that that term has come to imply a certain coldness or want of feeling, which was never perceived in her playing. But just such a use of the intellectual powers as serves the purposes of true art, ensuring perfect accuracy in all respects, no liberties being taken with the text, even when playing from memory, and above all securing an interpretation of the composer's work which is at once intelligible to the listener—this certainly formed an essential element of her playing, and it is worth while insisting on this, since the absence of that strict accuracy and perspicuity is too often mistaken for evidence of deep emotional intention. With all this, however, Mme. Schumann's playing evinced great warmth of feeling, and a true poet's appreciation of absolute beauty, so that nothing ever sounded harsh or ugly in her hands; indeed it may fairly be said that after hearing her play a fine work (she never played what is not good), one always became aware that it contained beauties undiscovered before. This was, no doubt, partly due to the peculiarly beautiful quality of the tone she produced, which was rich and vigorous without the slightest harshness, and was obtained, even in the loudest passages, by pressure with the fingers rather than by percussion. Indeed, her playing was particularly free from violent movement of any kind; in passages, the fingers were kept close to the keys and squeezed instead of striking them, while chords were grasped from the wrist rather than struck from the elbow. She founded her technique on the principle laid down by her father, F. Wieck, who was also her instructor, that 'the touch [i.e. the blow of the finger upon the key] should never be audible, but only the musical sound.'

an axiom the truth of which there is some danger of overlooking, in the endeavour to compass the extreme difficulties of certain kinds of modern pianoforte music.

Mme. Schumann's repertory was very large, extending from Scarlatti and Bach to Mendelssohn, Chopin and Brahms, and it would be difficult to say that she excelled in her rendering of any one composer's works rather than another's, unless it be in her interpretation of her husband's music. And even here, if she was pronounced by general opinion to be greatest in her playing of Schumann, it is probably because it was to her inimitable performances that we owe, in this country at least, the appreciation and love of his music now happily become universal, and thus the player shared in the acknowledgment she won for the composer.

Mme. Schumann's compositions, though not very numerous, evince that earnestness of purpose which distinguished her work in general. Even her earliest essays, which are short pianoforte pieces written for the most part in dance-form, are redeemed from any approach to triviality by their interesting rhythms, and in particular by the freshness of their modulations, the latter being indeed in some cases original even to abruptness. Their general characteristic is that of delicacy rather than force, their frequent staccato passages and the many skipping grace-notes which are constantly met with requiring for their performance a touch of the daintiest lightness; although qualities of an opposite kind are occasionally shown, as in the 'Souvenir de Vienne,' op. 9, which is a set of variations in bravura style on Haydn's Austrian Hymn. Among her more serious compositions of later date are a trio in G minor for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, op. 17, which is thoroughly musicianlike and interesting, three charming cadenzas to Beethoven's concertos, opp. 37 and 58, and a set of three Preludes and Fugues, op. 16, which deserve mention not only on account of their excellent construction, but as forming a most valuable study in legato part-playing. There is also a piano concerto, op. 7, dedicated to Spohr, of which the passages (though not the modulations) remind one of Hummel; but it is a short work and not well balanced, the first movement being reduced to a single solo, which ends on the dominant, and leads at once to the andante.

In the later works, as might naturally be expected, there are many movements which bear traces of the influence of Schumann's music both in harmony and rhythm, but this influence, which first seems perceptible in the 'Soirées musicales,' opp. 5, 6, is afterwards less noticeable in the pianoforte works than in the songs, many of which are of great beauty, and some of which (see op. 12) were incorporated into collections by Schumann. Her 'Liebst du um Schönheit' is one of the most expressive songs in existence. Schumann himself has made use of themes by Mme. Schumann in several instances, namely in his Impromptus, op. 5 (on the theme of her Variations, op. 3, which are dedicated to him), in the andantino of his sonata in F minor op. 14, and (as a 'motto') in the 'Davidsbündertänze,' op. 6.

SCHUMANN, GEORG ALFRED (b. Königstein on the Elbe, Oct. 25, 1866), was taught the violin by his father, Clemens Schumann (d. 1918), the town musical director there, and the organ by his grandfather, with such good results that at 9 years old he played in the orchestra, and at 12 did the organist's duty. At 15 he played the piano in public, and after learning from some Dresden masters, he went to the Leipzig Conservatorium, remaining there from 1881-88. In 1891-96 he was conductor of a choral society at Danzig, and from 1896 to 1899 director of the Philharmonic orchestra and choir in Bremen. In 1900 he was appointed Royal Professor, and made head of the Berlin Singakademie (see BERLIN). In 1913 he followed Bruch as head of the composition school of the Academy of Arts and was made Doctor of Philosophy of Berlin University in 1916. His compositions are in all the larger forms excepting opera. His op. 3 is a choral work, 'Amor und Psyche'; a symphony in B minor won a prize; his first published work for orchestra was a suite, 'Zur Karnevalszeit,' op. 22. Op. 24 is a set of symphonic variations on 'Wer nur den lieben Gott läßt walten,' for organ and orchestra, and op. 30, 'Variationen und Doppelfuge über ein lustiges Thema für grosses Orchester,' shows much humour and technical skill; a serenade, op. 34, and an overture, 'Liebesfrühling,' are among the orchestral works which have reached their climax in a symphony in F minor, op. 42. This symphony was played in London under Landon Ronald in 1909, and his oratorio 'Ruth' (op. 50) was given at the Sheffield Festival under Wood in 1911.

Two other choral works, the 'Totenklage,' op. 33, and 'Sehnsucht,' op. 40, deserve mention, and his chamber music includes variations and fugue on a theme of Beethoven for two pianos, a quintet for piano and strings in E minor, op. 18, a violoncello sonata, op. 19, two trios, in F and G, two violin sonatas in E minor and C sharp minor, and a pianoforte quartet for piano and strings in F minor, op. 29. Schumann belongs to the more conservative group of German composers, and his sound musicianship, the originality of his ideas and the skill of their treatment, mark him as a worthy member of the party which most strenuously resists the attitude of the ultra-modern writers. (Paul Hiescher, in Monographien moderner Musiker; Riemann.) M., adds.

SCHUMANN, ROBERT ALEXANDER (b. Zwickau, Saxony, June 8, 1810; d. Emdenick near Bonn, July 29, 1856), was the youngest son of Friedrich August Gottlob Schumann (b. 1773), a bookseller, whose father was a clergyman in Saxony; the composer's mother, Johanna Christiana (b. 1771), was the daughter of Herr Schnabel, Rathschirurgus (surgeon to the town council) at Zeitz.

Schumann cannot have received any incitement towards music from his parents; his father, however, took a lively interest in the belles lettres, and was himself known as an author. He promoted his son's leanings towards art in every possible way, with which, however, his mother seems to have had no sympathy. In the small provincial town where Schumann spent the first eighteen years of his life there was no musician capable of helping him beyond the mere rudiments of the art. There was a talented town-musician, who for several decades was the best trumpeter in the district,² but, as was commonly the case, he practised his art simply as a trade. The organist of the Marienkirche, J. G. Kuntzsch, Schumann's first pianoforte teacher, after a few years declared that his pupil was able to progress alone, and that his instruction might cease. He was so impressed with the boy's talent, that when Schumann subsequently resolved to devote himself wholly to art, Kuntzsch prophesied that he would attain to fame and immortality, and that in him the world would possess one of its greatest musicians. Some twenty years later, in 1845, Schumann dedicated to him his studies for the pedal-piano, op. 56.

His gift for music showed itself early. He began to compose, as he tells us himself, before he was 7. According to this he must have begun to play the piano, at latest, in his sixth year. When he was about 11, he accompanied at a performance of Friedrich Schneider's 'Weltgericht,' conducted by Kuntzsch, standing up at the piano to do it. At home, with the aid of some young musical companions, he got up performances of vocal and instrumental music which he arranged to suit their humble powers. In more extended circles, too, he appeared as a pianoforte-player, and is said to have had a wonderful gift for extempore playing. His father took steps to procure for him the tuition of C. M. von Weber, who had shortly before (1817) been appointed Kapellmeister in Dresden. Weber declared himself ready to undertake the guidance of the young genius, but the scheme fell through for reasons unknown. From that time Schumann remained at Zwickau, where circumstances were not favourable to musical progress; he was left to his own instruction, and every inducement to further progress must have come from himself alone. Under these circumstances, a journey made when he was 9 years old to Carlsbad, where he first heard a great pianoforte-player—Ignaz Moscheles—must have been an event never to be forgotten; and indeed during his whole life he retained a predilection for certain of Moscheles's works, and a reverence for his person. The influence of the pianoforte technique of Moscheles on him appears very distinctly in the variations published as op. 1.

At the age of 10 he entered the fourth class at the Gymnasium (or Academy) at Zwickau, and remained there till Easter, 1828. He had then risen to the first class, and left with a certificate of qualification for the University. During this period his devotion to music seems to have been for a time rather less eager, in consequence of the interference of his school-work and of other tastes. Now, at the close of his boyhood, a strong interest in poetry, which had been previously observed in him, but which had meanwhile been merged in his taste for music, revived with increased strength; he rummaged through his father's book-shop, which favoured this tendency, in search of works on the art of poetry; poetical attempts of his own were more frequent, and at the age of 14 Robert had already contributed some literary efforts to a work brought out by his father and called Bildergalerie der berühmtesten Menschen aller Völker und Zeiten. That he had a gift for poetry is evident from two Epithalamia given by Wasielewski.¹ In 1827 he set a number of his own poems to music, and it is worthy of note that it was not by the classical works of Goethe and Schiller that Schumann was most strongly attracted. His favourite writers were Schulze, author of 'Die bezauberte Rose'; the unhappy Franz von Sonnenberg; Byron, and, above all, Jean Paul, with whose works he made acquaintance in his seventeenth year (at the same time as with the compositions of Franz Schubert). These poets represent the cycle of views, sentiments, and feelings, under whose spell Schumann's poetical taste, strictly speaking, remained throughout his life. And in no musician has the influence of his poetical tastes on his music been deeper than in him.

STUDENT DAYS.—On Mar. 29, 1828, Schumann matriculated at the University of Leipzig as Studiosus Juris. It would have been more in accordance with his inclinations to have devoted himself at once wholly to art, and his father would no doubt have consented to his so doing; but he had lost his father in 1826, and his mother would not hear of an artist's career. Her son dutifully submitted, although he was decidedly averse to the study of jurisprudence. Before actually joining the university he took a short pleasure trip into South Germany, in April 1828. He had made acquaintance in Leipzig with a fellow-student named Gisbert Rosen; and a common enthusiasm for Jean Paul soon led to a devoted and sympathetic friendship. Rosen went to study at Heidelberg, and the first object of Schumann's journey was to accompany him on his way. In Munich he made the acquaintance of Heine, in whose house he spent several hours. On his return journey he stopped at Bayreuth to visit Jean Paul's widow, and received from her a portrait of her husband.

During the first few months of his university life, Schumann was in a gloomy frame of mind. A students' club to which he belonged for a time, struck him as coarse and shallow, and he could not make up his mind to begin the course of study he had selected. A large part of the first half-year had passed by and still—as he writes to his friend—he had been to no college, but 'had worked exclusively in private, that is to say, had played the piano and written a few letters and Jean Paulade.'²

In this voluntary inactivity and solitude the study of Jean Paul must certainly have had a special charm for him. That writer, unsurpassed in depicting the tender emotions, with his dazzling and even extravagant play of digressive fancy, his excess of feeling over dramatic power, his incessant alternations between tears and laughter, has always been the idol of sentimental women and ecstatic youths. 'If everybody read Jean Paul,' Schumann writes to Rosen, 'they would be better-natured, but they would be unhappier; he has often brought me to the verge of desperation, still the rainbow of peace bends serenely above all the tears, and the soul is wonderfully lifted up and tenderly glorified.' Even in his latest years Schumann would become violently angry if any one ventured to doubt or criticise Jean Paul's greatness as an imaginative writer, and the close affinity of their natures is unmistakable. Schumann himself tells us how once, as a child, at midnight, when all the household were asleep, he had in a dream and with his eyes closed, stolen down to the old piano, and played a series of chords, weeping bitterly the while. So early did he betray that tendency to overstrung emotion which found its most powerful nourishment in Jean Paul's writings.

Music, however, is a social art, and it soon brought him back again to human life. In the house of Professor Carus¹ he made several interesting acquaintances, especially that of Marschner, who was then living in Leipzig, and had brought out his 'Vampyr' there in the spring of 1828. His first meeting with Wieck, the father of his future wife, took place in the same year; and Schumann took several pianoforte lessons from him. Several music-loving students met together there, and all kinds of chamber music were practised. They devoted themselves with especial ardour to the works of Schubert, whose death, on Nov. 19, 1828, was deeply felt by Schumann. Impelled by Schubert's example, he wrote at this time eight polonaises for four hands; also a quartet for piano and strings, and a number of songs to Byron's words; all of which remain unpublished. Besides these occupations, he made a more intimate acquaintance with the clavier works of Sebastian Bach. It is almost self-evident that what chiefly fascinated Schumann in Bach's compositions was the mysterious depth of sentiment revealed in them. Were it not so, it would be impossible to conceive of Bach in connexion with the chaotic Jean Paul; and yet Schumann himself says that in early life Bach and Jean Paul had exercised the most powerful influence upon him. Considering the way in which his musical education had been left to itself, the fact of his so thoroughly appreciating the wealth and fullness of life in Bach's compositions at a time when Bach was looked upon only as a great contrapuntist, is clear evidence of the greatness of his own genius, which indeed had some affinity to that of Bach. The ingenuity of outward form in Bach's works was neither strange nor unintelligible to him. For although Schumann had hitherto had no instructor in composition, it need scarcely be said that he had long ago made himself familiar with the most essential parts of the composer's art, and that constant practice in composition must have given him much knowledge and skill in this branch of his art.

At Easter, 1829, Schumann followed his friend Rosen to the University of Heidelberg. The young jurists were perhaps tempted thither by the lectures of the famous teacher, A. F. J. Thibaut; but it is evident that other things contributed to form Schumann's resolution: the situation of the town—a perfect Paradise—the gaiety of the people, and the nearness of Switzerland, Italy and France. A delightful prospect promised to open to him there: 'That will be life indeed!' he writes to his friend; 'at Michaelmas we will go to Switzerland, and from thence who knows where?' On his journey to Heidelberg chance threw him into the society of Willibald Alexis. Alexis had trodden the path which Schumann was destined to follow, and had reached art by way of the law. No doubt this added to Schumann's interest in the acquaintance. It cannot be denied that even in Heidelberg Schumann carried on his legal studies in a very desultory manner, though Thibaut himself was a living proof that that branch of learning could co-exist with a true love and comprehension of music. Only a few years before (in 1825) Thibaut had published his little book, Über Reinheit der Tonkunst, a work which at that time essentially contributed to alter the direction of musical taste in Germany. Just as in his volume Thibaut attacks the degenerate state of church music, Schumann, at a later date was destined to take up arms, in word and deed, against the flat insipidity of concert and chamber music. Nevertheless the two men never became really intimate; in one, no doubt, the doctor too greatly preponderated, and in the other the artist. Thibaut himself subsequently advised Schumann to abandon the law, and devote himself entirely to music.

Indeed, if Schumann was industrious in anything at Heidelberg it was in pianoforte-playing. After practising for seven hours in the day, he would invite a friend to come in the evening and play with him, adding that he felt in a particularly happy vein that day; and even during an excursion with friends he would take a dumb keyboard with him in the carriage. By diligent use of the instruction he had received from Wieck in Leipzig, he brought himself to high proficiency as an executant; and at the same time increased his skill in improvisation. One of his musical associates at this time used afterwards to say that from the playing of no other artist, however great, had he ever experienced such ineffaceable musical impressions; the ideas seem to pour into the player's mind in an inexhaustible flow, and their profound originality and poetic charm already clearly foreshadowed the main features of his musical individuality. Schumann appeared only once in public, at a concert given by a musical society at Heidelberg, where he played Moscheles's variations on the 'Alexandermarsch' with great success. He received many requests to play again, but refused them all, probably, as a student, finding it not expedient.

It will no doubt be a matter of surprise that Schumann could have justified himself in thus spending year after year in a merely nominal study of the law, while in fact wholly given up to his favourite pursuit. A certain lack of determination, a certain shrinking from anything disagreeable, betray themselves during these years as his general characteristics, and were perhaps an integral part of his nature. At the same time his conduct is to a certain extent explicable, by the general conditions of German student life. Out of the strict discipline of the Gymnasium the student steps at once into the unlimited freedom of the University. It was the intoxicating poetry of the student life which Schumann drank in deep draughts. Its coarseness was repellent to his refined nature, and his innate purity and nobility guarded him against moral degradation; but he lived like a rover rejoicing in this bright world as it lies open to him, worked little, spent much, got into debt, and was as happy as a fish in the water. Besides its tender and rapturous side, his nature had a vein of native sharpness and humour. With all these peculiarities he could live his student's life to the full, though in his own apparently quiet and unassertive way. The letters in which he discusses money matters with his guardian, Herr Rudel, a merchant of Zwickau, show how he indulged his humorous mood even in these: 'Dismal things I have to tell you, respected Herr Rudel,' he writes on June 21, 1830:

'In the first place, that I have a repetitorium which costs eighty gulden every half-year, and secondly, that within a week I have been under arrest by the town (don't be shocked) for not paying thirty gulden of other college dues.'

And on another occasion, when the money he had asked for to make a journey home for the holidays did not arrive:

'I am the only student here, and wander alone about the streets and woods, forlorn and poor, like a beggar, and with debts into the bargain. Be kind, most respected Herr Rudel, and only this once send me some money—only money—and do not drive me to seek means of setting out which might not be pleasant to you.'

The reasons he employs to prove to his guardian that he ought not to be deprived of means for a journey into Italy are most amusing:

'At any rate I shall have made the journey; and as I must make it once, it is all the same whether I use the money for it now or later.'

His compositions, too, plainly show how deeply the poetical aspect of student life had affected him, and had left its permanent mark on him. I need only remind the reader of Kerner's 'Wanderlied' (op. 35, No. 3), dedicated to an old fellow-student at Heidelberg, and of Eichendorff's 'Frühlingsfahrt' (op. 45, No. 2). Among German songs of the highest class, there is not one in which the effervescent buoyancy of youth craving for distant flights has found such full expression, at once so thoroughly German and so purely ideal, as in this 'Wanderlied,' which indeed, with a different tune, is actually one of the most favourite of student songs. 'Frühlingsfahrt' tells of two young comrades who quit home for the first time, one of whom soon finds a regular subsistence and a comfortable home, while the other pursues glittering visions, yields to the thousand temptations of the world, and finally perishes; it is a portrait of a German student drawn from the life, and the way in which Schumann has treated it shows that he was drawing on the stores of his own experience.

Several journeys also served to infuse into Schumann's student life the delight of free and unrestrained movement. In Aug. 1829 he went for a pleasure trip to North Italy, quite alone, for two friends who had intended to go failed him. But perhaps the contemplative and dreamy youth enjoyed the loveliness of the country and the sympathetic Italian nature only the more thoroughly for being alone. Nor were little adventures of gallantry wanting. Fragments of a diary kept at this time, which are preserved (Wasielewski, p. 325), reveal to us the pleasant sociableness of the life which Schumann now delighted in. The Italian music which he then heard could indeed do little towards his improvement, except that it gave him, for the first time, the opportunity of hearing Paganini. The deep impression made by that remarkable player is shown by Schumann's visit to Frankfurt (Easter, 1830) with several friends to hear him again, and by his arrangement of his 'Caprices' for the pianoforte (opp. 3 and 10). Shortly after this he seems to have heard Ernst also in Frankfurt. In the summer of 1830 he made a tour to Strassburg, and on the way back to Saxony visited his friend Rosen at Detmold.

When Schumann entered upon his third year of study, he made a serious effort to devote himself to jurisprudence; he took what was called a Repetitorium, that is, he began going over again with considerable difficulty, and under the care and guidance of an old lawyer, what he had neglected during two years. He also endeavoured to reconcile himself to the idea of practical work in public life or the government service. His spirit soared up to the highest goal, and at times he may have flattered his fancy with dreams of having attained it; but he must have been convinced of the improbability of such dreams ever coming true; and indeed he never got rid of his antipathy to the law as a profession, even in the whole course of his Repetitorium. On the other hand, it must be said, that if he was ever to be a musician, it was becoming high time for it, since he was now 20 years old. Thus every consideration urged him to the point. Schumann induced his mother, who was still extremely averse to the calling of a musician, to put the decision in the hands of Friedrich Wieck. Wieck did not conceal from him that such a step ought only to be taken after the most thorough self-examination, but if he had already examined himself, then Wieck could only advise him to take the step. Upon this his mother yielded, and Robert Schumann became a musician.

MUSIC STUDY.—The delight and freedom which he inwardly felt when the die was cast, must have shown him that he had done right. At first his intention was only to make himself a great pianoforte-player, and he reckoned that in six years he would be able to compete with any pianist. But he still felt very uncertain as to his gift as a composer; the words which he wrote to his mother on July 30, 1830—'Now and then I discover that I have imagination, and perhaps a turn for creating things myself'—sound curiously wanting in confidence, when we remember how almost exclusively Schumann's artistic greatness was to find expression in his compositions.

He quitted Heidelberg late in the summer of 1830, in order to resume his studies with Wieck in Leipzig. He was resolved, after having wasted two years and a half, to devote himself to his new calling with energetic purpose and manly vigour. And faithfully did he keep to his resolution. The plan of becoming a great pianist had, however, to be given up after a year. Actuated by the passionate desire to achieve a perfect technique as speedily as possible, Schumann devised a contrivance by which the greatest possible dexterity of finger was to be attained in the shortest time. By means of this ingenious appliance the third finger was drawn back and kept still, while the other fingers had to practise exercises. But the result was that the tendons of the third finger were overstrained, the finger was crippled, and for some time the whole right hand was injured. This most serious condition was alleviated by medical treatment.¹ Schumann recovered the use of his hand, and could, when needful, even play the piano; but the third finger remained useless, so that he was for ever precluded from the career of a virtuoso.

Although express evidence is wanting, we may assume with certainty that this unexpected misfortune made a deep impression upon him; he saw himself once more confronted with the question whether it was advisable for him to continue in the calling he had chosen. That he answered it in the affirmative shows that during this time his confidence in his own creative genius had wonderfully increased. He soon reconciled himself to the inevitable, learned to appreciate mechanical dexterity at its true value, and turned his undivided attention to composition. He continued henceforth in the most friendly relations with his pianoforte-master, Wieck; indeed until the autumn of 1832 he lived in the same house with him (Grimmaische Strasse No. 36), and was almost one of the family. For his instructor in composition, however, he chose Heinrich Dorn, at that time conductor of the Opera in Leipzig, subsequently Kapellmeister at Riga, Cologne and Berlin, who lived till 1892. Dorn was a clever and sterling composer; he recognised the greatness of Schumann's genius, and devoted himself with much interest to his improvement.² It was impossible as yet to confine Schumann to a regular course of composition: he worked very diligently, but would take up now one point of the art of composition and now another. In 1836 he writes to Dorn at Riga that he often regrets having learnt in too irregular a manner at this time; but when he adds directly afterwards that, notwithstanding this, he had learnt more from Dorn's teaching than Dorn would believe, we may take this last statement as true. Schumann was no longer a tyro in composition, but had true musical genius, and his spirit was already matured. Under such circumstances he was justified in learning in his own way.

In the winter of 1832-33, he lived at Zwickau, and for a time also with his brothers at Schneeberg. Besides a pianoforte concerto, which still remains a fragment, he was working at a symphony in G minor, of which the first movement was publicly performed in the course of the winter both at Schneeberg and Zwickau. If we may trust the evidence of the Musikalisches Wochenblatt, Leipzig, 1875, p. 180, the whole symphony was performed at Zwickau in 1835, under Schumann's own direction, and the last movement was almost a failure.

At all events the symphony was finished, and Schumann expected it to be a great success; in this he must have been disappointed, for it has never been published. The first performance of the first movement at Zwickau took place at a concert given there on Nov. 18, 1832, by Wieck's daughter Clara, who was then 13 years of age. Even then the performances of this gifted girl, who was so soon to take her place as the greatest female pianist of Germany, were astonishing, and by them, as Schumann puts it, 'Zwickau was fired with enthusiasm for the first time in its life.' It is easily conceivable that Schumann himself was enthusiastically delighted with Clara, adorned as she was with the twofold charm of childlike sweetness and artistic genius. 'Think of perfection,' he writes to a friend about her on Apr. 5, 1833, 'and I will agree to it.' And many expressions in his letters seem even to betray a deeper feeling, of which he himself did not become fully aware until several years later.

Schumann's circumstances allowed him to

² Schumann's gratitude to him is thus expressed: 'The man who first gave a hand to me as I climbed upwards, and, when I began to doubt myself, drew me aloft so that I should see less of the common herd of mankind, and more of the pure air of art.'

revisit Leipzig in Mar. 1833, and even to live there for a time without any definite occupation. He was not exactly well off, but he had enough to enable him to live as a single man of moderate means. The poverty from which so many of the greatest musicians have suffered never formed part of Schumann's experience. He occupied himself with studies in composition chiefly in the contrapuntal style, in which he had taken the liveliest interest since making the acquaintance of Bach's works; besides this his imagination, asserting itself more and more strongly, impelled him to the creation of free compositions. From this year date the impromptus for piano on a romance by Clara Wieck, which Schumann dedicated to her father, and published in August 1833, as op. 5. In June he wrote the first and third movements of the G minor sonata (op. 22), and at the same time began the F# minor sonata (op. 11) and completed the toccata (op. 7), which had been begun in 1829. He also arranged a second set of Paganini's violin caprices for the piano (op. 10), having made a first attempt of the same kind (op. 3) in the previous year. Meanwhile he lived a quiet and almost monotonous life. Of family acquaintances he had few, nor did he seek them. He found a faithful friend in Frau Henriette Voigt, who was as excellent a pianist as she was noble and sympathetic in soul. She was a pupil of Ludwig Berger, of Berlin, and died young in the year 1839. Schumann was wont as a rule to spend his evenings with a small number of intimate friends in a restaurant. These gatherings generally took place at the 'Kaffeebaum' (Kleine Fleischergasse, No. 3). He himself, however, generally remained silent by preference, even in this confidential circle of friends. Readily as he could express himself with his pen, he had but little power of speech. Even in affairs of no importance, which could have been transacted most readily and simply by word of mouth, he usually preferred to write. It was, moreover, a kind of enjoyment to him to muse in dreamy silence. Henriette Voigt told W. Taubert that one lovely summer evening, after making music with Schumann, they both felt inclined to go on the water. They sat side by side in the boat for an hour in silence. At parting Schumann pressed her hand and said, 'To-day we have perfectly understood one another.'

FOUNDATION OF THE 'ZEITSCHRIFT.'—It was at these evening gatherings at the restaurant in the winter of 1833-34 that the plan of starting a new musical paper was matured. It was the protest of youth, feeling itself impelled to new things in art, against the existing state of music. Although Weber, Beethoven and Schubert had only been dead a few years, though Spohr and Marschner were still in their prime, and Mendelssohn was beginning to be celebrated, the general characteristic of the music of about the year 1830 was either superficiality or else vulgar mediocrity. 'On the stage Rossini still reigned supreme, and on the pianoforte scarcely anything was heard but Herz and Hüntel.' Under these conditions the war might have been more suitably carried on by means of important works of art than by a periodical about music. Musical criticism, however, was itself in a bad way at this time. The periodical called Caecilia, published by Schott, which had been in existence since 1824, was unfitted for the general reader both by its contents and by the fact of its publication in parts. The Berliner allgemeine musikalische Zeitung, conducted by Marx, had come to an end in 1830. The only periodical of influence and importance in 1833 was the Allgemeine musikalische Zeitung, published by Breitkopf & Härtel of Leipzig, and at that time edited by G. W. Fink. But the narrow view taken of criticism in that periodical, its inane mildness of judgment—Schumann used to call it 'Honigpinselerei' or 'Honey-daubing'—its lenity towards the reigning insipidity and superficiality, could not but provoke contradiction from young people of high aims. And the idea of first bringing the lever to bear on the domain of critical authorship, in order to try their strength, must have been all the more attractive to these hot-headed youths, since most of them had had the advantage of a sound scholarly education and knew how to handle their pens. On the other hand, they felt that they were not yet strong enough to guide the public taste into new paths by their own musical productions; and of all the set Schumann was the most sensible of this fact.

Such were the grounds on which, on Apr. 3, 1834, the first number of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik saw the light. Schumann himself called it the organ of youth and movement. As its motto he even chose this passage from the prologue to Shakespeare's Henry VIII.:

'Only they

Who come to hear a merry bawdy play,
A noise of targets, or to see a fellow
In a long motley coat guarded with yellow,
Will be deceived—'

a passage which sufficiently expresses his intention of contending against an empty flattering style of criticism, and upholding the dignity of art. 'The day of reciprocal compliments,' says the preliminary notice, 'is gradually dying out, and we must confess that we shall do nothing towards reviving it. The critic who dares not attack what is bad, is but a half-hearted supporter of what is good.' The doings of 'the three arch-foes of art—those who have no talent, those who have vulgar talent, and those who, having real talent, write too much,' are not to be left in peace. 'Their latest phase, the result of a mere cultivation of executive technique,' is to be opposed as inartistic. 'The older time,' on the other hand, 'and the works it produced, are to be recalled with insistence, since it is only at these pure sources that new beauties in art can be found.' Moreover, the Zeitschrift is to assist in bringing in a new 'poetic' period by its benevolent encouragement of the higher efforts of young artists, and to accelerate its advent. The editing was in the hands of Robert Schumann, Friedrich Wieck, Ludwig Schunke and Julius Knorr.

Of all these Schunke alone was exclusively a musician. That gifted pianist, who belonged to a widely dispersed family of esteemed musicians, came to Leipzig in 1833, and became a great friend of Schumann, but died at the end of the following year at the early age of 24. The three other editors were by education half musicians and half littérateurs, even Julius Knorr (b. 1807) having studied philology in Leipzig. Schumann co-operated largely in Schunke's contributions (signed with the figure 3), for handling the pen was not easy to him. Hartmann of Leipzig was at first the publisher and proprietor of the Zeitschrift, but at the beginning of 1835 it passed into the hands of J. A. Barth of Leipzig, Schumann becoming at the same time proprietor and sole editor. He continued the undertaking under these conditions till the end of June 1844; so that his management of the paper extended over a period of above ten years. On Jan. 1, 1845, Franz BRENDL (q.v.) became the editor, and after the summer of 1844 Schumann never again wrote for it, with the exception of a short article¹ on Johannes Brahms to be mentioned hereafter.

THE 'DAVIDSBÜNDLER.'—Schumann's own articles are sometimes signed with a number—either 2 or some combination with 2, such as 12, 22, etc. He also concealed his identity under a variety of names—Florestan, Eusebius, Raro, Jeanquirit. In his articles we meet with frequent mention of the Davidsbündler, a league or society of artists or friends of art who had views in common. This was purely imaginary, a half-humorous, half-poetical fiction of Schumann, existing only in the brain of its founder, who thought it well fitted to give weight to the expression of various views of art, which were occasionally put forth as its utterances. The characters which most usually appear are Florestan and Eusebius, two personages in whom Schumann endeavoured to embody the dual sides of his nature. The vehement, stormy, rough element is represented by Florestan; the gentler and more poetic by Eusebius. These two figures are obviously imitated from Vult and Walt in Jean Paul's Flegeljahre; indeed Schumann's literary work throughout is strongly coloured with the manner of Jean Paul, and frequent reference is made to his writings. Now and then, as moderator between these antagonistic characters, who of course take opposite views in criticism, 'Master Raro' comes in. In him Schumann has conceived a character such as at one time he had himself dreamed of becoming. The explanation of the name 'Davidsbündler' is given at the beginning of a 'Shrove Tuesday discourse' by Florestan in the year 1835. 'The hosts of David are youths and men destined to slay all the Philistines, musical or other.' In the college-slang of Germany the 'Philistine' is the non-student who is satisfied to live on in the ordinary routine of everyday life, or—which comes to the same thing in the student's mind—the man of narrow, sober, prosaic views, as contrasted with the high-flown poetry and enthusiasm of the social life of a German university. Thus, in the name of Idealism, the 'Davidsbündler' wage war against boorish mediocrity, and when Schumann regarded it as the function of his paper to aid in bringing in a new 'poetical phase' in music he meant just this. Though Schumann was himself the sole reality in the 'Davidsbündlerschaft,' he indulged his fancy by introducing personages of his acquaintance whose agreement with his views he was sure of. He quietly included all the principal co-operators in the Zeitschrift, and even artists such as Berlioz, whom he did not know, but in whom he felt an interest, and was thus justified in writing to A. von Zuccalmaglio in 1836: 'By the Davidsbund is figured an intellectual brotherhood which ramifies widely, and I hope may bear golden fruit.' He brings in the brethren, who are not actually himself, from time to time in the critical discussions; and the way in which he contrives to make this motley troop of romantic forms live and move before the eyes of the reader is really quite magical. He could say with justice: 'We are now living a romance the like of which has perhaps never been written in any book.' We meet with a Jonathan, who may perhaps stand for Schunke (on another occasion, however, Schumann designates himself by this name); a Fritz Friedrich probably meant for Lyser^{*} the painter, a lover of music; Serpentin is Carl Banck, a clever composer of songs, who at the outset was one of his most zealous and meritorious fellow-workers; Gottschalk Wedel is Anton von Zuccalmaglio, then living in Warsaw, who had made a name by his collection of German and foreign Volkslieder; Chiara is of course Clara Wieck, and Zilia (apparently shortened from Cecilia) is probably the same. Felix Mendelssohn appears under the name of Felix Meritis, and the name Walt occurs once (in 1836, Aus den Büchern der Davidsbündler, ii. Tanzliteratur). It cannot be asserted that any particular person was meant, still his direct reference to Jean Paul's Flegeljahre is interesting. There is also a certain Julius among the 'Davidsbündler,' probably Julius Knorr. The name occurs in Schumann's first essay on music, 'Ein opus ii.' This is not included in the Neue Zeitschrift, but appears in No. 49 of the Allgemeine musikalische Zeitung for 1831 (then edited by Fink). The editor has prefixed a note to the effect that 'it is by a young man, a pupil of the latest school, who has given his name,' and contrasts it with the anonymous work of a reviewer of the old school discussing the same piece of music. The contrast is indeed striking, and the imaginative flights of enthusiastic young genius look strange enough among the old-world surroundings of the rest of the paper.

SCHUMANN AS EDITOR.—Schumann placed this critique—which deals with Chopin's variations on 'La ci darem'—at the beginning of his collected writings, which he published towards the close of his life (Gesammelte Schriften, 4 vols. Georg Wigand, Leipzig, 1854). It is a good example of the tone which he adopted in the Neue Zeitschrift. His fellow-workers fell more or less into the same key, not from servility, but because they were all young men, and because the reaction against the Philistine style of criticism was just then in the air. This may be plainly detected, for instance, in a critique written by Wieck for the periodical called Cuculia, on Chopin's airs with variations. It is easy to understand that the total novelty of the style of writing of the Neue Zeitschrift should have attracted attention to music; the paper soon obtained a comparatively large circulation; and as, besides the charm of novelty and style, it offered a variety of instructive and entertaining matter, and discussed important subjects earnestly and cleverly, the interest of the public was kept up, and indeed constantly increased, from year to year. The influence exerted by Schumann on musical art in Germany through the medium of this paper cannot but be regarded as very important.

It has been sometimes said that Schumann's literary labours must have done him mischief, by taking up time and energy which might have been better employed in composition. But this view seems to me untenable. Up to the period at which we have now arrived, Schumann, on his own statement, had merely dreamed away his life at the piano. His tendency to self-concentration, his shyness, and his independent circumstances, placed him in danger of never achieving that perfect development of his powers which is possible only by vigorous exercise. Now the editing of a journal is an effective remedy for dreaming; and when, at the beginning of 1835, he became sole editor, however much he may have felt the inexorable necessity of satisfying his readers week after week, and of keeping his aim constantly in view, it was no doubt a most beneficial exercise for his will and energies. He was conscious of this, or he certainly would not have clung to the paper with such affection and persistency; and it is a matter of fact that the period of his happiest and most vigorous creativeness coincides pretty nearly with that during which he was engaged on the Zeitschrift. Hence, to suppose that his literary work was any drawback to his artistic career is an error, though it is true that as he gradually discovered the inexhaustible fertility of his creative genius, he sometimes complained that the details of an editor's work were a burden to him. Besides, the paper was the medium by which Schumann was first brought into contact and intercourse with the most illustrious artists of his time; and living as he did apart from all the practically musical circles of Leipzig, it was almost the only link between himself and the contemporary world.

Nor must we overlook the fact that certain peculiar gifts of Schumann found expression in his writings on musical subjects, gifts which would otherwise scarcely have found room for display. His poetic talent was probably neither rich enough nor strong enough for the production of large independent poems; but, on the other hand, it was far too considerable to be condemned to perpetual silence. In his essays and critiques, which must be regarded rather as poetic flights and sympathetic interpretations than as examples of incisive analysis, his poetical gift found a natural outlet, and literature is by so much the richer for them. Nay, it is a not unreasonable speculation whether, if his imaginative powers had not found this vent they might not have formed a disturbing and marring element in his musical creations. Even as it is, poetical imagery plays an important part in Schumann's music, though without seriously overstepping the permissible limits. This, too, we may safely say, that in spite of his silent and self-contained nature, there was in Schumann a vein of the genuine agitator, in the best and noblest sense of the word; he was possessed by the conviction that the development of German art, then in progress, had not yet come to its final term, and that a new phase of its existence was at hand. Throughout his writings we find this view beautifully and poetically expressed, as for instance, 'Consciously or unconsciously a new and as yet undeveloped school is being founded on the basis of the Beethoven-Schubert romanticism, a school which we may venture to expect will mark a special epoch in the history of art. Its destiny seems to be to usher in a period which will nevertheless have many links to connect it with the past century.'

Or again :

'A rosy light is dawning in the sky; whence it cometh I know not; but in any case, O youth, make for the light.'

SCHUMANN'S CRITICISM.—To rouse fresh interest and make use of that already existing for the advancement of this new movement was one of his deepest instincts, and this he largely accomplished by means of his paper. From his pen we have articles on almost all the most illustrious composers of his generation—Mendelssohn, Taubert, Chopin, Hiller, Heller, Henselt, Sterndale Bennett, Gade, Kirchner and Franz, as well as Johannes Brahms, undoubtedly the most remarkable composer of the generation after Schumann. On some he first threw the light of intelligent and enthusiastic literary sympathy; others he was actually the first to introduce to the musical world; and even Berlioz, a Frenchman, he eulogised boldly and successfully, recognising in him a champion of the new idea. By degrees he would naturally discern that he had thus prepared the soil for the reception of his own works. He felt himself in close affinity with all these artists, and was more and more confirmed in his conviction that he too had something to say to the world that it had not heard before. In the Zeitschrift he must have been aware that he controlled a power which would serve to open a shorter route for his own musical productions.

'If the publisher were not afraid of the editor, the world would hear nothing of me—perhaps to the world's advantage. And yet the black heads of the printed notes are very pleasant to behold.'

'To give up the paper would involve the loss of all the reserve force which every artist ought to have if he is to produce easily and freely.'

So he wrote in 1836 and 1837. But at the same time we must emphatically contradict the suggestion that Schumann used his paper for selfish ends. His soul was too entirely noble and his ideal aims too high to have any purpose in view but the advancement of art; and it was only in so far as his own interests were inseparable from those of his whole generation, that he would ever have been capable of forwarding the fortunes of his own works. The question even whether, and in what manner, his own works should be discussed in the Neue Zeitschrift he always treated with the utmost tact. In one of his letters he clearly expresses his principles on the subject as follows:

'I am, to speak frankly, too proud to attempt to influence Härtel through Fink (editor of the Allgemeine mus. Zeitung); and I hate, at all times, any mode of instigating public opinion by the artist himself. What is strong enough works its own way.'

His efforts for the good cause indeed went beyond essay-writing and composing. Extracts from a note-book published by Wasielewski prove that he busied himself with a variety of plans for musical undertakings of general utility. Thus he wished to compile lives of Beethoven and of Bach, with a critique of all their works, and a biographical dictionary of living musicians on the same plan. He desired that the relations of operatic composers and managers should be regulated by law. He wished to establish an agency for the publication of musical works, so that composers might derive greater benefit from their publications, and gave his mind to a plan for founding a Musical Union in Saxony, with Leipzig as its headquarters, to be the counterpart of Schillings's Deutscher National Verein für Musik.

RECEPTION OF PF. COMPOSITIONS.—In the first period of his editorship, before he had got into the way of easily mastering his day's labour, and when the regular round of work had still the charm of novelty, it was of course only now and then that he had leisure, or felt in the mood, for composing. Two great pianoforte works date from 1834 (the 'Carnaval,' op. 9, and the 'Études symphoniques,' op. 13), but in 1835 nothing was completed. After this, however, Schumann's genius began again to assert itself, and in the years 1836 to 1839 he composed that splendid set of pianoforte works of the highest excellence, on which a considerable part of his fame rests, viz. the great fantasia (op. 17), the F minor sonata (op. 14), Fantasiestücke (op. 12), Davidsbündlertänze, Novelletten, Kinderscenen, Kreisleriana, Humoreske, Faschingsschwank, Romanzen and others. The fount of his creative genius flowed forth ever clearer and more abundantly. 'I used to rack my brains for a long time,' writes he on March 15, 1839,

'but now I scarcely ever scratch out a note. It all comes from within, and I often feel as if I could go playing straight on without ever coming to an end.'

The influence of Schumann the author on Schumann the composer may often be detected. Thus the 'Davidsbündler' come into his music, and the composition which bears their name was originally entitled 'Davidsbündler, dances for the Pianoforte, dedicated to Walther von Goethe by Florestan and Eusebius.' The title of the F# minor sonata, op. 11, which was completed in 1835, runs thus: 'Pianoforte Sonata. Dedicated to Clara by Florestan and Eusebius.' In the 'Carnaval,' a set of separate and shorter pieces with a title to each, the names of Florestan and Eusebius occur again, as do those of Chiarina (the diminutive of Clara), and Chopin; the whole concluding with a march of the Davidsbündler against the Philistines.

The reception of Schumann's works by the critics was most favourable and encouraging, but the public was repelled by their eccentricity and originality; and it was not till after the appearance of the 'Kinderscenen' (1839) that they began to be appreciated. Opp. 1 and 2 actually had the honour of a notice in the Vienna Musikalische Zeitung of 1832, by no less a person than Grillparzer the poet. Fink designedly took hardly any notice of Schumann in the Allgemeine musikalische Zeitung. But Liszt wrote a long, discriminating, and very favourable article in the Gazette musicale of 1837 upon the impromptus (op. 5), and the sonatas in F# minor and F minor. Moscheles wrote very sympathetically on the two sonatas in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik itself (vols. 5 and 6), and some kind words of recognition of Schumann's genius were published subsequently from his diary.¹ Other musicians, though not expressing their sentiments publicly, continued to hold aloof from him. Hauptmann at that time calls Schumann's pianoforte compositions 'pretty and curious little things, all wanting in proper solidity, but otherwise interesting.'²

RELATIONS WITH MENDELSSOHN.—In October 1835 the musical world of Leipzig was enriched by the arrival of Mendelssohn. It was already in a flourishing state: operas, concerts and sacred performances alike were of great excellence, and well supported by the public. But although the soil was well prepared before Mendelssohn's arrival, it was he who raised Leipzig to the position of the most musical town of Germany. The extraordinarily vigorous life that at once grew up there under the influence of his genius, drawing to itself from far and near the most important musical talent of the country, has shown itself to be of so enduring a character that even at the present day its influences are felt. Schumann too, who had long felt great respect for Mendelssohn, was drawn into his circle. On Oct. 4, 1835, Mendelssohn conducted his first concert in the Gewandhaus; the day before this there was a musical gathering at the Wiecks', at which both Mendelssohn and Schumann were present, and it seems to have been on this occasion that the two first came into close personal intercourse.³ On Oct. 5, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Moscheles, Banck, and a few others, dined together. In the afternoon of the 6th there was again music at Wieck's house; Moscheles, Clara Wieck and L. Rakemann from Bremen, played Bach's D minor concerto for three clavier, Mendelssohn putting in the orchestral accompaniments on a fourth piano. Moscheles had come over from Hamburg, where he was staying on a visit, to give a concert in Leipzig. Schumann had already been in correspondence with him, but this was the first opportunity he had enjoyed of making the personal acquaintance of the man whose playing had so delighted him in Carlsbad when a boy of nine. Moscheles describes him as 'a retiring but interesting young man,' and the F# minor sonata, played to him by Clara Wieck, as 'very laboured, difficult and somewhat intricate, although interesting.'

A livelier intimacy, so far as Schumann was concerned, soon sprang up between him and Mendelssohn. When Mendelssohn had to go to Düsseldorf in May 1836, to the first performance of 'St. Paul' at the Niederrheinische Musikfest, Schumann even intended to go with him, and was ready months beforehand, though when the time arrived he was prevented from going. They used to like to dine together, and gradually an interesting little circle was formed around them, including among others Ferdinand David, whom Mendelssohn had brought to Leipzig as leader of his orchestra. In the early part of January 1837 Mendelssohn and Schumann used in this way to meet every day and interchange ideas, so far as Schumann's silent temperament would allow. Subsequently when Mendelssohn was kept more at home by his marriage, this intercourse became rarer. Schumann was by nature unsociable, and at this time there were outward circumstances which rendered solitude doubly attractive to him. Ferdinand Hiller, who spent the winter of 1839–40 in Leipzig with Mendelssohn, relates that Schumann was at that time living the life of a recluse and scarcely ever came out of his room. Mendelssohn and Schumann felt themselves drawn together by mutual appreciation. The artistic relations between the two great men were not as yet, however, thoroughly reciprocal. Schumann admired Mendelssohn to the point of enthusiasm. He declared him to be the best musician then living, said that he looked up to him as to a high mountain-peak, and that even in his daily talk about art some thought at least would be uttered worthy of being graven in gold. And when he mentions him in his writings, it is in a tone of enthusiastic admiration, which shows in the best light Schumann's fine ideal character, so remarkable for its freedom from envy. And his opinion remained unaltered: in 1842 he dedicated his three string quartets to Mendelssohn, and in the 'Album für die Jugend' there is a little piano piece called 'Erinnerung,' dated Nov. 4, 1847, which shows with eloquent simplicity how deeply he felt the early death of his friend. It is well known how he would be moved out of his quiet stillness if he heard any disparaging expression used of Mendelssohn. Mendelssohn, on the contrary, at first only saw in Schumann the man of letters and the art-critic. Like most productive musicians, he had a dislike to such men as a class, however much he might love and value single representatives, as was really the case with regard to Schumann. From this point of view must be regarded the expressions which he makes use of now and then in letters concerning Schumann as an author.⁴ If they sound somewhat disparaging, we must remember that it is not the personal Mendelssohn speaking against the personal Schumann, but rather the creative artist speaking against the critic, always in natural opposition to him. Indeed it is obviously impossible to take such remarks in a disadvantageous sense, as Schumann quite agreed with Mendelssohn on the subject of criticism.¹ One passage in his writings is especially remarkable in this respect. He is speaking of Chopin's pianoforte concerto, and Florestan exclaims,

'What is a whole year of a musical paper compared to a concerto by Chopin? What is a magister's rage compared to the poetic frenzy? What are ten complimentary addresses to the editor compared to the Adagio in the second Concerto? And believe me, Davidites, I should not think you worth the trouble of talking to, did I not believe you capable of composing such works as those you write about, with the exception of a few like this concerto. Away with your musical journals! It should be the highest endeavour of a just critic to render himself wholly unnecessary; the best discourse on music is silence. Why write about Chopin? Why not create at first hand—play, write and compose?'

True, this impassioned outburst has to be moderated by Eusebius. But consider the significance of Schumann's writing thus in his own journal about the critic's vocation! It plainly shows that he only took it up as an artist, and occasionally despised it. But with regard to Schumann's place in art, Mendelssohn did not, at that time at all events, consider it a very high one, and he was not alone in this opinion. It was shared, for example, by Spohr and Hauptmann. In Mendelssohn's published letters there is no verdict whatever on Schumann's music.² The fact, however, remains that in Schumann's earlier pianoforte works he felt that the power or the desire for expression in the greater forms was wanting, and this he said in conversation. He soon had reason to change his opinion, and afterwards expressed warm interest in his friend's compositions. Whether he ever quite entered into the individualities of Schumann's music may well be doubted; their natures were too dissimilar.

VIENNA.—Schumann's constant intimacy in Wieck's house had resulted in a tender attachment to his daughter Clara, now grown up. It was in the latter part of 1835 that this first found any definite expression. His regard was reciprocated, and in September 1837 he preferred his suit formally to her father.³ Wieck, however, did not favour it; possibly he entertained loftier hopes for his gifted daughter. At any rate he was of opinion that Schumann's means and prospects were too vague and uncertain to warrant his setting up a home of his own. Schumann seems to have acknowledged the justice of this hesitation, for in 1838 he made strenuous efforts to find a new and wider sphere of work. With the full consent of Clara Wieck he decided on settling in Vienna, and bringing out his musical periodical in that city. The glory of a great epoch still cast a light over the musical life of the Austrian capital—the epoch when Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Schubert were living and working there. In point of fact, all genuine music had vanished even during Beethoven's lifetime, and had given way to a trivial and superficial taste. Rossini and his followers were paramount in opera; in orchestral music there were the waltzes of Strauss and Lanner; and in vocal music the feeble sentimentalities of Proch and his fellow-composers. So far as solo-playing was concerned, the fourth decade of the century saw it at its highest pitch of executive brilliancy, and its lowest of purpose and feeling—indeed it may be comprehensively designated as the epoch of Thalberg. Thus Schumann would have found in Vienna ample opportunity for doing good work, for the Viennese public was still as ever the most responsive in the world, and one to justify sanguine hopes. Schumann effected his move with the assistance of Professor Joseph Fischhof, his colleague in the paper; settling himself in October 1838 in the Schönlaterngasse, No. 679. Oswald Lorenz edited the Zeitschrift as Schumann's deputy, and for a time it was still to be issued in Leipzig. Schumann hoped to be able to bring it out in Vienna by January 1839, and made every effort to obtain the prompt permission of the authorities, as well as the support of influential persons for himself and his journal. But the consent of the censor's office and the police were long withheld; and he was required to secure the co-operation of an Austrian publisher, in itself a great difficulty. It is hard to believe that in the great city of Vienna no strictly musical newspaper then existed, and that a small catalogue, the Allgemeine musikalische Anzeiger, published weekly by Tobias Haslinger, and almost exclusively devoted to the business interests of his firm, was the only publication which could pretend to the name. But the publishers were either too indolent or too timid to attempt any new enterprise, and sought to throw impediments in Schumann's way.

His courage and hopefulness were soon much reduced. The superficially kind welcome he met everywhere could not conceal the petty strife of coteries, the party spirit and gossip of a society which might have been provincial. The public, though keenly alive to music, was devoid of all critical taste. He 'could not get on with these people,' he writes to Zuccalmaglio as early as Oct. 19, 1838; their utter insipidity was at times too much for him, and while he had hoped that on its appearance in Vienna the Zeitschrift would have received a fresh impulse, and become a medium of intercourse between North and South, he was forced as early as December to say: 'The paper is evidently falling off, though it must be published here; this vexes me much.' Sterndale Bennett, who was residing in Leipzig during 1837-38, and who, Schumann hoped, would settle with him in Vienna, was obliged to relinquish his intention; and in Vienna itself he sought in vain for an artist after his own heart,

'one who should not merely play tolerably well on one or two instruments, but who should be a whole man, and understand Shakespeare and Jean Paul.'

At the same time he did not abandon the scheme of making a wide and influential circle of activity for himself; he was unwilling to return to Leipzig, and when in Mar. 1839 he made up his mind to do so, after trying in vain to carry on the journal in Vienna, it was with the intention of remaining there but a short time. He indulged in a dream of going to England never to return! What the anticipations could have been that led him to cherish such an idea we know not; perhaps his friendship for Bennett may have led to it; but, in point of fact, he never set foot on English ground.

As far, therefore, as making a home for himself went, his half-year's stay in Vienna was without result. But without doubt Schumann received impulses and incitements towards further progress as a musician through his acquaintance with Vienna life. A work which is to be referred directly to this influence is the 'Faschingsschwank aus Wien' (op. 26, published by Spina in 1841). In the first movement, which seems to depict various scenes of a masquerade, there springs up quite unnoticed the melody of the 'Marseillaise' (p. 7, bar 40, etc.; Pauer's edition, vol. iii. p. 596, l. 1), at that time strictly forbidden in Vienna. Schumann, who had been much worried by the government officials on account of his newspaper, took this opportunity of playing off a good-tempered joke upon them.

It was very natural that, with his enthusiastic admiration for Schubert, he should take pains to follow out the traces of that master, who had now been dead just ten years. He visited the Währing cemetery, where Schubert is buried, divided by a few intervening graves from Beethoven. On the tomb of the latter a steel pen was lying; this Schumann took possession of, and being always fond of symbolical associations and mystic connexions, used on very special occasions. With it he wrote his symphony in B \flat (op. 38), and the notice of Schubert's C major symphony, which is found in the Zeitschrift for 1840.¹ And here we encounter one of the chief benefits which Schumann received from his stay in Vienna. He visited Franz Schubert's brother Ferdinand, who showed him the artistic remains of his too early lost brother, and among them the score of the C major symphony. This he had composed in Mar. 1828, but never lived to hear it performed entire, and no one had since cared to take any trouble about it. Schumann arranged for the score to be sent to Leipzig, and there on Mar. 21, 1839, it was performed for the first time under Mendelssohn's direction. Its success was very striking, and was of great influence on the more thorough and widespread appreciation of Schubert's genius. Schumann retained pleasant memories of Vienna throughout his life, in spite of the little notice he attracted on this occasion, and the meagre success of a concert consisting of his own works, which he gave with his wife on a subsequent visit in the winter of 1846. In the summer of 1847 he even wished to apply for a vacant post on the board of direction at the Conservatorium, but when the year 1848 came, he was extremely glad that the plan had come to nothing.

COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE.—At the beginning of April 1839 Schumann returned to his old life in Leipzig. He devoted himself with new zest to the interests of the journal, and delighted in once more being associated with prominent and sympathetic musicians. In the summer he paid a short visit to Berlin, which pleased and interested him from its contrast to Vienna.

Unfortunately Wieck's opinion as to the match between Schumann and his daughter remained unchanged, and his opposition to it became even stronger and more firmly rooted. Since persuasion was unavailing, Schumann was forced to call in the assistance of the law, and Wieck had to account for his refusal in court. The case dragged on for a whole year, but the final result was that Wieck's objections to the marriage were pronounced to be trivial and without foundation. A sensitive nature such as Schumann's must have been deeply pained by these difficulties, and the long-delayed decision must have kept him in disastrous suspense. His letters show signs of this. For the rest, his outward circumstances had so much improved, that he could easily afford to make a home without the necessity of such a round of work as he had attempted in Vienna. 'We are young,' he writes on Feb. 19, 1840, 'and have hands, strength and reputation; and I have a little property that brings in 500 thalers a year. The profits of the paper amount to as much again, and I shall get well paid for my compositions. Tell me now if there can be real cause for fear.' One thing alone made him pause for a time. His bride-elect was decorated with different titles of honour from the courts at which she had played in her concert tours. He himself had, it is true, been latterly made a member of several musical societies, but that was not enough. In the beginning of 1840 he executed a scheme which he had cherished since 1838, and applied to the University of Jena for the title of Doctor of Philosophy. Several cases in which the German universities had granted the doctor's diploma to musicians had lately come under Schumann's notice; for instance the University of Leipzig had given the honorary degree to Marschner in 1835, and to Mendelssohn in 1838, and these may have suggested the idea to him. Schumann received the desired diploma on Feb. 24, 1840. As he had wished, the reason assigned for its bestowal is his well-known activity not only as a critical and æsthetic writer, but as a creative musician. At last, after a year of suspense, doubts and disagreements, the marriage of Robert Schumann with Clara Wieck took place on Sept. 12, 1840, in the church of Schönefeld, near Leipzig.

The 'Davidsbündlertänze,' previously mentioned, bore on the title-page of the first edition an old verse—

'In all und jeder Zeit
Verknüpft sich Lust und Leid :
Bleibt fromm in Lust, und seyd
Beim Leid mit Muth bereit.'

And when we observe that the two first bars of the first piece are borrowed from a composition by Clara Wieck (op. 6, No. 5), we understand the allusion. Schumann himself admits that his compositions for the piano written during the period of his courtship reveal much of his personal experience and feelings, and his creative work in 1840 is of a very striking character.

SONG.—Up to this time, with the exception of the symphony in G minor, which has remained unknown, he had written only for the piano; now he suddenly threw himself into vocal composition, and the stream of his invention rushed at once into this new channel with such force that in that single year he wrote above one hundred songs. Nor was it in number alone, but in intrinsic value also, that in this department the work of this year was the most remarkable of all Schumann's life. It is not improbable that his stay in Vienna had some share in this sudden rush into song, and in opening Schumann's mind to the charms of pure melody. But still, when we look through the words of his songs, it is clear that here more than anywhere, love was the prompter—love that had endured so long a struggle, and at last attained the goal of its desires. This is confirmed by the 'Myrthen' (op. 25), which he dedicated to the lady of his choice, and the twelve songs from Rückert's Liebesfrühling (op. 37), which were written conjointly by the two lovers. 'I am now writing nothing but songs great and small,' he says to a friend on Feb. 19, 1840;

'I can hardly tell you how delightful it is to write for the voice as compared with instrumental composition, and what a stir and tumult I feel within me when I sit down to it. I have brought forth quite new things in this line.'

With the close of 1840 he felt that he had worked out the vein of expression in the form of song with pianoforte accompaniment, almost to perfection. Some one expressed a hope that after such a beginning a promising future lay before him as a song-writer, but Schumann answered, 'I cannot venture to promise that I shall produce anything further in the way of songs, and I am satisfied with what I have done.' And he was right in his firm opinion as to the peculiar character of this form of music. 'In your essay on song-writing,' he says to a colleague in the Zeitschrift, 'it has somewhat distressed me that you should have placed me in the second rank. I do not ask to stand in the first, but I think I have some pretensions to a place of my own.'

As far as anything human can be, the marriage was perfectly happy. Besides their genius, both husband and wife had simple domestic tastes, and were strong enough to bear the admiration of the world without becoming egotistical. They lived for one another, and for their children.¹ He created and wrote for his wife, and in accordance with her temperament; while she looked upon it as her highest privilege to give to the world the most perfect interpretation of his works, or at least to stand as mediatrix between him and his audience, and to ward off all disturbing or injurious impressions from his sensitive soul, which day by day became more and more irritable. Now that he found perfect contentment in his domestic relations, he withdrew more than ever from intercourse with others, and devoted himself exclusively to his family and his work. The deep joy of his married life produced the direct result of a mighty advance in his artistic progress. Schumann's most beautiful works in the larger forms date almost exclusively from the years 1841-45.

ORCHESTRAL COMPOSITION.—In 1841 he turned his attention to the symphony, as he had done in the previous year to the song, and composed, in this year alone, no fewer than three symphonic works. The B₃ symphony (op. 38) was performed as early as Mar. 31, 1841, at a concert given by Clara Schumann in the Gewandhaus at Leipzig. Mendelssohn conducted it, and performed the task with so much zeal and care as truly to delight his friend. The other two orchestral works were given at a concert on Dec. 6 of the same year, but did not meet with so much success as the former one. Schumann thought that the two together were too much at once; and they had not the advantage of Mendelssohn's able and careful direction, for he was spending that winter in Berlin. Schumann put these two works away for a time, and published the B₃ symphony alone. The proper title of one of these was 'Symphonistische Phantasie,' but it was performed under the title of 'Second Symphony,' and, in 1851, the instrumentation having been revised and completed, was published as the 4th symphony (D minor, op. 120). The other was brought out under an altered arrangement, which he made in 1845, with the title 'Ouverture, Scherzo, et Finale' (op. 52); and it is said that Schumann originally intended to call it 'Sinfonietta.' Besides these orchestral works the first movement of the pianoforte concerto in A minor was written in 1841. It was at first intended to form an independent piece with the title of 'Fantasie.' As appears from a letter of Schumann to David, it was once rehearsed by the Gewandhaus orchestra in the winter of 1841-42. Schumann did not write the last two movements which complete the concerto until 1845.

CHAMBER MUSIC.—The year 1842 was devoted to chamber music. The three string quartets deserve to be first mentioned, since the date of their composition can be fixed with the greatest certainty. Although Schumann was unused to this style of writing, he composed the quartets in about a month—a certain sign that his faculties were as clear as his imagination was rich. In the autograph,¹ after most of the movements is written the date of their completion. The adagio of the first quartet bears the date June 21, 1842; the finale was 'finished on St. John's day, June 24, 1842, in Leipzig.' In the second quartet the second movement is dated July 2, 1842, and the last July 5, 1842, Leipzig. The third is dated as follows: first movement, July 18, second July 20, third July 21, and the fourth Leipzig, July 22, all of the same year. Thus the two last movements took the composer only one day each. These quartets, which are dedicated to Mendelssohn, were at once taken up by the Leipzig musicians with great interest. The praise bestowed upon them by Ferdinand David called forth a letter from Schumann, addressed to him, which merits quotation, as showing how modest and how ideal as an artist Schumann was:

'Härtel told me how very kindly you had spoken to him about my quartets, and, coming from you, it gratified me exceedingly. But I shall have to do better yet, and I feel, with each new work, as if I ought to begin all over again from the beginning.'

In the beginning of October of this year the quartets were played at David's house; Hauptmann was present, and expressed his surprise at Schumann's talent, which, judging only from the earlier pianoforte works, he had fancied not nearly so great. With each new work Schumann now made more triumphant way—at all events in Leipzig. The same year witnessed the production of the quintet for pianoforte and strings (op. 44). The first public performance took place in the Gewandhaus on Jan. 8, 1843, his wife, to whom it is dedicated, taking the pianoforte part. Berlioz, who came to Leipzig in 1843, and there made Schumann's personal acquaintance, heard the quintet performed, and carried the fame of it to Paris. Besides the quintet, Schumann wrote, in 1842, the pianoforte quartet (op. 47) and a pianoforte trio. The trio, however, remained unpublished for eight years, and then appeared as op. 88, under the title of 'Phantasiestücke' for pianoforte, violin and violoncello. The quartet too was laid aside for a time; it was first publicly performed on Dec. 8, 1844, by Madame Schumann, in the Gewandhaus, David taking the violin part, and Niels W. Gade, who was directing the Gewandhaus concerts that winter, playing the viola.

CHORAL WORKS.—With the year 1843 came a total change of style. The first work to appear was op. 46, the variations for two pianos, which are now so popular, and to which Mendelssohn may have done some service by introducing them to the public, in company with Mme. Schumann, on August 19, 1843. The principal work of the year, however, was 'Paradise and the Peri,' a grand composition for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, to a text adapted from Moore's 'Lalla Rookh.' The enthusiasm created by this work at its first performance (Dec. 4, 1843), conducted by the composer himself, was so great that it had to be repeated a week afterwards, on Dec. 11, and on the 23rd of the same month it was performed in the Opera House at Dresden. It will be easily believed that from this time Schumann's fame was firmly established in Germany, although it took twenty years more to make his work widely and actually popular. Having been so fortunate in his first attempt in a branch of art hitherto untried by him, he felt induced to undertake another work of the same kind, and in 1844 began writing the second of his two most important choral works, namely, the music to Goethe's 'Faust.' For some time, however, the work consisted only of four numbers. His uninterrupted labours had so affected his health that in this year he was obliged for a time to forgo all exertion of the kind.

CONCERT TOURS.—The first four years of his married life were passed in profound retirement, but very rarely interrupted. In the beginning of 1842 he accompanied his wife on a concert tour to Hamburg, where the B♭ symphony was performed. Madame Schumann then proceeded alone to Copenhagen, while her husband returned to his quiet retreat at Leipzig. In the summer of the same year the two artists made an excursion into Bohemia, and at Königswart were presented to Prince Metternich, who invited them to Vienna. Schumann at first took some pleasure in these tours, but soon forgot it in the peace and comfort of domestic life, and it cost his wife great trouble to induce him to make a longer journey to Russia in the beginning of 1844. Indeed she only succeeded by declaring that she would make the tour alone if he would not leave home. 'How unwilling I am to move out of my quiet round,' he wrote to a friend, 'you must not expect me to tell you. I cannot think of it without the greatest annoyance.' However, he made up his mind to it, and they started on Jan. 26. His wife gave concerts in Mitau, Riga, St. Petersburg and Moscow; and the enthusiasm with which she was everywhere received attracted fresh attention to Schumann's works, the constant aim of her noble endeavours. Schumann himself, when once he had parted from home, found much to enjoy in a journey which was so decidedly and even brilliantly successful. At St. Petersburg he was received with undiminished cordiality by his old friend Henselt, who had made himself a new home there. At a soirée at Prince Oldenburg's Henselt played with Mme. Schumann her husband's variations for two pianos. The symphony in B \flat was also performed under Schumann's direction at a soirée given by the Counts Joseph and Michael Wielhorsky, the highly esteemed musical connoisseurs; and it is evident that the dedication of Schumann's PF. quartet (op. 47) to a Count Wielhorsky was directly connected with this visit.

In June they were once more in Leipzig, and so agreeable were the reminiscences of the journey that Schumann was ready at once with a fresh plan of the same kind—this time for a visit to England with his wife in the following year; not, indeed, as he had once intended, with a view to permanent residence, but merely that she might win fresh laurels as a player, and to make himself known as a composer. He proposed to conduct parts of 'Paradise and the Peri' in London, and anticipated a particular success for it because the work 'had, as it were, sprung from English soil, and was one of the sweetest flowers of English verse.' On June 27, 1844, he writes to Moscheles concerning the project, which had the full support of Mendelssohn; but the scheme ultimately came to nothing, chiefly because of the refusal of Buxton, the proprietor of the publishing firm of Ewer & Co., to bring out 'Paradise and the Peri' with English words. Still Schumann, even long after, kept his eye steadily fixed on England. He was delighted at being told that Queen Victoria often listened to his music, and had had the symphony in B \flat ¹ played by the private band at Windsor, and he contemplated dedicating his Manfred music (op. 115) to Her Majesty, but the idea was given up.

Instead of going to England, they at length paid a visit to Vienna in the winter of 1846. Here again Schumann conducted his symphony in B \flat and his wife played his pianoforte concerto. This was on Jan. 1, 1847. But the public were perfectly unsympathetic, and justified an earlier utterance of Schumann that 'The Viennese are an ignorant people, and know little of what goes on outside their own city.' Nor were matters much more satisfactory in Berlin, whither they went from Vienna to conduct 'Paradise and the Peri'; while in Prague, where they performed on their way, they met with the warmest reception.

REMOVAL TO DRESDEN.—The year 1844 was the last of Schumann's residence in Leipzig; for in October he left the town where he had lived and worked with short intervals for fourteen years, and moved to Dresden. He had given up the editorship of the Neue Zeitschrift in July, and from April 3, 1843, had held a professor's chair in the Conservatorium, founded at Leipzig by Mendelssohn's exertions, and opened on that date. (See LEIPZIG; also MENDELSSOHN, Vol. III., p. 405.) He was professor of pianoforte-playing and composition; but his reserved nature was little suited to the duties of a teacher, though his name and the example afforded by his work were no doubt highly advantageous to the infant institution. Schumann had no disciples, properly speaking, either in the Conservatorium or as private pupils. In a letter to David from Dresden he incidentally mentions Carl Ritter as having instruction from him, and as having previously been a pupil of Hiller's; and he writes to Hiller that he has brought young Ritter on a little. But what the style of Schumann's teaching may have been cannot be told; and a single exception only proves the rule.

The move to Dresden seems to have been chiefly on account of Schumann's suffering condition. His nervous affection rendered change of scene absolutely necessary to divert his thoughts. He had overworked himself into a kind of surfeit of music, so much so that his medical attendant forbade his continually hearing it. In the musical world of Leipzig such a prohibition could not be strictly obeyed, but at Dresden it was quite different. 'Here,' he writes to David on Nov. 25, 1844,

'one can get back the old lost longing for music, there is so little to hear! It just suits my condition, for I still suffer very much from my nerves, and everything affects and exhausts me directly.'

Accordingly he at first lived in Dresden in the strictest seclusion. A friend sought him out there and found him so changed that he entertained grave fears for his life. On several occasions he tried sea-bathing, but it was long before his health can be said to have radically improved. In February 1846, after a slight improvement, he again became very unwell, as he did also in the summer of the following year. He observed that he was unable to remember the melodies that occurred to him, when composing; the effort of invention fatiguing his mind to such a degree as to impair his memory. As soon as a lasting improvement took place in his health, he again devoted himself wholly to composition. He was now attracted more powerfully than before to complicated contrapuntal forms. The 'Studies' and 'Sketches' for the pedal-piano (opp. 56 and 58), the six fugues on the name of 'Bach' (op. 60) and the four piano fugues (op. 72) owe their existence to this attraction. The greatest work of the years 1845-46, however, was the C major symphony (op. 61), which Mendelssohn produced at the Gewandhaus in Leipzig, Nov. 5, 1846. Slight intercourse with a few congenial spirits was now gradually resumed. Among those whom he saw was the widow of C. M. v. Weber, whose fine musical feeling was highly valued by Schumann. The first year in Dresden was spent with Ferdinand Hiller, who had been living there since the winter of 1844. Their intercourse gradually grew into a lively and lasting intimacy. When Hiller was getting up subscription concerts in the autumn of 1845, Schumann took an active share in the undertaking. With Richard Wagner, too, then Kapellmeister at Dresden, he was on friendly terms. He was much interested in the opera of 'Tannhäuser' and heard it often, expressing his opinion of it in terms of great though not unqualified praise. But the natures of the two musicians differed too widely to allow of any real sympathy between them. (See WAGNER, Vol. V. p. 589.) Wagner was always lively, versatile and talkative, while Schumann's former silence and reserve had increased since his illness, and even intimate friends, like Moscheles and Lipinski, had to lament that conversation with him was now scarcely possible.

OPERA.—At the end of Schumann's collected works we find a Theaterbüchlein (1847-50), in which are given short notes of the impressions made upon him by certain operas. From this we learn that in 1847 he went comparatively often to the theatre; the reason being that at that time he himself was composing an opera. He had long cherished the idea. So early as Sept. 1, 1842, he writes, 'Do you know what is my morning and evening prayer as an artist? German Opera. There is a field for work.' He concludes a critique of an opera by Heinrich Esser in the number of the Zeitschrift for September 1842 with these significant words:

'It is high time that German composers should give the lie to the reproach that has long lain on them of having been so craven as to leave the field in possession of the Italians and French. But under this head there is a word to be said to the German poets also.'

In 1844 he composed a chorus and an aria for an opera on Byron's Corsair. The work, however, went no farther, and the two pieces still remain unpublished. He also corresponded with his friend Zuccalmaglio as to the subject for an opera, which he wished to find ready on his return from Russia; and made notes on more than twenty different subjects of all kinds, periods and nationalities; but none of these were found suitable, and circumstances led to the abandonment of the project.

At length, in 1847, he decided on the legend of St. Geneviève. The two versions of the story contained in the tragedies of Tieck and Hebbel (principally that of Hebbel) were to serve as the basis of the text. The treatment of the words he persuaded Robert Reinick, the poet, who had been living in Dresden since 1844, to undertake. Reinick, however, failed to satisfy him, and Hebbel, who came to Dresden at the end of July 1847, could not say that he thought it a satisfactory text, though he declined to assist in remedying the deficiencies and bringing it into the desired form. This, however, was from no lack of interest in Schumann himself. On the contrary Hebbel always preserved the highest esteem for him, and subsequently dedicated to him his drama of Michael Angelo, accepting in return from Schumann the dedication of his 'Nachtlied' (op. 108). But it was repugnant to him to see his work mutilated in the way which Schumann considered necessary for an opera. The composer was at last obliged to trust to his own poetic powers, and construct a text himself from those already mentioned.

By August 1848 the music for the opera was so far complete that Schumann thought he might take steps for its performance. His first thought was of the theatre at Leipzig, where he knew that he was most warmly remembered. Wirsing was at that time the director, Julius Rietz the conductor, and the opera was to have been brought out in the spring of 1849, but it came to nothing. In June, when the preparations were to have begun, Schumann was detained by domestic circumstances, and the rest of the year slipped away with constant evasions and promises on the part of the director of the theatre. Even the promise, 'on his honour,' that the opera should be performed at the end of February 1850, at latest, was not kept. And so in this, his very first attempt at dramatic work, Schumann made acquaintance with the shady side of theatrical management in a way which must have disgusted his upright and honourable spirit. In his indignation, he would have made the director's breach of faith public, by invoking the aid of the law; but his Leipzig friends were happily able to dissuade him from this course. At last, on June 25, 1850, the first representation of 'Genoveva' actually took place under Schumann's own direction. But the time was unfavourable. 'Who,' he writes to Dr. Hermann Härtel, 'goes to the theatre in May or June, and not rather into the woods?'

However, the number of his admirers in Leipzig was great, and the first opera by so famous a master excited great expectations; the house was full, and the reception by the public, though not enthusiastic, was honourable to the composer.

Still, artists and connoisseurs were tolerably unanimous in thinking that Schumann lacked the special genius for writing opera. His almost entire exclusion of recitative was very widely disapproved of. No one but the venerable Spohr, who had attended many of the rehearsals, gave a really favourable verdict upon the work. In his last opera, 'The Crusaders,' Spohr himself had adopted similar methods of making the music follow the plot closely without ever coming to a standstill, and he was naturally delighted to find the same in Schumann's work. After three representations (June 25, 28, 30) 'Genoveva' was laid aside for the time. Schumann, already vexed by the tedious postponements of the first performance, and disappointed by the cold reception of the work, was greatly annoyed by the discussions in the public prints, especially by a critique from Dr. E. Krüger, one of the collaborateurs in the Neue Zeitschrift. A letter from Schumann to Krüger, in stronger terms than might have been expected from him, put an end for ever to their acquaintance.

GOETHE'S 'FAUST.'—Schumann derived far more gratification from the reception of his music to 'Faust.' In 1848 he completed the portion he had originally intended to write first, viz. the salvation of Faust, which forms the end of the second part of Goethe's poem, and the music of which is called the 'third part.' On June 25, 1848, the first performance took place among a limited circle of friends, upon whom it made a deep impression. The most cultivated portion of the audience was of opinion that the music made the meaning of the words clear for the first time, so deeply imbued was the composer with the poet's inmost spirit. As the 100th anniversary of Goethe's birthday was approaching (August 28, 1849) it was decided to give a festival concert in Dresden, at which this 'Faust' music and Mendelssohn's 'Walgurnisnacht' should form the programme. When the Leipzig people heard of this intention, they would not be behind Dresden, and also got up a performance of the same works on August 29. In Weimar too the 'Faust' music was performed for the same festivity. Schumann was exceedingly delighted that his work had been employed for so special an occasion. He writes to Dr. Härtel: 'I should like to have Faust's cloak, and be able to be everywhere at once, that I might hear it.' In Dresden the success of the work was very considerable, but it made less impression at its first performance in Leipzig. Schumann took this quite calmly. 'I hear different accounts,' says he in a letter, 'of the impression produced by my scenes from "Faust"; some seem to have been affected, while upon others it made no definite impression. This is what I expected. Perhaps an opportunity may occur in the winter for a repetition of the work, when it is possible that I may add some other scenes.'

This repetition, however, did not take place in Schumann's lifetime. He fulfilled his scheme of adding several scenes; and in 1853 prefixed an overture to the whole work, which was divided into three parts. It was not published complete until two years after his death.

In the meantime, Schumann's health had again improved, as was evident from his augmented creative activity. Indeed his eager desire for work increased in a way which gave rise to great apprehensions. In the year 1849 alone he produced thirty works, most of them of considerable extent. It had never seemed so easy to him to create ideas and bring them into shape. He composed as he walked or stood, and could not be distracted, even by the most disturbing circumstances. Thus he wrote Mignon's song 'Kennst du das Land' at Kreitscha, near Dresden, in the midst of a group of his noisy children. And in a restaurant near the post office, much frequented by the artistic society of Dresden, where he used to drink his beer in the evening, he would usually sit alone, with his back to the company and his face to the wall, whistling softly to himself, and developing his musical ideas all the time. No preference for any particular form of art can be traced in Schumann's work at this time. Piano-forte works and chamber trios, songs and vocal duets, choruses, choral works with orchestra, concertos with orchestra, compositions for horn, clarinet, oboe, violoncello or violin, with pianoforte accompaniment, even melodramatic music—all these thronged as it were out of his imagination in wild and strange succession. Among all the beautiful and important works produced at this time, the music to Byron's Manfred deserves especial mention. The first stage performance of it was given by Franz Liszt in Weimar on June 13, 1852. For that occasion the drama was adapted for the stage by Schumann himself, in an arrangement which is printed as a preface to the score of the work. The first performance of the music at a concert took place at Leipzig on Mar. 24, 1859.

CHORAL CONDUCTING.—Dresden was Schumann's place of residence until 1850.¹ In the latter years of his stay there his outward life was more active than before. No journeys of note were made, it is true, with the exception of those to Vienna and Berlin already mentioned, and a longer expedition undertaken in 1850 to Bremen and Hamburg, where many concerts were given. He avoided the passing disturbance occasioned by the Dresden insurrection of 1849, by leaving the town with his family. Though no revolutionary, like Richard Wagner, scarcely even a politician, Schumann loved individual liberty and wished others to enjoy it also. But what gave a different aspect to his life as a musician in the last years of his stay in Dresden, was his occupation as a conductor. Ferdinand Hiller had conducted a choral society for men's voices; and when he left Dresden to go to Düsseldorf as municipal director of music, Schumann succeeded him in his post. He conducted the society for some time with great interest, and was glad to find that his capacity for conducting was not so small as he had generally fancied it to be. He was even induced to write a few works for male chorus. Three songs of War and Liberty (Kriegs- und Freiheitslieder, op. 62) and seven songs in canon-form, to words by Rückert (op. 65), were written in 1847, and a grand motet for double chorus of men's voices (op. 93) in 1849. But a nature like Schumann's could not thrive in the atmosphere of a German singing-club. He was in all respects too refined for the tone of vulgar comfort, and often even of low sentimentality, which pervades these assemblies, and they could not but be irksome to him. 'I felt myself,' he says, in a letter to Hiller written on Apr. 10, 1849, after his withdrawal, 'out of my element; they were such nice (hubsch) people.' This is even noticeable in his compositions for male chorus; they are not of the right kind, and have in consequence never been much sung. Of greater artistic importance was a society of mixed voices which was constituted in January 1848, and of which Schumann was asked to take the lead. It was not very large—in 1849 it numbered only sixty or seventy members—but these were efficient, and Schumann was able 'to perform correctly any music he liked with pleasure and delight.' It was this society that gave the first performance of the third part of 'Faust' in June 1848, at a private party; Schumann was induced to write many new compositions for them, and they did much service in promoting a knowledge of his music in Dresden by two performances of 'Paradise and the Peri' on Jan. 5 and 12, 1850. They even succeeded in drawing him into social amusements. In August 1848 a general excursion was arranged, in which Schumann took what was, for him, a lively interest.

That Schumann, after so successful a beginning in the art of conducting, considered himself fitted to undertake the direction of performances on a larger scale, is evident from the following circumstance. After Mendelssohn's death the Gewandhaus concerts were conducted by Julius Rietz, who until 1847 had been at work in Düsseldorf. In the summer of 1849 a report reached Dresden that Rietz was going to succeed O. Nicolai as royal Kapellmeister at Berlin. Schumann thereupon applied for the post of concert director at the Gewandhaus. Dr. Hermann Härtel was to be the medium of communication, and Schumann, with a well-founded expectation that the choice would fall upon him, gave himself up for a time with great pleasure to the idea of becoming the successor of the honoured Mendelssohn. 'It would give me great pleasure,' he wrote:

'If the thing came to pass. I long for regular duty, and though I can never forget the last few years, during which I have lived exclusively as a composer and know that so productive and happy a time may perhaps never be mine again, yet I feel impelled towards a life of active work, and my highest endeavour would be to keep up the renown which the institution has so long enjoyed.'

This wish was not realised, for Rietz remained in Leipzig. But Schumann's desire for a more extended field of work as a conductor was to be satisfied in another way in the following year.

DÜSSELDORF.—In 1850 Hiller gave up his post in Düsseldorf to obey a call to Cologne as Kapellmeister to that city. He suggested that Schumann should be his successor, and opened negotiations with him. Some efforts were made to keep him in Dresden and to obtain his appointment as Kapellmeister to the King of Saxony; but the attempt was unsuccessful, and Schumann accepted the directorship at Düsseldorf that summer, though he left his native place with deep regret, and not without some suspicions as to the condition of music in Düsseldorf, of which he had heard much that was unfavourable from Mendelssohn and Rietz. In his new post he had the direction of a vocal union and of an orchestra, and a number of concerts to conduct in the course of the winter. He arrived at Düsseldorf, Sept. 2, 1850, and the first winter concert was in some sort a formal reception of him, since it consisted of the overture to 'Genoveva,' some of his songs and Part I. of 'Paradise and the Peri.' It was under the direction of Julius Taubsch, Schumann himself appearing as conductor for the first time on Oct. 24.

He was very well satisfied with his new sphere of work. The vocal resources, as is the case with all the choirs of the Rhine towns, were admirable; Hiller had cultivated them with special zeal, and he and Rietz had left the orchestra so well drilled that Schumann, for the first time in his life, enjoyed the inestimable advantage of being able to hear everything that he wrote for the orchestra performed immediately. The concerts took up no more of his time than he was willing to give, and left him ample leisure for his own work. Chamber music was also attainable, for in J. von Wasielewski there was a good solo violinist on the spot. Schumann and his wife were at once welcomed in Düsseldorf with the greatest respect, and every attention and consideration was shown to them both. It might be said that their position here was one of special ease, and they soon formed a delightful circle of intimate acquaintances. Little as his music was then known in the Rhine cities, Schumann's advent in person seems to have given a strong impulse to the public feeling for music in Düsseldorf. The interest in the subscription concerts during the winter of 1850 was greater than it had ever been before; and the board of directors was able, at the close of the usual series of six concerts, to undertake a second series of three or four. At Schumann's instance one of the winter concerts was entirely devoted to the works of living composers, an idea then perfectly novel, and showing that he had remained faithful to his desire—manifested long before through the Zeitschrift—of facilitating the advancement of young and gifted composers.

At first Schumann's direction gave entire satisfaction. If some performances were not perfectly successful, they were compensated for by others of special excellence; and the execution of Beethoven's symphony in A at the third concert even seemed to show that he was a born conductor. But it was not so in reality; indeed he was wholly wanting in the real talent for conducting; all who ever saw him conduct or who played under his direction are agreed on this point. Irrespective of the fact that conducting for any length of time tired him out, he had neither the collectedness and prompt presence of mind, nor the sympathetic faculty, nor the enterprising dash, without each of which conducting in the true sense is impossible. He even found a difficulty in starting at a given tempo; nay, he sometimes shrank from giving any initial beat; so that some energetic pioneer would begin without waiting for the signal, and without incurring Schumann's wrath. Besides this, any thorough practice bit by bit with his orchestra, with instructive remarks by the way as to the mode of execution, was impossible to this great artist, who in this respect was a striking contrast to Mendelssohn. He would have a piece played through, and if it did not answer to his wishes, had it repeated. If it went no better the second, or perhaps even a third time, he would be extremely angry at what he considered the clumsiness or even the ill-will of the players; but detailed remarks he never made.

Any one knowing his silent nature and his instinctive dislike to contact with the outer world, might certainly have feared from the first that he would find great difficulty in asserting himself as a director of large masses. And as years went on his incapacity for conducting constantly increased, as the issue showed, with the growth of an illness, which, after seeming to have been completely overcome in Dresden, returned in Düsseldorf with increasing gravity. His genius seemed constantly to shrink from the outside world into the depths of his soul. His silence became a universally accepted fact, and to those who saw him for the first time he seemed apathetic. But in fact he was anything rather than that; he would let a visitor talk for a long time on all kinds of subjects without saying a word, and then when the caller rose to leave, 'not to disturb the master longer,' he would discover that Schumann had followed the one-sided 'conversation' with unflinching interest. When sitting for an hour, as he was accustomed to an evening, with friends or acquaintances at the restaurant, if anything was said that touched or pleased him he would give the speaker a radiant, expressive glance, but without a word; and the incessant creative labours, to which he gave himself up so long as he was able, are the best proof of the rich vitality which constantly flowed from the deepest sources of his soul.

In the family circle he was a different man; there he could be gay and talkative to a degree that would have surprised a stranger. He loved his children tenderly, and was fond of occupying himself with them. The three piano sonatas (op. 118) composed for his daughters Julie, Elise and Marie, the Album for beginners (op. 68); the Children's Ball (op. 130), and other pieces, are touching evidence of the way in which he expressed this feeling in music.

LATE COMPOSITIONS.—The first great work of the Düsseldorf period was the symphony in E \flat (op. 97), marked by the composer as No. 3, although it is really the fourth of the published ones, that in D minor preceding it in order of composition. If we call the overture, scherzo and finale (op. 52) a symphony too, then the symphony in E \flat must rank as the fifth. It would seem that Schumann had begun to work at it before his change of residence. As soon as he conceived the project of leaving Saxony for the Rhine, he bethought himself of the great musical festival which ever since 1818 had been held in the lower Rhine districts (see NIEDER-RHEINISCHE FEST), and was inspired by the idea of assisting at one of these in the capacity of a composer. He wrote down this great work with its five movements between Nov. 2 and Dec. 9, 1850. He has told us that it was intended to convey the impressions which he received during a visit to Cologne; so that its ordinary name of the 'Rhenish Symphony' may be accepted as correct. It was first performed at Düsseldorf on Feb. 6, 1851, and then at Cologne on Feb. 25, both times under the direction of the composer, but was coldly received on both occasions.¹

Although Schumann had had no pleasant experiences in connexion with the opera 'Genoëva,' he was not to be deterred from making another essay in dramatic composition. In Oct. 1850 he received from Richard Pohl, at that time a student in the Leipzig University, Schiller's 'Bride of Messina,' arranged as an opera libretto. Schumann could not make up his mind to set it to music; but in Dec. 1850 and Jan. 1851 he wrote an overture to the 'Braut von Messina' (op. 100), which showed how much the material of the play had interested him, in spite of his refusal to set it. He inclined to a more cheerful, or even a comic subject, and Goethe's 'Hermann und Dorothea' seemed to him appropriate for an operetta. He consulted several poets concerning the arrangement, and having made out a scheme of treatment, wrote the overture at Christmas 1851 (op. 136). The work, however, progressed no farther. He subsequently turned his attention to Auerbach's 'Dorfgeschichten,' but without finding any good material, and no second opera from his pen ever saw the light.

He completed, however, a number of vocal compositions for the concert-room, in which his taste for dramatic music had free play. A young poet from Chemnitz, Moritz Horn, had sent him a faery poem, which greatly interested him. After many abbreviations and alterations made by Horn himself at Schumann's suggestion, 'The Pilgrimage of the Rose' (Der Rose Pilgerfahrt, op. 112) was really set to music between April and July 1851. The work, which both in form and substance resembles 'Paradise and the Peri,' except that it is treated in a manner at once more detailed and more idyllic, had at first a simple pianoforte accompaniment, but in November Schumann arranged it for orchestra. June 1851 is also the date of the composition of Uhland's ballad 'Der Königssohn' (op. 116), in a semi-dramatic form, to which indeed he was almost driven by the poem itself. Schumann was much pleased with his treatment of this ballad, which he set for solo, chorus and orchestra. In the course of the next two years he wrote three more works of the same kind: 'Des Sängers Fluch' (op. 139), a ballad of Uhland's; 'Vom Pagen und der Königstochter' (op. 140), a ballad by Geibel; and 'Das Glück von Edenhall' (op. 143), a ballad by Uhland.

In the last two poems he made alterations of more or less importance, to bring them into shape for musical setting, but the 'Sängers Fluch' had to be entirely remodelled—a difficult and ungrateful task, which Richard Pohl carried out after Schumann's own suggestions.

At that time this young man, a thorough art enthusiast, kept up a lively intercourse with Schumann, both personally and by letter. They devised together the plan of a grand oratorio. Schumann wavered between a Biblical and an historical subject, thinking at one time of the Virgin Mary, at another of Ziska or Luther. His final choice fell upon Luther. He pondered deeply upon the treatment of his materials. It was to be an oratorio suitable both for the church and the concert-room, and in its poetical form as dramatic as possible. In point of musical treatment he intended the chorus to predominate, as in Handel's 'Israel in Egypt,' of which he had given a performance in the winter of 1850. Moreover, it was not to be complicated and contrapuntal in style, but simple and popular, so that 'peasant and citizen alike should understand it.' The more he pondered it the more was he inspired with the grandeur of the subject, although by no means blind to its difficulties. 'It inspires courage,' he says, 'and also humility.' He could not, however, coincide with his poet's opinion as to the extent of the work, the latter having formed the idea of a sort of trilogy, in oratorio form, while Schumann wished the work to be within the limit of one evening's performance, lasting about two hours and a half. In this way the few years of creative activity that were still granted to him slipped away, and the oratorio remained unwritten. The impossibility of satisfying, by the oratorio on Luther, the inclination for grave and religious music which became ever stronger with increasing years, is partly the reason of his writing in 1852 a Mass (op. 147), and a Requiem (op. 148). But to these he was also incited by outward circumstances. The inhabitants of Düsseldorf are mostly Catholics, the organ-lofts in the principal churches are too small to hold a large choir and orchestra, and the regular church music was in a bad condition. The choral society which Schumann conducted was accustomed, as a reward for its labours, to have several concerts of church music, or at least sacred compositions, every year; and Schumann was probably thinking of this custom in his Mass and his Requiem, but he was not destined ever to hear them performed.

In the summer of 1851 he and his family made a tour in Switzerland, which he had not visited since the time of his student life in Heidelberg; on his return he went to Antwerp, for a competitive performance by the Belgian 'Männergesangverein,' on August 17, at which he had been asked to aid in adjudging the prizes. Two years later, towards the end of 1853, he and his wife once more visited the Netherlands, and made a concert tour through Holland, meeting with such an enthusiastic reception that he could not help saying that his music seemed to have struck deeper root there than in Germany. In March 1852 they revisited Leipzig, where, between the 14th and the 21st, a quantity of his music was performed; the Manfred overture and the 'Der Rose Pilgerfahrt' at a public matinée on the 14th; the sonata in D minor for pianoforte and violin (op. 121) in a private circle, on the 15th; the symphony in E_♭ at a concert at the Gewandhaus on the 18th; the pianoforte trio in G minor (op. 110) at a chamber concert on the 21st. On Nov. 6, 1851, the overture to the 'Braut von Messina' was also performed at the Gewandhaus. The public had thus, during this season, ample opportunity of becoming acquainted with the latest works of this inexhaustible composer. But although he had lived in Leipzig for fourteen years, and had brought out most of his compositions there, besides having a circle of sincerely devoted friends in that city, he could not on this occasion boast of any great success; the public received him with respect and esteem, but with no enthusiasm. But in this respect Schumann had lived through a variety of experience; 'I am accustomed,' he writes to Pohl, Dec. 7, 1851, when speaking of the reception of the overture to the 'Braut von Messina,' 'to find that my compositions, particularly the best and deepest, are not understood by the public at a first hearing.' Artists, however, had come to Leipzig from some distance for the 'Schumann-week'; among them Liszt and Joachim.

In August 1852 there was held in Düsseldorf a festival of music for men's voices, in which Schumann assisted as conductor, though, owing to his health, only to a very limited extent. He took a more important part at Whitsuntide 1853, when the 31st of the Lower Rhine Festivals was celebrated in Düsseldorf on May 15, 16 and 17. He conducted the music of the first day, consisting of Handel's 'Messiah' and of his own symphony in D minor, which was exceedingly well received. In the concerts of the two following days, which were conducted chiefly by Hiller, two more of Schumann's larger compositions were performed; the pianoforteconcerto in A minor, and a newly composed Festival Overture with soli and chorus on the 'Rheinweinlied' (op. 123). But although Schumann appeared in so brilliant a way as a composer, and as such was honoured and appreciated in Düsseldorf, yet there was no concealing the fact that as a conductor he was inefficient. The little talent for conducting that he showed on his arrival in Düsseldorf had disappeared with his departing health. It was in fact necessary to procure some one to take his place. An attempt was made after the first winter concert of the year (Oct. 27, 1853) to induce him to retire for a time from the post of his own accord. But this proposal was badly received. The fact, however, remains, that from the date just mentioned all the practices and performances were conducted by Julius Tausch, who thus became Schumann's real successor. No doubt the directors of the society were really in the right; though perhaps the form in which Schumann's relation to the society was expressed might have been better chosen. The master was now taken up with the idea of leaving Düsseldorf as soon as possible, and of adopting Vienna, for which he had preserved a great affection, as his permanent residence. But fate had decided otherwise.

THE ARRIVAL OF BRAHMS.—The dissatisfaction induced in his mind by the events of the autumn of 1853 was, however, mitigated partly by the tour in Holland already mentioned, and partly by another incident. It happened that in October a young and wholly unknown musician arrived, with a letter of introduction from Joachim. Johannes Brahms—for he it was—immediately excited Schumann's warmest interest by the genius of his playing and the originality of his compositions. In his early days he had always been the champion of the young and aspiring, and now as a matured artist he took pleasure in smoothing the path of this gifted youth. Schumann's literary pen had lain at rest for nine years; he now once more took it up, for the last time, in order to say a powerful word for Brahms to the wide world of art. An article entitled Neue Bahnen (New Paths) appeared on Oct. 28, 1853, in No. 18 of that year's Zeitschrift. In this he pointed to Brahms as the artist whose vocation it would be 'to utter the highest ideal expression of our time.' He does not speak of him as a youth or beginner, but welcomes him into the circle of masters as a fully equipped combatant. When before or since did an artist find such words of praise for one of his fellows? It is as though, having already given so many noble proofs of sympathetic appreciation, he could not leave the world without once more, after his long silence, indelibly stamping the image of his pure, lofty and unenviable artist-nature on the hearts of his fellow-men.

So far as Brahms was concerned, it is true that this brilliant envoi laid him under a heavy debt of duty, in the necessity of measuring his productions by the very highest standard; and at the time Schumann was supposed to have attributed to Brahms, as he did to the poetess Elisabeth Kulmann, gifts which he did not actually possess. We know now that Schumann's keen insight did not deceive him, and that Brahms verified all the expectations formed of him. His intercourse with the young composer (then twenty years old), in whom he took the widest and most affectionate interest, was a great pleasure to Schumann.

At that time, too, Albert Dietrich (afterwards Hofkapellmeister at Oldenburg) was staying in Düsseldorf, and Schumann proved to the utmost the truth of what he had written only a few months previously of Kirchner, that he loved to follow the progress of young men. A sonata for pianoforte and violin exists in MS. which Schumann composed during this month (Oct. 1853) in conjunction with Brahms and Dietrich. Dietrich begins with an allegro in A minor; Schumann follows with an intermezzo in F major; Brahms—who signs himself Johannes Kreisler junior—adds an allegro (scherzo) in C minor; and Schumann winds up the work with a finale in A minor, ending in A major. The title of the sonata is worth noting Joachim was coming to Düsseldorf to play at the concert of Oct. 27, so Schumann wrote on the title-page :

'In anticipation of the arrival of our beloved and honoured friend Joseph Joachim, this sonata was written by Robert Schumann, Albert Dietrich and Johannes Brahms.'¹

This interesting intimacy cannot have continued long, since in November Schumann went to Holland with his wife, and did not return till Dec. 22. But he met Brahms again in Hanover in Jan. 1854 at a performance of 'Paradise and the Peri,' where he found also Joachim and Julius Otto Grimm. A circle of gifted and devoted young artists gathered round the master and rejoiced in having him among them, little imagining that within a few months he would be suddenly snatched from them for ever.

MENTAL COLAPSE.—Schumann's appearance was that of a man with a good constitution ; his figure was above the middle height, full and well-built ; but his nervous system had always shown extreme excitability, and even so early as his twenty-fourth year he suffered from a nervous disorder which increased to serious disease. At a still earlier date he had shown a certain morbid hypertension of feeling, in connexion with his passionate study of Jean Paul, of whom he wrote, even in his eighteenth year, that he often drove him to the verge of madness. Violent shocks of emotion, as for instance the sudden announcement of a death, or the struggle for the hand of Clara Wieck, would bring him into a condition of mortal anguish, and the most terrible state of bewilderment and helplessness, followed by days of overwhelming melancholy. A predisposition to worry himself, an 'ingenuity in clinging to unhappy ideas,' often embittered the fairest moments of his life. Gloomy anticipations darkened his soul ; 'I often feel as if I should not live much longer,' he says in a letter to Zuccalmagho of May 18, 1837, 'and I should like to do a little more work' ; and later, to Hiller—'man must work while it is yet day.' The vigour of youth for a time conquered these melancholy aberrations, and after his marriage the calm and equable happiness which he found in his wife for a long time expelled the evil spirit. It was not till 1844 that he again fell a prey to serious nervous tension. This was evidently the result of undue mental strain, and for a time he was forced to give up all work, and even the hearing of music, and to withdraw into perfect solitude at Dresden. His improvement was slow and not without relapses ; but in 1849 he felt quite re-established, as we gather from his letters and from the work he accomplished ; and his condition seems to have remained satisfactory till about the end of 1851. Then the symptoms of disease reappeared ; he had, as usual, been again working without pause or respite, and even with increased severity ; and was himself so much alarmed as to seek a remedy. Various eccentricities of conduct betrayed even to strangers the state of nervous excitability in which he was. By degrees delusions grew upon him, and he fancied that he incessantly heard one particular note, or certain harmonies, or voices whispering words of reproof or encouragement. Once in the night he fancied that the spirits of Schubert and Mendelssohn brought him a musical theme, and he got up and noted it down. He was again attacked by that 'mortal anguish of mind' of which he had had former experience, and which left him perfectly distracted. Still, all these symptoms were but temporary, and between the attacks Schumann was in full possession of his senses and self-control. He himself expressed a wish to be placed in an asylum, but meanwhile worked on in his old way. He wrote some variations for the piano on the theme revealed to him by Schubert and Mendelssohn, but they were his last work, and remained unfinished.

On Feb. 27, 1854, in the afternoon, in one of his fits of agony of mind, he left the house unobserved and threw himself from the bridge into the Rhine. Some boatmen were on the watch and rescued him, and he was recognised and carried home. Unmistakable symptoms of insanity now declared themselves, but after a few days a peculiar clearness and calmness of mind returned, and with it his irrepresible love of work. He completed the variation on which he had been at work before the great catastrophe. These last efforts of his wearied genius remain unpublished, but Brahms has used the theme for a set of 4-hand variations which form one of his most beautiful and touching works (op. 23), and which he has dedicated to Schumann's daughter Julie.

The last two years of Schumann's life were spent in the private asylum of Dr. Richarz at Endenich, near Bonn. His mental disorder developed into deep melancholy ; at times—as in the spring of 1855—when for a while he seemed better, his outward demeanour was almost the same as before. He corresponded with his friends and received visits, but gradually the pinions of his soul drooped and fell, and he died in the arms of his wife, July 29, 1856, only 46 years of age.

Soon after Schumann's death his music achieved a popularity in Germany which will bear comparison with that of the most favourite of the older masters. When once the peculiarities of his style grew familiar, it was realised that these very peculiarities had their origin in the deepest feelings of the nation. The desire of giving outward expression to the love which was felt towards him soon asserted itself more and more strongly. Schumann was buried at Bonn, in the churchyard opposite the Sternenthor, and it was resolved to erect a monument to him there. On Aug. 17, 18 and 19, 1873, a Schumann festival took place at Bonn, consisting entirely of the master's compositions. The conducting was undertaken by Joachim and Wasielewski, and among the performers were Madame Schumann, who played her husband's pianoforte concerto, and Stockhausen. The festival was one of overwhelming interest, owing to the sympathy taken in it, and the manner in which that sympathy was displayed. The proceeds of the concerts were devoted to a monument to Schumann's memory, which was executed by A. Donndorf of Stuttgart, erected over the grave, and unveiled on May 2, 1880. On this occasion also a concert took place, consisting of compositions by Schumann and Brahms's violin concerto (op. 77), conducted by himself and played by Joachim.

THE LITERARY ARTIST.—Schumann, with his activity both as an author and as a composer, was a new phenomenon in German music. It is true that he had had a predecessor in this respect in C. M. von Weber, who also had a distinct gift and vocation for authorship, and whose collected writings form a literary monument possessing far more than a merely personal interest. Still, Weber was prevented by circumstances and by his own natural restlessness from fully developing his literary talent, while Schumann benefited by the restraint and discipline of his ten years of editorship. In 1854 he had his Gesammelte Schriften über Musik und Musiker published in four volumes by Wigand in Leipzig, and it was not long in reaching its second edition, which appeared in two volumes in 1871. This collection, however, is not nearly complete, and the essays it includes have been much altered. A full and correct edition of his writings is still a desideratum.

It must not, however, be imagined that Schumann's aim as an author was to lay down the principles on which he worked as a composer; it is indeed hardly possible to contrast the critical and the productive elements in his works. His authorship and his musical compositions were two distinct phases of a creative nature, and if it was by composition that he satisfied his purely musical craving it was by writing that he gave utterance to his poetical instincts. His essays are for the most part rather rhapsodies on musical works or poetical imagery lavished on musical subjects than criticisms properly speaking; and the cases where he writes in the negative vein are very rare exceptions. A high ideal floats before his mind, and supported by the example of the greatest masters of the art, his one aim is to introduce a new and pregnant period of music in contrast to the shallowness of his own time. Again and again he speaks of this as the 'poetic phase'—and here we must guard against a misunderstanding. The term 'poetic music' is often used in antithesis to 'pure music,' to indicate a work based on a combination of poetry and music; as, for instance, a song, which may be conceived of either as a purely musical composition founded on the union of definite feelings and ideas, or as intended to express the preconceived emotions and ideas of the poet. But it was not anything of this kind that Schumann meant to convey; he simply regarded poetry as the antithesis to prose, just as enthusiasm is the antithesis to sober dullness, the youthful rhapsodist to the Philistine, the artist with his lofty ideal to the mechanical artisan or the superficial dilettante. His aim is to bring to birth a living art, full of purpose and feeling, and he cannot endure a mere skeleton of forms and phrases. In this key he pitches his writings on music, and their purport is always the same. He once speaks of reviewers and critics under a quaint simile—'Music excites the nightingale to love-songs, the lap-dog to bark.' Nothing could more accurately represent his own attitude in writing on music than the first of these images. From his point of view a piece of music ought to rouse in the true critic sympathetic feeling, he ought to absorb and assimilate its contents, and then echo them in words—Schumann was in fact the singing nightingale. Though we may not feel inclined to apply his other comparison to every critic who does not follow in his steps, we may at least say that the difference between Schumann's style and that of the musical periodicals of his day was as great as that between a nightingale and a lap-dog. And how strange and new were the tones uttered by this poet-critic! A considerable resemblance to Jean Paul must be admitted, particularly in his earlier critiques: the ecstatic youthful sentiment, the humorous suggestions, the highly wrought and dazzling phraseology are common to both; but the style is quite different. Schumann commonly writes in short and vivid sentences, going straight at his subject without digressions, and indulging in bold abbreviations. There is a certain indolence of genius about him, and yet a sure artistic instinct throughout. Nor has he a trace of Jean Paul's sentimental 'luxury of woe,' but we everywhere find, side by side with emotional rhapsody, the refreshing breeziness of youth and health.

It has already been said that Schumann connects certain definite characteristics with different feigned names (Florestan, Eusebius, Raro, etc.), a device which none but a poet could have hit on. Indeed, it would be a hindrance to the writing of calm criticism, which must have a fixed and clearly defined position as its basis. But it often introduces a varied and even dramatic liveliness into the discussion, which is very attractive, and leads to a deeper consideration of the subject. Schumann, however, could use still more artificial forms in his critiques. Thus he discusses the first concert conducted by Mendelssohn at the Gewandhaus, Oct. 1835, in letters addressed by Eusebius to Chiara in Italy; and within this frame the details of the concert are gracefully entwined with ingenious reflections and fanciful ideas which add brilliance to the picture. On another occasion, when he was to write about a mass of dance music, Schumann has recourse to the following fiction: the editor of a certain musical paper gives an historical fancy ball. Composers are invited, young lady amateurs and their mothers, music publishers, diplomatists, a few rich Jewesses, and—of course—the Davidsbündler; the dance programme includes the music to be criticised, to which the couples whirl about during the whole evening. Hence arise all sorts of humorous incidents—satirical, whimsical and sentimental outpourings, in which a criticism of the compositions is brought in unperceived. On another occasion, the Davidsbündler have met, and the new compositions are played in turns; during the playing the rest carry on a variety of amusements which culminate in a magic lantern, throwing the figures of a masked ball on the wall, which Florestan, standing on the table, explains, while Zilia plays Franz Schubert's 'Deutsche Tänze.' Anything more vivid, charming and poetical than this essay¹ has never been written on music; a little work of art in itself! Once, in reviewing a concert given by Clara Wieck, he gives us a real poem.² In this he combines his own tender sentiments with a skilful characterisation of all that was peculiar in the performance. For sketching character-portraits Schumann shows a conspicuous talent; the articles in which he has characterised Sterndale Bennett, Gade and Henselt are unsurpassed by anything since written concerning these artists. He seems to have penetrated with the insight of a seer to the core of their natures, and has set forth his conclusions in a delicate and picturesque manner that no one has succeeded in imitating.

The foundation of Schumann's critiques lay in kindness; his fastidious character would simply have nothing to do with anything bad enough to demand energetic reproof. The most cutting and bitter article³ he ever wrote was the famous one on Meyerbeer's 'Huguenots.' In its violence it has no doubt somewhat overshot the mark; but nowhere perhaps do the purity and nobleness of Schumann's artistic views shine forth more clearly than in this critique and in the one immediately following on Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul.' It was the great success of the 'Huguenots' which infused the acid into Schumann's antagonism; for when dealing with inoffensive writers he could wield the weapons of irony and ridicule both lightly and effectively. But he is most at his ease when giving praise and encouragement; then words flow so directly from his heart that his turns of expression have often quite a magical charm. As an example we may mention the article⁴ on Field's seventh concerto. Anything more tender and full of feeling was never written under the semblance of a critique than the remarks on a sonata in C minor by Delphine Hill-Handley—formerly Delphine Schauroth.⁵ Schumann has here given us a really poetical masterpiece in its kind, full of intelligent appreciation of the purport of the work, and giving covert expression to its maidenly feeling, even in the style of his discussion; it must delight the reader even if he does not know a note of the composition. Schumann had fresh imagery always at command, and if in a generally moribund work he found something to blame, he contrived to do it in the most delicate manner. His amiable temper, his tender heart and his conspicuous talents for literary work combined never left him at a loss in such cases for some ingenious or whimsical turn. Sometimes, though rarely, in his eager sympathy for youthful genius in difficulty he went too far; Hermann Hirschbach, for instance, never fulfilled the hopes that Schumann formed of him; and even in his remarks on Berlioz, he at first probably said more than he would afterwards have maintained.

In later years Schumann's flowery and poetic vein gave way to a calm and contemplative style. His opinions and principles remained as sound as ever, but they are less keenly and brilliantly expressed than at the earlier period when he took peculiar pleasure in turning a flashing phrase.⁶ Still, the practical musician always predominates, and Schumann himself confesses that 'the curse of a mere musician often hits higher than all your aesthetics.'⁷ Here and there, however, we come upon a profound aesthetic axiom, the value of which is in no degree diminished by our perception that it is the result rather of intuition than of any systematic reflection. It is universally acknowledged that by his essay 'on certain corrupt passages in classical works'⁸ Schumann gave a real impetus to the textual criticism of music; historical clues and comparisons are frequently suggested, and though these indications are not founded on any comprehensive historical knowledge, on all important subjects they show a happy instinct for the right conclusion, and are always worthy of attention.

It may be said of Schumann's literary work in general that it was not calculated to attract attention merely for the moment, though it did in fact open up new paths, but that it took the form of writings which have a high and permanent value. They will always hold a foremost place in the literature of music, and may indeed take high rank in the literature of art. For analytical acumen they are less remarkable. Schumann cannot be called the Lessing of music, nor is it by the display of learning that he produces his effects. It is the union of poetic talent with musical genius, wide intelligence and high culture that stamps Schumann's writings with originality and gives them their independent value.

Schumann's literary work was connected with another phase of the musical world of Germany, as new in its way as the twofold development of his genius—the rise of party feeling. No doubt Schumann gave the first impetus to this movement, both by his imaginary 'Davidsbündlerschaft' and by that Radical instinct which was part of his nature. Schumann's principles as an artist were the same which have been professed and followed by all the greatest German masters; what was new in him was the active attempt to propagate them as principles. So long as he conducted the Zeitschrift he could not of course lend himself to party feeling; the standard he had assumed was so high that all who took a serious view of art were forced to gather round him. But the spirit of agitation was inflamed, and when he retired from the paper other principles of less general application were put forward. It was self-evident that Schumann was the only contemporary German composer who could stand side by side with Mendelssohn, and they were of course compared. It was asserted that in Mendelssohn form took the precedence of meaning, while in Schumann meaning predominated, striving after a new form of utterance. Thus they were put forward as the representatives of two antagonistic principles of art, and a Mendelssohn party and a Schumann party were formed. In point of fact there was scarcely any trace of such an antagonism of principle between the two composers; the difference was really one of idiosyncrasy; and so, being grounded more or less on personal feeling, the parties assumed something of the character of cliques. The literary Schumannites, having the command of an organ of their own, had an advantage over the partisans of Mendelssohn, who, like Mendelssohn himself, would have nothing to do with the press. Leipzig was for a time the headquarters of the two parties. There, where Mendelssohn had worked for the delight and improvement of the musical world, it was the fate of his art to be first exposed to attack and detraction, which, to the discredit of the German nation, rapidly spread through wider and wider circles, and was fated too to proceed first from the blind admirers of the very master for whom Mendelssohn ever felt the deepest attachment and respect. That Schumann himself must have been painfully affected by this spirit is as clear as that it could only result in hindering the unprejudiced reception of his works; and the process thus begun with Schumann has been carried on, in a greater degree, in the case of Wagner.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.—As a composer Schumann started with the pianoforte, and until the year 1840 wrote scarcely anything but pianoforte music. For some time he used to compose sitting at the instrument, and continued to do so even until 1839, though he afterwards condemned the practice (in his Musikalische Haus- und Lebens-regeln). At all events it had the advantage of making him write from the first in true pianoforte style. If ever pianoforte works took their origin from the innermost nature of the pianoforte, Schumann's did so most thoroughly. His mode of treating the instrument is entirely new. He develops upon it a kind of orchestral polyphony, and by means of the pedal, of extended intervals, of peculiar positions of chords, of contractions of the hands and so forth he succeeds in bringing out of it an undreamt-of wealth of effects of tone. How deeply and thoroughly Schumann had studied the character of the instrument may be seen from the detailed preface to his arrangement of Paganini's caprices (op. 3). Even in his earliest pianoforte works he nowhere shows any inclination to the method of any of the older masters, except in the variations, op. 1, which betray the influence of the school of Hummel and Moscheles. But it is evident that he knew all that others had done, and the time and attention devoted in his writings to works of technical pianoforte study were no doubt deliberately given. Notwithstanding this his compositions are scarcely ever written in the bravura style; for he seldom cared to clothe his ideas in mere outward brilliancy. Sometimes one is constrained to wonder at his reluctance to use the higher and lower registers of the pianoforte.

As is the case with the technical treatment of the piano, so it is from the beginning with the substance and form of his compositions. Few among the great German masters show such striking originality from their very first compositions. In the whole range of Schumann's works there is scarcely a trace of any other musician. At the outset of his course as a composer he preferred to use the concise dance or song form, making up his longer pieces from a number of these smaller forms set together as in a mosaic, instead of at once casting his thoughts in a larger mould. But the versatility with which the small forms are treated is a testimony to the magnitude of his creative faculty. The predominance of the small forms is explained by his earlier method of composing. Diligent and constant though he was in later years, in early life his way of working was fitful and inconstant. The compositions of this period seem as if forced out of him by sudden impulses of genius. As he subsequently says of his early works, 'the man and the musician in me were always trying to speak at the same time.' This must indeed be true of every artist; if the whole personality be not put into a work of art, it will be utterly worthless. But by those words Schumann means to say that as a youth he attempted to bring to light in musical form his inmost feelings with regard to his personal life-experiences. Under such circumstances it is but natural that they should contain much that was purely accidental and inexplicable by the laws of art alone; but it is to this kind of source that they owe the magic freshness and originality with which they strike the hearer. The variations, op. 1, are an instance of this. The theme is formed of the notes A, B(♭), E, G, G. Meta Abegg was the name of a beautiful young lady in Mannheim, whose acquaintance Schumann, when a student, had made at a ball. Playful symbolism of this kind is not unfrequent in him. To a certain extent it may be traced back to Sebastian Bach, who expressed his own name in a musical phrase: as Schumann afterwards did Gade's. (See 'Album für die Jugend,' op. 68, No. 41.) In the same way (Ges. Schriften, ii. 115) he expresses the woman's name 'Beda' in musical notes, and also in the 'Carnaval' made those letters in his own name which stand as notes—s (es), c, h, a—into a musical phrase. But the idea really came from Jean Paul, who is very fond of tracing out such mystic connexions. Schumann's op. 2 consists of a set of small pianoforte pieces in dance form under the name of 'Papillons.' They were written partly at Heidelberg, partly in the first years of the Leipzig period which followed. No inner musical connexion subsists between them. But Schumann felt the necessity of giving them a poetical connexion, to satisfy his own feelings, if for nothing else, and for this purpose he adopted the last chapter but one¹ of Jean Paul's Flegeljahre, where a masked ball is described at which the lovers Wina and Walt are guests, as a poetic background for the series. The several pieces of music may thus be intended to represent partly the different characters in the crowd of maskers, and partly the conversation of the lovers. The finale is written designedly with reference to this scene in Jean Paul, as is plain from the indication written above the notes found near the end—

'The noise of the Carnival-night dies away. The church clock strikes six.' The strokes of the bell are actually audible, being represented by the A six times repeated. Then all is hushed, and the piece seems to vanish into thin air like a vision. In the finale there are several touches of humour. It begins with an old Volkslied, familiar to every household in Germany as the GROSSVATERTANZ (q.v.).

In contrast to these two old-fashioned love-tunes is placed the soft and graceful melody of No. 1 of the 'Papillons,' which is afterwards worked contrapuntally with the 'Grossvater-tanz.' The name 'Papillons' is not meant to indicate a light, fluttering character in the pieces, but rather refers to musical phases which, proceeding from various experiences of life, have attained the highest musical import, as the butterfly soars upwards out of the chrysalis. The design of the title-page in the first edition points towards some such meaning as this; and the explanation we have given corresponds with his usual method of composing at that time. There exists, however, no decisive account of it by the composer himself.

In a kind of connexion with the 'Papillons' is the 'Carnaval,' op. 9. Here again Schumann has depicted the merriment of a masquerade in musical pictures, and a third and somewhat similar essay of the same kind is his 'Faschings-schwank' aus Wien, op. 26. The 'Carnaval' is a collection of small pieces, written one by one without any special purpose, and not provided either with collective or individual titles until later, when he arranged them in their present order. The musical connexion between the pieces is that with few exceptions they all contain some reference to the succession of notes a, es, c, h (A, E♭, C, B) or as, c, h (Ab, C, B). Now Asch is the name of a small town in Bohemia, the home of a Fräulein Ernestine von Fricken, with whom Schumann was very intimate at the time of his writing this music. The same notes in another order, s (or es), c, h, a, are also the only letters in Schumann's own name which represent notes. This explains the title 'Sphinxes,' which is affixed to the ninth number on p. 13 of the original edition. The pieces are named, some from characters in the masked ball—Pierrot, Arlequin, Pantalón and Colombine—and some from real persons. In this last category we meet with the members of the Davidsbund—Florestan, Eusebius and Chiarina; Ernestine von Fricken, under the name Estrella, Chopin and Paganini; there is also a 'Coquette,' but it is not known for whom this is intended. Besides these, some of the pieces are named from situations and occurrences at the ball; a recognition, an avowal of love, a promenade, a pause in the dance (Reconnaissance, Aveu, Promenade, Pause); between these are heard the sounds of waltzes, and in one of the pieces the letters A-S-C-H and S-C-H-A, 'Lettres dansantes,' themselves dance boisterously and noisily, and then vanish like airy phantoms. A piece called 'Papillons' rushes by like a hasty reminiscence, and in the numbers entitled 'Florestan' an actual passage from No. 1 of the 'Papillons' (op. 2) is inserted. The finale is called 'March of the Davidsbündler against the Philistines.' The symbol of the Philistines is the 'Grossvater-tanz,' here called by Schumann a tune of the 17th century. The fact of the march being in 3-4 time has perhaps a humorous and symbolic meaning.

The 'Davidsbündlertänze' (op. 6), the 'Fantasiestücke' (op. 12), 'Kinderszenen' (op. 15), 'Kreisleriana' (op. 16), 'Novelletten' (op. 21), 'Bunte Blätter' (op. 99) and 'Albumblätter' (op. 124), the contents of which all belong to Schumann's early period, and, of the later works, such pieces as the 'Waldscenen' (op. 82), all bear the impress of having originated, like the 'Papillons' and the 'Carnaval,' in the personal experiences of Schumann's life. They are poésies d'occasion (Gelegenheitsdichtungen), a term which, in Goethe's sense, designates the highest form that a work of art can take. As to the 'Davidsbündlertänze,' the 'Kreisleriana' and the 'Novelletten,' Schumann himself tells us that they reflect the varying moods wrought in him by the contentions about Clara Wieck. In the 'Davidsbündlertänze' the general arrangement is that Florestan and Eusebius appear usually by turns, though sometimes also together. The expression 'dance' does not, however, mean, as is sometimes supposed, the dances that the Davidsbündler led the Philistines, but merely indicates the form of the pieces, which is, truth to say, used with scarcely less freedom than that of the march in the finale to the 'Carnaval.' The 'Kreisleriana' have their origin in a fantastic story with the same title by E. T. A. Hoffmann, contained in his Fantasiestücke in Callots Manier (Bamberg, 1814, p. 47). Hoffmann was a follower of Jean Paul, who indeed wrote a preface to Fantasiestücke. Half musician, half poet, Schumann must have looked on him as a kindred spirit; and in the figure of the wild and eccentric yet gifted 'Kapellmeister Kreisler,' drawn by Hoffmann from incidents in his own life, there were many traits in which Schumann might easily see a reflection of himself. Of the 'Novelletten,' Schumann says that they are 'long and connected romantic stories.' There are no titles to explain them, although much may be conjectured from the indications of time and expression. But the rest of the works we have just mentioned nearly always have their separate component parts, headed by names which lead the imagination of the player or hearer, in a clear and often deeply poetic manner, in a particular and definite direction. This form of piano piece was altogether a very favourite one with Schumann. He is careful to guard against the supposition that he imagined a definite object in his mind, such as a 'pleading child' (in op. 15) or a 'haunted spot in a wood' (in op. 82), and then tried to describe it in notes. His method was rather to invent the piece quite independently and afterwards to give it a particular meaning by a superscription. His chief object was always to give the piece a value of its own, and to make it intelligible of itself. This principle is undoubtedly the right one, and, by adopting it, Schumann proved himself a genuine musician, with faith in the independent value of his art. Nevertheless, had he considered the poetical titles utterly unimportant, he would hardly have employed them as he has in so large a majority of his smaller pianoforte pieces. His doing so seems to evince a feeling that in the composition of the piece alone he had not said everything that struggled within him for expression. Until a particular mood or feeling had been aroused in the hearer or the player, by means of the title, Schumann could not be sure that the piece would have the effect which he desired it to have. Strictly speaking, poetry and music can only be really united by means of the human voice. But in these pianoforte pieces with poetical titles Schumann found a means of expression which hovered as it were between pure instrumental music on the one hand and vocal music on the other, and thus received a certain indefinite and mysterious character of its own, which may most justly be called romantic, but which is entirely apart from any connexion with what is now called PROGRAMME MUSIC (q.v.).

Among the compositions consisting of small forms we must count the variations. Schumann treated the variation-form freely and fancifully, but with a profuse wealth of genius and depth of feeling. For the impromptu on a theme by Clara Wieck (op. 5), Beethoven's so-called 'Eroica Variations' (op. 35), apparently served as a model; they remind us of them both in general arrangement and in the employment of the bass as a theme, without being in any way wanting in originality. In the andante and variations for two pianofortes (op. 46), one of the most charming and popular of Schumann's pianoforte works, he treated the form with such freedom that they are not so much variations as fantasias in the style of variations.¹ His most splendid work in this form is his op. 13 (the 'Études symphoniques'), a work of the grandest calibre, which alone would be sufficient to secure him a place in the first rank of composers for the pianoforte, so overpowering is the display of his own individual treatment of the pianoforte—frequently rising to the highest limits of the bravura style of execution—of his overflowing profusion of ideas, and his boldness in turning the variation-form to his own account. In the finale the first two bars only of the theme are employed, and these only occasionally in the 'working-out section.' In other respects the proud edifice of this elaborately worked number has nothing in common with a variation.¹ It contains, however, a delicate reference to the person to whom the whole work is dedicated, William Sterndale Bennett. The beginning of the chief subject is a fragment of the celebrated romance in Marschner's 'Templer und Judin' ('Du stolzes England, freue dich,' etc.). It is an ingenious way of paying a compliment to his beloved English composer.²

Schumann had made early attempts at works of larger structure, but it cannot be denied that they were not at first successful. The sonata in F# minor (op. 11) teems with beautiful ideas, but is wanting in unity to a remarkable degree, at least in the allegro movements. That in F minor (op. 14) shows a decided improvement in this respect, and the sonata in G minor (op. 22) is still better, although not entirely free from a certain clumsiness. Schumann afterwards showed himself quite aware of the faults of these sonatas in regard to form. They offer the most striking example of his irregular and rhapsodical method of working at that period. The second movement of the sonata in G minor (see SONATA) was written in June 1830, the first and third in June 1833, the fourth in its original form in Oct. 1835, and in its ultimate form in 1838, the whole sonata being published in 1839. The sonata in F# minor was begun in 1833 and not completed till 1835. That in F minor, finished on June 5, 1836, consisted at first of five movements—an allegro, two scherzos (one after the other), an andantino with variations and a prestissimo. When the work was first published, under the title of 'Concerto sans orchestre,' Schumann cut out the two scherzos, apparently intending to use them for a second sonata in F minor. This, however, was not carried out, and in the second edition of the work he restored the second of the scherzos to its place.³ When we observe how he took up one sonata after another, we see how impossible it is that any close connexion can subsist between the several parts, or that there should be any real unity in them as a whole.

The allegro for pianoforte (op. 8) is somewhat disjointed in form, while the toccata (op. 7), a bravura piece of the greatest brilliance and difficulty in perfect sonata-form, exhibits a great degree of connexion and consequence. In the great fantasia (op. 17) we are led by the title to expect no conciseness of form. The classical masters generally gave to their fantasias a very clearly defined outline, but Schumann in this case breaks through every restriction that limits the form, especially in the first movement, where he almost seems to lose himself in limitless freedom. In order to give unity to the fantastic and somewhat loosely connected movements of this work of genius, he again had recourse to poetry, and prefaced the piece with some lines by F. Schlegel as a motto:

Durch alle Töne tönet
Im bunten Erdentraum,
Ein laiser Ton gezogen
Für den der heimlich lauscht.

Through all the tones that vibrate
About earth's mingled dream,
One whispered note is sounding
For ears attuned to hear.

The 'earth's mingled dream' is in a manner portrayed in the substance of the composition. Schumann means that 'the ear attuned to hear' will perceive the uniting-tones that run through all the pictures which the imagination of the composer unrolls to his view. Schlegel's motto seems almost like an excuse offered by Schumann. The original purpose of this fantasia was not, however, to illustrate these lines. About Dec. 17, 1835, an appeal having been made from Bonn for contributions to a Beethoven memorial, Schumann proposed to contribute a composition; and this was the origin of the work now called 'Fantasia,' the three movements of which were originally intended to bear the respective inscriptions of 'Ruins,' 'Triumphal Arch' and 'The Starry Crown.' By these names the character both of the separate parts and of the whole becomes more intelligible. In order to get into the right disposition for the work Schumann's four articles⁴ on Beethoven's monument should be read.

Although few of Schumann's pianoforte works of the first period are without defects of form, yet their beauties are so many that we easily forget those defects. In certain ways the compositions of the first ten years present the most characteristic picture of Schumann's genius. In after life he proposed and attained loftier ideals in works worthy of the perfect master. But the freshness and charm of his earlier pianoforte works was never surpassed, and in his later years was but rarely reached. A dreamy imaginative nature was united in Schumann's character with a native solidity that never descended to the commonplace. From the first his music had in it a character which appealed to the people—nay, which was in a way national. After Beethoven, Schumann is the first master who possesses the power of giving full and free expression to the humorous element in instrumental music. Both in his writings and compositions he allows it to have full play, and it is in his earlier PF. works that it is most prominent. One of his freshest and fullest works is the Humoreske (op. 20), the most wonderful portrayal of a humorous disposition that it is possible to imagine in music. Schumann's thorough individuality is prominent alike in harmonies, rhythm and colouring, and in the forms of the melodies. It is, however, characteristic of his early pianoforte works that broad bold melodies rarely occur in them, though there is a superabundance of melodic fragments—germs of melody, as they might be called, full of a deep expression of their own. This music is pervaded by a spring-like animation and force, a germ of future promise, which gives it a peculiar romantic character; a character strengthened by the admixture of poetic moods and feelings. Schumann was both musician and poet, and he who would thoroughly understand his music must be first imbued with the spirit of the German poets who were most prominent in Schumann's youth; above all others Jean Paul and the whole romantic school, particularly Eichendorff, Heine and Rückert. And just as these poets were specially great in short lyrics, revealing endless depths of feeling in a few lines, so did Schumann succeed, as no one had done before, in saying great things, and leaving unutterable things to be felt, in the small form of a short pianoforte piece.

² H. K. Krehbiel pointed out that the theme of the finale is based on an inversion of the principal theme. Schumann's intention to quote from Marschner in honour of Bennett has been questioned.

Schumann's enthusiastic admiration and thorough appreciation of Bach have been already described (see BACH GESELLSCHAFT). He shared this with Mendelssohn, but it is certain that he entered more thoroughly than Mendelssohn did into the old master's mysterious depth of feeling. It would therefore have been wonderful if he had not attempted to express himself in the musical forms used by Bach. His strong natural inclination towards polyphonic writing is perceptible even in his earliest pianoforte works, but it was not until 1840 that it comes prominently forward. His six fugues on the name 'Bach' (op. 60), the four fugues (op. 72), the seven pianoforte pieces in fughetta form (op. 126), the studies in canon form for the pedal piano (op. 56), and the other separate canons and fugues scattered up and down his pianoforte works—all form a class in modern pianoforte music just as new as do his pianoforte works in the free style. The treatment of the parts in the fugues is by no means always strictly according to rule, even when viewed from the standpoint of Bach, who allowed himself considerable freedom. In employing an accompaniment of chords in one part, he also goes far beyond what had hitherto been considered allowable. But yet, taken as a whole, these works are masterpieces; no other composer of his time could have succeeded as he did in welding together so completely the modern style of feeling with the old strict form, or in giving that form a new life and vigour by means of the modern spirit. In these pieces we hear the same Schumann whom we know in his other works; his ideas adapt themselves as if spontaneously to the strict requirements of the polyphonic style, and these requirements again draw from his imagination new and characteristic ideas. In short, though a great contrapuntist he was not a pedantic one, and he may be numbered among the few musicians of the last hundred years to whom polyphonic forms have been a perfectly natural means of expressing their ideas.

SONG WRITING.—As a composer of songs Schumann displays a more finely cultivated poetic taste than Schubert, with a many-sided feeling for lyric expression far greater than Mendelssohn's. Many of his melodies are projected in bold and soaring lines, such as we meet with in no other composer but Schubert; for instance, in the well-known songs 'Widmung' (op. 25, No. 1), 'Lied der Braut' (op. 25, No. 12), 'Liebesbotschaft' (op. 36, No. 6), 'Stille Thränen' (op. 35, No. 10) and others. Still more frequently he throws himself into the spirit of the German Volkslied, and avails himself of its simpler and narrower forms of melody. Indeed his songs owe their extraordinary popularity chiefly to this conspicuously national element. The reader need only be reminded of the song 'O Sonnenschein' (op. 36, No. 4), of Heine's 'Liederkreis' (op. 24), and of the Heine songs 'Hör' ich das Liedchen klingen,' 'Allnächtlich im Traume,' 'Aus alten Märgen' (op. 48, Nos. 10, 14, 15), of most of the songs and ballads (opp. 45, 49, 53), and above all of the 'Wanderlied' (op. 35, No. 3), which sparkles with youthful life and healthy vigour. Besides these there are many songs in which the melody is hardly worked out, and which are—as is also frequently the case with his pianoforte works—as it were, mere sketches, or germs, of melodies. This style of treatment, which is quite peculiar to Schumann, he was fond of using when he wished to give the impression of a vague, dreamy, veiled sentiment; and by this means he penetrated more deeply than his contemporaries into the vital essence and sources of feeling. Such songs as 'Der Nussbaum' (op. 25, No. 3), or 'Im Walde' (op. 39, No. 11) are masterpieces in this kind. Besides this, Schumann always brought a true poet's instinct to bear on the subtlest touches and most covert suggestions in the poems which he chose for setting, and selected the musical expression best fitted to their purport. He was the first who ventured to close on the dominant seventh when his text ended with a query (as in op. 49, No. 3). With him also the vocal part often does not end on the common chord, but the true close is left to the accompaniment, so as to give an effect of vague and undefined feeling. The part filled by the pianoforte in Schumann's songs is a very important one. It was evidently of moment in the history of his art that Schumann should have come to the work of writing songs after ten years' experience as a composer for the pianoforte, and after instituting an entirely new style of pianoforte music. This style supplied him with an immense variety of delicate and poetic modes and shades of expression, and it is owing to this that he displays such constant novelty in his treatment of the pianoforte part. The forms of phrase which he adopts in his 'accompaniments' are infinitely various, and always correspond with perfect fitness and ingenuity to the character of the verses. In some cases the pianoforte part is an entirely independent composition, which the voice merely follows with a few declamatory phrases (op. 48, No. 9, 'Das ist ein Flöten und Geigen'); while in others, in contrast to this, the voice stands almost alone, and the pianoforte begins by throwing in a few soft chords which nevertheless have their due characteristic effect (op. 48, No. 13, 'Ich hab' im Traum'). In Schumann's songs the proper function of the pianoforte is to reveal some deep and secret meaning which it is beyond the power of words, even of sung words, to express; and he always disliked and avoided those repetitions of the words of which other composers have availed themselves in order to fill out in the music the feeling to which the words give rise. When he does repeat he always seems to have a special dramatic end in view rather than a musical one, and often makes the piano supplement the sentiment aroused by the text, while the voice is silent. He is particularly strong in his final symphonies, to which he gave a value and importance, as an integral portion of the song, which no one before him had ventured to do, often assigning to it a new and independent musical thought of its own. Sometimes he allows the general feeling of the song to reappear in it under quite a new light; sometimes the musical phrase suggests some final outcome of the words, opening to the fancy a remote perspective in which sight is lost (a beautiful example is op. 48, No. 16, 'Die alten bösen Lieder'). Or he continues the poem in music; of which a striking instance is the close of the 'Frauenliebe und -Leben' (op. 42), where by repeating the music of the first song he revives in the fancy of the lonely widow the memory of her early happiness. The realm of feeling revealed to us in Schumann's songs is thoroughly youthful, an unfailing mark of the true lyric; the sentiment he principally deals with is that of love, which in his hands is especially tender and pure, almost maidenly. The set of songs called 'Frauenliebe und -Leben' gives us a deep insight into the most subtle and secret emotions of a pure woman's soul, deeper indeed than could have been expected from any man, and in fact no composer but Schumann would have been capable of it.

Schumann also found musical equivalents and shades of colour for Eichendorff's mystical views of nature; his settings of Eichendorff's poems may be called absolutely classical, and he is equally at home in dealing with the bubbling freshness or the chivalrous sentiment of the poet. Many of Schumann's fresh and sparkling songs have a touch of the student's joviality, but without descending from their high distinction; never under any circumstances was he trivial. Indeed he had no sympathy with the farcical, though his talent for the humorous is amply proved by his songs. A masterpiece of the kind is the setting of Heine's poem 'Ein Jüngling liebt ein Mädchen' (op. 48, No. 11), with its strange undercurrent of tragedy. It was principally in dealing with Heine's words that he betrays this sense of humour; 'Wir saßen am Fischerhause' (op. 45, No. 3) is an example, and still more 'Es leuchtet meine Liebe' (op. 127, No. 3), where a resemblance to the scherzo of the A minor string quartet is very obvious. A thing which may well excite astonishment as apparently quite beside the nature of Schumann's character, is that he could even find characteristic music for Heine's bitterest irony (op. 24, No. 6) 'Warte, warte, wilder Schiffsmann,' and many of the 'Dichterliebe.'

THE SYMPHONIES.—Schumann's symphonies may be considered as the most important in their time since Beethoven. Though Mendelssohn excels him in regularity of form, and though Schubert's C major symphony is quite unique in its wealth of beautiful musical ideas, yet Schumann surpasses both in greatness and force. He is the man, they the youths; he has the greatest amount of what is demanded by that greatest, most mature, and most important of all forms of instrumental music. He comes near to Beethoven, who it is quite evident was almost the only composer that he ever took as a model. No trace whatever of Haydn or Mozart is to be found in his symphonies, and of Mendelssohn just as little. A certain approximation to Schubert is indeed perceptible in the 'working out' (Durchführung) of his allegro movements. But the symphonies, like the pianoforte works, the songs, and indeed all that Schumann produced, bear the strong impress of a marvellous originality, and a creative power all his own. Even the first published symphony (in B \flat , op. 38) shows a very distinct talent for this branch of composition. We do not know that Schumann had ever previously attempted orchestral compositions, except in the case of the symphony written in the beginning of 1830, which still remains in MS. In 1839 he writes to Dorn: 'At present it is true that I have not had much practice in orchestral writing, but I hope to master it some day.' And in his next attempt he attained his object. In a few passages in the B \flat symphony, the effects of the instruments are indeed not rightly calculated. One great error in the first movement he remedied after the first hearing. This was in the two opening bars, from which the theme of the allegro is afterwards generated, and which were given to the horns and trumpets. It ran originally thus, in agreement with the beginning of the allegro movement :

which, on account of the G and A being stopped notes, had an unexpected and very comic effect. Schumann himself was much amused at the mistake ; when he was at Hanover in January 1854 he told the story to his friends, and it was very amusing to hear this man, usually so grave and silent, regardless of the presence of strangers (for the incident took place at a public restaurant), sing out the first five notes of the subject quite loud, the two next in a muffled voice, and the last again loud. He placed the phrase a third higher, as it stands in the printed score :

Another, but less important passage for the horns has remained unaltered. In bar 17 of the first allegro, Schumann thought that this phrase ought to be made more prominent than it usually was on the horns, and requested both Taubert and David, when it was in rehearsal at Berlin and Leipzig in the winter of 1842, to have it played on the trombones.

But in general we cannot but wonder at the certain mastery over his means that he shows even in the first symphony. His orchestration is less smooth and clear than that of either Mendelssohn or Gade, and in its sterner style reminds us rather of Schubert. But this stern power is suited to the substance of his ideas, and there is no lack of captivating beauty of sound. We even meet in his orchestral works with a number of new effects of sound such as only true genius can discover or invent. Instances of these are the treatment of the three trumpets in the 'Manfred' overture, the use made of the horns in the second movement of the symphony in E♭, the violin solo introduced into the Romanza of the D minor symphony, etc. etc. It is hard to decide which of Schumann's four symphonies (or five, counting op. 52) is the finest. Each has individual beauties of its own. In life and freshness and the feeling of inward happiness, the symphony in B♭ stands at the head. Schumann originally intended to call it the 'Spring Symphony' ; and indeed he wrote it, as we learn from a letter to Taubert, in Feb. 1841, when the first breath of spring was in the air. The first movement was to have been called 'Spring's Awakening,' and the finale (which he always wished not to be taken too fast) 'Spring's Farewell.' Many parts of the symphony have an especial charm when we thus know the object with which they were written. The beginning of the introduction evidently represents a trumpet summons sent pealing down from on high ; then gentle zephyrs blow softly to and fro, and everywhere the dormant forces awake and make their way to the light (we are quoting from the composer's own programme). In the allegro the spring comes laughing in, in the full beauty of youth.¹ This explains and justifies the novel use of the triangle in the first movement—an instrument not then considered admissible in a symphony. An enchanting effect is produced by the Spring song at the close of the first movement, played as though sung with a full heart ; and it is an entirely new form of coda (see p. 67 of the score). In publishing the symphony, Schumann omitted the explanatory titles, because he believed that the attention of the public is distracted from the main purpose of a work by things of that kind. We may well believe, moreover, that a good part of the spring-like feeling in this symphony comes from the deep and heart-felt joy which Schumann felt at being at last united to his hard-won bride. The same influence is seen in the D minor symphony (op. 120), written in the same year with that just described, and immediately after it. It is entirely similar to its predecessor in its fundamental feeling, but has more passion. The form too is new and very successful ; the four sections follow each other consecutively without any pauses, so that the work seems to consist of only one great movement. The subjects of the Introduction reappear in the Romanze, with different treatment, and the chief subject of the first allegro is the foundation of that of the last. The second part of the first allegro is in quite an unusual form, and before the last allegro we find a slow introduction—imaginative, majestic and most original. As has been already mentioned, Schumann intended to call the work 'Symphonic Fantasia.' Here, too, poetic pictures seem to be hovering round him on every side.

His third symphonic work of the year 1841 is also irregular, but only in form, and has as good a right as the second to the name of 'Symphony.' It appeared, however, under the name 'Overture, Scherzo and Finale' as op. 52. Of this work, which is charming throughout, the first movement offers us the only example to be found in Schumann of the influence of Cherubini, a master for whom he had a great reverence. Perhaps the most lovely movement is the highly poetic scherzo in gigue-rhythm, which might constitute a type by itself among symphony-scherzos. His other scherzos approximate in style to those of Beethoven, whose invention and speciality this form was, and who had no successor in it but Schumann. The characteristic of the C major symphony (op. 61) is a graver and more mature depth of feeling; its bold decisiveness of form and overpowering wealth of expression reveal distinctly the relationship in art between Schumann and Beethoven. The form, too, as far as regards the number and character of the movements, is quite that of the classical masters, while in the last symphony (E♭, op. 97) Schumann once more appears as one of the modern school. This is divided into five separate movements, including a slow movement in sustained style, and of a devotional character, between the andante and the finale. Schumann originally inscribed it with the words 'In the style of an accompaniment to a solemn ceremony' (im Charakter der Begleitung einer feierlichen Cereemonie), and we know that it was suggested to him by the sight of Cologne Cathedral, and the festivities on the occasion of Archbishop von Geissel's elevation to the Cardinalate. The other movements are powerful, and full of variety and charm, and the whole symphony is full of vivid pictures of Rhineland life. Perhaps the gem of the whole is the second movement (scherzo), in which power and beauty are mingled with the romance which in every German heart hovers round the Rhine and its multitude of songs and legends. Although written in 1850, when Schumann's imagination was becoming exhausted, the work bears no trace of any diminution of power. (For a study of the position taken by Schumann's symphonies in the development of the form, see SYMPHONY.)

The poetical concert-overture, a form invented by Mendelssohn, and practised by Bennett and Gade, was one never cultivated by Schumann. His overtures are really 'opening pieces,' whether to opera, play, or some festivity or other. In this again he follows Beethoven. His overtures, like those of Beethoven, are most effective in the concert-room, when the drama or occasion for which they were composed is kept in mind. It is so even with the wonderful 'Genoveva' overture, which contains something of Weber's power and swing; but more than all is it true of the overture to Byron's Manfred, so full of tremendous passion. None of the overtures subsequently written by Schumann reached this perfection, least of all his 'Faust' overture, though that to the 'Braut von Messina' (op. 100) is not much inferior to 'Manfred.' In the last year of his productive activity Schumann was much occupied with this form, but the exhausted condition of his creative powers cannot be disguised, either in the 'Faust' overture or in those to Shakespeare's Julius Caesar (op. 128) and Goethe's Hermann und Dorothea (op. 136), which last he had intended to set as an opera. The festival overture on the 'Rheinweinlied' (op. 123) is cleverly worked, and a very effective pièce d'occasion.

CONCERTED CHAMBER MUSIC.—It was in the spring of 1838 that Schumann made his first attempt, so far as we know, at a string quartet. It was scarcely successful, for he was too much immersed in pianoforte music; at any rate the world has hitherto seen nothing of it. In June and July 1842 he was much more successful. The three string quartets (op. 41), written at this time, are the only ones that have become known. They cannot be said to be in the purest quartet style; but as Schumann never played any stringed instrument, this is not surprising. They still retain much of the pianoforte style; but by this very means Schumann attains many new and beautiful effects. At the time of writing the A minor quartet Schumann had become acquainted with Marschner's G minor trio (op. 112), and speaks of it in the Zeitschrift. The fine scherzo of that work struck him very much, and in his own scherzo it reappears, in a modified form certainly, but yet recognisable enough. In spite of this plagiarism, however, we must allow the quartet to be in the highest degree original, and full of richness and poetry. It contains much enchanting beauty, never surpassed even by Schumann. He seems here to have resumed his practice of mixing up poetic mysticism with his music. What other reason could there be for proposing to use the four bars of modulation from the first quartet (bars 30-34), exactly as they stand, for an introduction to the second quartet? He afterwards struck them out, as may be seen in the autograph. The other quartets also arrived at their present form only after manifold alterations. The slow introduction to the quartet in A minor was at first intended to be played con sordini. The third quartet began with a chord of the 6-5 on D, held out for a whole bar. The greatest alterations were made in the first allegro of the A minor and in the variations in A♭ of the F major quartets. Whole sections were re-written and modified in various ways. But Wasielewski is mistaken in saying (3rd ed. p. 178, note) that the più lento over the coda in these variations is a misprint for più mosso. Schumann wrote più lento quite plainly, and evidently meant what he wrote. He may possibly have changed his mind afterwards, for in regard to tempo he was often moved by the opinions of others.

Of the works for strings and pianoforte, the quintet (op. 44) is the finest; it will always keep its place in the first rank of musical masterpieces. It claims the highest admiration, not only because of its brilliant originality, and its innate power—which seems to grow with every movement, and at the end of the whole leaves the hearer with a feeling of the possibility of never-ending increase—but also because of its gorgeous beauty of sound, and the beautiful and well-balanced relations between the pianoforte and the strings. Musicians like Carl Reinecke of Leipzig, who at the time of its appearance were in the most susceptible period of youth, told the writer of the indescribable impression the work made upon them. It must have seemed like a new paradise of beauty revealed to their view. The pianoforte quartet (op. 47) only wants animation, and a more popular character in the best sense of the word, to make it of equal merit with the quintet. There is much in it of the spirit of Bach, as is perhaps most evident in the wonderful melody of the andante. A high rank is taken by the trios in D minor (op. 63) and F major (op. 80), both, as well as the quintet and quartet, written in one and the same year. In the first a passionate and sometimes gloomy character predominates, while the second is more cheerful and full of warmth in the middle movements. The canonic style is employed in the adagios of both trios with new and powerful effect. The treatment of the strings with respect to the pianoforte may here and there be considered too orchestral in style; but it must not be forgotten that it was adopted to suit the piano style, which in Schumann is very different from that of the classical masters. The two trios, however, are wanting in that expression of perfect health which is so prominent in both the quintet and the quartet. They show traces of the hurry and breathless haste which in his later years increases the complication of his rhythms. The third and last trio (G minor, op. 110) is far inferior to the others. There is still the same artistic design, and in isolated passages the noble genius of the master still shines clearly out; but as a whole this trio tells of exhaustion. The same may be said of most of the other chamber works of Schumann's latest years. Among them are two sonatas for piano and violin, gloomy, impassioned compositions, which can hardly be listened to without a feeling of oppression. There are also a number of shorter pieces for different instruments, among which the 'Märchenbilder für Pianoforte und Viola' (op. 113) are prominent.

No one who bears in mind Schumann's ultimate fate can hear without emotion the last of these 'Märchenbilder,' which bears the direction 'Langsam, mit melancholischem Ausdruck.'

THE CONCERTOS.—In the sphere of the concerto Schumann has left an imperishable trace of his genius in the pianoforte concerto in A minor (op. 54). It is one of his most beautiful and mature works. In addition to all his peculiar originality it has also the qualities, which no concerto should lack, of external brilliancy, and striking, powerful, well-rounded subjects. The first movement is written in a free form with happy effect; the cause being that Schumann had at first intended it to stand as an independent piece, with the title 'Fantasia.' He did not add the other two movements until two years afterwards.—The 'Introduction und Allegro appassionato,' for pianoforte and orchestra (op. 92), is a rich addition to concerto literature. In Schumann there is a deeper connexion between the pianoforte and orchestra than had before been customary, though not carried to such a point as to interfere with the contrast between the two independent powers. He was far from writing symphonies with the pianoforte obbligato. His other works in concerto form, written in the last years of his life, do not attain to the height of the concerto. Among them is an unpublished violin concerto written between Sept. 21 and Oct. 3, 1853, and consisting of the following movements: (1) D minor alla breve, 'Imkräftigen, nicht zu schnellen Tempo'; (2) B \flat major, common time, 'Langsam'; (3) D major, 3-4, 'Lebhaft, doch nicht zu schnell.' The autograph was in the possession of Joachim. A fantasia for violin and orchestra, dedicated to the same great artist, is published as op. 131. The violoncello concerto (op. 129) is remarkable for a very beautiful slow middle movement. There is also a concerto for four horns and orchestra (op. 86). Schumann himself thought very highly of this piece, partly because, as he wrote to Dr. Härtel, 'it was quite curious.' It is indeed the first attempt made in modern times to revive the form of the old Concerto grosso which Sebastian Bach had brought to perfection in his six so-called 'Brandenburg' concertos. As these concertos of Bach were not printed until 1850, and Schumann can scarcely have known them in manuscript, it is a remarkable and interesting coincidence that he should thus have followed Bach's lead without knowing it. The piece is particularly hard for the first horn, because of the high notes. When well rendered it has a peculiarly sonorous, often very romantic effect, to which, however, the ear soon becomes insensible from the tone of the four horns.

CHORAL COMPOSITIONS.—In his account of Marschner's 'Klänge aus Osten,' a work performed in Leipzig on Oct. 22, 1840, Schumann expresses great admiration for the form, in which it was possible to make use for concert performances of romantic stories, which had hitherto been only used on the stage. He was the first to follow this example in his 'Paradiese und Peri.' The text was taken from Moore's poem, of which Schumann shortened some parts to suit his purpose, while he lengthened others by his own insertions. It was his first work for voices and orchestra, and is one of his greatest and most important. The subject was happily chosen. The longing felt by one of those ideal beings created by the imagination from the forces of nature, to attain or regain a higher and happier existence, and using every means for the fulfilment of this longing, is of frequent occurrence in the German popular legends, and is still a favourite and sympathetic idea in Germany. It is the root of the legends of the Fair Melusina, of the Water Nixie and of Hans Heiling. Schumann's fancy must have been stimulated by the magic of the East, no less than by Moore's poem, with its poetic pictures displayed on a background of high moral sentiment. The fact of Schumann's having retained so much of Moore's narrative is worthy of all praise; it is the descriptive portions of the poem that have the greatest charm, and the music conforms to this. True, there will always be a certain disadvantage in using a complete self-contained poem as a text for music, a great deal of which will inevitably have been written without regard to the composer. Much that we pass over lightly in reading has, when set to music, a more definite and insistent effect than was intended. In other places again, the poem, from the musician's point of view, will be deficient in opportunities for the strong contrasts so necessary for effect in music. This is very obvious in Schumann's composition. The third portion of the work, although he took much trouble to give it greater variety by additions to the poetry, suffers from a certain monotony. Not that the separate numbers are weaker than those of the former parts, but they are wanting in strong shadows. But there is something else that prevents the work from producing a really striking effect upon large audiences, and that is, if we may say so, that there is too much music in it. Schumann brought it forth from the fullness of his heart, and threw, even into its smallest interludes, all the depth of expression of which he was capable. The beauties are crowded together, and stand in each other's light. If they had been fewer in number they would have had more effect. But, with all these allowances, 'Paradise and the Peri' is one of the most enchanting musical poems in existence. All the choruses in 'Paradise and the Peri,' perhaps with the exception of the last, are fine, original and effective. But it must be admitted that choral composition was not really Schumann's strong point. In many of his choruses he might even seem to lack the requisite mastery over the technical requirements of choral composition, so instrumental in style, so impracticable and unnecessarily difficult do they seem. But if we consider Schumann's skill in polyphonic writing, and recall pieces of such grand conception and masterly treatment as the beginning of the last chorus of the 'Faust' music, we feel convinced that the true reason of the defect lies deeper.

The essential parts of a chorus are large and simple subjects, broad and flowing development, and divisions clearly marked and intelligible to all. In a good chorus there must be something to speak to the heart of the masses. Schumann took exactly the opposite view. The chorus was usually an instrument unfitted for the expression of his ideas. His genius could have mastered the technical part of choral composition as quickly and surely as that of orchestral composition. But since the case was otherwise, the chief importance of 'Paradise and the Peri' is seen to be in the solos and their accompaniments, especially in the latter, for here the orchestra stands in the same relation to the voice as the pianoforte does in Schumann's songs.

In the fairy-tale of 'The Pilgrimage of the Rose' (op. 112) Schumann intended to produce a companion picture to 'Paradise and the Peri,' but in less definite outline and vaguer colours. The idea of the poem is similar to that of the former work, but Horn's execution of the idea is entirely without taste. Schumann was possibly attracted by its smooth versification and a few really good musical situations. The music contains much that is airy and fresh, as well as a beautiful dirge. On the other hand, it is full of a feeble sentimentality utterly foreign to Schumann's general character, and ascribable only to the decay of his imagination. The insignificant and wholly idyllic subject was quite inadequate to give employment to the whole apparatus of solo, chorus and orchestra, and Schumann's first idea of providing a pianoforte accompaniment only was the right one. His other works in this form consist of four ballads: 'Der Königsohn' (op. 116), 'Des Sängers Fluch' (op. 139), 'Das Glück von Edenhall' (op. 143), all by Uhland; and 'Vom Pagen und der Königstochter' (op. 140), by Geibel. It is painfully evident that these poems were not really written for music. The way the principal events of the story are described, and the whole outward form of the verses, imply that they were intended to be recited by a single person, and that not a singer but a speaker. If necessary to be sung, the form of a strophic song should have been chosen, as is the case with 'Das Glück von Edenhall,' but this would confine the varieties of expression within too narrow a range. It is as though Schumann's pent-up desire for the dramatic form were seeking an outlet in these ballads; especially as we know that in the last years of his creative activity he was anxious to meet with a new opera libretto. The faults of texts and subjects might, however, be overlooked, if the music made itself felt as the product of a rich and unwearyed imagination. Unfortunately, however, this is seldom the case. It is just in the more dramatic parts that we detect an obvious dullness in the music, a lameness in rhythm, and a want of fresh and happy contrasts. It must be remarked, however, that isolated beauties of no mean order are to be met with; such as the whole of the third part and the beginning and end of the second, in the ballad 'Vom Pagen und der Königstochter.' These works, however, taken as a whole, will hardly live.

On the other hand, there are some works of striking beauty for voices and orchestra in a purely lyrical vein. Among these should be mentioned the 'Requiem for Mignon' from 'Wilhelm Meister' (op. 98b), and Hebbel's 'Nachtlied' (op. 108). The former of these was especially written for music, and contains the loveliest thoughts and words embodied in an unconstrained and agreeable form. Few composers were so well fitted for such a work as Schumann, with his sensitive emotional faculty and his delicate sense of poetry; and it is no wonder that he succeeded in producing this beautiful little composition. But it should never be heard in a large concert-room, for which its delicate proportions and tender colouring are utterly unfitted. The 'Nachtlied' is a long choral movement. The peculiar and fantastic feeling of the poem receives adequate treatment by a particular style in which the chorus is sometimes used only to give colour, and sometimes is combined with the orchestra in a polyphonic structure, in which all human individuality seems to be merged, and only the universal powers of nature and of life reign supreme.

Schumann's music to 'Faust' is not intended to be performed on the stage as the musical complement of Goethe's drama. It is a piece for concert performance, or rather a set of pieces, for he did not stipulate or intend that all three parts should be given together. What he did was to take out a number of scenes from both parts of Goethe's poem, and set music to them. It follows that the work is not self-contained, but requires for its full understanding an accurate knowledge of the poem. From the First Part he took the following: (1) Part of the first scene in the garden between Gretchen and Faust; (2) Gretchen before the shrine of the Mater dolorosa; (3) The scene in the Cathedral. These three form the first division of his Faust music. From the Second Part of the play he adopted: (1) The first scene of the first act (the song of the spirits at dawn, the sunrise, and Faust's soliloquy); (2) The scene with the four aged women from the fifth act; (3) Faust's death in the same act (as far as the words, 'Der Zeiger fällt—Er fällt, es ist vollbracht'). These form the second division of the music. Schumann's third division consists of the last scene of the fifth act (Faust's glorification) divided into seven numbers. The experiment of constructing a work of art, without central point or connexion in itself, but entirely dependent for these on another work of art, could only be successful in the case of a poem like 'Faust'; and even then, perhaps, only with the German people, with whom Faust is almost as familiar as the Bible. But it really was successful, more particularly in the third division, which consists of only one great scene, and is the most important from a musical point of view. In this scene Goethe himself desired the co-operation of music. Its mystic import and splendid expression could find no composer so well fitted as Schumann, who seemed, as it were, predestined for it. He threw himself into the spirit of the poem with such deep sympathy and understanding, that from beginning to end his music gives the impression of being a commentary on it. To Schumann is due the chief meed of praise for having popularised the second part of 'Faust.' In musical importance no other choral work of his approaches the third division of his work. In freshness, originality and sustained power of invention it is in no way inferior to 'Paradise and the Peri.' Up to about the latter half of the last chorus it is a chain of musical gems, a perfectly unique contribution to concert literature, in the first rank of those works of art of which the German nation may well be proud. The second division of the 'Faust' music, is also of considerable merit. It is, however, evident in many passages that Schumann has set words which Goethe never intended to be sung. This is felt still more in the scenes from the First Part, which are, moreover, very inferior in respect of the music. The overture is the least important of all; in fact the merit of the work decreases gradually as we survey it backwards from the end to the beginning; a circumstance corresponding to the method pursued in its composition, which began in Schumann's freshest, happiest and most masterly time of creativeness, and ended close upon the time when his noble spirit was plunged in the dark gloom of insanity.

DRAMATIC WORKS.—There exist only two dramatic works of Schumann intended for the theatre: the opera of 'Genoveva' and the music to Byron's Manfred. The text of the opera may justly be objected to, for it scarcely treats of the proper legend of Genoveva at all; almost all that made the story characteristic and touching being discarded, a fact which Schumann thought an advantage. This may perhaps be explained by remembering his opinion that in an opera the greatest stress should be laid on the representation of the emotions, and that this object might most easily be attained by treating the external conditions of an operatic story as simply and broadly as possible. He also probably felt that a great part of the Genoveva legend is epic rather than dramatic. He was mistaken, however, in thinking that after the reductions which he made in the plot, it would remain sufficiently interesting to the general public. He himself, as we have said, arranged his own libretto. His chief model was Hebbel's 'Genoveva,' a tragedy which had affected him in a wonderful way; though he also made use of Tieck's 'Genoveva.' Besides these he took Weber's 'Euryanthe' as a pattern. The mixture of three poems, so widely differing from one another, resulted in a confusion of motives and an uncertainty of delineation which add to the uninteresting impression produced by the libretto. The character of Golo, particularly, is very indistinctly drawn, and yet on him falls almost the chief responsibility of the drama. The details cannot but suffer by such a method of compilation as this. A great deal is taken word for word from Hebbel and Tieck, and their two utterly different styles appear side by side without any compromise whatever. Hebbel, however, predominates. Tieck's work appears in the finale of the first act, and in the duet (No. 9) in the second act, e.g. the line 'Du liebst mich, holde Braut, da ist der Tag begonnen.' Genoveva's taunt on Golo's birth is also taken from Tieck, although he makes the reproach come first from Wolf and afterwards from Genoveva herself, but without making it a prominent motive in the drama. Beside this several Volkslieder are interspersed. This confusion of styles is surprising in a man of such fine discrimination and delicate taste as Schumann displays elsewhere. The chief defect of the opera, however, lies in the music. In the opera of 'Genoveva,' the characters all sing more or less the same kind of music; that which Schumann puts to the words is absolute music, not relative, i.e. such as would be accordant with the character of each individual. Neither in outline nor detail is his music sufficiently generated by the situations of the drama. Lastly, he lacks appreciation for that liveliness of contrast which appears forced and out of place in the concert-room, but is absolutely indispensable on the stage. 'Genoveva' has no strict recitatives, but neither is there spoken dialogue; even the ordinary quiet parts of the dialogue are sung in strict time, and usually accompanied with the full orchestra. Schumann considered the recitative a superannuated form of art, and in his other works also makes scarcely any use of it. This point is of course open to dispute; but it is not open to dispute that in an opera, some kind of calm, even neutral form of expression is wanted, which, while allowing the action to proceed quickly, may serve as a foil to the chief parts in which highly wrought emotions are to be delineated. The want of such a foil in 'Genoveva' weakens the effect of the climaxes, and with them, that of the whole. As in the formation of the libretto Schumann took 'Euryanthe' as his model, so as a musician he intended to carry out Weber's intentions still farther, and to write, not an opera in the old-fashioned ordinary sense, but a music-drama, which should be purely national.

At the time when 'Genoveva' was written, he was utterly opposed to Italian music, not in the way we should have expected him to be, but exactly as Weber was opposed to it in his time. 'Let me alone with your canary-bird music and your tunes out of the waste-paper basket,' he once said angrily to Weber's son, who was speaking to him of Cimarosa's 'Matrimonio segreto.' But although he may not have succeeded in producing a masterpiece of German opera, we may appreciate with gratitude the many beauties of the music, the noble sentiment pervading the whole, and the constant artistic feeling, directed only to what is true and genuine. The finest part of the work is the overture, a masterpiece in its kind, and worthy to rank with the classical models.

The music to Byron's Manfred (op. 115) consists of an overture, an entr'acte, melodramas, and several solos and choruses. Byron expressly desired the assistance of music for his work, though not so much of it as Schumann has given. Schumann inserted all the instrumental pieces in the work, with the exception of the tunes on the shepherd's pipe in the first act; also the Requiem heard at Manfred's death, sounding from the convent church. On the other hand, it is remarkable that he left the song of 'The captive usurper' in Act. ii. Scene iv. without music. The whole work consists of sixteen numbers, including the overture; this Schumann composed first of all, and probably without intending to write music for the drama itself. Even here he does not evince any special gift for dramatic writing. Byron's drama has been frequently performed upon the stage with Schumann's music, and its effectiveness can thus be tested. The music hardly ever serves to intensify the dramatic effects, and yet this is all that is necessary in a drama. It appears rather to be the outcome of the impression produced on Schumann by Byron's poem. There is one peculiarity about the 'Manfred' music. On the stage it loses a great part of its effect, just as, in my opinion, the poem loses half its fantastic and weird magic by being dressed in the clumsy and palpable illusions of a scenic representation. The overture is a piece of music of the most serious character, and much more fitted for concert performance than for assembling an audience in a theatre. This is still more true of all the other pieces, so delicate in construction and subtle in feeling, the closing Requiem by no means excluded. And yet in the concert-room the music does not make its due effect; partly because the hearer is withdrawn from the influence of the action, which is indispensable to the full understanding of the whole work; and also because in the melodramas the spoken words and the music which accompanies them disturb one another more than when performed on the stage.

From these remarks it might be imagined that the 'Manfred' music is an inferior work; but strange to say that is by no means the case. It is a splendid creation, and one of Schumann's most inspired productions. It hovers between the stage and the concert-room; and, paradoxical as it may seem, the deepest impression is produced by reading the score, picturing in one's mind the action and the spoken dialogue, and allowing the music to sink deep into the ears of one's mind. Perhaps the most striking parts of it all are the melodramas, and among them the deeply touching speech of Manfred to Astarte; and these all stand out with a peculiar purity and unity, when read as just described. They are in a manner improvements upon those highly poetic piano pieces of Schumann with supercriptions; and we ought to think of the words when hearing the piece. In this music, if nowhere else, is revealed Schumann's characteristic struggle after the inward, to the disregard of the outward; and we see how diametrically opposed to his nature was the realisation of dramatic effects where all is put into visible and tangible form. But he devoted himself to the composition of the 'Manfred' music just as if he had been fitted for it by nature. The poet and the composer seem to have been destined for one another as truly as in the case of the 'Faust' music, but in a different way. Byron had no idea of stage representation in writing Manfred; he only wished his poem to be read. Its romantic sublimity of thought, spurning all firm foothold or support on the earth, could only find its due completion in music such as this, which satisfies the requirements of neither stage nor concert-room. That a work of art, mighty and instinct with life, can be produced with a sublime disdain of all limits set by circumstance, provided only genius is at work upon it, is amply proved by Byron and Schumann in this their joint production. It has been already remarked more than once that the gloomy, melancholy and passionate intensity of strife in Byron's Manfred, heightened by contrast with the splendid descriptions of nature, corresponded to the conditions of Schumann's spirit at the time when the music was written. And indeed a deep sympathy speaks in every bar. But there was in Schumann a longing for peace and reconciliation, which is wanting in Byron. This comes out very plainly in different passages in the music, of which the most striking is the Requiem at the close, which sheds over the whole work a gentle gleam of glory.

In January 1851 Schumann wrote to a friend:

'It must always be the artist's highest aim to apply his powers to sacred music. But in youth we are firmly rooted to the earth by all our joys and sorrows; it is only with advancing age that the branches stretch higher, and so I hope that the period of my higher efforts is no longer distant.'

He is here speaking emphatically of 'sacred,' not of church music. Church music he never wrote, his Mass and his Requiem notwithstanding. It should be adapted to the church services, and calculated to produce its effect in combination with the customary ceremonial; but sacred or religious music is intended to turn the mind of the hearers, by its own unaided effect, to edifying thoughts of the eternal and divine. Of compositions of this class we possess several by Schumann; nor was it in 1851 that he first began writing them. There is an Advent hymn for solo, chorus and orchestra (op. 71), written in 1848; a motet for men's voices with organ, subsequently arranged for orchestra (op. 93), of 1849, and a New Year's hymn for chorus and orchestra (op. 144) of the winter of the same year; all three settings of poems by Friedrich Rückert. The Mass (op. 147) and the Requiem (op. 148), on the other hand, were composed in 1852, and Schumann may have been thinking mainly of works of this kind when he wrote the letter quoted above. As a Protestant his relations to the Mass and Requiem were perfectly unfettered; and in the composition of these works he can have had no thought of their adaptation to divine service, since even in form they exhibit peculiarities opposed to the established order of the Mass. It may, however, be assumed that it was the Catholic feeling of Düsseldorf which suggested them, and that he intended the works to be performed on certain occasions at church concerts. The words of the Mass will always have a great power of elevating and inspiring an earnest artist; but irrespective of this the composition of a Mass must have had a peculiar attraction for Schumann on other grounds. A poetical interest in the Catholic Church of the Middle Ages was at that time widely prevalent in Germany, particularly in circles which were most influenced by romantic poetry, and found in the Middle Ages the realisation of their most cherished ideals. Schumann shared in this tendency; a vein of mystical religionism, which otherwise might have lain dormant, often shows itself in his later compositions. For instance, under the name Requiem we find the setting of a hymn, ascribed to Héloïse, the beloved of Abélard (op. 90, No. 7),

'Requiescat a labore
Doloroso, et amore,' etc.

Other instances are the poems of Mary Stuart (op. 135) and the Requiem for Mignon. In the Mass he has, contrary to custom, introduced an offertorium, Tota pulchra es, Maria, et macula non est in te.

In judging of Schumann's sacred music it is necessary to repeat that, though the chorus is not, strictly speaking, the musical means by which he was best able to express himself, yet both custom and the character and importance of the subject urged him to make considerable use of it in these works. Thus they contain a contradiction in themselves; they are all nobly and gravely conceived, but as choral music are only very rarely satisfactory. The Mass, no doubt, ranks highest, and contains much that is very beautiful; the 'Kyrie,' the 'Agnus,' the beginning and end of the 'Sanctus' and part of the 'Credo' being among Schumann's very best choral works. Unfortunately there is less to be said for the Requiem; we should have expected the mere idea of a Mass for the dead to have inspired such a genius as Schumann's, even without recollecting the wonderful tones which he has found for the final Requiem in 'Manfred.' But this work was undoubtedly written under great exhaustion; and the first romantic chorus alone makes a uniformly harmonious impression. It closes the list of Schumann's works, but it is not with this that we should wish to complete the picture of so great and noble a master. He once said with reference to the Requiem, 'It is a thing that one writes for oneself.' But the abundant treasure of individual, pure and profound art which he has bequeathed to us in his other works is a more lasting monument to his name, stupendous and imperishable.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Among the published works that treat of Schumann's life and labours, that by Wladislaw Jurek, the first mention (Robert Schumann, eine Biographie, von JOSEF W. VON WANKLEWART; Dresden, K. Kuhn, 1867; ed. 3, Bonn, C. Strauss, 1890). Though in time it may yet reach the rank of a classic, it has still the enduring merit of giving from accurate acquaintance the broad outlines of Schumann's life. ALFRED REISMANN's Robert Schumann, sein Leben und seine Werke (1890, 1871 and 1879) contains analysis of many works. Other valuable contributions to his biography have been written by F. HOFFER, Die Poesie in der Musik (Leipzig, 1874), by R. POUT, Erinnerungen an R. Schumann, Deutsche Revue, vol. iv, Berlin, 1878 (pp. 169-81 and 306-17); by MAX KALEBERG, R. Schumann in Wien, forming the feuilletons of the Wiener allgemeine Zeitung of Sept. 24, 25, and Oct. 5, 1880. An accurate and sympathetic essay on Schumann, Robert Schumanns Tage und Werke was contributed by A. W. ANDREAS to the Kulturhistorische Bilder aus dem Musikleben der Gegenwart (Leipzig, Matthes, 1880), pp. 51-90. Schumann's literary work was reviewed by H. JELLERS in the Alle. musik. Zeitung (Leipzig, Breitkopf & Härtel, 1865, Nov. 47-49). The Gesammelte Schriften reached their third edition in 1883, and were translated by HARRY RAYMOND RITTER; Die Davidbinder by F. G. JENSEN (1885) is full of interest. A collection of the master's Autographen, edited by CLARA SCHUMANN, appeared in 1885, and was translated in 1888; J. G. KERNER'S Neue Folge of letters (1886) appeared as The Life of Robert Schumann told in his Letters, translated by MAY HERBERT (1890). LITZMANN'S biography of Clara Schumann contains much new information. A large selection from all the letters was published by DR. KASSEL STROBE in 1907, and translated by HANNAH DRYANT. FREDERICK NICKER'S Robert Schumann, a Supplementary and/or Corrective Biography, edited by his widow, CHRISTINA NICKER, was published in 1924, and is referred to in this article in the present edition. ROBERT PITRON'S La Vie Intérieure de A. Schumann (Paris, 1925) may be compared. The literary works of Schumann have been translated into French by H. de Curzon. Schuberth & Co. published in 1860-1 a Thematic Catalogue of Schumann's printed works, extending to op. 143 only. A complete index to all the published compositions of Schumann, with careful evidence as to the year in which each was written, published and first performed, and their different editions and arrangements, was compiled by Alfred Dörffel as a supplement to the Musikalisches Wochenblatt (Leipzig, Fritzsch, 1878). It is impossible to indicate all the shorter notices of Schumann in books and periodicals. The author of this article has had the advantage of seeing a considerable number of his unpublished letters and of obtaining much information at first hand from persons who were in intimate relations with him.

SCHUMANN - HEINK, ERNESTINE (née ROESSLER) (b. Lieben, near Prague, June 15, 1861), was taught singing by Marietta Leclair at Graz, and on Oct. 13, 1878, made her début at Dresden as Azucena, remaining there four years. In 1883 she was engaged at Hamburg, where she remained many years. In 1892, as Frä. Heink, she sang with the Hamburg Company both at Covent Garden and Drury Lane, making her début June 8 (Covent Garden) as Erda in 'Siegfried.' Later she sang as Fricke, Waltraute, and, July 8, as the Countess on the production in England at Drury Lane of Nessler's 'Trompeter von Säckingen.' She made a great impression, on account of her fine voice, combining mezzo and contralto, and of her excellent singing and acting. From 1897-1900 inclusive she sang again at Covent Garden, principally in Wagner parts; July 11, 1898, the music of the Prologue, on the production of Mancinelli's 'Ero e Leandro.' From 1896-1906 she was in continued request at Bayreuth. From 1898 she was engaged at the Berlin Opera, and she purchased her release from this engagement in order to follow up her success in America. She had first appeared in America at Chicago (Nov. 7, 1898) and New York (Jan. 9, 1899). She sang frequently at the Metropolitan till 1904, and became an American citizen in 1905. She created the part of Clytemnestra in Strauss's 'Elektra' at Dresden, Jan. 25, 1909. She has been three times married: first in 1883 to Heink; secondly, in 1893, to Paul Schumann; thirdly, on May 27, 1906, to William Rapp, son of a publisher in Chicago, her business manager.

SCHUNKE, LOUIS (LUDWIG) (b. Cassel, Dec. 21, 1810; d. Dec. 7, 1834), pianoforte-player and composer, of a musical family. His progress was so rapid that at 10 he could play the concertos of Mozart and Hummel with ease. In 1824 he visited Munich and Vienna, and then Paris, where he put himself under Kalkbrenner and Reicha. After some wandering to Stuttgart, Vienna (1832), Prague and Dresden he came to Leipzig, where he made the acquaintance of Schumann, and an intimate friendship was the result. Schunke died at the early age of not quite 24, to the great grief of Schumann, who indulged his affection in several interesting papers (Ges. Schriften, i. 92, 325; ii. 56, 277) full of memorials of his friend's characteristics. Schunke was one of the four who edited the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik on its first appearance. His articles are signed with the figure 3. His published compositions are for the piano, and show considerable ability.

SCHUPPANZIGH, IGNAZ (b. Vienna, 1776; d. Mar. 2, 1830), celebrated violinist. His father was a professor at the Realschule, Vienna. He adopted music as a profession about the end of 1792, and that he early became known as a teacher we gather from an entry in Beethoven's diary for 1794, 'Schuppanzigh three times a week, Albrechtsberger three times a week.' Beethoven was studying the viola, which was at that time Schuppanzigh's instrument, but he soon after abandoned it for the violin. Before he was 21 he had made some name as a conductor, and in 1798 and 1799 directed the Augarten concerts. The A.M.Z. of May 1799, after describing the concerts, remarks that

'the zeal shown by Herr Schuppanzigh in interpreting the compositions produced, makes these concerts models worth following by all amateur associations of the kind, and by many conductors.'

Beethoven, who had also appeared at the Augarten concerts, kept up a singular kind of friendship with Schuppanzigh. They were so useful to each other that, as Thayer says, they had a great mutual liking, if it did not actually amount to affection. Schuppanzigh was good-looking, though later in life he grew very fat, and had to put up with many a joke on the subject from Beethoven. 'My lord Falstaff'¹ was one of his nicknames. The following piece of rough drollery, scrawled by Beethoven on a blank page at the end of his sonata op. 28, is here printed for the first time:

Schuppanzigh was a great quartet-player, and belonged to the party which met every Friday during 1794 and 1795 at Prince Carl Lichnowsky's, where he took the first violin, the Prince himself, or a Silesian named Sina, the second, Weiss the viola, and Kraft, a thorough artist, the violoncello—occasionally changing with Beethoven's friend Zmeskill. Towards the close of 1808 Schuppanzigh founded the Rasoumowsky Quartet, to which he, Mayseder and Linke remained attached for life. Weiss again took the viola. Beethoven's quartets were the staple of their performances. In the meantime Schuppanzigh had married a Fräulein Kilitzky, the sister of a well-known singer, who sang with little success 'Ah perfido!' at a concert of Beethoven's in 1808, instead of Anna Milder. On this occasion the great joker writes to Graf Brunswick, 'Schuppanzigh is married—they say his wife is as fat as himself—what a family.'¹ When the Rasoumowsky palace was burnt down in 1815 Schuppanzigh started on a tour through Germany, Poland and Russia, and did not return till early in 1824, when the quartets were resumed with the same band of friends (see Beethoven's letters to his nephew, 1825). One of the first events after his return was the performance of Schubert's octet, which is marked as finished on Mar. 1, and was doubtless played very shortly after. The acquaintance thus begun was cemented by Schubert's dedication of his lovely quartet in A 'to his friend I. Schuppanzigh,' a year later. Schuppanzigh was a member of the court chapel, and for some time director of the court opera. He died of paralysis. Of his compositions the following were printed: 'Solo pour le violon avec quatuor' (Diabelli), 'Variationen über ein russisches Lied' (Cappi), and 'Variationen über ein Thema aus Alcina' (Mollo). F. SCHUSTER, JOSEPH (b. Dresden, Aug. 11, 1748; d. there, July 24, 1812). In 1765 Schuster and his friend Seydelmann went with Naumann to Italy to study composition. They remained there until 1768, and Schuster produced several operas. In 1772 both were appointed church composers to the Elector. From 1774-76 and again from 1778-82 Schuster was in Italy partly to study with Padre Martini, partly to produce some operas which he had written to order for various Italian theatres. In Naples his success was so great that the king appointed him his honorary maestro di cappella. He wrote about 25 Italian and German operas, masses, oratorios, secular vocal music, symphonies, chamber music, etc. (See list in Q.-L.; see also Riemann; Mendel.)

SCHUYT (SCOUTS), CORNELIS (b. Leyden; d. there, June 1616²), went to Italy at the town's expense to perfect himself. In 1593 he was appointed organist at the Begijnenhof (nunnery), Leyden. He composed several books of madrigals and a book of pavans, galliards and instrumental canzone (Q.-L.).

SCHWANENBERG (SCHWANENBERGER), JOHANN GOTTFRIED (b. Wolfenbüttel, Dec. 28, 1740; d. Brunswick, Apr. 5, 1804), studied in Italy chiefly under Hasse, and was court Kapellmeister at Brunswick from 1762. He composed operas, cantatas, symphonies, sonatas, etc. (list in Q.-L.; also Riemann).

SCHWARBROOK, THOMAS, a German, was in the employ of Renatus Harris the organ-builder. Early in the 18th century he left London to live at Warwick, and built many noble instruments. His masterpiece was the organ of St. Michael's, Coventry, built in 1733, which cost £1400. The latest mention of him is in 1762, when he improved the organ of Worcester Cathedral. v. de p.

SCHWEITZER, ALBERT (b. Upper Alsace, Jan. 14, 1875), became famous in the musical world through his writing on J. S. Bach, which, together with that of Pirro, has had a marked influence on the modern estimate of that master.

Schweitzer studied the organ both at Strassburg and in Paris (with Widor) together with theology and medicine, but, contrary to the usual practice of those who have made a name in music, art had no triumph in his case over the learned professions. He became a teacher of theology in the University of Strassburg in 1913, and if one interest may be said to have absorbed him more than others it has been his work as a medical missionary in equatorial Africa, where he now lives and works. It was in the Congo that he began his work on J. S. Bach. His Jean Sébastien Bach, le musicien-poète was published in Paris 1905 and expanded in a subsequent German edition (Leipzig, 1907). The latter has been translated into English by Ernest Newman. The emphasis laid on Bach's realism and his use of type figures of melody to illustrate ideas was an individual contribution to the study of Bach's aesthetic standpoint, and Schweitzer has probably been more quoted than any authority since Spitta. He engaged with Widor on an edition of Bach's organ works (still incomplete), was organist of the Société J. S. Bach in Paris, which he helped to found, and in 1922, after more than four years in Africa, he gave a number of organ recitals in European cities (including one at Westminster Abbey), devoting the proceeds to the medical mission which he had established in Africa. C.

SCHWEITZER, ANTON (bapt. Coburg, June 6, 1735; d. Gotha, Nov. 23, 1787), received his musical education at the expense of the Duke of Coburg, who sent him to Kleinknecht at Bayreuth. He then went to Hildburghausen as Kapellmeister at the court and conductor of Seiler's theatrical company. After further studies in Italy he became musical director at the Ducal Theatre, Weimar, and when that was burnt down, in 1774, went to Gotha, where he became Benda's successor at the court. He composed several serious operas to librettos which Wieland had specially written for him, and which are among the first German operas; but his greatest success lay in his 'Singspiele,' in which genre he was foremost among all who cultivated it. So great was the ignorance of the public that he was placed above Gluck by his contemporaries (Q.-L.; Riemann).

SCHWEMMER, HEINRICH (b. Gumbertshausen, near Hallburg, Lower Franconia, Mar. 28, 1621; d. May 26, 1696). In his younger years war and the pestilence obliged his family to seek refuge first at Weimar, then at Coburg. According to Gerber he first visited Nuremberg in 1641 as a pupil of the St. Sebald School, and received his musical instruction from the organist Johann Erasmus Kindermann. But the first documentary evidence we have of his presence at Nuremberg is in connexion with a great musical festival and banquet held there in 1649, in honour of the Swedish Field-Marshal, after the Peace of Westphalia. Schwemmer appears among the singers on that occasion, though not yet holding any appointment. The year 1650 is the date of his first appointment at Nuremberg as an assistant master at the St. Laurence School. In 1656 he is described as Director Chori musicæ at the Frauenkirche; but with this post, which he seems to have retained till his death, he was obliged, in accordance with the custom of the time, to combine certain duties of ordinary school instruction at the St. Sebald School. Like greater musicians after him Schwemmer appears to have found his ordinary school duties somewhat irksome, and for an occasional negligence in them came under the censure of the town authorities. In spite of this he was recognised as the best musical teacher in Nuremberg, and the most distinguished of later Nuremberg musicians, such as Pachelbel, Johann Krieger, and Baltazar Schmidt, were his pupils. He was also the musician most sought after for such occasional compositions as wedding and funeral anthems. Q.-L. enumerates twenty of such works for voices and instruments. He was also the composer of a large number of melodies for the various Nuremberg hymn-books of the time. In D.D.T. (2nd series, Bayern) vi. there is printed for the first time an Easter Motet by him for voices and instruments, which is characterised by much of the Handelian simplicity and directness of choral effect. Only a few other church works by him remain in MS. J. R. M.

SCHWENKE (SCHWENCKE), a German musical family, whose founder, (1) JOHANN GOTTLIEB (b. Breitenau, Saxony, Aug. 11, 1744; d. Hamburg, Dec. 7, 1823), was a famous bassoonist and a 'Rathsmusikus.' His son (2) CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH GOTTLIEB (b. Wachenhausen, Harz, Aug. 30, 1767; d. Hamburg, Oct. 28, 1822) was a proficient clavier-player, and appeared in public at Hamburg in a concerto by his father in 1779, when eleven and a half years old. Emanuel Bach interested himself in the boy's career, and was instrumental in getting him sent to Berlin (1782), where he studied under Kirnberger. He tried for an organist's post at Hamburg in 1783, but was unsuccessful, although Emanuel Bach was a judge. In 1787 and 1788 he studied at the University of Leipzig and Halle, and after the dispute which followed on Emanuel Bach's death in 1789, Schwenke was appointed to succeed him as town cantor, but the new conditions attached to the post were so irksome that he devoted himself mainly to mathematical problems. As a composer his main importance was in the stress he laid on good accentuation. He set Klopstock's 'Vater-unser' and 'Der Frohsinn' to music, and was a friend of the poet's. Various cantatas for solo and chorus with orchestra, six organ fugues, a concerto for oboe, and clavier sonatas are mentioned in Q.-L., from which most of the

Two of his sons were musicians: the elder, (3) JOHANN FRIEDRICH (b. Hamburg, Apr. 30, 1792; d. there, Sept. 28, 1852), was a player on the organ, violoncello and clarinet, was appointed to the Nikolaikirche in Hamburg in 1829 and composed cantatas with organ accompaniment, arrangement, etc., of Chorals, a septet for five violoncellos, double-bass and drums, and orchestrated Beethoven's 'Adelaide' and 'Wachtelschlag,' among other things. The younger, (4) KARL (b. Hamburg, Mar. 7, 1797), was a clever pianist and an industrious composer; three sonatas for piano duet, and one for violin, appeared, as well as a symphony performed at the Paris Conservatoire in 1843, and at Hamburg. From 1870 when he lived near Vienna, all trace of him is lost. Johann Friedrich's son and pupil, (5) FRIEDRICH GOTTLIEB (b. Hamburg, Dec. 15, 1823; d. there, June 11, 1896), was his successor in the Nikolaikirche, had success as a pianist and organist in Paris (1855) and elsewhere. Two fantasias for organ, trumpet, trombones and drums, are his most important compositions. He re-edited his father's collection of Chorals, and wrote preludes to them. (Riemann; Q.-L.) M.

SCHWINDL (SCHWINDL), FRIEDRICH (d. Karlsruhe, Aug. 10, 1786), was a skillful player on the violin, flute and clavier, in the 18th century. He was at the Hague about 1770, where Burney met him, and in Geneva and Mulhausen, where he brought out some operettas; finally he settled at Karlsruhe, where he died holding the position of Markgräflisch badischer Konzertmeister. He was one of the followers of the Mannheim school; his numerous symphonies, quartets, trios, etc., appeared at Amsterdam, Paris, and London (where his music enjoyed great popularity), from 1765 onwards. A Mass in E minor for four voices and orchestra is in MS. at Milan. (Riemann; Q.-L., etc.) M.

SCHYTTE, (1) LUDWIG THEODOR (b. Aarhus, Jutland, Denmark, Apr. 28, 1848; d. Berlin, Nov. 10, 1909), was originally a chemist, and gave up that business for music in 1870, when he studied the pianoforte under Anton Rée and Edmund Neupert, and composition with Gebauer and Gade, finally going to Taubert in Berlin, and Liszt at Weimar. He had one of the advanced piano classes in Horák's Academy in Vienna in 1887-88, and subsequently resided there, being distinguished as a player, composer and teacher. A very large number of graceful and effective compositions for pianoforte testified to his industry, and many have become widely popular, such as op. 22, 'Naturstimmungen'; op. 30, 'Pantomimen' for P.F. duet; op. 53, sonata. A pianoforte concerto is op. 28, and among his many songs, a cycle, 'Die Verlassene,' deserves mention. A comic opera, 'Fahrendes Volk,' was not performed; but 'Hero,' a one-act opera, was given at Copenhagen in 1898, and an operetta, 'Der Mameluk,' at Vienna in 1903. (Riemann; Baker.) His brother, (2) HENRIK BISSING (b. Aarhus, May 4, 1827; d. Copenhagen, Feb. 22, 1909), was a violoncellist, musical critic to several Danish papers, editor of Musikbladet (1884-93) and of a Nordisk Musiklexikon. M.

SCIOLTO, CON SCIOLTEZZA, 'freely'; an expression used in nearly the same sense as ad libitum, but generally applied to longer passages, or even to whole movements. It is also applied to a fugue in a free style. Thus what Beethoven, in the last movement of the sonata in B., op. 106, calls 'Fuga con alcune licenze,' might otherwise be called 'Fuga sciolta.' M.

SCONTRINO, ANTONIO (b. Trapani, Sicily, May 17, 1850; d. Florence, Jan. 7, 1922). His father, a carpenter by trade, was an ardent lover of music, playing the violin and guitar as well as singing, and constructing violins, guitars, violoncellos, double-basses and even pianofortes. With his children and brothers this keen amateur formed an orchestra in which, at the age of 7 years, Antonio was persuaded to take part as double-bass, playing on a violoncello adapted for the purpose, and provided with three strings only.

In 1861 he took up music in earnest, and entered the Palermo Conservatorio to study the instrument which chance, rather than choice, had made his own. For harmony he was a pupil of Luigi Alfano, and for counterpoint and composition of Platania, the director of the institution. In 1870 he left the Conservatorio and toured as a virtuoso on the double-bass throughout southern Italy; in the following year he obtained the libretto of an opera from Leopoldo Marengo, but the work, 'Matelda,' was not produced until 1876. Aided by a grant from the municipality and province of Trapani, Scontrino went in 1872 to Munich, where for two years he studied German music. In 1874 he came to England as a member of Mapleson's orchestra, and afterwards settled in Milan as a teacher of instrumental, vocal and theoretical music. In 1891 he was appointed professor of counterpoint and composition in the Palermo Conservatorio, and in 1892 a similar professorship was gained by him in competition, at the Reale Istituto Musicale at Florence.

His works include five operas: 'Matelda,' 4 acts (Milan, Teatro Dal Verme, 1876); 'Il progettista,' 1 act (Rome, 1882); 'Sortilegio,' 3 acts (Turin, 1882); 'Gringoire,' 1 act (Milan, 1890); and 'Cortigiana,' 4 acts (Milan, 1895-1896). Among his more important orchestral compositions are an overture to Marengo's 'Celeste,' incidental music to D'Annunzio's 'Francesca da Rimini,' and a 'Sinfonia marinесca' and 'Sinfonia romantica.' Three string quartets and a prelude and fugue for the same instruments; various pieces for violin, violoncello and double-bass with piano accompaniment, and several sets of pianoforte soli are among his instrumental works; and his songs, which number about fifty, include two cycles, La Vie intérieure to words by Sully Prud'homme, and 'Intima vita' to words by E. Panzacchi. An O Salutaris and Salve Regina for two voices with organ accompaniment, a motet, 'Tota Pulcra,' for vocal quartet, and a Gloria, an eight-part fugue for solo voices, are his sacred compositions. M.

SCORDATURA (mis-tuning), a term used to designate some abnormal tunings of the violin which are occasionally employed to produce particular effects.

The scordatura originated in the lute and viol, which were tuned in various ways to suit the key of the music. Their six strings being commonly tuned by fourths, with one third in the middle, the third was shifted as occasion required, and an additional third or a fifth was introduced elsewhere, so as to yield on the open strings as many harmonies as possible; in old lute music the proper tuning is indicated at the beginning of the piece. This practice survives in the guitar. The normal tuning being as at (a), very striking effects in the key of E major, for instance, may be produced by tuning the instrument as at (b). The scordatura was formerly often employed on the violin. (1) The tuning (c) is extremely favourable to simplicity of fingering in the key of A. It is employed by Tartini in one of his soli, and by Castrucci in a well-known fugue: its effect is noisy and monotonous. It is frequently employed by Scotch reel-players, and in their hands has a singularly rousing effect. The following strain from 'Kilrack's Reel' is to be read by the player as if tuned in the ordinary way, so that the first phrase sounds in the key of A:

The reel called 'Appin House' and the lively Strathspey called 'Anthony Murray's Reel' are played in the same tuning. (2) The tuning (d) employed by Biber (q.v.) is a modification of (c), a fourth being substituted for a fifth on the first string; and (3) the tuning (e), also employed by Biber, is a similar modification of the normal tuning by fifths. In these tunings the viol fingering must be used on the first strings. On Biber's use of the scordatura in the eleventh sonata of his second book (reprinted in D.T.Ö. xii. 2) see the Zeitschr. of the Int. Mus. Ges. viii. p. 471, and ix. p. 29 (both 1907). (4) The tuning (f), employed by Nardini in his Enigmatic Sonata, is the reverse of the last, being a combination of the common tuning for the first two strings with the viol tuning in the lower ones. (5) The tuning (g) is employed by Barbella in his 'Serenade' and by Campagnoli in his 'Notturmo,' to imitate the viola d'amore, from the four middle strings of which it is copied. Thick first and second strings should be used, and the mute put on. The effect is singularly pleasing: but the G and A on the second string are flat and dull. (6) The tuning (h) employed by Lolli, is the normal tuning except the fourth string, which is tuned an octave below the third. If a very stout fourth string is used, a good bass accompaniment is thus obtainable.

Such are a few of the abnormal tunings employed by the old violinists. The scordatura is seldom used by modern players except on the fourth string, which is often tuned a tone higher, as at (i). (De Bériot, Mazas, Prume, etc.). This device may always be employed where the composition does not descend below A; the tone is much increased, and in some keys, especially D and A, execution is greatly facilitated. Paganini tuned his fourth string higher still, as at (j) and (k), with surprising effect; the B \flat tuning was a favourite one with De Bériot. Paganini's tuning in flats (l) cannot be called scordatura, as it consists in elevating the violin generally by half a tone for the sake of brilliancy. The same device was employed by Spohr in his duets for harp and violin, the harp part being written in flats a semitone higher. The fourth string is rarely lowered: but Baillot sometimes tuned it a semitone lower, as at (m), to facilitate arpeggios in the sharp keys.

The scordatura (n) is employed by Bach in his fifth sonata for the violoncello. It corresponds to the violin tuning (e). This depression of the first string, if a thick string is used, is not unfavourable to sonority. When the scordatura is used, suitable strings should be obtained. Thicker ones are necessary where the pitch is depressed, and thinner ones where it is elevated: and the player will find it best to keep a special instrument for any tuning which he frequently employs. E. J. F.

In engraved music of Scottish reels, etc., the scordatura was marked at the beginning of the piece by the word 'Scordatura' and the tuning in notes. In manuscript music, however, it was frequently more carelessly indicated, or even left without indication. It must be remembered that although all notes on the mistuned strings are affected, yet the notation throughout the piece always stood as if the tuning were normal, and consequently allowance for this must be made in playing on the piano, etc., and in transcripts. In scordatura of the lowest string the sound A is represented by the note G, the sound B by the note A, and so on. For a curious instance of the Scottish scordatura see SIR ROGER DE COVERLY. F. K.

REEL.—ANDRÉAS MOSER, Die Violin-Scordatur. A.M. 14, 1919. (16 pp.)

a 'short' score, a 'vocal' score, or a 'piano' score, should properly be reserved for the system which presents on separate staves all the parts that are to be performed simultaneously, commonly spoken of as 'full score.' The oldest known form of score would seem to be that in the pseudo-Hucbald Musica enchiridias, a treatise of the 11th century. A specimen will be found under NOTATION.

An interesting early score is in the B.M. Harl. MS. 978—the volume which contains the famous Reading rota 'Sumer is icumen in.' Below the three voice-parts here shown there is a supplementary quadruplum, written on a separate staff, which has no concern with our present purpose. This composition shows that in the first half of the 13th century the essential feature of a score was realised in England.

A series of staves on which the different parts of a piece of music are written one above another, so that the whole may be read at a glance.

The English name is derived from the practice of dividing the music by bars or lines scored through the entire series of staves. The Latin term, partitura cancellata owes its origin

In Arundel MS. No. 248, fol. 153a, 154b, 155a and 201a, there are two-part compositions regularly scored on staves of eight and nine lines. In the last of these, now nearly illegible, two staves, each consisting of four black lines, are separated by a red line. In the other case the staves consist of eight uniform and equidistant black lines. The following is from to the compartments or cancelli, into which the page is divided by the vertical scorings. The word score, though often misapplied in the present day to what is more correctly called fol. 155a of the MS., and the lower part of the same facsimile is another hymn 'Salve uirgo uirginū,' for three voices, on a staff of twelve equidistant black lines. The MS. dates from about the middle of the 13th century. A score of the same kind, about the same date, is referred to by Ambros as being in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris. W. S. R.

It will be observed that in these examples care is taken that the notes which synchronise in time are in the same vertical line. In the rola (see Frontispiece to Vol. V.) and in the 15th century carols edited by J. A. Fuller Maitland and W. S. Rockstro; although the parts are superimposed, yet there is no attempt to make the page really a score.

One of the first printed scores, properly so-called, is that of Cipriano de Rore's madrigals of 1577; and one of the first printed orchestral scores, if not the very first, was that of the 'Ballet comique de la Roynie' (Paris, 1582). From the system then adopted to the complicated scores now in use, the process is one of natural development. Down to the days of Bach and Handel, and for some time after them, the orchestral instruments were used rather as an accretion of obligato parts than as a complex whole; but from the time that the orchestra became a recognised constitution, some system of grouping instruments of the same class near each other has been followed. The basso continuo or thorough-bass, whether figured or not, always occupied the lowest stave, and its inseparable companion, the violoncello part, was placed immediately above it. In purely orchestral music the viola comes next and the two violin parts; but in vocal music, whether for soli or choruses, the voice-parts, with or without an organ part below them, occupy the position immediately above the violoncello. Sometimes in a concerto the solo instrument has this place, as in the first organ concerto of Handel; but more often, and in modern music almost universally, the solo instrument in such a composition is placed above the strings.

Having arrived at the line for the first violin¹ or violin solo part, it will be most convenient to describe the constitution of the score from the top downwards. In certain instances, such as Beethoven's C minor symphony, Mozart's 'Jupiter' symphony, Schumann's in E flat, etc., the drums occupy the top line; but in far the greater number of cases the piccolos or flutes head the score as the top of the group of 'wood-wind' instruments. Next come the oboes with the cor anglais, then the clarinets of all types; the bassoons with double bassoon generally end the group of 'wood.' Some composers have written their horn-parts between the clarinet and bassoons, but the modern plan is to let them head the division of 'brass,' and below them to place trumpets, trombones and tubas. Upon the staves between the last of the brass instruments and the first violin lines are placed the instruments of percussion, generally beginning with the ordinary drums, and including such things as triangles, tambourines, big drum, side drum, cymbals, etc. The staves for the harp or harps are generally placed in this division, often below the big drum line. As a rule assistance is given to the reader's or conductor's eye by not carrying the bar-lines through all the staves, but leaving spaces in the vertical lines between the various groups of instruments. In a well-edited score, while the whole is joined together at the beginning of each page and the groups are indicated by thicker vertical lines, the bar-divisions will be continuous from the piccolo line to that of the double bassoon, and from the first horn line to that of the bass tuba; each instrument of percussion will have its own bar-lines to itself, and the three upper strings will be joined in their bar-lines. If solo parts and a double chorus are employed, each solo part will have its separate bar-lines, and each choir will have joined bar-lines. Lastly, the violoncello and double-bass part will be barred together. With every kind of difference in detail, this arrangement has continued in use from the classical days to our own, the change of place in the drum-line being the most important alteration.

The following arrangement (with English nomenclature) of the score of Gustav Holst's suite 'The Planets' ('Mars') is representative of modern practice:

- 2 Piccolos.
- 2 Flutes.
- 2 Oboes.
- English horn (cor anglais).

- 3 Clarinets in B \flat .
- Bass clarinet in B \flat .
- 3 Bassoons.
- Double bassoon.
- 6 horns in F $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} \text{I., II., III.} \\ \text{IV., V., VI.} \end{array} \right\}$ (2 staves).

- 2 Tenor trombones.

SCORING, the art of ORCHESTRATION (q.v.). SCOTCH SNAP or CATCH is the name given to the reverse of the ordinary dotted note which has a short note after it—in the snap the short note comes first and is followed by the long one. It is characteristic of the slow STRATHSPY (q.v.), rather than of vocal music, though as Burns and others wrote songs to some of these dance-tunes, it is not infrequently found in connexion with words. 'Green grow the rushes,' 'Roy's wife,' and 'Whistle o'er the lave o't,' contain examples of the snap.

It was in great favour with many of the Italian composers of the 18th century, for Burney—who seems to have invented the name—says in his account of the Italian Opera in London, in 1748, that there was at this time too much of the 'Scots catch or cutting short of the first of two notes in a melody.' He blames Cocchi, Perez and Jommelli 'all three masters concerned in the opera "Vologeso" ' for being lavish of the snap. J. M. W.

In the hands of Hook and the other purveyors of the pseudo-Scottish music, which was in vogue at Vauxhall and elsewhere in the 18th century, it became a senseless vulgarism, and with the exception of a few songs, such as those mentioned above, and the Strathspey reel in which it is an essential feature, its presence may generally be accepted as proof that the music in which it occurs is not genuine. M.

SCOTCH SYMPHONY, THE, Mendelssohn's own name for his A minor symphony (op. 56); produced at a Gewandhaus Concert, Mar. 3, 1842; Philharmonic Society, London, June 13, 1842, Mendelssohn conducting.

SCOTT, CHARLES KENNEDY (b. Romsey, Nov. 16, 1876), has done important work as a choral conductor in London.

Scott studied at the Brussels Conservatoire where he took a first prize in organ-playing (1897). From the time that he settled in London (1898) he subordinated his personal career as performer or composer to the furtherance of English music, particularly of choral music. He founded the Oriana Madrigal Society in 1904, associated with it a scheme for the publication of English Madrigals (the 'Euterpe Series') and published a Manual of Madrigal Singing. Under his direction the Oriana Madrigal Society soon earned a high reputation as a small choir of picked voices pursuing a definite artistic ideal. The programmes devised by Scott have brought together the old music and the new, for his aim has been to perform whatever is of musical value irrespective of age or idiom. Scott took an active part in schemes for the advancement of national music, notably the concerts of Balfour GARDNER (q.v.) and the Glastonbury productions of opera by Rutland BOURTON (q.v.). In 1919 he formed and conducted the PHILHARMONIC CHOIR (q.v.), primarily for the performance of larger choral works with the Royal Philharmonic Society. Here his excellent training in choral technique has placed in the hands of visiting conductors a vocal body of equal competence with the Society's orchestra, but the choir has also given important programmes under his direction. C.

SCOTT, CYRIL (b. Oxtou, Cheshire, Sept. 27, 1879), composer and poet, began to play the piano by ear at a very early age. By the time he had reached his seventh year and learnt musical notation, he began to write down his immature attempts at composition. His mother, an excellent amateur musician, advocated a musical career for him, although his father was at first opposed to the idea.

At the age of 12 Scott was sent to Frankfort-on-Main, where he began to study the piano seriously at the Hoch Conservatoire, his general education being entrusted to a tutor. On his return to England this mode of instruction was continued at Liverpool, where he also perfected his piano-playing under Steudner-Welsing. At 16 he returned to Frankfort in order to take up the study of composition under Ivan Knorr. Among his fellow-students were Percy Grainger, Norman O'Neill and Roger Quilter. It was still the fashion at that time to send young British musicians to study in Germany, but Scott and his companions escaped the influence of a one-sided academicism by being placed under a professor whose sympathies extended beyond national boundaries, and especially to the Slavonic schools. Another influence which affected the young artist's outlook was that exercised on him by the poet Stefan George.

In 1898 Cyril Scott left Frankfort for the second time and took up his residence in Liverpool, where he gave a piano recital and received a few pupils. Here began a warm friendship with Charles Bonnier, at that time professor of French literature at the university, who made Scott acquainted with modern poetry and first awakened in him a desire to devote himself actively to that art. Scott wrote his first verses about 1900, and at that time his 'Heroic Suite' was performed by Richter at Liverpool and Manchester, and his first symphony at Darmstadt. Both works, together with some chamber music written at Frankfort, were later destroyed by the composer as unrepresentative.

The first London production of a work by Cyril Scott was that of the piano quartet in E minor at St. James's Hall in 1901, Kreisler playing the violin part. In 1903 Henry J. Wood produced the second symphony at the Promenade Concerts. Scott now began to produce a good deal of work, and was soon encouraged in his activities by the firm of Elkin & Co., who entered into contract with him for the publication of his songs and smaller piano pieces. Schott & Co. followed suit in 1909 with an agreement covering violin pieces and piano works on a larger scale.

It is by no means irrelevant to mention the deep interest which the composer began to take in Oriental philosophy and theosophy about this time, for with it his musical style underwent a marked change. Tonality, diatonic scales and regular rhythmic periods were not discarded for good and all, since Scott desired to enlarge his means of expression rather than to exchange old conventions for new formulas, but they were regarded by him as inessential, and he began to write music without any key signature and with an elaborate method of irregular barring that fixed down the main accents of his long and free melodic lines. The first important works in this new style were the sonata for violin and piano, written between 1908-10, and the sonata for piano, which belongs to the same period. About this time Scott began a composition on a still larger scale, the 'Nativity Hymn' for chorus and orchestra, which is preceded by the 'Christmas Overture' for orchestra alone. The 'Aubade' for orchestra and the 'Tallahassee Suite' for violin and piano belong to the year 1911, and the reconstruction of the piano quintet from an older sextet is approximately contemporary with these two works.

In 1913 Scott was invited to Vienna by Gustav Mahler's widow, and the overture to Maeterlinck's 'Princesse Maleine' was given there with such success that a performance of the 'Nativity Hymn' and 'Christmas Overture' was contemplated for the following year, but frustrated by the European War.

At the British Music Festival organised in London by Thomas Beecham in 1915, the piano concerto, written in 1913-14, was heard for the first time, with the composer in the solo part. The same conductor introduced the 'Two Passacaglias on Irish Themes' at one of the Royal Philharmonic Society's concerts in 1916. A setting of Keats's 'La Belle Dame sans Merci' for chorus and orchestra was composed in 1915-16. Scott afterwards entered, for the first time in his career, upon a phase of operatic composition. The first of his operas to be performed was 'The Alchemist,' produced at Essen on May 28, 1925, under the direction of Felix Wolfes.

The art of Cyril Scott in its mature stages has an unmistakably personal quality that is at once its merit and its limitation. He rightly prefers to achieve self-expression in a somewhat constricted idiom to the imitation of even the greatest models at the expense of his individuality, but it must be confessed that he does not always escape the danger of his idiosyncrasies hardening into mechanical mannerisms or of going over the same ground several times with only a surface appearance of striking out in a new direction. It is no doubt his way of applying principles which are new and highly distinctive at first, but afterwards tend to become stereotyped formulas, that has deluded some critics into making too much of a supposed likeness between his art and that of Debussy: in actual fact, though their manner of envisaging their tasks may be the same, its results are utterly dissimilar in practice.

The secret of a certain sameness of flavour almost throughout Scott's work lies probably in its predominantly harmonic character. His treatment of each note in the chromatic scale as a unit not dependent on a certain position in relation to a tonic root is immensely fertile in novel chord formations and chord sequences, but his music is on the other hand comparatively poor in variety of texture. Even in the string quartet, the medium to which contrapuntal writing is most indispensable, there is an extraordinary amount of part-writing in vertically parallel groupings. But it must be borne in mind that these limitations are part and parcel of the particular nature of his work: he is by no means incapable of submitting his characteristic methods to the discipline of the most exacting forms of thematic treatment, as is proved by such things as the two 'passacaglias' for orchestra and the fugue in the second suite for piano, where he adapts elaborate polyphonic devices to his special requirements with a mastery that is none the less complete for its independence of classical models.

Scott has a highly developed sense of secondary and tertiary harmonic colours. He blends his chords and lets them succeed each other with such subtlety that to an ear once accustomed to his idiom the apparently most daring combinations appear not as dissonances, but as a new and finely calculated euphony. His melodic invention, when it is not made subordinate to the harmony, is little inferior to the latter. In his songs he often achieves a tunefulness that is both attractive and distinctive, and the long-drawn melodic curves in some of his larger works, which breathe freely under the composer's unrestricted barring, are highly original in contour, phrasing and accentuation.

In respect of form, Scott's work rests on a solid classical foundation, but he applies the conventional patterns of the sonata, the rondo, the passacaglia, etc., to his own uses by accommodating them to the need of each work. He may leave himself free to string together what movements he pleases by making use of the suite, or he may organise a sonata form that varies the classical model according to a no less logical plan of his own. The cyclic sonata form has also advanced in his hands, as may be seen from the finale in the violin sonata, where he does not merely recall a motto theme, but sums up much of the principal material previously used. In the matter of orchestral colour, Scott is often fastidious to the verge of preciosity. The curious orchestration of his piano concerto, for instance, where harp, celesta and glockenspiel reinforce almost incessantly the cold glitter of the solo part, may seem as cloying to some temperaments as a perpetual redolence of incense. But though one may be enervated by the languorous scents that frequently pervade Scott's orchestration as well as his harmony, it is impossible ever to call their quality in question. He is too much of a sensitive musical poet to indulge in cheap effects: there is on the contrary a certain over-refinement about his style which at times imparts to it an almost morbid delicacy.

Many of Scott's smaller works, especially among the piano pieces and songs, have become exceedingly popular in Great Britain, but his larger compositions have been more frequently produced abroad, especially in Germany and Austria. His dramatic work is interesting for its independence of Wagnerian or any other models. The only published score so far (1926) is that of 'The Alchemist,' which shows a laudable tendency to return to a purely musical treatment that avoids any kind of pictorial duplication of what is already sufficiently clearly conveyed by the action.

SCOTT, JOHN (b. circa 1776; d. Spanish Town, Jamaica, 1815), nephew of John Sale, jun., was a chorister of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and Eton College; afterwards studied the organ under William Sexton, organist of St. George's, Windsor, and became deputy for Dr. Arnold at Westminster Abbey. He was also chorus-master and pianist at Sadler's Wells. On the erection of the first organ in Spanish Town, Jamaica, he went out as organist, and died there. He was composer of a well-known anthem, 'Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem,' and a famous comic song, 'Abraham Newland,'¹ has been ascribed to him (see ROGUE'S MARCH). This composition, however, was more commonly ascribed to Tipton, a Vauxhall writer, and was written about the end of the 18th century. W. H. H.; rev. F. K.

SCOTT, LADY JOHN DOUGLAS (b. 1810; d. Spottiswoode, Mar. 12, 1900), an amateur composer of Scottish songs. Born Alicia Ann Spottiswoode, she was the eldest daughter of John Spottiswoode, of Spottiswoode in Berwickshire. On Mar. 16, 1836, she married Lord John Montague-Douglas Scott (son of the fourth Duke of Buccleuch, d. 1860). In 1870, under the will of her father, she resumed her maiden name.

Her best claim to remembrance, musically, is her composition of the song 'Annie Laurie,' which was first published without composer's name in the third volume of Paterson and Roy's 'Vocal Melodies of Scotland' in 1838. So popular was the song during the Crimean War, that a letter from the composer herself, in her last years, by mistake refers to it as being composed about that period. It may be added that the words are altered from a song first published in A Ballad Book collected by Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe, and privately issued in 1824. A few other of her songs gained but scant favour, although she is sometimes credited with being the composer or adapter of 'The Banks of Loch Lomond,' a Scottish song still much sung.

Throughout her life she upheld the ancient Scottish customs in a manner verging on eccentricity. F. K.

SCOTT-GATTY, SIR ALFRED SCOTT (b. Ecclesfield, Yorks, Apr. 26, 1847; d. London, Dec. 18, 1918), Garter Principal King-of-Arms, was an amateur musician, whose songs had a great vogue in their day by reason of their unaffected melody and simple, if untutored, style. His earliest work appeared in Aunt Judy's Magazine, edited by his mother, Mrs. Alfred Gatty. He contributed to the German Reel entertainments, and later brought out several musical plays for children and the more ambitious 'Tattercoats,' produced for charity at the Savoy Theatre in 1900. He founded the MAGPIE MADRIGAL SOCIETY (q.v.) in 1886. He was appointed Rouge Dragon Pursuivant of Arms at the College of Heralds in 1880, becoming York Herald in 1886 and Garter in 1904, and was knighted the same year.

SCOTTI, ANTONIO (b. Naples, 1869), baritone singer, made his first appearance on the stage at Malta on Nov. 1, 1889. He steadily won the favour of the public, and following upon successful engagements in Milan, Rome, Buenos Ayres and Madrid he came to London.

in 1899, and appeared at Covent Garden as Don Giovanni on June 8. In that winter he went to New York, appeared at the Metropolitan in the same part on Dec. 27 and in his first season firmly established his position as one of the leading baritones of the day. For the next fifteen years his career was divided between London and New York, where, particularly in association with Caruso, his fame increased in a great variety of parts, notably Rigoletto, Iago, Amonasro (in 'Aida'), the Baron Scarpia in 'Tosca,' Tonio in 'Pagliacci' and the Count in 'Le Nozze di Figaro.' Subsequently New York became his headquarters, and besides singing constantly at the Metropolitan he toured with his own company in 1919-20.

Scotti was taught singing by Madame Trifari Payanini (d. 1908)—herself a pupil of the elder Lamperti—and has expressed in print his great indebtedness to her skill. Like many other singers before him he was a little impatient at being kept back in his young days, but when at last the opportunity of doing heavy dramatic work came to him he recognised the wisdom of his teacher's methods, his carefully placed voice being equal to all reasonable demands upon it.

SCOTTISH NATIONAL MUSIC. Of Scottish national or folk music no specimens exist before the early part of the 17th century. That Scotland was a musical nation there is no denying, and we have every reason to believe that it was in no way lacking in musical beauty as the later examples show. Indeed there is strong evidence that many of the tunes which did not see the light of print until the 18th century are of a very much earlier date though lack of printed or manuscript notation leaves us in the dark for positive proof.

There are many early entries in royal and other accounts showing that musical performances were frequent, but there is nothing to show that these performances were of native music; the contrary seems to be the case, and that English, French or other fashionable compositions were rendered. Meanwhile we have the strong belief that Scottish folk-music, ran as it did in England, a silent stream ignored by the cultured musician.

The first light we have on Scottish national music is provided by the Skene Manuscript, a set of seven small volumes now bound together which belonged to John Skene of Hallyard who died in 1644. It is probable that he was responsible for the notation of the tunes. It is believed to have been written between the years 1615 and 1635. It is written in tablature for a lute with six strings. It is now in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh; it contains 114 airs. (See LIBRARIES.)

The next early manuscript of Scottish music is the Straloch Manuscript, also in tablature, dated 1627. There are several other manuscripts of lesser importance. The Straloch MS was formerly in the possession of Burney and a copy of the Scottish airs in it was made by G. F. Graham in 1839, since which time the original has disappeared. Graham's copy is in the Advocates' Library.

It must be premised that the Straloch and the Skene manuscripts do not contain only Scottish airs. There are many tunes which are English and some nondescript pieces which have no historical value. It was not until the early years of the 18th century that Scottish tunes began to be preserved in any quantity. The late John Glen possessed an important manuscript book, 'Margaret Sinkler's Book,' 1710, which contains over 100 early versions of Scottish airs. Some other manuscripts might be mentioned, but historically they are not so important as the above named.

There are two early works that bear upon the subject of Scottish Song: Wedderburn's 'Complaints of Scotland,' 1548, and 'Ane Compendious Booke of Godly and Spiritual Songs,' 1621. In the first is a list of names of songs sung by shepherds, some of which are English.

The second is a collection of hymns set to secular tunes, mostly Scottish. In Verstegan's Restitution of Decayed Intelligence, 1605, there is mentioned a Scottish woman 'dandling her child to sing "Bothwell Bank thou blumest fayre."'

Several more instances of early Scottish songs might be cited, but little can be gathered regarding the music fitted to the songs.

In 1662 John Forbes of Aberdeen published his Cantus Songs and Fancies, to three, four or five parts. Later editions bear the dates 1666 and 1682. The book has extracts from some English publications and has really little bearing upon Scottish national music.

Towards the end of the 17th century Scottish songs began to appear on half-sheets engraved by T. Cross, and in the early editions of Pills to purge Melancholy and elsewhere many attempts to produce songs in the Scots manner came forth. It was quite a fashionable craze and the best musicians of to-day composed songs in this manner.

The first printed book of Scottish tunes was issued by Henry Playford in 1700 with a second edition dated 1701. Its title runs:

'A collection of original Scotch tunes (full of the highland humours) for the violin being the first of this kind yet printed, 1700.'

There are 39 tunes contained in the volume.

In 1724 Allan Ramsay issued the first volume of his Tea Table Miscellany which contains a selection of Scottish songs. In 1728 he published a small oblong work, Musick for Allan Ramsay's Collection of Scots Songs. In 1725 appeared the first collection of Scottish songs fitted to the music. This is, Orpheus Caledonius, arranged by William Thomson, a singer under court favour. There are fifty airs with an added bass and the long list of subscribers shows that the singing of Scottish songs was popular.

In 1733 he published a second edition in two volumes, containing 100 songs and airs.

In the first edition of Orpheus Caledonius there are several tunes marked as by Rizzio. This assumption has been ridiculed, but further consideration will show that though the airs claimed are quite unlikely to be the composition of Rizzio, yet there can be but little doubt that Rizzio as a favoured court musician may have had a certain influence upon the style of composition. In fact some of the tunes are far more scholarly than those which have come from a peasant class.

The bibliography appended to the end of the article will show that a great deal of Scottish national music took the form of REELS and STRATHSPEYS (g.r.), the national dances of the country. Many of the Scottish fiddlers issued collections of these dances of their own composition and of traditional airs.

The Gow family were the principal of these and their collections are extremely valuable as they contain not only the composition of the family but many beautiful airs which have come down traditionally.

SCOTTISH SCALES AND THEIR MELODIES

The existence of Scottish airs constructed on the series 1, 2, 3, 5, 6 of a major diatonic scale is well known.¹ These are not by any means numerous, though their characteristic leap between the third and fifth, and sixth and eighth of the scale, is so common in Scottish melody, that many persons not only believe the greater part of our airs to be pentatonic, but do not admit any others to be Scottish. However the taste for this style may have arisen, the series of notes was a very convenient one, for an instrument possessing the major diatonic scale in one key only could play these airs correctly in the three positions of the scale where major thirds are found, that is, on the first, fourth, and fifth degrees. In the key of C, these are as shown below, adding the octave to the lowest note of the series in each case.

Pentatonic scale in three positions, without change of signature.

If, reversing the order of the notes given above, we begin with the sixth, and passing downwards add the octave below, the feeling of a minor key is established, and keys of A, D, and E minor seem to be produced. Besides tunes in these six keys, a few others will be found, which begin and end in G minor (signature two flats), though also played with natural notes; for B and E being avoided in the melody neither of the flats is required.

A curious peculiarity of tunes written in this series is, that from the proximity of the second and third positions phrases move up and down from one into the other, thus appearing to be alternately in the adjoining keys a full tone apart, moving for example from G into F and vice versa. The following are good examples of the style:

(1) Gala Water.

(2) Were na my heart licht I wad die.

(3) The bridegroom grat.

The first, 'Gala Water,' is one of the most beautiful of our melodies. The modern version of it contains the seventh of the scale more than once, but Oswald has preserved the old pentatonic version in his Caledonian Pocket Companion (1759-65). That version is here given in the large type, the small type showing the modern alterations. The air may be played correctly beginning on E, on A, or on B, representing the third of the keys of C, F and G; but neither flat nor sharp is required in any of the positions, the notes being all natural throughout.

The second is the melody to which Lady Grizel Baillie wrote (1892) her beautiful ballad, 'Were na my heart licht, I wad die.' It is a very simple, unpretending tune, and is given chiefly on account of its close; indeed, both of these tunes are peculiar, and worth more detailed discussion than can be given them here.

The third is the old tune which was so great a favourite with Lady Anne Lyndsay that she wrote for it her celebrated ballad 'Auld Robin Gray.' Although it has been superseded by a very beautiful modern English air, it ought not to be entirely forgotten.

Another exceedingly beautiful pentatonic melody is that to which Burns wrote 'O meikle thinks my love o' my beauty.' It will be found in E minor in the 'Select Songs of Scotland,' by Sir G. A. Macfarren; but it may also be played in D minor and A minor, in each case without either flat or sharp being required in the melody.

The use of the pentatonic scale in our early music must gradually have ceased, through acquaintance with the music of the church service, which had its singularly complete diatonic system of modes. The complete diatonic scale, which we find in the simple shepherd's pipe or recorder, is really that on which our older melodies are formed. The pitch note might be D or G, or any other, but the scale would be the ordinary major diatonic with the semitones between the 3rd and 4th and 7th and 8th degrees. The key of C is that adopted in the following remarks. With scarcely an exception the old tunes keep steadily to this scale without the use of any accidental. It will also be seen that the pathos produced by means of the 4th of the key, is a clever adaptation of a necessity of the scale. 'The Flowers of the Forest'—fortunately preserved in the Skene MS.—is a fine example of the skill with which the composer used the means at his disposal. The first strain of the air is in G major, as will be seen if it be harmonised, though no F sharp was possible on the instrument; in the second strain, no more affecting wail for the disaster of Flodden could have been produced than that effected by the use of the F \sharp , the 4th of the scale of the instrument, the minor 7th of the original key. With his simple pipe the composer has thus given the effect of two keys.

It may be objected that the voice was not tied down to the notes of an imperfect instrument, and could take semitones wherever it felt them to be wanted; but in the process of transmission the untutored singers, happily ignorant of musical science, adhere rigidly to the original forms of the scales in which they sang.

The same effect of playing in two keys occurs in 'O waly waly! love is bonnie, a little while when it is new,' but in most modern versions of the melody both the F \sharp and F \natural are found; this was not possible on the primitive instrument, though easy on the lute or violin.

O waly waly.

Any air which has the natural as well as the altered note may be set down as either modern, or as having been tampered with in modern times. The major seventh in a minor key is also a fairly good sign of modern writing or modern meddling. In a tune written otherwise in the old tonality, the occurrence of the major seventh sounds weak and effeminate when compared with the robust grandeur of the full tone below.

A few more examples may be given to show the mingling of the pentatonic with the completed scale. 'Adieu Dundee'—also found in the Skene MS.—is an example of a tune written as if in the natural key, and yet really in the Dorian mode.

Adieu Dundee.

Another example is 'The wauking of the fauld,' which, played in the same key, has the same peculiarity in the 13th bar; this, however, is the case only in modern versions of the air, for that given by Allan Ramsay in the Gentle Shepherd (1736) is without the E.

OF THE GAELIC MUSIC

If the difficulty of estimating the age of the music of the Lowlands is great, it is as nothing compared to what is met with in considering that of the Highlands.

The Celts certainly had music even in the most remote ages, but as their airs had been handed down for so many generations solely by tradition, it may be doubted whether this music bore any striking resemblance to the airs collected between 1760 and 1780 by the Rev. Patrick Macdonald and his brother. The specimens given of the most ancient music are interesting mainly in so far as they show the kind of recitative to which ancient poems were chanted, for they have little claim to notice as melodies. The example here given is said to be 'Ossian's soliloquy on the death of all his contemporary heroes.'

There are, however, many beautiful airs in the collection; they are simple, wild, and irregular; but their beauty has not a very wide appeal on a first hearing. Of the style of performance the editor says:

'These airs are sung by the natives in a wild, artless and irregular manner. Chiefly occupied with the sentiment and expression of the music, they dwell upon the long and pathetic notes, while they hurry over the inferior and connecting notes, in such a manner as to render it exceedingly difficult for a hearer to trace the measure of them. They themselves while singing them seem to have little or no impression of measure.'

This is more particularly the case with the very old melodies, which wander about without any attempt at rhythm, or making one part answer to another. The following air is an excellent example of the style:

Wet is the night and cold.

In contrast to these are the 'Luing' and 'Jorram,' the former sung by the women at their work, the latter boat-songs.

Patrick Macdonald says 'the very simplicity of the music is a pledge of its originality and antiquity.' Judged by this criticism his versions of the airs seem much more authentic than those of his successors. Captain Fraser of Knockie, who published a very large and important collection of Highland airs in 1816, took much pains, in conjunction with a musical friend, to form what he terms a 'standard.' As he had no taste for the old tonality, he introduces the major seventh in minor keys, and his versions generally abound in semitones. He professed a liking for simplicity, and is not sparing of his abuse of MacGibbon and Oswald for their departures from it; yet his own turns and shakes and florid passages prove that he did not carry his theory into practice. As, however, a large portion of his volume is occupied with tunes composed during the latter part of the 18th and the beginning of the 19th century, in these it would be affectation to expect any other than the modern tonality. A specimen of what he calls an ancient Ossianic air is given as a contrast to that selected from Patrick Macdonald. In style it evidently belongs to a date nearer to the times of MacPherson than to those of Ossian. Compare the 'soliloquy' given above with the following:

An air to which Ossian is recited.

It cannot be denied that though by his alterations of the forms of Gaelic melody Fraser may have rendered them more acceptable to his contemporaries, he has undoubtedly shorn the received versions of much of their claim to antiquity. The volume published by the Gaelic Society of London in 1876, though not faultless in regard to modern changes, has restored some of the old readings; one example ought to be quoted, for the air 'Mairi bhan og' is very beautiful, and the F# in the fourth bar gives us back the simplicity and force of ancient times.

Mairi bhan og. (Mary fair and young.)

Captain Fraser stigmatises the previous collections of Patrick Macdonald and Alexander Campbell (Albyn's Anthology) as very incorrect. But Fraser's own versions have in many cases been much altered in the second edition (1876), while more recent works differ most remarkably from earlier copies. The airs are evidently still in a plastic state—every glen, almost every family, seems to have its own version.

It is evident from the examples given by Patrick Macdonald that in the most ancient times Gaelic music was devoid of rhythm. The Ossianic chants are short and wild. They are succeeded by longer musical phrases, well suited it may be to heighten the effect of the Gaelic verse, but, apart from that, formless to a modern ear. From these emerge airs still wild and irregular, but with a certain sublimity arising from their very vagueness. Even when they become more rhythmic the airs do not at once settle down into phrases of twos and fours, but retain an easy indifference to regularity; two alternating with three, four with five bars, and this in so charming a way that the ease and singularity are alone apparent. The air 'Morag' may be cited; other examples may be found in Albyn's Anthology, 1816-18, and in 'Orain na h-Albain,' an excellent collection of Gaelic airs made by Miss Bell and edited by Finlay Dun. J. M. W.; addn. F. K.

LATER COLLECTIONS

George THOMSON (q.v.) employed Pleyel, Kozeluh, Haydn, Beethoven, Weber and Hummel to harmonise and supply symphonies to the Scottish songs which comprised his published collections. The choice in all these instances was not very good. Beethoven appears to have been under the impression that the 'Scotch snap' was characteristic of all Scottish music, whereas, really, it only naturally belongs to the strathspey, the reel and the Highland fling. Haydn, who seems truly to have had a liking for, and some knowledge of, Scottish vocal music, was certainly better fitted for the task; he also arranged the two volumes of Scottish songs issued by Whyte in 1806-07.

Sir G. A. Macfarren's collection has already been spoken of, and an excellent set of twelve Scottish songs arranged by Max Bruch was published by Leuckart of Breslau. 'Songs of the North,' with the music arranged by Malcolm Lawson, had a great popularity, but many of the airs suffered a good deal in transmission, and several of them are to be found in a purer form in Macleod's 'Songs of a Highland Home.'

The virulent attack made by the late William Chappell on the claims advanced for the Scottish origin of certain airs cannot in every case be considered justifiable. There is much truth in what he advances, i.e. that a number of Anglo-Scottish songs of the 17th and 18th centuries have been too readily claimed as Scottish folk-songs, in spite of the fact that they have been sufficiently well ascertained to be the composition of well-known English musicians.¹

It is, however, quite evident that Chappell's irritation has, on some points, led him astray,² for some of his statements can be proved to be wrong; those for instance regarding 'Jenny's Bawbee,' 'Gin a body' and 'Ye Banks and Braes' and some others. That STENHOUSE (q.v.), up to Chappell's time the chief writer on the history of Scottish song, makes many lamentably incorrect assertions in his commentary on Johnson's Scots Musical Museum cannot be denied, but that he did so wilfully is quite unlikely. It must be remembered that Stenhouse was handicapped by being four hundred miles from the British Museum Library, a storehouse which supplied Chappell so well, and, besides, Stenhouse's work was a pioneer, for his notes were begun in 1817.

Another class of music which now constitutes part of the national music of Scotland was the compositions of professional or semi-professional musicians. As the fiddle is the national instrument of Scotland, so the reel and the strathspey reel are the national dances. A great number of country musicians, particularly in the northern part of Scotland, composed and played these dance tunes for local requirements. These they named either after some patron or gave them a fanciful title. In many instances, by the aid of subscription, the musician was enabled to publish one or a series of his compositions, and so favourite dance tunes from these works were frequently reprinted and rearranged by other musicians.

Isaac Cooper of Banff, Daniel Dow, William Marshall and many other lesser-known composers, along with the Gow family, have thus enriched Scottish music. We must also remember that where one of this type of musicians has succeeded in getting his compositions into print, there may be many whose tunes have passed into local tradition namelessly, so far as composer is concerned. While there are a great many beautiful and purely vocal airs, yet these instrumental melodies have largely been used by song-writers in spite of their great compass; this is one of the factors which makes Scottish song so difficult of execution to the average singer. 'Miss Admiral Gordon's Strathspey,' 'Miss Forbes' Farewell to Banff,' 'Earl Moira's welcome to Scotland,' with others, are well-known examples, and have been selected by Burns and other song-writers for their verses. Another notable one is 'Caller Herring,' which, composed by Nathaniel Gow as a harpsichord piece (one of a series) intended to illustrate a popular Edinburgh Cry, had its words fitted twenty years afterwards by Lady Nairne.

About 1820-30 many now well-known songs in the Scottish vernacular had their birth, possibly owing to the Waverley novels. Allan Ramsay was the first to collect the Scots songs into book form from tradition, and from printed ballad sheets and garlands. His first volume of The Tea-Table Miscellany was issued in 1724, three others following later. It is rather unfortunate, from an antiquarian point of view, that Ramsay and his friends were not content to leave them as collected, but imparted to many a then fashionable artificial flavour, while boasting in his dedication of the charming simplicity of the Scotch ditties.

In 1769 and 1776 David Herd rendered a more trustworthy account of traditional Scots song in the two volumes he published; while Johnson's Scots Musical Museum of six hundred songs, with the music, was the principal collection of the 18th century.

The following list comprises all the important collections of Scottish national music, including some early manuscripts which contain Scottish airs :

- MANUSCRIPTS
- c. 1612-28. The Rowallan MSS. In late tablature on a six-line staff, 40 pp. It belongs to the 17th century, probably written by Sir William Muir of Rowallan between the dates 1612 and 1628. It contains several Scottish airs, and is in the library of the Edinburgh University.
- c. 1627-29. The Straloch MSS. In late tablature on a six-line staff. Contained Scottish and other airs. The original manuscript is now lost, but a copy of a portion of it was made by G. F. Graham in 1858, in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh (see STRALOCH, MSS.).
- 1630-? The Skene MSS. In tablature on a four-line staff. In the Advocates' Library (see SKENE, MSS.).
- c. 1675-80. The Glen MSS. In tablature on a six-line staff. A number of Scottish airs, or, rather, as the late Mr. Glen pointed out, accompaniments for them. In the Edinburgh University.
- 1683-92. The Blaikie MSS. These two, in tablature for the viol da gamba, belonged to Andrew Blaikie of Paisley, a music-engraver, early in the 18th century. 1709. Elizabeth Crockett's MSS.
1709. Mrs. Crockett's MSS. Refused to be stenohous who once possessed it; it is said to have been dated 1709, but it is now lost.
1710. Margaret Stukler's MSS. An oblong quarto volume of about a hundred airs, which formerly belonged to the late Mr. John Glen. It bears the date 1710, and is in ordinary notation.

PRINTED AND ENGRAVED COLLECTIONS

Many Scots and Anglo-Scottish airs appear in Playford's 'Dancing Master,' 1650-1728, and other of Playford's publications; also in D'Urvey's 'Pills to purge Melancholy,' 1698-1720. At later dates a great number are also to be found in the London country-dance books of modern publishers.

'The Ministry of Scotland,' Alfred Moffat, Augener, 1895; 'Early Scottish Melodies,' John Glen, 1900, 8vo.; 'The Glen Collection of Scottish dance music,' 1891-95; John Glen, 2 vols. folio. Jacobite songs are best represented in Hogg's 'Jacobite Relics,' 1819-21, 2 vols. 8vo. (reprinted in 1874); Gaelic music is found scattered through Gow's publications and other collections of Scottish dance music, and elsewhere, but the best-known gatherings into volume form are—Rev. Peter McDonald's 'Highland Airs,' folio (1783); Simon Fraser's 'Airs and Melodies, peculiar to the Highlands and Islands of Scotland,' 1816, folio (reprinted 1876); Alexander Campbell's 'Albyn's Anthology,' 1816-18, 2 vols. folio; 'Ordn na h-Albain,' collected by Miss G. A. Ball, Edinburgh, c. 1840; 'A Treatise on the Language, Poetry and Music of the Highland Clans,' Donald Campbell, Edinburgh, 1867, 8vo.; 'Ancient Orkney Melodies,' collected by Col. Baillie, 1885; 'The Ministry of the Scottish Highlands,' Alfred Moffat, Bayley and Ferguson, Glasgow, 1907; 'Songs of the Hebrides' (3 vols. Eng. and Gaelic text), 1909, 1917, 1921, collected by Marjorie Kennedy Fraser; 'Last Leaves of Traditional Ballads and Ballad Airs,' collected to Aberdeen by the late Gavin Greig, 4to (The Buchan Club, Aberdeen, 1928), a very valuable book.

The above bibliography represents but a tithe of what might justly be included in it. Although there is much traditional Scottish music found among the quantity of dance collections issued by individual Scottish musicians it is difficult to classify it. Besides the Scottish publications enumerated above, the London country-dance books from the early part of the 18th century onward contain much interesting matter in connexion with both Scottish and Irish music. Walsh and others issued collections of Scottish songs and airs, but they were mainly taken from Thomson's 'Orpheus Caledonius.' His 'Caledonian country dances' and those published by John Johnson are, however, of much antiquarian interest.

The attention recently paid to folk-song has brought forth enough evidence to show that the published Scottish national music is but a small proportion of what, even now, exists in a traditional form. Gavin Greig, Miss Lucy Broadwood and other workers have, without much search, brought to light a wealth of Gaelic music of a purely traditional kind. In the Lowlands of Scotland folk-song exists as it does in England, and much of this lowland Scottish folk-song is either almost identical with that found in different parts of England or consists of variants of it. There is, of course, a certain proportion which may be classed as purely confined to Scotland.

One of the first of the modern attempts to tap this stream of traditional music was made by Dean Christie, who published his two volumes of Traditional Ballad Airs in 1876 and 1881. This collection of between three and four hundred tunes, noted down with the words in the north of Scotland, would have been much more valuable if the Dean had been content to present them exactly as noted. Another valuable contribution to the publication of Scottish folk-song is Robert Ford's Vagabond Songs of Scotland, first and second series, 1899 and 1900. In both these works folk-song as known in England is largely present. The New Spalding Club of Aberdeen in 1903 made an initial movement towards the rescue of traditional Scottish song. Gavin Greig (who is also a grantee under the Carnegie Trust given to the universities of Scotland for research work) was commissioned to collect systematically in the north-east of Scotland. Greig's able paper, Folk-Song in Buchan, being part of the Transactions of the Buchan Field Club, gives some of the results of his labours. The Scottish National Song Society has also turned its attention to folk-song research.

SCOTTISH ORCHESTRA, THE. The Scottish Orchestra Company, Limited, was formed in 1891 with the object of fostering the study and love of orchestral music in Scotland, and for the purpose of organising and maintaining an efficient orchestra available for concerts throughout Scotland. To this end a fully equipped band of eighty performers, named 'The Scottish Orchestra,' was recruited in 1893 under the leadership of Maurice Sons, and conducted by George Henschel. Its headquarters are in Glasgow; and during the autumn and winter season concerts are given not only in Glasgow, but also in Edinburgh (in the latter city at the series of concerts under the management of Paterson & Sons), and less frequently at Aberdeen, Dundee, Dunfermline, Paisley, Greenock, and in many other towns, by this fine combination of players.

Apart from the presentation of purely orchestral compositions, the Scottish orchestra has frequently been associated with the principal Scottish choral societies in the production of important choral works. In 1895 Henschel resigned the post of conductor, and was succeeded first by Wilhelm Kes (1895-98), and later by Max Bruch (1898-1900), Frederic Cowen (1900-10), Mlynarski (1910-16), Landon Ronald (1916-20), Julius Harrison (1920-23). A system of inviting several conductors to take part in each season was then adopted until 1926, when TALICH (q.v.) undertook the winter season.

In the absence of the regular conductor, the Scottish Orchestra has played under the direction of many famous conductors, including Richard Strauss, Fritz Steinbach, Edouard Colonne, Hans Richter, Henry J. Wood, and others, and though, in accordance with the purpose for which it was founded, the appearances of this band are appropriately confined mainly to the country north of the Tweed, it has played in London, Leeds, Newcastle, Huddersfield and elsewhere.

SCRIBE, AUGUSTIN-EUGÈNE (b. Paris, Dec. 25, 1791; d. there, Feb. 21, 1861), the most prolific of French dramatists, and the best librettist of his day. He lost his parents early, and the well-known advocate Bonnet urged him to take to the Bar; but he was irresistibly drawn to the stage, and from his début at 20 at the Théâtre du Vaudeville till his death, he produced for the different theatres of Paris a rapid succession of pieces which have served as models to a host of imitators. He originated the comédie-vaudeville, and attained to high comedy in 'Une Chaine'; but it is in opéra-comique and lyric tragedy that he has given the most striking proofs of his imagination and knowledge of the stage. For half a century he produced on an average ten pieces a year, many, it is true, written conjointly with various authors, but in these 'mariages d'esprit' Scribe was always the head of the firm.

Meyerbeer's 'Huguenots', 'Robert', 'Prophète', 'L'Étoile du nord', and 'L'Africaine'; Auber's 'Fra Diavolo', 'Gustave III', 'Cheval de bronze', 'Domino noir', and 'Diamants de la couronne'; Auber's 'Muette de Portici'; and Verdi's 'Vêpres siciliennes' are the most famous of his libretti.

Scribe died suddenly. He had been a member of the French Academy since 1836, and had acquired a large fortune. His complete works have been published (1874-85; 76 vols.), and there are several editions of his stage-pieces. That of 1855 comprises 2 vols. of operas, and 3 of opéras-comiques; and that of Calmann Lévy (1874-81), 6 vols. 12mo of ballets and opéras, and 20 of opéras-comiques. A perusal of these gives a high idea of his fertility and resource. G. C.

SCRIPTORES. There are several great collections of ancient writers on musical theory, both Greek and Latin. In 1652 Meibomius printed a valuable collection of Greek writers which long held the field. It is now, however, superseded by the following:

Musici scriptores Graeci, ed. C. Janus (Teubner, 1895), contains, with elaborate prolegomena, the following authors:

1. Aristides. 'I'ool de musica.'
2. Pseudo-Aristotle. 'De rebus musicis problemata.'
3. Euclides. 'Sectio canonis.'
4. Cleonides. Εισαγωγή ἀρμονική.

8. Alypius. Εἰσαγωγή μουσικῆς.
9. 'Excerpta Neapolitana.'
10. 'Carminum Graecorum reliquiae.'

The De musica of ARISTIDES QUINTILIANUS is not included above, because it had been edited separately by A. Jahn (Berlin, 1882). The Harmonic Elements of Aristoxenus are best studied in Macran's edition (Oxford, 1902).

The later Greek writers are to be found as published by Wallis, either separately or in his Opera mathematica (Oxford, 1699), of which vol. iii. contains Ptolemy, Harmonica; Porphyry, Commentary on Ptolemy; and Bryennius, Harmonica. To these may be added a less important anonymous work, De musica, ed. Bollermann (Berlin, 1841).

For Latin authors reference must first be made to the great collection of Martin Gerbert, Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica, 3 vols., 1784 (and reproduced in facsimile 1905). It contains the following:

W. H. F.

SCUDO, PIETRO (b. Venice, June 6, 1806; d. Blois, Oct. 14, 1864), was brought up in Germany. Some circumstance led him to Paris, and in 1816 he entered Choron's school, and studied singing there at the same time with Duprez. He never became a good singer, and after taking a secondary part in Rossini's 'Il viaggio a Reims' left the boards, returned to Choron's school, and there picked up a slender knowledge of music. After the revolution of 1830 he played second clarinet in a military band. Returning to Paris he made his way into society, set up as a teacher of singing, and a composer of romances. He took to writing, and published Physiologie du rire and Les Paris politiques en province (1838). He gradually restricted himself to musical criticism, but as long as he wrote only for the Revue de Paris, the Réforme and the Revue indépendante, he was unknown outside certain cliques in Paris. As musical critic to the Revue des deux mondes, he became a man of mark. Scudo's articles are worth reading as specimens of French musical criticism before Berlioz was known, and while Fétis occupied a field without a rival. They have been mostly republished under the following titles: Critique et littérature musicale (1850, 8vo; 1852, 12mo), 2nd series (1859, 12mo); La Musique ancienne et moderne (1854, 12mo); L'Année musicale, 3 vols. (Hachette, 1860, 1861, and 1862); La Musique en 1862 (Hetzl, 1863); and Le Chevalier Sarti (1857, 12mo), a musical novel taken from Italian and German sources, of which a continuation, Frédérique, appeared in the Revue des deux mondes, but was not republished. All his works were printed in Paris. Scudo finally became insane, and died in an asylum at Blois.

SEASONS, THE.—'Die Jahreszeiten'—Haydn's last oratorio. The book was compiled in German from Thomson's 'Seasons' by Van Swieten, who induced Haydn to undertake its composition immediately after the success of the 'Creation'; and the music was written between Apr. 1798 and Apr. 24, 1801, on which day the first performance took place at the Schwarzenberg palace, Vienna.

The score was published in 1802-03 (without date) at Vienna; a barbarous English version accompanied the German text. In 1813 Clementi published a vocal score with a better version. The Rev. John Webb followed with a further improvement in 1840 or 1841, Professor E. Taylor made a fourth.

SEBASTIANI, JOHANN (b. Weimar, Sept. 30, 1622; d. 1683), is said to have studied music in Italy. He is next heard of as settled at Königsberg in Prussia about 1650, where also in 1661 he was appointed cantor to the Domkirche in the Kneiphof quarter of the town, and in 1663 became Kapellmeister to the electoral Schlosskirche. He retired on a pension in 1679. He is chiefly known as the composer of a Passion music, which occupies an important place in the development of the form. The full title of the work is:

'Das Leyden und Sterben unsers Herrn und Heylandes J. Chr. nach dem heiligen Mattheus. In eine rechtliche Harmoni von 5 ständigen und 6 spielenden Stimmen nebst dem Basso continuo gesetzt. Wortten zu erweckung mehrer Devotion unterschiedliche Verse aus denen gewöhnlichen Kirchenliedern mit eingeführt.'

Königsberg, 1674.

The work is dedicated to Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg. As the title indicates.

it is a Passion with instrumental accompaniment a 6 and chorus a 5. The instrumental parts are for first and second violins, three for viola da gamba or da braccio, and one for viola bassa. But the full accompaniment is only reserved for the dramatic choruses in the work. Elsewhere the distinction is made that while the violas alone accompany the words of the Evangelist and other single characters sung by solo voices, the first and second violins alone with basso continuo accompany the utterances of our Lord. There are also short symphonic interludes for violas alone, and the Choral verses are intended to be sung by a solo voice with the accompaniment of violas. The conclusion consists of a hymn of thanksgiving, the first four verses of which are sung solo, and only the last verse tutti. The whole interesting work has now been reprinted in the D.D.T. xvii. (See PASSION MUSIC.) Other works of Sebastiani, enumerated in Q.L., are two collections of 'geistliche und weltliche Lieder' bearing the title 'Parnass-blumen,' published at Hamburg 1672 and 1675, also a large number of occasional compositions for weddings and funerals. A few sacred compositions in the concerted style for voices and instruments remain in MS. J. R. M.

SECHTER, SIMON (b. Friedberg, Bohemia, Oct. 11, 1788; d. Sept. 12, 1867), a famous theoretician and composer.

In 1804, after a moderate musical education, he went to Vienna, where he applied himself with ardour to theoretical studies. In 1809, while Vienna was in the hands of the French, he made the acquaintance of Dragonetti—then living in concealment under the curious apprehension that Napoleon would oblige him to go to Paris—for whom he wrote the pianoforte accompaniments to his concertos for the double bass. In 1810 Sechter became teacher of the piano and singing at the Blind Institute, for which he wrote many songs and two masses. During the whole of this time he pushed forward his studies, working more especially at Bach and Mozart. He found a good friend in Abbé Stadler, through whose means three of Sechter's masses were performed at the court chapel. A Requiem of his and a chorus from Schiller's 'Bride of Messina' were also executed at the Concert Spirituel with success. In 1824 he became court organist, first as subordinate, and in 1825, on the death of Worzißcheck, as chief, an office which he retained till his death. His fame as a theoretical teacher attracted numerous scholars, amongst others the great Schubert, who was on the point of taking lessons from him when attacked by his last illness. (See SCHUBERT.) Amongst his pupils may be mentioned, Preyer, Nottebohm, the Princess Czartorjaska, Sucher, Bibl, Rosa Kastner (Escudier), Rufinatscha, Bruckner, Otto Bach, Döhler, Schachner, Flitsch, S.

Bagge, Benoni, Vieuxtemps, Pauer, C. F. Pohl and Thalberg. The Emperor Ferdinand conferred upon him the large gold medal for a Mass dedicated to his Majesty, which was shortly followed by the order of St. Louis from the Duke of Lucca. In 1850 he became professor of composition in the Conservatorium at Vienna. His Aphorisms, etc., which he communicated to the Vienna A.M.Z., show him to have been a profound thinker, and give many instructive hints both to teachers and scholars. His most intimate friends were Staudigl, Lutz and Hölzel, for whom he wrote a quantity of humorous Volkslieder in contrapuntal style, as well as many comic operettas, ballads, etc. His diligence in study was astonishing. No day passed in which he did not write a fugue. A few years before his death he had the misfortune, through his own good nature, to lose almost everything, and died in poverty and privation.

His unpublished works in the Imperial Library and the Musikverein at Vienna contain four oratorios, operas and large cantatas, music for voice, organ, and pianoforte, including 104 variations on an original theme of 104 bars; also a complete theoretical treatise ready for publication, in two portions, first on acoustics, second on canon. Among his published works are an edition of Marburg On Fugue, with many additions; Grundsätze der musik. Composition (3 vols. B. & H.); twelve masses; Practical Examples of Accompaniment from Figured Bass, op. 59; Practical School of Thorough Bass, opp. 49, 98; preludes for the organ, in four books; fugues, hymns, choral preludes; four fugues for PF., op. 5, dedicated to Beethoven; fugue in C minor, to the memory of Schubert, op. 43; etc. Sechter completed the grand fugue for orchestra in D major left unfinished by Mozart.

SECOND, the smallest interval in the scale used for musical purposes. It is described by notes which are next to each other on the staff or by letters which lie next each other in the alphabet, as A B, B C, C D♯, E♭, F♯.

Three kinds can be practically distinguished. The minor second, which is equal to a semitone, as at (b) in the example; the major second, which is equal to a tone (but of which there are two kinds, grave and acute—see below), as at (a); and the augmented second, which is equal to three semitones, as at (c).—The numerical ratios of the several intervals in just intonation are given as follows: the minor second, 16 : 15; the grave major second, 10 : 9; the acute major second, 9 : 8; and the augmented second, 75 : 64. (See SEMITONE; INTERVAL.)

SEDIE, ENRICO DELLE (b. Leghorn, June 17, 1824¹; d. Paris, Nov. 28, 1907), baritone singer, son of a merchant of Leghorn. In the year 1848 he volunteered in the army of Charles Albert of Piedmont, and fought against the Austrians in the war for Italian independence. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Curtatone but afterwards released, and at the close of the campaign of the following year retired from the army with the rank of lieutenant. Under the direction of his fellow-citizen, Orazio Galeffi, he then devoted himself to the study of singing, and in 1851 made his début at Pistoia² in Nabucco.

From 1854, when he made a great success as Rigoletto in Florence, his position was secure. He appeared with unvarying success at Rome, Milan, Vienna, Paris and London, and though possessed of so little voice as to gain the sobriquet of Il baritone senza voce, he made up by dramatic accent and purity of style for the shortcomings of nature. In 1867, at the earnest request of Auber, he accepted a professorship at the Conservatoire of Paris on the most advantageous terms hitherto offered. Under him a commission was appointed for the entire remodelling of that institution, but the death of Auber and the outbreak of the Franco-Prussian War compelled the Government to abandon their intention. In 1874 he published a large work upon the art of singing and musical declamation, under the title of L'Art lyrique. Translations of this and other vocal treatises are published in New York as A Complete Method of Singing.

Delle Sedie was Cavaliere of the Order of the Crown of Italy, for his military services in the campaigns of 1848, 1849; Cavaliere of the Order of SS. Maurizio and Lazzaro; and member of many societies and academies both of Italy and France. For some time he lived in Paris, and devoted himself entirely to the teaching of his art.

SEGR (SEGER, SEGER, SAGER, SEGERT, ZECKERT), JOSEPH FERDINAND NORBERT (b. Repin near Melnik, Bohemia, Mar. 21, 1716; d. Apr. 22, 1782), eminent organist and composer. Educated at Prague, where he graduated Master of Philosophy, he was also singer at St. James's Church in that city, and later, organist at St. Martin's. In 1735 he was first violinist at the Tein Church, but was appointed organist in 1741, which position he retained until his death. In addition, he held the appointment of organist at the Kreuzherrenkirche in the Old Town for thirty-seven years (1745-1782). In this church Joseph II. heard Seegr play, and was so delighted with the masterly performance that he at once determined to give him a court appointment at Vienna. Seegr died, however, before the official document arrived which contained this preference. Amongst his pupils were the principal Bohemian musicians of that time, viz.: Kozeluh, Maschek, Mysliwecek, Gelinek, Bixi, Kucharz, etc.

That Seegr was well known to Bach is testified by the fact that the latter advised Count Millesimo to place Mathias Sofka under Master Seegr, remarking that he could not entrust him to a better teacher. Burney (Present State of Music, Germany, vol. ii. pp. 13-14) mentions him as being a fine organ-player, a good linguist and an excellent musician. The unanimous testimony of his contemporaries proclaims Seegr as one of the finest organists of his time. At his death his compositions were acquired by Ernst, Konzertmeister of Gotha. Daniel Gottlob Turk, music director of Halle, was employed to edit the first posthumous instalment of these compositions—'Eight Toccatas and Fugues' for the organ (Breitkopf, 1793), which are up to the present his best-known works. The tocatas are in reality preludes—with the exception of No. 5, the style of which is more in accordance with its title. His other compositions consisted of many masses, psalms, litanies, etc., printed copies of which do not exist. After the lapse of nearly a century and a quarter, Messrs. Novello & Co. have issued Nos. 1, 5 and 7, edited by Dom Samuel Gregory Ould, and adapted to the requirements of the modern organ.

SEELING, HANS (b. Prague, 1828; d. there, May 26, 1862), pianist and composer. Ill-health obliged him to go to Italy in 1852, and in 1856 he toured in the East, returning to Italy in 1857. After settling in Paris, 1859, he made his home in Germany. An excellent pianist, he met with unflinching success on his tours. Seeling composed a number of brilliant pieces and studies for the piano, of which the best known are the 'Barcarolle', the 'Lorelei' (op. 2), the 'Concert Studies' (op. 10), and the 'Memories of an Artist' (op. 13). These compositions are highly effective, and their character partakes of Henselt on the one hand and Bendel on the other.

SEGRETO DI SUSANNA, IL, opera in one act; text by Enrico Golisciani; music by Wolf-Ferrari. Produced Hofoper, Munich, Nov. 4, 1909; New York, Metropolitan Opera House, Mar. 14, 1911; Covent Garden, July 11, 1911; Costanzi Theatre, Rome, Nov. 27, 1911; in English (Beecham) Covent Garden, Nov. 12, 1919.

SEGUE, 'follows'—as segue l'aria, 'the aria follows'; a direction frequently found at the end of recitatives. It is thus equivalent to the more modern word attacca. It is also found occasionally at the foot of a page where a space is left after one movement in order that the next may begin at the top, to avoid turning over in the middle. It then indicates that no stop is to be made between the two movements.

SEGUIDILLA (SIGUIDILLA), a popular national dance of Spain. The origin of both name and dance are uncertain; it existed in La Mancha in the time of Cervantes (see Don Quixote, part ii. chap. 38), but there is no evidence to show whether it is indigenous, or introduced into Spain by the Moors. It is, however, certain that from La Mancha it spread all over Spain, and it is still danced in both town and country. Seguidillas are divided into three kinds—Seguidillas Manchegas, the original form of the dance, in which it assumes a gay and lively character; Seguidillas Boleras,¹ more measured and stately; and Seguidillas Gitanas, danced very slowly and sentimentally. To these some writers add a fourth kind, the Seguidillas Taleadas, said to be a combination of the original Seguidilla with the Caohucha. The music is written in 3-4 or 3-8 time, usually in a minor key, and is performed on the guitar with occasionally a flute, violin or castanet accompaniment. The coplas, or words sung by the musicians, are written in couplets of four short lines followed by an estrevillo or refrain of three lines, but some coplas want this latter feature. Both music and words often partake of the character of an improvisation, the former remarkable for strange and sudden modulations, and the latter treating of both serious and comic subjects.

A collection of coplas was published at the end of the 18th century by N. Zamacola, writing under the pseudonym of Don Preciso. From the introduction to this book the following quaint description of the Seguidilla is translated:

'So soon as two young people of the opposite sexes present themselves standing face to face at a distance of about two varas² in the middle of the room, the "ritornelo" or prelude of the music begins; then the seguidilla is insinuated by the voice—if it be a manchega, by singing the first line of the copla; if it be a bolera, by singing two lines, which must only take up four bars. The guitar follows, playing a pasacalle³; and at the fourth bar the seguidilla begins to be sung. Then the dance breaks out with castanets or crotolas,⁴ running on for a space of nine bars, with which the first part concludes. The guitar continues playing the pasacalle, during which the dancers change to opposite positions by means of a very deliberate and simple promenade (paseo). While singing again, at the beginning, and at the fourth bar, each goes on for nine bars more, making the variations and differences of their respective schools, which forms the second part. Again they change places, and upon each dancer returning to the spot where they began to dance, the third part goes on in the same way as the second, and on arriving at the ninth bar, the voice, the instrument, and the castanets cease all at once, and as if improvisamente, the room remaining in silence, and the dancers standing immovable in various beautiful attitudes, which is what we call "well stopped" (Bien parado).'

Space will not allow us to give an example of the music which accompanies this beautiful dance. In Book IV. of Luigi Borghi's 'Opera Dances' (London, 1783) is a seguidilla modified for theatrical representation, and in the first act of 'Carmen' there is a Spanish air which Bizet has entitled 'Seguidillo.' Better examples than these will be found in Mendel's Lexicon (sub voce Seguidilla), and in the Appendix to Part I. of Marino Soriano Fuertes's Historia de la musica española (Madrid, 1855-59), in which specimens are given of the varieties of the dance. With regard to the words, the following copla (from Don Preciso's Collección de Coplas, Madrid, 1799) may serve as an example:

'El Lunes me enamoro,
Martes lo digo,
Miércoles me declaro,
Jueves consigo:
Viernes doy zelos
Y Sábado y Domingo
Busco Amor nuevo.'

SEGUIN, (1) ARTHUR EDWARD SHAYDEN (b. London, Apr. 7, 1809; d. New York, Dec. 9, 1852), of Irish descent, received his musical education at the R.A.M., and first appeared in public in 1823 at concerts and performances of Italian operas given by its pupils. His voice was a deep bass, of very extensive compass, and he met with a very favourable reception. In 1829 he sang at the Exeter Festival. In 1831 he appeared at the theatre in Tottenham Street as Polyphemus in 'Acis and Galatea.' In 1832 he sang at the Concert of Ancient Music. In 1833 and 1834 he was engaged at Covent Garden, and in the latter year appeared at the King's Theatre as Il Conte Robinson in Cimarosa's 'Matrimonio segreto,' and also sang at the Festival in Westminster Abbey. From 1835-37 he was engaged at Drury Lane. In Aug. 1838 he appeared at the English Opera House in Macfarren's 'Devil's Opera,' and soon afterwards quitted England for America, made his first appearance at the National Theatre, New York, as the Count in Rooke's 'Amilie' on Oct. 15, 1838, and was extremely well received. He afterwards formed an opera company named 'The Seguin Troupe,' who performed at various places in the United States and Canada. Amongst other distinctions he was elected a chief by one of the Indian tribes, and received an Indian name, signifying 'The man with the deep mellow voice,' an honour which had never before been conferred on any Englishman except Edmund Kean, the tragedian.

His wife, ANN CHILDE (b. London, 1814; d. New York, Aug. 1888), was also a pupil of the R.A.M., and appeared in public as a soprano singer in 1828 in the same performances as her future husband, and with equal success. In 1832 she sang at the Concert of Ancient Music, and in 1834 at the Westminster Abbey Festival. After performing for two or three seasons at the King's Theatre as 'seconda donna,' she appeared on the English stage at Drury Lane, Nov. 3, 1837, as Donna Anna in the English version of Mozart's 'Don Giovanni.' She accompanied her husband to America and performed in opera until his death, when she retired from the stage and taught music in New York.

Seguin's younger brother, (2) WILLIAM HENRY (b. London, 1814; d. Dec. 28, 1850), also a pupil of the R.A.M., possessed a light bass voice and was a concert singer and member of the choir of the Temple Church. He married Miss GOOCH, soprano singer, a fellow-pupil at the R.A.M., who survived him a few years only.

His sister, (3) ELIZABETH (b. London, 1815; d. London, 1870), was also a singer, and was the mother of Mme. PAREFA-ROSA (q.v.).

W. H. H.

SEIDEL, FRIEDRICH LUDWIG (b. Treuenbrietzen, July 14, 1765; d. Charlottenburg, May 8, 1831), a pupil of Friedrich Benda at Berlin, while Reichardt took him into his house and supplied his personal wants. In 1792 he was organist at St. Mary's; in 1801 assistant conductor at the National Theatre; in 1808 musical director of the Royal Chapel; and in 1822 court Kapellmeister. He was pensioned in 1830. He composed a Mass, Requiem and other church music, an oratorio, operas, music for plays, overtures, a sextet, PF. and wind, pieces for PF. and songs (Riemann; Q.-L.).

SEIDL, ANTON (b. Pest, May 7, 1850; d. New York, Mar. 28, 1898), was entered as a pupil at the Leipzig Conservatorium in Oct. 1870. Early in 1872 he went to Bayreuth, and was there employed by Wagner to make the first copy of the score of the Nibelungen trilogy. He also assisted at the festival in Aug. 1876. In 1879, through Wagner's recommendation, he obtained the post of conductor at the Leipzig Opera-House, and remained there until 1882, when he went upon a long tour through Germany, Holland, England, Italy, etc., in the capacity of conductor of Angelo Neumann's 'Nibelungen' opera troupe. The performances were not altogether faultless: it is true that the vocalists were good, but the great music drama was reproduced in a sadly mutilated condition. Yet Seidl proved himself to be an energetic conductor, and was personally successful. In 1883 he became conductor at the Bremen Opera-House. Early in 1885 he married the well-known soprano singer Frl. Kraus, and in September of that year accepted the post of conductor of German opera at the New York Metropolitan Opera-House, which post he filled with great distinction. He also succeeded THOMAS (q.v.) as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Society (1891), and conducted the first performance of Dvořák's symphony, 'From the New World' (1893). In 1895-97 he again conducted German opera in New York, and in 1897 he conducted at Covent Garden.

SEIDL, ARTHUR (b. Munich, June 8, 1863), distinguished critic and littérateur, graduated D.Phil. (1887) at Leipzig University with a thesis, Vom Musikalisch-Erhabenen. He concentrated his attention primarily on modern music and its problems, as the titles of his many publications show. Riemann gives a list which includes further works on æsthetics, on Wagner, Richard Strauss, Hans Pfitzner (1921) and other men and matters.

In 1898-99 at Weimar Seidl was engaged in editing Nietzsche's works and letters; in 1904 he became teacher of musical history, literature and æsthetics in Leipzig University, and concurrently with this (1903-19) was musical manager to the Hoftheater at Dessau. Later, at Dessau, he has held private courses in musical science.

SEIFFERT, MAX (b. Beeskow on the Spree, Feb. 9, 1868), was educated at his native place and at the Joachimsthal Gymnasium at Berlin. He studied musical science and literature under Philipp Spitta, and wrote a treatise on Sweelinck for the doctor's degree in 1891 (printed in the Vierteljahrsschrift of that year). Besides many contributions to that periodical, to the Allg. deutsche Biographie, the Tijdschrift of the Dutch Vereeniging, etc., he issued a revised and enlarged edition of C. F. Weitzmann's Geschichte der Klaviermusik in 1899, and was editor of the complete works of Sweelinck issued in twelve volumes, and of several volumes of the various series of D.D.T. (q.v.). From April 1904 till 1914 he was editor-in-chief of the Internationale Musikgesellschaft, and from 1918 he edited the Archiv für Musikwissenschaft, which as far as Germany was concerned took up the task of the Int. Mus. Ges. (Riemann.)

SEISS, ISIDOR WILHELM (b. Dresden, Dec. 23, 1840; d. Cologne, Sept. 25, 1905), was at first a pupil of F. Wieck for piano and of Julius Otto for theory. In 1858-60 he studied at Leipzig under Hauptmann. He had a success as a pianist in the following year, and issued several compositions. In 1871 he was appointed a piano-teacher at the Cologne Conservatorium, and in 1878 received the title of professor. He had a long and successful career there, and conducted the Musikalische Gesellschaft. His compositions, chiefly educational works for the piano, are tasteful and of high aim; his clever arrangement of Beethoven's 'Contre-danses' and 'Dances allemandes' are among his most famous productions, as well as a revised version of Weber's E flat concerto. A 'Feierliche Szene und Marsch' are for orchestra. (Riemann.) M.

SÉJAN, NICOLAS (b. Paris, Mar. 19, 1725; d. there, Mar. 16, 1819), a famous organist. In 1760 he was at St. André des Arts; in 1772 successor of Daquin at Notre Dame; in 1789 successor of L. A. Couperin at the Royal Chapel and teacher of singing at the École Royale de Chant. He lost his position through the Revolution. In 1807 he was organist at the Dôme des Invalides, and in 1814 again at the Royal Chapel. He composed 3 PF. trios, 6 violin sonatas, PF. and organ pieces (Riemann; Q.-L.).

SEKLES, BERNHARDT (b. Frankfort-on-Main, June 20, 1872), pupil of Uzielli, Knorr, and Scholz, at the Hochs Conservatorium. He was for some time Kapellmeister in Heidelberg and Mainz, but later became teacher of theory at the Hochs Conservatorium, Frankfort. His works are full of exotic charm, beauty and colour, and have a certain affinity with the compositions of Cyril Scott. They include:

Songs for soprano (opp. 2, 3, 8, 18); songs for tenor; songs for baritone (opp. 1, 7, 11); 'Aus dem Gärten der Semiramis,' symph. poem; serenade (for 11 solo instruments); passacaglia and fugue (for orch. and organ); 'Kleine Suite' (for orch.); 'Die Temperamente' (for orch.); passacaglia and fugue (for str. quartet); sonata (for vcl. and PF.); Dance-Play, 'Der Zwerg und die Infantin' (Frankfort, 1918); opera, 'Schahrazade' (Mannheim, 1917); Burlesque, 'Die Hochzeit des Paun' (Wiesbaden, 1921); PF. pieces (opp. 4, 5, 10). K. D. H.

SELBY, BERTRAM, LUARD- (b. Ightham, Kent, Feb. 12, 1853; d. Jan. 1919), received his musical education at the Leipzig Conservatorium under Reinecke and Jadassohn; became organist of St. Barnabas, Marylebone, and Highgate School in 1876, and gave chamber concerts in London before his appointment to the post of organist of Salisbury Cathedral in 1881, a post he retained for two years. He was next organist at St. John's, Torquay, in 1884, and of St. Barnabas, Pimlico, in 1886. He was appointed organist of Rochester Cathedral in succession to Dr. John Hopkins, in 1900. His most important works are incidental music to 'Helena in Troas,' performed in London, May 1886, and 'Weather or No,' a musical duologue, produced at the Savoy Theatre in Aug. 1896. An orchestral 'Idyll' was played at one of Henschel's London Symphony Concerts on Mar. 11, 1897. This, two quintets for piano and strings, a suite for violin and piano, many piano pieces and an opera 'The Ring' (1886) remain unpublished. The list of printed works includes 'The Waits of Bremen,' 'The Dying Swan,' 'Summer by the Sea,' short cantatas, part-songs, 'The Hag,' 'It was a Lover and his Lass,' trios, etc., for female voices, a violin sonata in B minor, some sixteen anthems, ten services, very numerous organ pieces and some songs, all of which show great taste and refinement of treatment. M.

SELLE, THOMAS (b. Zörbig, Saxony, Mar. 23, 1599; d. Hamburg, July 2, 1663), was first rector at Wesselburen; in 1624 at Heide; in 1625 at Wesselburen-Itzehoe; in 1634 cantor at Itzehoe; in 1637 cantor at Johanneum, Hamburg; and in 1641 town cantor, minor canon and musical director at Hamburg Cathedral. He composed a large number of concerts, madrigals, motets, sacred and secular songs, including a number of settings of poems by Rist, the various books bearing the long florid titles customary at that time (Q.-L.; Riemann).

SELLINGER'S ROUND, a 16th-century tune and round dance, of unknown authorship, which had immense popularity during the 16th and 17th centuries. The original form of the title was doubtless 'St. Leger's Round.' The delightful vigour and unusual character of the air are felt to-day, when played before a modern audience, as fully as in its own period. It is frequently referred to in 16th- and 17th-century literature, including Bacchus Bountie, 1593; Morley's Plaine and Easie Introduction, 1597, and elsewhere. In some cases the sub-title 'or the Beginning of the World' is found added to it, and this is partly explained in a comedy named 'Lingua,' 1607. An excellent version of the tune, arranged with variations by William Byrd, is found in 'The Fitzwilliam Virginal Book,' and other copies of the air are in Lady Neville's Virginal Book and William Ballet's Lute-book. (See VIRGINAL MUSIC.)

Printed copies, which differ considerably, and are not so good as those referred to, appear in some of the Playford publications, including early editions of 'The Dancing Master,' on 'Musick's Handmaid,' and 'Musick's delight the Cithren.' The original dance has probably been a maypole one, and this is borne out by a rude wood-cut on the title-page of a 17th-century 'Garland,' where figures are depicted dancing round a maypole, and 'Hey for Sellinger's Round' inscribed above them.

The following is the air, without the variations and harmony, as given in the 'Fitzwilliam Virginal Book':

SELNECCER (SELENECCER), NIKOLAUS (b. Hersbruck, near Nuremberg, Dec. 6, 1528; d. Leipzig, May 24, 1592), was organist of the Burghkapelle in that city, at the age of 12, and studied at Wittenberg from 1549. From 1557-1561 he was court preacher and tutor in Dresden, and subsequently held professional posts in Jena (1561-68), Leipzig (1568-70), Wolfenbüttel (1570-74), Leipzig again (1574-88). In the latter year he was deprived of his offices and became Superintendent at Hildesheim, until at the death of the Elector Christian of Saxony he was reinstated. He was an eminent theologian, and wrote the words and music of many hymns; his great work in this direction was published at Leipzig in 1587, under the title 'Christliche Psalmen, Lieder, vnd Kirchengesenge,' set for four voices, Selneccker's own compositions being marked with his initials. Specimens of his music are given in several of the hymn-books of the 17th century. (Q.-L.) M.

SELVA, BLANCHE MARIE (b. Brive, Corrèze, Jan. 29, 1884), French pianist, was rewarded with a first-class medal in the preparatory piano-forte class at the Paris Conservatoire (1895), and became a pupil of V. d'Indy. She studied at the Schola Cantorum, taught piano there for many years, and afterwards at the Strassburg and Prague Conservatoires. Her concert career began at the age of 13; at 20 she had performed all Bach's works in 17 concerts. Since 1902 she has devoted her remarkable talent to the works of modern French composers, which she played at the Société Nationale de Musique, and at the Libre Esthétique, Brussels.

Her works relating to PF. teaching and musical interpretation are: La Sonate (Paris, Rouart et Lerolle, 1913); Quelques mots sur la sonate (Paris, Mellotée, 1914); L'Enseignement musical de la technique du piano, comprising two preparatory books (book 1, 1922), and 3 volumes (vol. 3 in 2 parts). SEMBRICH, MARCELLA (b. Wisniewczyk, Galicia, Feb. 15, 1858), distinguished Polish-American soprano. The daughter of a musician, Kasimir Kochanski, Sembrich adopted her mother's maiden name. Taught by her father, at the age of 12 she played both the violin and the piano in public; later she received further instruction on these instruments from Wilhelm Stengel (whom she afterwards married) and Brustermann, then went to Vienna for the completion of her studies, but 'discovering' her voice she determined to adopt a vocal career. Accordingly she studied at Vienna singing under Rokitanaky, and later at Milan under Lamperti the younger, and on June 7, 1877, made her début at Athens in 'I Puritani.'

Further study of the German repertory followed, under Richard Lewy. In October, 1878, Sembrich made a highly successful début at Dresden as Lucia. There she remained until the spring of 1880, singing coloratura parts. In June, 1880, she made her first appearance in England, at the Royal Italian Opera, singing the part of Lucia and subsequently other rôles. She returned there for the seasons of 1881-84. During the succeeding years she sang in Paris, Russia, Spain and the United States, and in 1895 reappeared in London, at Covent Garden, as Susanna. Thereafter her appearances in opera were confined to Austria and the United States, where she was long a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company, retiring in 1909. She continued active in concert singing on both sides of the Atlantic until 1917, when she permanently retired and made her home in New York.

Sembrich's voice, singularly perfect in quality, with a compass from c' to f''', was also capable of true expressiveness. As a singer of songs she achieved a combination of beautiful tone with musical intelligence.

SEMELE, a secular oratorio by Handel, composed in 1743, between June 3 and July 4. The libretto is slightly altered from an opera-book of Congreve's, written in 1707. 'Semelo' is termed by Arnold 'A Dramatic Performance,' by Mainwaring 'An English opera' but called an Oratorio, while it was announced at different times in the General Advertiser as 'Semele, after the manner of an Opera,' and 'Semele, after the manner of an Oratorio.' The first performance took place on Feb. 10, 1744, at Covent Garden Theatre; the following December, with additions and alterations, King's Theatre, Haymarket; revived by Smith and Stanley in 1762, and Cambridge University Musical Society, Nov. 27, 1878. The original MS. is in the Roy. Lib. B.M., and there are some interesting sketches (principally of Act iii.) in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge. w. s. s.

SEMÉT, THÉOPHILE (b. Lille, Sept. 6, 1824; d. Corbeil, near Paris, Apr. 15, 1888), opera composer. The prizes he gained at the local Conservatoire procured him a grant from the municipality to study in Paris, and he entered Halévy's class for composition. His first work was merely a few songs and some charming orchestral music for 'La Petite Fadette,' vaudeville in two acts (Variétés, Dec. 28, 1850), but he at length procured a better opportunity, and his 'Nuits d'Espagne,' two acts (May 26), and 'La Demoiselle d'honneur,' three acts (Dec. 30), were both produced in 1857 with success at the Théâtre Lyrique; 'Gil Blas' (Mar. 26, 1860), an opéra-comique in five acts, and 'Ondine,' three acts (Jan. 7, 1863), followed at the same theatre, and his next work, 'La Petite Fadette' (Sept. 11, 1869), was produced at the Opéra-Comique.

Besides his operas he composed songs for a piece called 'Constantinople' (1854); songs; a cantata (performed at the Opéra, Aug. 15, 1862); airs de ballet for 'Les Pirates de la SEMIBREVE (Fr. ronde; Ger. Taktnote, ganze Note, whence the American term whole note; Ital. semibreve): the half of a breve (whence its name) and equal to two minims. It is written , and its rest is , a block-stroke placed below a line of the staff (see NOTATION).

SEMICHORUS, i.e. Half-chorus; a word used to denote a kind of antiphonal effect produced by employing half the number of voices at certain points, and contrasting this smaller body of sound with the full chorus. M.

SEMICROMA (Lat. semichroma; Eng. quaver, or semiquaver), the Italian name for the semiquaver. Old writers, however, sometimes apply the term croma to the crotchet, and semicroma to the quaver. (See NOTATION, subsection LESSER NOTE VALUES; QUAVER.)

W. S. R.

SEMIFUSA, the Latin name for the semiquaver; but sometimes applied to the quaver also. (See NOTATION.) W. S. R.

SEMININIMA MAJOR and MINOR (Eng. greater and lesser half-minim=crotchet and quaver; Ital. croma e semicroma; Ger. Viertel und Achtel; French noire et croche). (See NOTATION, subsection LESSER NOTE VALUES.)

SEMIQUAVER (Fr. double croche; Ger. Sechzehntel, whence the American term Sixteenth note; Ital. semicroma, biscroma): the half of a quaver, and the sixteenth of a semibreve. It is written, when single , when joined . Its rest is  (see NOTATION).

SEMIRAMIDE (i.e. Semiramis, Empress of Nineveh); a favourite subject with Italian writers of operas. Libretti upon it were written by Moniglia, Apostolo Zeno and Silvani; and Clément's Dictionnaire lyrique contains a list of twenty-one operas composed to one or other of these by the masters of the 18th century. Voltaire's play on the same subject was adapted to music and set by Graun (Berlin, 1754) and Catel (1802). Rossini's version was written to a libretto by Rossi, and produced Venice, Feb. 3, 1823; King's Theatre, July 15, 1824; New York, Apr. 25, 1826; in French, as 'Semiramis,' Paris, July 9, 1860.—SEMIRAMIDE RICONOSCIUTA, words by Metastasio, was set by Vinci, Porpora, Cocchi, Sarti, Traetta, Meyerbeer and Gluck—the last of these at Vienna in 1748. SEMITONE (from the Greek ἡμιτόνιον). Half a tone; the smallest interval in the ordinary musical scales. The semitone may be of different kinds, each of which has a different theoretical magnitude.

Since the invention of the diatonic scale the natural interval of the fourth has been subdivided artificially into two tones and a semitone. In the ancient Greek time the two tones were both what are now called major tones, and the hemitone had a magnitude determined by the difference between their sum and the fourth; but when harmony began to prevail, one of the tones was diminished to a minor tone, and this gave the modern semitone a little greater value. The semitone, so formed, as belonging to the diatonic scale (from B to C, or from E to F, for example) is called a diatonic semitone.

The introduction of chromatic notes gave rise to a third kind of semitone, as from C to C \sharp or from G to G \flat ; this is called a chromatic semitone and has a less magnitude than the diatonic one.

Finally came the great simplification of music by dividing the octave into twelve equal intervals, each of which was called a mean semitone, thus abolishing practically the difference between the diatonic and the chromatic values. A semitone may now be considered, in practical use, as simply the interval between the sounds given by any two adjoining keys on a well-tuned piano.

The relations between the theoretical magnitudes of the different kinds of semitones are about as follows: If we represent the magnitude of a mean semitone by 25, the true magnitude of a diatonic semitone will be about 28; of a chromatic semitone about 18; and of the ancient Greek hemitone about 23. W. P.

SEMPlice, 'simple'; a direction denoting that the passage so marked is to be performed without any adornment or deviation from the time, used particularly in passages of which the character might possibly be misunderstood. The arietta which forms the subject of the variations in Beethoven's last PF. sonata, op. 111, is marked 'Adagio molto semplice cantabile.' Variants of the term, suggesting less formality, are 'semplicemente' and 'con semplicità.' M.

SEMPRE, 'always,' a word used in conjunction with some other mark of time or expression to signify that such mark is to remain in force until a new direction appears. Its purpose is to remind the performer of the directions which might otherwise be forgotten—as in the scherzo of the Eroica Symphony, where the direction Sempre pp. e staccato is repeated again and again throughout the movement. SENAILLÉ, JEAN BAPTISTE (b. Paris, Nov. 23, 1867; d. there, Oct. 15, 1730), a violinist of eminence, at one time member of the band of Louis XV., was born in the parish of Saint Germain l'Auxerrois, Paris. His father, Jean Senaillé, was one of the 24 violons du roi. He received his earliest violin instruction from Queversin, a member of the famous 'Vingt-quatre violons,' and during his period of study with this master assisted a maître d'élève named Bonnefons. His next teacher was Corelli's excellent pupil, Jean Baptiste Anet, generally known as Baptiste, whose teaching imbued him with such a longing to visit Italy that he travelled to Modena, where he became a pupil of Tommaso Antonio Vitali. According to the account of Senaillé given by Jacques Lacombe in his Dictionnaire portatif des beaux-arts (Paris, 1752), Anet's teaching enabled his pupil to surpass the Italian violinist; for on his arrival at Modena, during the time of the annual fair held in the month of May, the composer of the opera then being performed begged him to play in his orchestra, and on gaining his consent installed him with ceremony in a place prepared for him above the other members of the band. After the performance, he was presented to the Duke and Duchess of Modena: played several of his own sonatas before them and their guests with unqualified success, eventually receiving an appointment in the music of the court. In 1720 he settled in Paris, where the special recommendation of the Duchess of Modena, daughter of the Duc d'Orléans—at that time Regent of France—procured him a position in the court band. He performed frequently with great success in the Concert Spirituel from its foundation. A similar appointment was accorded him in the private band of Louis XV., and he held this until his death, when he was succeeded by Joseph Franceœur.

Senaillé ranked as one of the best performers of his time in France. His importation of the Italian methods of playing influenced the French school—at that time in its first state of development—almost as much as did Leclair. Through his two best pupils Guignon and Guillemain, his traditions were transmitted and preserved. His compositions show the influence of Corelli; they comprised five books of sonatas for violin alone, and were published in books of 10 sonatas in the following years: 1710, 1712, 1716, 1721, 1727. A selection of 13 sonatas by him appeared, taken from his violin works (Le Cône, Amsterdam), under the title 'Sonates de Senaillé ajustées pour les musettes et les vielles,' fol. s. d. (M. Pincherle's Collection, Paris). An aria of his for PF. and vln. is included in G. Jensen's 'Classische Violin-Musik,' Heft iii. A sarabande and allemanda (sonate à violon seul) is arranged by Alfred Moffat. A sonata in G edited by Alfred Moffat is in Simrock's 'Meister-Schule für Violine mit Begleitung des Pianoforte.' Alard includes Senaillé's Ninth Sonata in his 'Maîtres classiques de violon' (1862), and G. Jensen has arranged the same sonata for piano and violin, which is published in 'Classische Violin-Musik,' 1890. A composition by Senaillé is also to be found in E. M. E. Deldevez's 'Pièces diverses choisies' (Paris, Richault, 1858).

SÉNART, MAURICE (b. Jan. 29, 1878), music publisher, founded, in 1908, in partnership with Roudanez, a music-publishing business which set out to make the best classical works accessible to the public. In this a large edition was undertaken, under the artistic direction of Vincent d'Indy, of which each number cost only 25 centimes. Then came the vocal works edited by Henry Expert, and an anthology of popular songs.

In 1912 were published 'Maîtres contemporains de l'orgue' (8 vols.). This same year SÉNART was alone at the head of the firm, which was changed in 1920 into the Société anonyme des Éditions Maurice SÉNART, with its business address at 20 rue du Dragon. By his efforts since then, the publication of 'La Musique de chambre' has been carried on, a vast periodic collection of instrumental and vocal music, of which three-quarters are devoted to modern music and one-quarter to old music. From its foundation to Dec. 1925 the Société had published more than 5000 works or about 40,000 engraved pages.

SENESINO, FRANCESCO BERNARDI (b. Siena, c. 1680; d. circa 1750), one of the most famous of the sopranists who flourished in the 18th century. He derived his name from his native town. He received his musical education from Bernacchi, at Bologna. In 1719 he was singing at the court theatre of Saxony, and when Handel came to Dresden in quest of singers was engaged by him for London. His first appearance in this country (Nov. 1720) was in Bononcini's opera 'Astarte,' which at once established him in public favour. He sang next in a revival of Handel's 'Floridante,' and in the celebrated 'Muzio Scævola'; afterwards in Handel's 'Ottone,' 'Flavio' and 'Giulio Cesare' (1723), 'Tamerlano' (1724), 'Rodelinda' (1725), 'Scipio' and 'Alessandro' (1726), and in various operas and pasticcios by other composers. In 'Giulio Cesare' his declamation of the famous accompanied recitative 'Alma del gran Pompeo' created a special sensation. A writer in the London Magazine (Feb. 1733) relates an amusing anecdote of Senesino in this opera:

'When I was last at the opera of "Julius Caesar," a piece of the machinery tumbled down from the roof of the theatre upon the stage, just as Senesino had chanted forth these words "Cesare non seppe mai che sia timore" (Cesar never knew fear). The poor hero was so frightened that he trembled, lost his voice, and fell crying. Every tyrant or tyrannical minister is just such a Cesar as Senesino.'

'Alessandro' had a run of two months, and its last performance, advertised for June 7, was prevented by the sudden illness of Senesino, who, as soon as he was able to travel, set off for Italy, for the recovery of his health, promising to return the next winter. This promise, however, was not kept in time to enable the Opera-house to open before Christmas.

Senesino reappeared in Handel's 'Admeto,' early in 1727. This was followed in the same year by 'Riccardo Imo,' and in 1728 by 'Siroë' and 'Tolomeo,' in which a great effect was made by the echo song, 'Dite che fa,' sung by Cuzzoni, with many of the passages repeated behind the scenes by Senesino. But now, after several unprosperous seasons, the society called the Royal Academy was dissolved. Hawkins attributes to this time the quarrel which ended in a final rupture between Senesino and the great composer. But this is disproved by the fact that Senesino returned to sing for Handel in 1730. That there was, however, much discord in the company before it separated is true enough.

He rejoined the Haymarket company, under Handel's management, at a salary of 1400 guineas, and appeared on Feb. 2, 1731, in 'Poro,' then considered a great success. In the same year were revived 'Rodelinda' and 'Rinaldo.' 'Ezio' and 'Sosarme' were produced in 1732. Besides singing in all these, Senesino took part (May 2, 1732) in 'Esther,' Handel's first oratorio, described as 'a new species of exhibition at the Opera-house,' and on June 10, in a curious performance, under the composer's own direction, of 'Acis and Galatea.' Several airs and three choruses were interpolated on this occasion, from Handel's early Neapolitan serenata on the same subject, and the piece was sung partly in English and partly in Italian.

The last of Handel's operas in which Senesino appeared was 'Orlando' (Jan. 1733), but he took part later in the same season in 'Deborah,' described then as an opera, and performed (as was 'Esther') on opera nights. The long impending quarrel now came to a crisis. Accordingly, says Burney,

'the nobility and gentry opened a subscription for Italian operas at Lincoln's Inn Fields, inviting Porpora thither to compose and conduct, and engaging Senesino, Cuzzoni, Montagnana, Segatti, Bertolli, and afterwards Farinelli, to perform there.'

There Senesino remained till 1735, when he returned to Siena, with a fortune of £15,000, and built himself a house.

Senesino's voice was a mezzo-soprano, or, according to some, a contralto. Although limited in compass it was considered by many good judges to be superior in quality even to that of Farinelli. It was clear, penetrating and flexible, his intonation faultless, his shake perfect. Purity, simplicity and expressiveness were the characteristics of his style, while for the delivery of recitative 'he had not his fellow in Europe.'

In 1739 Senesino was living at Florence, and sang a duet with the Archduchess Maria Theresa there.

SENFF, BARTHOLOF (b. Friedrichshall, Coburg, Sept. 2, 1815; d. Badenweiler, June 25, 1900), an eminent German music-publisher. He founded the house which bears his name, in Leipzig, in 1850, and his catalogue contains original editions of Mendelssohn, Schumann, Brahms (opp. 5, 6, Gavotte by Gluck, 5 Studien für PF.), Gade, Hiller, Reinecke, Reitz, Rubinstein, and other masters, as well as the excellent educational works of Louis Köhler.

Senff was founder, editor and proprietor of the well-known musical periodical Signale für die musikalische Welt. (See PERIODICALS, MUSICAL.) G.

SENFL (SENFEL), LUDWIG (b. Zürich, end of 15th cent.; d. Munich, c. 1555). A volume of MS. songs in the Vienna library contains some verses, written and set to music by Senfl himself, describing his early enthusiasm for music, his education under Heinrich Isaac, and his gratitude to that master. At an early age he entered the court chapel of Maximilian I., ultimately succeeded Isaac as Kapellmeister, and held that office till the emperor's death (Jan. 1519), on which occasion he wrote music to the words 'Quis dabit oculis nostris fontem lacrimarum.' In 1520 he was at Augsburg, received a present of fifty gulden from Charles V. on Feb. 19, and in the following November personally edited the 'Liber selectarum cantionum,' one of the first music books printed in Germany. Thence he went to Munich, though in what capacity is uncertain. On one title-page (1526) he is called 'Musicus intonator,' on another (1534) 'Musicus primarius,' of the Duke of Bavaria, while in his own letters he subscribes himself simply 'Componist zu München.' In Forster's collection of Liedlein (preface dated Jan. 31, 1556) he is spoken of as 'L. S. seliger' (i.e. dead); and if the title 'musicus primarius' stands for Kapellmeister he must have died or retired some years before, since Ludwig Daser had held that office for some years when Lassus went to Munich in 1557.

The well-known letter from Luther to Senfl¹ is no evidence that the composer had worked specially for the Lutheran Church, though the existence of the correspondence has given rise to that idea. Indeed his connexion with the strictly Catholic court of Munich would, as Fétis points out, render it most improbable.² Four letters written by Senfl to the Margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg and to Georg Schultheis are printed in the A.M.Z. for Aug. 12, 1863.

A portrait engraved on a medal by Hagenauer of Augsburg, with the inscription 'Ludovicus Senfl,' and on the reverse 'Psallam deo meo quamdiu fuero 1529,' is in the collection of coins and medals at Vienna.

² Biographie des musiciens, vi. 44.

The state library at Munich contains the manuscript church service books begun by Isaac and completed by Senfl, as well as manuscript masses by the latter. These have been published in D.D.T. (second series) III. ii. The most important publications during his life are:

- (1) 'Quinque salutationes D. N. Hiesu Christi,' etc. (Norimbergae 1590).
- (2) 'Varia carminum genera, quibus tum Horatius, tum alii egregii poetae . . . harmonis composita' (Jd. 1534).
- (3) '121 neue Lieder' (Jd. 1534), with 81 nos. by L. S.
- (4) 'Magnificat octo tonorum,' s. 4, 5 (Jd. 1537).
- (5) '115 guter neuer Liedlein' (Jd. 1544), with 64 nos. by L. S.

Besides these Eitner¹ names above 100 separate pieces printed in various collections of the 16th century. (See Q.-L.) Nine sacred pieces (a 4) are given by Winterfeld in Der evangelische Kirchengesang (Leipzig, 1843), and five Lieder by Liliencron in Die historischen Volkslieder der Deutschen (Leipzig, 1865-69). SENNET—also written SENET, SENNATE, SYNNET, CYNET, SIGNET or SIGNATE—a word which occurs in stage-directions in the plays of the Elizabethan dramatists, and is used to denote that a particular fanfare is to be played. The name is probably derived from Seven, and may indicate a flourish of seven notes, as suggested in Stainer and Barrett's Dictionary of Musical Terms. It is a technical term, and what particular notes were played is now unknown. A Sennet was distinguished from a Flourish, as is proved by a stage-direction in Dekker's Satiromastix, 'Trumpets sound a florish, and then a sennate.' (Nares's Glossary.)

W. B. S.

SENZA, 'without'—as senza organo, 'without organ'; a direction of frequent occurrence throughout Handel's organ concertos; senza ripetizione, 'without repeat' (see REPEAT); senza tempo, 'without time,' which occurs in Schumann's Humoreske, op. 20, in the movement marked Precipitoso. The right hand is marked come senza tempo ('Wie ausser tempo,' in German), while the left remains in tempo. The same direction is employed at the end of Chopin's Nocturne, op. 9, No. 3. In the 'Sanctus' of Verdi's Requiem both the terms senza misura and senza tempo occur. M.

SEPTAVE, the compass of seven diatonic notes reckoned upward from the tonic or key-note. The term is occasionally employed by organ-builders. T. E.

SEPTET (Fr. septuor; Ger. Septett; Ital. septetto), a composition for seven instruments or voices.

Instrumental septets are comparatively few in number. As noted under SEXTET the addition of extra instruments to the quartet of strings tends to go beyond the domain of chamber-music. T. F. Dunhill in his treatise on Chamber Music notes the existence of a single work for strings alone, otherwise composers have looked to the possibilities of the variety afforded by the inclusion of pianoforte and wind instruments in the combination. Among such are Beethoven's op. 20 for violin, viola, violoncello, double-bass, clarinet, bassoon and horn; D'Indy and Schönberg have written for strings and wind; Ravel for strings, wind and harp; Hummel, Saint-Saëns and Spohr for pianoforte, strings and wind, and Onslow and Pijper for pianoforte, wind and double-bass. (See CHAMBER MUSIC.)

The vocal septet occurs in opera where the dramatic situation may allow for the ensemble of the protagonists. One will be found in the last act of Goetz's 'Taming of the Shrew.'

SEQUENCE, (a) the repetition of a definite group of notes or chords in different positions of the scale, like regular steps ascending or descending, as in the following outlines:

The device has been a favourite one with composers, from Corelli, Bach and Handel to Schumann, Brahms and Wagner. The reason is partly that it is so thoroughly intelligible without being commonplace. The mind is easily led from point to point by recognising each successive step after the first group of chords has been given, and is sufficiently interested by the slight amount of diversity which prevails at each repetition. It thus supplies a vital element of form in a manner which in some cases has certain advantages over simple exact repetition, especially when short phrases are repeated in juxtaposition. It was consequently made much use of by early composers of sonatas, and instrumental works of like nature, such as Corelli and his immediate successors; and in many cases examples make their appearance at analogous points in different movements, indicating the recognition of formal principles in their introduction. This occurs, for instance, near the beginning of the second half in the following movements from Corelli's Opera Quarta: Corrente and Allemanda of Sonata 1, Allemanda and Corrente of Sonata 2, Corrente of Sonata 3, Corrente and Giga of Sonata 4, Gavotte of Sonata 5, Allemanda and Giga of Sonata 6, and so forth. A large proportion of both ancient and modern sequences are diatonic; that is, the groups are repeated analogously in the same key series, without consideration of the real difference of quality in the intervals; so that major sevenths occasionally answer minor sevenths, and diminished fifths perfect fifths, and so forth; and it has long been considered allowable to introduce intervals and combinations, in those circumstances, which would otherwise have been held inadmissible. Thus a triad on the leading note would in ordinary circumstances be considered as a discord, and would be limited in progression accordingly; but if it occurred in a sequence, its limitations were freely obviated by the preponderant influence of the established form of motion. Such diatonic sequences, called also sometimes diatonic successions, are extremely familiar in Handel's works. A typical instance is a capriccio in G major, published in Pauer's 'Alte Meister,' which contains at least fifteen sequences, some of them unusually long ones, in four pages of allegro. The subject itself is a characteristic example of a sequence in a single part; it is as follows:

A kind of sequence which was early developed, but which is more characteristic of later music, is the modulatory sequence, sometimes also called chromatic. In this form accidentals are introduced, sometimes by following exactly the quality of the intervals where the diatonic series would not admit of them, and sometimes by purposely altering them to gain the step of modulation. This will be easily intelligible from the following example:

The usefulness of the device in such circumstances is, if anything, even more marked than it is in a single key, because of the greater breadth of range which it allows, and the closeness and cogency of the successive transitions which it renders possible. A compact and significant example to the point is the following from a fugue by Cherubini in C major:

Beethoven made very remarkable use of this device, especially in the great sonata in E \flat , op. 106, from which an example is quoted in the article MODULATION. The 'working out' portion of the first movement of the same sonata is an almost unbroken series of sequences of both orders; and the introduction to the final fugue is even more remarkable, both for the length of the sequence and the originality of its treatment. The first-mentioned, which is from the slow movement, is further remarkable as an example of a peculiar manipulation of the device by which composers have obtained very impressive results. This is the change of emphasis in the successive steps of which it is composed. For instance, if the characteristic group consists of three chords of equal length, and the time in which it occurs is a square one, it is clear that the chord which is emphatic in the first step will be weakest in the next, and vice versa. This form will be most easily understood from an outline example:

A passage at the beginning of the presto at the end of Beethoven's Leonora overture, No. 3, is a good example of a sequence of this kind in a single part. It begins in the following quotation at *:

(See ACCENT.)

The extension of the characteristic group of a sequence is almost unlimited, but it will be obvious at once that in harmonic sequences the shorter and simpler they are the more immediately they will be understood. In long-limbed sequences the hearer may soon perceive that there is a principle of order underlying what he hears, though its exact nature may always elude his apprehension, and in respect of the larger branches of form this is a decided advantage. Among short-limbed emphatic sequences in modern music, the one of eight steps which occurs towards the end of the first full portion of the overture to 'Die Meistersinger' is conspicuous, and it has the advantage of being slightly irregular. The long-limbed sequences are sometimes elaborately concealed, so that the underlying source of order in the progression can only with difficulty be unravelled. A remarkable example of a very complicated sequence of this kind is a passage in Schumann's fantasia in C major (op. 17), in the movement in E \flat , marked 'Moderato con energia,' beginning at the 58th bar. The passage is too long to quote, but the clue to the mystery may be extracted somewhat after this manner:

In order to see how this has been manipulated reference must be made to the original.

Another species of sequence is that in which a figure or melody is repeated a tone higher; this has been termed a ROSALIA (q.v.). Another, which is equally characteristic, is a repetition of a figure or passage a semitone higher; an example from the Eroica Symphony is quoted in Vol. III. p. 486 of this Dictionary.

The device has never been bound to rigid exactness, because it is easy to follow, and slight deviations seasonably introduced are often happy in effect. In fact, its virtue does not consist so much in the exactness of transposition as in the intelligibility of analogous repetitions. If the musical idea is sufficiently interesting to carry the attention with it, the sequence will perform its function adequately even if it be slightly irregular both in its harmonic steps and in its melodic features; and this happens to be the case both in the example from the slow movement of Beethoven's sonata in B \flat , and in the passage quoted from Schumann's fantasia. It is not so, however, with the crude harmonic successions which are more commonly met with; for they are like diagrams, and if they are not exact they are good for nothing. C. H. H. P.

(b) (Lat. Sequentia, Prosa.) A hymn of peculiar structure, which owes its name to its position in the Mass; it appears there as the continuation or sequence of the Gradual and Alleluia. It originally was a long jubilus or melody without words, attached to the a of the Alleluia. (See TROPE.) In the 9th century in France words were adapted to the notes, and these were called a 'Prose,' because they followed the lines of the music and not any scheme of metre. When these compositions had thus won a place for themselves, fresh ones came to be written in regular metre, and the old name Prose being unsuitable gave way to the new name Sequence. From the 12th century to the 15th century such compositions were most popular; and many of the most beautiful specimens we possess were written by the great hymnologists who flourished during these productive periods. Mediæval Office-Books contain innumerable sequences of striking originality; but at the last revision of the Roman liturgy, by direction of the Council of Trent, the greater number of these were expunged. Five, however, have been retained in the current missal; and these five occupy a very prominent position in the services in which they are incorporated, as well as in the history of ecclesiastical music.

(1) The sequence appointed for Easter Sunday is Victimæ paschali, the oldest now in use, and in reality a Prose, attributed to Wipo in the first half of the 11th century.

(2) The sequence for Whitsunday, Veni Sancte Spiritus, in rhymed triplets of Trochaic Dimeter Catalectic, has been attributed¹ to Innocent III. at the end of the 12th century; it is called by mediæval writers, The Golder Sequence.

(3) For the festival of Corpus Christi, S. Thomas Aquinas wrote the celebrated sequence, Lauda Sion, which is generally believed to date from about the year 1261.

(4) To Innocent III. is also attributed the Stabat Mater, sung since 1727 on the Feasts of the Seven Dolours of Our Lady (the Friday in Passion Week, and the third Sunday in September). The authorship, however, has not been certainly ascertained; and many are inclined to attribute it to Jacobus de Benedictis (Jacopone). (See STABAT MATER.)

(5) Even more celebrated than any of these is the Dies iræ written, during the latter half of the 12th century or beginning of the 13th century, by Thomas of Celano, and sung in the Requiem, or Mass for the Dead. In the triple stanzas of this wonderful poem the rhymed Latin of the Middle Ages attained its highest perfection; and, though the Stabat Mater is frequently said to be second only to it in beauty, the distance between the two is very great.

The plain-chant melodies of sequences differ from hymn melodies in their structure. The ancient jubilus was divided into sections, each of which is sung twice, and consequently a sequence melody properly consists of a series of phrases each of which is repeated. Similarly a sequence is a series of verses each dual in structure and consisting of strophe and anti-strophe. They may be represented by the formula aa' : bb' : cc', etc. In the early rhythmical proses a, b, c, etc., are usually unlike one another; in the later metrical proses for the most part the same scheme runs throughout the words though the music varies. The Dies iræ is irregular and does not conform to the usual type, because it was not originally a sequence at all. W. S. R.; revised W. H. F.

SERAFINO, SANTO (SANCTUS SERAPHIN), and GIORGIO (uncle and nephew), two celebrated violin-makers of Venice. The uncle, as his label informs us ('Sanctus Seraphin Utinensis fecit Venetiis'), was originally of Udine, a town in the Venetian territory towards the mountains of Carinthia, and probably of Jewish extraction. His nephew, if we may judge from the style of his instruments, worked with the uncle many years, and appears to have succeeded him in the business. The instruments of Santo Serafino occupy a middle place between the Italian and the Tyrolese school. As far as external appearance goes, the maker seems to vacillate between the model of Stainer and that of Nicolo Amati. But in the essential particulars of the art, in the selection of wood of the finest and most sonorous quality, in the proper calculation of the proportions, and the solidity and finish of the parts, he worked on the principles of the Cremona makers. Few equalled him as a workman. Those who wish to see how far mechanical perfection can be carried should examine his purfling with a magnifying glass. In Serafino's earlier years the Stainer character predominates in his instruments; in his later years he leaned to the Amati model. His instruments are famous for their perfect finish (reminding forcibly of the style of Stradivarius), their remarkably lustrous deep red varnish and fine mellow tone.

The period of Santo Serafino's activity extends from about 1678-1735. He worked in Udine for nearly twenty years, and during that time he employed an engraved label of large dimensions which runs: 'Sanctus Seraphinus Nicolai Amati Cremonensis Allumnus faciebat: Udine A. 16 .'. It is worthy of note that the dates on Serafino's labels are in accordance with the rest of his work, neatly written in, and not bungled, as is frequently the case with his contemporaries. The Venetian label quoted at the beginning of this article is larger than any label to be found in a Cremona instrument. The legend on Serafino's ticket is framed by a design composed on three sides of graceful curving strokes, while the upper side is formed of two fern leaves and elegant curves. On either side there are some rolls of music and a violin. Representations of this ticket are given by Laurent Grillet in his Ancêtres du violon and also in von Lutgendorf's Die Geigen- und Lautenmacher. One of the finest known examples of this maker's work was a violoncello lent to the South Kensington Special Loan Exhibition by its owner H. B. Heath in 1872.

Georgio Serafino followed his uncle's later model with such precision that it is difficult to find any point of difference. Like his uncle, he finished his instruments to a degree which amounts to a fault, depriving them, as it does, of character and individuality. Like his uncle, he used a large copper-plate label (nearly all the Italian makers used letterpress labels) bearing the inscription 'Georgius Seraphin Sancti nepos fecit Venetiis (1743).' Both makers branded their instruments at the tail-pin.

A superb violin of Santo Serafino which belonged to Barré and Bayly's collection realised £280, at a sale by auction in 1894, while a violoncello by the same maker, the property of James Goding, was sold in a like manner for £56: 14s. in 1857. According to Von Lutgendorf, George Seraphin was not Sanctus Seraphin's nephew but his grandson.

SERAGLIO, THE. (1) The English title of Mozart's ENTFÜHRUNG AUS DEM SERAIL (q.v.).

(2) An opera by Charles Dibdin under this title was produced at Covent Garden, Nov. 14, 1776. Dibdin being then in France, Dr. Arnold, composer to the theatre, had some share in the musical part of it, but it contains Dibdin's fine song 'Blow high, blow low' sung in the opera by Reinhold, and afterwards introduced by Bannister into Arne's opera 'Thomas and Sally.' The opera had very little success, but both libretto and music were published. Harris, the Covent Garden manager, altered the piece considerably for acting purposes. F. K.

SERAPHINE. The seraphine has already been referred to as a precursor of Debain's HARMONIUM (q.v.). It was an English free-reed instrument resembling the German Physarmonica, which latter was brought to England by the Schulz family in 1826. In 1828 a similar instrument, but named aeol-harmonica, was played by young Schulz at a Philharmonic Concert (Concertante for aeol-harmonica and two guitars, Apr. 28). In 1833, John Green, who had been Clementi's traveller, and had a shop in Soho Square, brought out the seraphine. Green engaged Samuel Wesley to give weekly performances upon the seraphine at his shop, and managed for some time to dispose of his instruments at 40 guineas each. But the seraphine was harsh and raspy in tone, and never found favour with sensitive musicians. The wind apparatus, similar to the organ, was a dead-weighted bellows giving a uniform pressure, and a swell was produced by opening a shutter of a box placed over the reeds.

In the year 1841 W. E. Evans invented the 'organo harmonica,' the improvements on the seraphine consisting of thin steel reeds artistically voiced, and coiled springs in the reservoir to enable the player to produce a rapid articulation with a small wind pressure, and to increase the power of tone as the reservoir filled. Eminent musicians publicly pronounced Evans' instrument more valuable than the seraphine as a substitute for the organ, but neither the one nor the other was capable of what is now known as 'dead expression.'

Patents for various improvements of the seraphine were taken out by Myers and Storer in 1839, by Storer alone in 1846 and by Mott in the same year. There is further reference to it in patents of Pape 1850, and Blackwell 1852. About the last-named date it was superseded by the harmonium. (See PLATE XV. No. 4.)

SERENADE (Fr. sérénade; Ger. Ständchen; Ital. serenata), evening song, from the Italian sera. Hence the word has been applied, indiscriminately, to many different kinds of music intended to be sung or played at night in the open air; and so generally has this connexion of ideas been accepted that, by common consent, the term 'serenade' has identified itself in many languages with the song sung by a lover standing beneath his mistress's window, or the concert of instrumental music substituted for it by an admirer with 'no voice for singing.'

To be true to nature, a serenade of this kind should be simple, melodious, sensuous in expression, and accompanied by some kind of instrument which the lover might carry in his hand. All these conditions are fulfilled in the most perfect example of the style that ever has been, or is ever likely to be, written—'Deh vieni alla finestra,' in 'Don Giovanni.' The melody of this is as artless as a folk-song, yet capable of breathing the very soul of voluptuous passion.

W. S. R.

If Mozart created the perfect type of vocal serenade in the song just mentioned, such things as his 'Hafner Serenade' have served as the model of the instrumental serenade, which, like the divertimento, is generally in a large number of short movements. The two serenade trios of Beethoven (opp. 8 and 25) are illustrious specimens of the forms in which each section is of the most concise structure and built upon melodic themes that are easily recognisable by the untutored ear. Two serenades by Brahms are among his earlier works; the first, op. 11, is for full orchestra, in D; and the second, op. 16, in A, has no violins. It does not appear that the German equivalent, Ständchen, has found much favour with the composer of instrumental serenades.

SERENATA (Fr. sérénade; Ger. Serenade; Ital. serenata). Though the terms serenata and serenade are generally regarded as interchangeable—so nearly synonymous that we have no choice but to give the one as the translated equivalent of the other—they mean, in musical language, two very different things.

The vocal serenata may be considered as a form of cantata, which may be either dramatic or imaginative, or even a simple ode on any subject not actually sacred. Handel applied the term to his Italian pastoral, 'Acis, Galatea, e Polifemo,' written at Naples in 1709; to the ode composed for the birthday of Anne of Denmark in 1712; and to the English pastoral 'Acis and Galatea,'¹ written at Cannons in 1720.

We must not omit mention of a serenata by Stradella in which two lovers, each with his orchestra in a coach, serenade a lady, a work which is famous because Handel appropriated a great deal of it in 'Israel.' It was republished as No. 3 of Chrysander's Supplemente to the edition of Handel.

The form of the instrumental serenata is much more clearly defined, and comprised within much narrower limits. It was very popular during the latter half of the 18th century; and, for some considerable time, occupied a position midway between those of the orchestral suite which preceded and the symphony which followed it. From the former it borrowed the multiplicity, and from the latter the colouring, of the long series of lightly developed movements of which it usually consisted. Neither the sequence nor the structure of these movements was subject to any very rigid law. Two forms, however, were considered so necessary that they may almost be described as indispensable—the march and the minuet. With the former almost every serenata of any consequence began or ended. The latter was almost always interposed between two allegros, or an allegro and an andante, or, indeed, between any two movements of any other kind; and used so freely that it frequently made its appearance several times in the course of a composition of importance. The gavotte and bourrée so freely used in the older suite were completely banished from the serenata. When wind instruments were alone employed, the composition was often called 'Harmoniemusik'; and this term was so generally received that music for wind instruments is popularly called 'Harmonie' in Germany to the present day. The term cassation was also frequently applied to works of this kind, whether written for the full orchestra or for wind instruments alone; and many pieces, not differing very much from these, were called divertimenti. Sometimes the number of instruments employed was very small, for the serenata was almost always intended for private performance, and it was a matter of necessity that it should accommodate itself to the resources of the particular establishment for which it was intended.

SERES, WILLIAM, an early music-printer associated with John Day and others, had a privilege for printing psalters, etc. He was working in 1548, and was one of the early members of the Stationers' Company, filling the offices of Warden and Master. His shop was 'at the signe of the Hedge Hogg.' One of his noteworthy works is Francis Seagar's 'Certayne Psalms select out of the Psalter of David, drawn into English metre with notes to every Psalm in iiij parts to Synge,' 1553.

SERMISY, CLAUDE DE (b. circa 1490; d. 1562), one of the group of French musicians connected with the Chapelle du Roi early in the 16th century.

Sermisy is first heard of in 1508,¹ when he was appointed 'clerc musicien' in the Sainte-Chapelle du Palais at Paris; his name appears in the Sainte-Chapelle registers as Claude de Sermisy. He was there for a short period, as before 1515 he became a 'chanteur' in the Chapelle de musique du Roi, at that time Louis XII. This post was equivalent to the English 'gentleman of the Chapel Royal,' and as a chanteur his name occurs in a list of the musicians who were present at the funeral of Louis XII. He eventually succeeded Antoine de Longueval as sous-maître of the Chapelle. In the accounts of payments to the various members of the Chapelle in 1533 there are some entries concerning Claude de Sermisy. As sous-maître he received the sum of 400 livres tournois (=2400 francs), his wages for the said year, and a sum of 1080 livres tournois (=6480 francs) for the feeding and maintenance of the children of the Chapelle Royale for the year, and another sum of 240 l.t. (=1440 francs) for care of the books belonging to the Chapelle and for the procuring of singing boys, 'pour envoyer quérir des chantes.' This shows his position as sous-maître to have been similar to that of the English master of the children of the Chapel Royal, who also received like payments, and fees for journeys made to 'press' children for the service of the Chapel.

On Sept. 20, 1533, Sermisy was made a canon of La Sainte-Chapelle, which gave him a residence and a large salary, and only imposed the obligation of officiating at certain ceremonies; he retained therefore his post of sous-maître, although he and Louis Hérault are mentioned as joint possessors of the office in 1547, when François I. died. They continued to hold it under Henri II. As a member of the Chapelle du Roi, Sermisy was present on three historical occasions, first at the meeting of François I. with Pope Leo X. at Bologna in 1515, when the French singers vied with the Papal Choir; then in 1520 when François I. and Henry VIII. met at the Field of Cloth of Gold, and again in 1532 when they met at Boulogne; on both occasions the English and the French musicians delighted their hearers with their performances.

A work published in 1554, the Rudiments de musique by Maximilien Guillaud, was dedicated to the 'excellent musicien Monsieur Maître Claude de Sermisy, maître de la Chapelle du Roy, et chanoine de la Sainte-Chapelle du Palais Royal à Paris; 15 Septembre, 1552.'

Sermisy probably resigned the post of sous-maître soon after this date, but retained his connexion with La Sainte-Chapelle until Aug. 16, 1561, his name then appearing for the last time on the rolls of the Chapter meetings.

Four partbooks containing 28 motets composed by Sermisy were published in 1542:

'Nova et prima motectorum editio 6, 5, 4, 3 et 2 vocum, Lib. 1, 2, 3, Paris.' Pierre Attaignant.

Claude de Sermisy, or Claudin as he is almost invariably called in music-books, shows an extraordinarily wide range as a composer; love songs, masses, motets were published in rapid succession, and retained their popularity for many years after his death, if one may judge by the number of reprints of his works.

Upwards of 200 of his chansons were included in the various collections of the period.

The set of song-books published by Pierre Attaignant in Paris, beginning in January 1529 with the 'Trente et huyt chansons musicales à quatre parties,' which were continued until 1535, contained ninety-two chansons by Claudin. The same publishers began a new series in 1538, 'Premier livre contenant xxv chansons nouvelles à quatre parties'; in this set, up to the 'vingtseptième livre' in 1548, there were thirty-five chansons by Claudin. About the same time Jacques Moderne in Lyons was publishing the various volumes of 'Le Parangon des chansons,' and in the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 7th, 9th and 10th volumes (1538-43), which were often reprinted, Claudin was represented by about twelve different songs. In Venice the 'Primo libro de le canzonni francese,' published by Scotto in 1535, included 'Faict ou failly' for four voices by Claudin. While at Anvers, Tylman Susato printed, in 1544, Claudin's 'O combien est malheureux,' in the 'Quatriesme livre des chansons à quatre parties.' In Paris, Attaignant's song-books were being replaced by Nicolas du Chemin's publications; the Premier, Second and the 'Quart livre du recueil contenant . . . chansons à quatre parties,' in 1551, contained altogether fifteen of Claudin's chansons. Shortly before his death, Adrian Le Roy and Robert Ballard of Paris, the widely-known 'imprimeurs du roy,' who published much of the music of the 16th century, produced the 'Livre de meslanges, contenant six vingtz chansons des plus rares . . . soit des auteurs antiques, soit des plus memorables de notre temps,' 1560, which contained Claudin's 'Peins et travail me faut' for six voices.

Claudin's claim to be a pupil of the great Josquin rests on a phrase in the preface to this volume: 'Josquin des Prez, hennuyer de nation, et ses disciples, Mouton, Claudin, Jaquet,' etc. The same publishers also issued in 1571 the 'Second recueil . . . de chansons à quatre parties,' in which were eight chansons by Claudin. There is one song in Granjon's 'Trophée, livre 2'; there are four in 'Il primo libro di madrigali d'Archadelt a tre voci' (Venetia, Gardano, 1559); another, 'On en dire ce qu'on,' in the 'Troisième livre delle Muse a tre voci' (Venice, Scotto, 1582), and three more in the 'Primo libro de canzonni francese a due voci' (Venice, Antonio Gardano, 1584).

In 1532 Attaignant issued seven volumes of masses by various composers. These included the following by Claudin for four voices :

- Liber I. Secunda est 'Philomena praevia.'
 " II. Secunda est 'Missa IX lectionum.'
 " III. Prima est 'Missa plurimum motetorum.'
 " IV. Secunda est 'Missa pro defunctis.'
 " VII. Prima est 'Domini est terra.'

In 1534 Attaignant published :

Missarum musicalium ad quatuor voces, pares, Liber II. 'Tota pulchra,' Claudin; 'Missa ad placitum,' Claudin; etc.
Liber III. 'Missa Dominus quis habitabit,' Claudin; Paris, 1540.

In 1556 Nicolas du Chemin published in Paris a great collection of masses, among them :

Missa cum quatuor vocibus. Ad imitationem moduli: 'Ab initio' condita. . . . auctore D. Claudio de Sermisy Regio Symphoniarum ordini praefecto et in regali parisiensis palatii sacello canonico.
Missa cum quatuor vocibus. Ad imitationem cantionis: 'Voulant l'honneur' condita, etc.
Missa cum quatuor vocibus paribus. Ad imitationem moduli: 'Tota pulchra' est condita, etc.
Missa cum quinque vocibus. Ad imitationem moduli: 'Quare fremuerunt gentes' condita, etc.

Three of the masses printed in 1532 were reissued :

Missae tres (Claudio de Sermisy Regii Sacelli magistro, praestantissimo musico auctore . . . cum quatuor vocibus . . . 'Novem lectionum' fol. 2; 'Philomena praevia' fol. 13; 'Domini est terra' fol. 23
 Lutetiae 1558 apud Adrianum Le Roy et Robt. Ballard, folio.

There was another edition in 1583. The same publishers in the 'Missae tres a Claudio de Sermisy, Joannes Maillard, Claudio Goudimel, cum quatuor vocibus conditae,' 1558, included Claudin's 'Missa plurimum modularum.' His motets were published in such collections as the 'Fior de motetti' (? 1526), the 'Motetti del fiore' (1532). Rhau's 'Tricinia' (1542) and Ochsenkuhn's 'Tabulatur Buch' (1558).

MS. copies of Claudin's music are to be found in different foreign libraries, in Rome, Berlin, Cambrai, Bologna, in the Dresden State Library, MS. 1270, No. 5, a 'Laudate Dominum' for six voices by Claudin; in the Munich State Library, MSS. 69, 92 and 132 contain motets and MSS. 202, 204, 205 and 207 various chansons—all were published in the 16th century.

Of modern reprints, Henry Expert's publication 'Les Maîtres musiciens' includes Attaignant's 'Trente et un chansons' (1529), of which eleven were composed by Claudin. Three chansons are in vol. 23 of the 'Publication alterer prakt. und theoret. Musikwerke,' Leipzig, 1899. Commer ('Coll. op. mus.' vol. xii.) reprints three, the melodies of which were used for 'Psalms lxxii., ciii. and cxxviii., in the 'Souter Liedekens,' Antwerp, 1540. Otto Kade in his book Die ältere Passionskomposition, Gütersloh, 1893, treats very fully of Claudin's Passion music, published by Attaignant in 1534. Further reprints are, Extraits des maîtres musiciens de la Renaissance (H. Expert, Paris) 4 chansons; Chansonniere du XIV^e siècle (Ch. Bordes, Paris) 2 chansons.

SEROV, ALEXANDER NICHOLAEVICH
 (b. St. Petersburg, Jan. 23, 1820; d. there, Feb. 1—Jan. 20, O.S.—1871), composer and critic, was the son of a government official, educated at the School of Jurisprudence, where he only made one intimate friend, Vladimir Stassov. destined afterwards to be his stoutest opponent in matters of art.

In his Reminiscences of the School of Jurisprudence Stassov has given an interesting account of Serov's student days. He left the institution with a decided hankering after an artistic career, but accepted a clerkship in a government office in obedience to his father's wish. He found, however, some leisure for musical pursuits, studied the violoncello and was busy with the project of composing an opera. From his correspondence with Stassov we gather that he cherished vague, ambitious plans which were hindered by lack of technical training and by the unsympathetic attitude of his father. In 1848 he was transferred from the capital to the dull provincial town of Simferopol, which proved fatal to his musical schemes. Nevertheless his determination to acquire further technical knowledge was unshaken. Through Stassov he obtained an introduction to the famous theorist Hunke, then living in St. Petersburg, who undertook to instruct him in counterpoint by correspondence. The method was not very successful, and Serov's progress was slow. It is evident that he was often tempted to throw up his official position for art's sake, but his father sternly discountenanced such a proceeding. Nevertheless, his feeling for music continued to assert itself, and as his ideas assumed more definite shape, he turned to criticism, which at that time was at a low ebb in Russia. His first articles in the Russian Contemporary in 1851 created something like a sensation, because he brought to bear upon his aesthetic criticism a highly cultivated intelligence, a distinctive style and an effective, if ponderous, irony. His early articles dealt with Mozart, Beethoven, Donizetti, Rossini, Meyerbeer and Spontini, and in discussing the last named he explained and defended the historical ideal of the music-drama. Considering that at this time Serov was practically ignorant of Wagner's works, the conclusions which he draws do credit to his reflection and foresight. His writings have now lost much of their value because of their polemical character. With one hand Serov pointed to the great musical movement in Western Europe; with the other he sought to blind the eyes of Russian society to the awakening which was taking place within.

It was not until after his visit to Germany in 1858, from which—in his own words—he returned 'Wagner mad,' that he took up a distinctly hostile attitude to the New Russian School which was striving to express in music the spirit of the race. Then followed that long polemic between Serov and Stassov which was only a side episode in that greater conflict between Western and Slavophil. In spite of great popular authority, Serov's position in 1860 was in many respects an isolated and unenviable one. There was neither place nor need for an ardent Wagnerian propaganda in Russia. Between his ungenerous depreciation of the new school and his lukewarm attitude towards Rubinstein, Serov's influence began to wane. Serov had passed his fortieth year before he set to work upon his first opera, 'Judith.' With extraordinary energy and determination he surmounted all technical difficulties, and completed his opera in the spring of 1862. In Mar. 1863 Wagner visited St. Petersburg, and Serov submitted to him the score of 'Judith.' Wagner more particularly praised the orchestration, in which he cannot have failed to see the reflection of his own influence. 'Judith' was produced in the course of the season 1863-64, on a scale of magnificence hitherto unknown in the production of national opera, and immediately took the public by storm. The subject was well adapted to Serov's opulent and sensational manner. In general style the work recalls the early Wagnerian operas, with some curious reminiscences of Meyerbeer. As regards picturesque effect, 'Judith' is admirable, although the dramatic colour is occasionally coarse and flashy. The many technical defects were easily overlooked by the public in an opera which made so direct an appeal to their sensuous enjoyment. Serov's long apprenticeship to musical criticism taught him what was attractive and practicable for the stage, just as he had acquired from the study of Wagner a considerable power of effective orchestration. 'Judith' fascinated not only the uncritical public, but many of the young musical generation, including Tchaikovsky, who refers to it as one of his 'first loves' in music.

Serov lost no time in following up his first success, and 'Rogneda' was completed and performed in the autumn of 1865. Its success was unprecedented. In 'Rogneda' Serov almost discards the Wagnerian influence for that of Meyerbeer. We look in vain in this work for the higher purpose, the effort at psychological delineation and comparative solidity of execution which are occasional features of 'Judith.' Tchaikovsky writes:

'Serov knew how to catch the crowd, and if this opera suffers from poverty of melodic inspiration, want of organic sequence, weak recitative and declamation, and from harmony and instrumentation that are purely decorative—yet what sensational effects the composer succeeds in piling up! . . . The whole thing literally crackles with them. Serov had only a mediocre gift, united to great experience, remarkable intellect and extensive erudition; therefore it is not astonishing to find in 'Rogneda' numbers—rare ones in a desert—in which the music is excellent.'

Tchaikovsky stood somewhat apart from the heated conflict with national tendencies in which Serov was constantly involved, therefore his judgment may be accepted as less biased than that of the majority of his contemporaries. After the triumph of 'Rogneda' Serov rested awhile upon his laurels. The balm of success seems to have done something to soften his hostility to the national school, for the lectures on Glinka and Dargomijsky which he delivered before the Russian Musical Society in 1866 are valuable not only for clearness of exposition, but for fairness of judgment.

For the subject of his third opera Serov turned to contemporary national life as depicted in Ostrovsky's strong, but somewhat sordid, play 'The Power of Evil.' His correspondence reveals his intentions with regard to this work. 'Ten years ago,' he says,

'I wrote much about Wagner. Now it is time to act. To embody the Wagnerian theories in a music-drama written in Russian on a Russian subject. . . . In this work, besides observing as far as possible the principles of dramatic truth, I aim at keeping more closely than has yet been done to the forms of Russian popular music as preserved in our folk-songs.'

He is seeking in fact to fuse the methods of Glinka with those of Wagner, and produce a Russian music-drama. Serov was a connoisseur of Russian folk-songs, but he had not the genius of Glinka; moreover, with all his knowledge of the popular music he was never penetrated by the national spirit as was his great predecessor. In creating this Russo-Wagnerian work Serov created something purely artificial: a hybrid which could bring forth nothing in its turn. The work never attained the popularity of 'Judith' and 'Rogneda.'

Serov died of heart disease in 1871. The orchestration of 'The Power of Evil' was completed by one of his most talented pupils, Soloviev. At the time of his death he was busy with a fourth opera based upon Gogol's 'Christmas Eve Revels,' but this work did not progress beyond a first sketch, from which his widow afterwards arranged an orchestral suite, published in 1877. Other compositions, all belonging to his later years, are: Stabat Mater, Ave Maria, incidental music to 'Nero' (1869), 'A Christmas Song' and two or three orchestral works, including a 'Gopak' and 'Dance of the Zaporogne Cossacks.' Serov married Valentina Semenovna Bergman, a talented pupil of the St. Petersburg Conservatoire, and the composer of several operas, one of which, 'Uriel Acosta' (Moscow, 1885), brought her some success. She was also a constant contributor to the reviews, and in later years devoted her energies to the popularising of music among the masses. R. N.

ment forming the natural bass of the ancient cornet family, played with a cupped mouth-piece similar to that of the bass trombone. (See PLATE LXXIV. No. 6.) It consisted of a wooden tube about 8 feet long, increasing conically from $\frac{1}{2}$ of an inch in diameter at the mouthpiece to 4 inches at the open end. The name is obviously derived from the curved form into which the tube was contorted. There were six holes on the front of the instrument, to be stopped by the three middle fingers of either hand; those for the left hand on the third descending branch; those for the right on the fourth ascending branch towards the bell. The holes were set in groups of three, within reach of the outstretched fingers.

The serpent consisted of three parts: (1) the mouthpiece, (2) the crook, or curved brass tube leading into (3) the wooden body, which is built up of several pieces held together by a leathern covering. The whole of the instrument was, however, sometimes made of brass or copper. It is usually said to have been invented by a canon of Auxerre, named Edmé Guillaume, in 1590. However that may be, there can be no doubt that about this period clerical musicians employed bass reed and brass instruments for the accompaniment of ecclesiastical plain-song. Indeed Mersenne, who gives a remarkably good and complete account of the serpent, notices that 'even when played by a boy it is sufficient to support the voices of twenty robust monks.' The 'Serpent d'Eglise' was a recognised functionary in French churches, and for many years the instrument was an indispensable member of the primitive orchestras which accompanied the singing in rural churches in England.

The scale of the serpent was capricious, and indeed fortuitous. Mersenne gives it a compass of seventeen diatonic notes from 8-foot D upwards, and intimates that the intervening chromatics can be obtained by half-stopping. He does not name the device of cross-fingering so largely employed on the bassoon. Berlioz, who speaks slightly of it, states that it is in B \flat , and that parts for it 'must be written a whole tone above the real sound.' Old parts, however, used in England were invariably in C.

The serpent produced the usual harmonic series of notes. These in Mersenne's work seem limited to the fundamental, its octave and twelfth. There would be no difficulty in obtaining a far larger compass. Lichtenthal,¹ who, as an Italian, highly values the serpent, gives its compass as no less than four full octaves from the Do bassissimo, which 'does not exist on the pianoforte (1826), but on the pedal of the organ of 16 feet,' up to the Do of the violin on the third space. He states, moreover, that the lowest sound of Do can only be used from time to time, 'avendo bisogno di una particolare buona imboccatura'—requiring a specially good lip. As the fundamental note, pedal, or lowest proper tone of the serpent was the 8-foot C, just as it is on the trombone, euphonium, or ophicleide in C, the statement of Lichtenthal can only be explained by admitting that certain players, by a peculiarly loose embouchure, could produce notes of a forced or constrained pitch one octave lower than due to the length of tube. The compass given in the scales and tutors is three octaves from C to c', with a possible extension downwards, by slackening the lips, to B, and B \flat .

It will be seen from the plate that one hand being applied to an ascending, and the other to a descending branch, the usual sequence of fingering is inverted in the two hands; the scale proceeding downwards in the left and upwards in the right. The serpent is probably the only instrument exhibiting so quaint and unscientific a device. This fact, and the different lengths of sounding-tube intervening between the holes, indicate the great imperfection of the instrument mechanically considered, and point to the conclusion that a good player must have relied more on his dexterity and on the strength of his embouchure, as mentioned above, than on the resources of the instrument itself. Later makers, however, added a multiplicity of keys, both above and below, which only complicated without facilitating performance. A part for it is to be found in the score of Mendelssohn's overtures 'The Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage' and 'St. Paul,' in the overtures to 'Masaniello,' 'The Siege of Corinth' (between the second and third trombones), and 'Rienzi.' It is also found in the score of 'I Vespri siciliani.' It is usually replaced in performance by the tuba. A Yorkshirer of Richmond, named Hurworth, who played in the private band of George III., could execute elaborate flute variations with perfect accuracy on this unwieldy instrument.

A Method for the Serpent, containing studies and duets, was published by Cocks. The only concerted music set down to it seems to have been originally intended for the bassoon.

A 'contra-serpent' was shown in the Exhibition of 1851, made by Jordan of Liverpool. It was in E \flat of the 16-foot octave. It was, however, too unwieldy to be carried by the player, and required independent support. Another modification of this instrument was invented by Beacham and played on by Prospère in Jullien's orchestra. It was named the serpentcleide, and was essentially an ophicleide with a body of wood instead of brass.

was a pupil of Ambroise Thomas at the Conservatoire, and took the Grand Prix de Rome in 1871 for a cantata ('Jeanne d'Arc') of great promise. On his return from Italy, despairing of acceptance at the Opéra-Comique, he closed with the Bouffes Parisiens, and produced 'La Branche cassée' (three acts, Jan. 23, 1874), with a success which induced him to go on composing works of the same slight character. The following is a list of his theatrical works:

'Le Manoir du pte tordu' (May 28, 1875); 'Le Moulin du vert galant' (Apr. 12, 1876); 'La Petite Muette' (Oct. 3, 1877), all in three acts and given in Paris; 'Le Nûls de St. Gormain' (Mar. 1880) in Brussels; 'Madame le Diabla', 'Fanfreuche' (1882, 1883); 'Le Château de Tire-larigot' (1884); 'Cendrillonette' (1890); 'La Demoiselle du téléphone' (1891); 'Cousin-Cousine' (1895); 'La Dot de Brigitte' (1898); 'Le Capitole, an opéra-comique' (1895); 'Le Carnet du diable,' a fantastic piece (1895); 'Le Carillon' (1898); 'Le Royaume des femmes,' an opérette (1896); 'Shakespeare,' an opéra-bouffe (1899).

SERRES, MARIE FRANÇOIS LOUIS ARNAL DE (b. Lyons, Rhône, Oct. 8, 1864), French composer, entered the Paris Conservatoire in 1884 and joined the organ class of César Franck, becoming his private pupil from 1885-90. He studied harmony in the class of Taudou (1st 'accessit' 1888). He is one of the most active colleagues of Ch. Bordes and V. d'Indy at the Schola, was professor there from 1900 (chamber music, lyric declamation choir-class, general inspector of studies), and organist of the Paris Irish Chapel (St. Joseph). He has composed orchestral music: 'Les Caresses,' performed at the Société Nationale, 'Les Heures claires' (voice and orchestra). His choral music, sacred and secular ('Nuit d'été,' 'Le Jour des morts,' motets, French and Latin, 'Ave verum,' etc.), is of special interest. His songs ('Toi,' 'Sub urbe,' 'L'Éveil de Pâques,' 'Le Jardin clos,' 6 poems, etc.) are characteristic of the tradition of Duparc and Chausson. De Serres's delicate and expressive manner of writing was much appreciated by César Franck.

SERVAIS, (1) ADRIEN FRANÇOIS (b. Hal, near Brussels, June 6, 1807; d. there, Nov. 26, 1866), a great violoncellist, became a pupil of Platel in the Brussels Conservatoire, where he rapidly rose to the first rank. On the advice of Fétis he went to Paris, where his success was great. In 1835 he visited England, and on May 25 played a concerto of his own at the Philharmonic concert, where he was announced as 'principal violoncello to the King of the Belgians.' He then returned home, and wisely resolved to study for a year, and it was during this period that he formed the style by which he was afterwards known. In 1836 he reappeared in Paris, and the next dozen years were occupied in a series of long tours through Germany, Holland, Austria, Norway, Russia, and even Siberia. In 1842 he married in St. Petersburg. In 1848 he settled in Brussels as professor in the Conservatoire, and formed many distinguished pupils. He died of an illness contracted during his third visit to St. Petersburg. His works comprise three concertos and sixteen fantasies for violoncello and orchestra; six études for violoncello and P.F.—with Grégoir; fourteen duos for ditto; three duets for violin and violoncello—with Léonard; one duet for ditto—with Vieuxtemps. A biography of Servais was published at Hal by Vanderbroeck Desmeth, 1866. Interesting reminiscences of him are published in the Guide musical of June 2, 1907, a propos of the centenary of his birth.

His eldest son, (2) JOSEPH (b. Hal, Nov. 28, 1850; d. there, Aug. 29, 1885), succeeded his father in June 1872 as professor of the violoncello at the Brussels Conservatoire. He appeared first at Warsaw with his father, and the pair excited the greatest enthusiasm. In 1868 he was appointed solo violoncellist at Weimar and remained two years. In 1875 he played for the first time in Paris at one of Pasdeloup's Popular Concerts, when some of the journals spoke in terms of extravagant praise of his performance. The instrument used by both father and son was a fine Stradivarius presented by the Princess Yousouff. A second son, (3) FRANÇOIS MATTHIEU (d. near Paris, Jan. 14, 1901), a successful pianist and composer, was a pupil in the same Conservatoire. His opera 'Jon' was produced at Carlsruhe, 1899. SERVICE. This word is used in the English language with a great variety of meaning. It has a special use for church musicians in reference to the free and somewhat elaborate musical settings of the canticles and certain other details contained in the Book of Common Prayer. Among its many meanings the word 'service' is defined in the New English Dictionary as signifying the action of serving a master; hence it is employed with a religious significance to describe the celebration of public worship in a general way as 'Divine Service'; in a more limited sense it denotes a ritual or series of words and ceremonies prescribed for public worship, often coupled with a defining word, such as marriage-service, burial-service, etc. It is but one step further to the special meaning already mentioned with which it is used by musicians.

These musical settings are to be grouped under three main headings: (a) The Office for the Holy Communion; (b) Morning Prayer; (c) Evening Prayer. The portions of the Communion Office that may be set to music are the Kyrie, the Creed, the Sanctus and the Gloria in excelsis. The Benedictus and Agnus Dei have no place in the Book of Common Prayer,¹ but since the middle of the 19th century they have come into such general use that composers now commonly include them in their 'Communion Services.' There are five canticles in the Morning Service of the Prayer Book which may be set to music: Venite, Te Deum, Benedictus, with the alternatives Benedicite and Subilate. The evening canticles are Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, with the alternatives, Cantate Domino and Deus misereatur. Church musicians employ the term 'Service' for a musical setting of any of the three groups, and there are many examples of these compositions which are limited to a single one of them; a few settings include both alternatives among the canticles, but it has been a very general practice to deal with all three groups as a single composition, usually styled a 'Full Service,' and in such instances it is conventional to write all the several numbers in the same key. It has become the custom to refer to a service not only by the name of the composer but also by the key in which it is written; thus, for example, 'Stanford in B flat' is understood to comprise his setting in B flat of the canticles for Morning and Evening Prayer as well as the music for the Communion Office. 'Walmisley in D minor' is an example of an Evening Service alone, and 'Boyce in C' is a setting of the morning canticles alone. There are also numerous settings of the Communion Service which have no Morning or Evening Service connected with them.

In considering the history and development of the service it will be convenient to discuss the settings of the Communion Office first. It is not proposed here to deal with the musical settings of the Latin Mass. (See MASS.) Even before the appearance of the First Prayer Book of Edward VI. the Mass was being celebrated with English words in the place of Latin, and English versions of the Office are to be found, for example, in Marshall's Primer of 1535, Hilsey's Primer of 1539 and Henry VIII.'s Primer of 1545. But attention has been drawn² to the fact that complete musical settings of these English versions of the Holy Communion Office were written for practical use at much the same date. Some of these were adaptations; thus two of Taverner's masses, 'Sine Nomine' and 'Small Devotion,' are to be found adapted to English words in the Bodleian MSS. Mus. Sch. E420-422; the importance of this discovery is enhanced by the possibility, subsequently suggested by Dom Anselm of Pershore, that these partbooks are in Taverner's autograph. This same set of books contains ten more complete English Communion Services set to original music by various composers, although their names are not recorded in the MSS., and all these settings included the Gloria in excelsis, Creed, Sanctus, Benedictus and Agnus Dei. One of these Communion Services was the work of John Heath, and was subsequently printed by John Day in 1560 in his 'Certaine Notes set forth in foure and three parts to be song at the morning, Communion, and evening praiser.' But in the interval the progress of religious controversy had led to the exclusion of the Benedictus and Agnus Dei, so that Heath's settings of these were omitted by Day.

In the meanwhile many notable composers set themselves to provide music for the newly authorised Book of Common Prayer, and in dealing with the Communion Office they confined themselves to settings of the Kyrie, as a response to the Commandments, and the Nicene Creed, in accordance with the later usage of Elizabeth's reign. The Benedictus, Agnus Dei and Gloria in excelsis were entirely dropped, and few, if any, genuine settings of the Sanctus are to be found in the works of the Elizabethan composers. The Sanctus in Gibbons's service is certainly spurious, and so, almost equally certainly, is that sometimes attached to Byrd's 'short' service. Byrd's 'short' service and 'great' service alike include only the Kyrie and Creed. The music of the Communion Office continued to be thus limited until the Restoration period, when it again became customary to sing the Sanctus in connexion with the 'ante-Communion' Service which customarily followed Morning Prayer at that date every Sunday. It is interesting, however, to note that in three or four cathedrals, among them Durham and Exeter, the full Communion Service was celebrated chorally once a month, with scarcely any interruption through the three centuries that succeeded the Reformation. An example of a complete Communion Service, written in the 18th century, is that of Kempton of Ely; it is a very feeble composition, but considerable historical interest is attached to it.

No further change took place until the middle of the 19th century, when, as one of the effects of the 'Oxford movement,' choral celebration of the Holy Communion came into general vogue; this led to an immediate demand for music for the Gloria in excelsis in addition to the Kyrie, Creed and Sanctus; and at a rather later date the Benedictus and Agnus Dei were also re-introduced. Thus a full modern Communion Service will usually contain a Kyrie (either the nine-fold Greek Kyrie, or the Response to the Commandments, or both), Creed, Sanctus, Gloria in excelsis, Benedictus and Agnus Dei. In some instances composers have also added to their Communion Services special introits, settings of the Offertory sentences, elaborate Amens and other minor features.

The disestablishment of the daily choral celebration of the Mass in the English cathedrals and collegiate churches, which was one of the features of the Reformation movement, led immediately to the establishment of the elaborate choral performances of Morning and Evening Prayer which have formed such a distinctive feature of English church music during the past four centuries. It seems to have been clearly felt that the great traditions of the famous choirs must be maintained, and that if the daily singing of the Mass was proscribed it behoved them to perform the substituted services with all the dignity that the best music and the best singing could lend to them. Thus, as soon as the Book of Common Prayer came into use, and even rather earlier, a demand was created for musical settings of the canticles and for English anthems (see ANTHEM), as well as for harmonised adaptations of the old plain-song for the litany preces and responses and for chants for the Psalms, the prayers being chanted or invariably 'intoned' by the Priest. The Bodleian MSS. Mus. Sch. E 420-422 contain several settings of the morning and evening canticles in English, some of which are at least as early as the Prayer Book. A new musical tradition was thus constructed on the old foundations, and this has not only provided the means of a continuous expression of dignified worship day by day in our great cathedral churches, but also has proved of incalculable value to the growth and prosperity of English music as a whole, seeing that the large majority of notable English musicians since the Reformation received their earliest training as choristers; Henry Purcell provides a conspicuous illustration of this truth. But whereas the music of the Mass formed the basis of the music of the English Communion Service as regards both form and style, there was little to serve as a model for setting the English canticles of Morning and Evening Prayer. It is probable that the pioneers looked to the Latin settings of Te Deum and Magnificat for guidance, but the needs of the cathedrals called for something of a simple character, and, in addition, the suggestion was made by Cranmer that in setting the canticles 'the song should not be full of notes, but, as near as may be, for every syllable a note so that it may be sung distinctly and devoutly.'¹ This led to the straightforward type of setting which the Elizabethan composers styled the 'short' service. But in spite of injunctions and orders the composers could not be entirely restrained, and many of them wrote more elaborate settings which they described as 'great,' or sometimes 'high' services. In these 'great' services verbal phrases were frequently repeated and much ingenuity was shown in contrapuntal device. Far the finest of all the 'great' services is that of Byrd; Tallis also wrote a service on these lines, but only fragments have survived and its value cannot be judged from these. The practice of composing 'great' services continued into the 17th century. It should be mentioned that a feature which uniformly characterises the settings of the service, from the time of the Reformation to the present date, is the antiphonal treatment by which sections of the music are allotted alternately to the two sides of the choir, the sides being denoted Decani (that of the Dean) and Cantoris (that of the Precentor).

The Elizabethan musicians usually set Venite in similar style to the other canticles, but the custom of singing Venite to a chant in the daily cathedral usage has long superseded this form. The Elizabethans almost invariably set Benedictus rather than the alternative Jubilate which was inserted in the second Prayer Book in 1552 as a concession to Puritan demands. Early examples of settings of Jubilate are those of John FARFANT in D minor and GIBBONS in D minor (Gibbons's more elaborate service). After the Restoration Jubilate was set in preference to Benedictus in a very large majority of services. In the present century Benedictus is commonly preferred, but Jubilate cannot be entirely banished from the daily cathedral lists without also consigning many excellent settings of Te Deum to unmerited neglect. The Benedicite has seldom been set in 'service' form at any period.

The two evening canticles are Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis. In 1552 the psalms Cantate Domino and Deus misereatur were introduced as alternatives for the same reason as Jubilate. No settings of these alternative canticles are found much before the Restoration period, but from that time until the close of the 19th century there are many examples. Child, Blow, Purcell and Croft are among the earliest composers who wrote settings of Cantate Domino and Deus misereatur.

It remains to discuss briefly the development of the service during the past four centuries. The Edwardine examples in the Bodleian Library have already been mentioned. These are of a very simple and mainly homophonic character, and must be regarded for the most part as experiments rather than as suitable for modern use. Tye and Tallis are among the great pioneers of the service; Tallis's 'short' service is still in constant use; it shows a decided advance upon the earlier works of the kind, especially as regards the thematic material; it is almost entirely homophonic and conforms to Cranmer's view. It was left to Byrd to raise the service to that degree of excellence that enables it to appeal to modern ears as a thing of beauty quite apart from any feeling of antiquarian interest; his 'short' service is remarkable for its subtlety in the treatment of the verbal rhythm as well as for its melodic beauty and the balance of the phrasing. Byrd's 'great' service stands as the finest of all English services: the several sections are treated with much elaboration and rare contrapuntal skill, the salient features of each canticle being brought into prominence by special devices. The Gloria Patri to the Nunc Dimittis of this service is of unrivalled dignity and beauty. Two other Evening Services by Byrd have survived. Of these his 'Second Service with verses to the organs' represents an important development in service-form; it is the earliest service, as far as is known, in which there are passages for a solo voice with an independent organ accompaniment. Morley wrote an elaborate service with 'verses' and independent organ accompaniment, but the most important service-writers of this school after Byrd were Weelkes and Tomkins. Weelkes wrote as many as 10 settings of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, and to 6 of these there is a corresponding Morning Service. Unfortunately of only one of these has sufficient text survived to make satisfactory reconstruction practicable; the missing alto part in the 4-part service can easily be supplied, but this is the least interesting of Weelkes's services. All the others are for 'verse' and chorus, and some exhibit much originality in structure, notably that 5-part service which is described in the manuscripts as 'for two trebles.' In this service each verse of the words is given alternately to solo voices with independent accompaniment and to 5-part chorus; this device is even followed in the Gloria. One of Weelkes's services is 'of seven parts.' Another is described as 'Mr. Weelkes's in medio chori'; the exact meaning of this term, which is to be found in connexion with more than one service in Batten's organ-book (Tenbury MS. 791), has not been satisfactorily explained. Tomkins wrote 5 settings of the Morning and 7 of the Evening Service. The first two, which include Venite, Kyrie and Creed together with the morning and evening canticles, are unaccompanied settings, of the 'short' service type, in four parts. The third service includes Te Deum, Jubilate, Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis; it is mainly in 5 parts, but there are sections in 7, 8 and 9 parts. This service is of an elaborate character, but can be sung unaccompanied. The 4th service is styled a 'great' service, and is also elaborate, but the organ part forms an indispensable part of the composition. The evening canticles of this service are laid out in alternate sections of solo and 5-part chorus, much like Weelkes's service 'for two trebles.' Tomkins's 5th service is less elaborated, but contains passages for bass solo together with other verse sections alternating with 4-part choral writing. There are two evening services by Tomkins in Batten's organ-book (Tenbury MS. 791) which were not published in Musica Deo sacra.

Orlando Gibbons's services are of special interest; his 'short' service in F is far less homophonic than those of Byrd and Tallis, for the four voices rarely coincide in singing the words. Yet there is little repetition of the words. The Gloria of the Nunc Dimittis is in canon, but it is very smooth and melodious, especially in the concluding phrases. His second service is extended in form like a 'great' service, but, like that of Tomkins, it differs from the 'great' service of Byrd in having an independent organ part and many solo and 'verse' passages. The form of the Jubilate in this service is like that of Weelkes's 'for two trebles,' in that alternate sections are for solo and chorus. Among other service-writers of this school were the Farrants, the Mundy's, Adrian Batten and Nathaniel Giles.

The services of these Elizabethan and Jacobean composers have been discussed here at some length because it is important to emphasise the originality as well as the sterling merit of their work in the light of what followed. For, strange to say, in a period of nearly 200 years that followed, the service, instead of advancing in interest and developing in form, stood absolutely still and in many respects deteriorated. None of the experiments of Byrd, Weelkes or Gibbons as regards form were followed up; the 'great' services were neglected, and almost exclusively the 'short' service became the accepted model. Benjamin Rogers and Child in the mid-17th century followed the design of the 'short' service exclusively; moreover, their work is conventional and lacks the inspiration and interest which characterises that of their predecessors.

What is more surprising is that the composers of the Restoration school did nothing of any real value for the service. This was the period in which the development of the anthem was very pronounced, especially as regards accompaniment. But the services even of Blow and Purcell show no similar advance; they can be sung without accompaniment and are designed on the 'short' service model. Purcell's big Te Deum in D does not, of course, belong to this class of work at all (see CECILIA, sub-section CECILIAN CELEBRATIONS); it was never intended for daily cathedral use. Neither Croft nor Aldrich, nor any other of this school of composers, added anything to the service. During the 18th century the standard of achievement sank lower and lower, and the services of that date are, with scarcely any exception, entirely lacking in subtlety of verbal expression and accentuation. King's services were absolutely commonplace, Travers in his more florid style was little better, whereas the work of Kent and Nares is of the feeblest character. The services of Boyce are slightly more robust, but are much inferior to his best anthems, and the close of the century brought with it the bombastic and vulgar style of which Cooke's service in G is typical. The close of the 18th century saw the turn of the tide. Attwood and the elder Wesley were among those who first pointed to better things, but it was T. A. Walmisley and Sebastian Wesley who really set up a new standard and laid the foundation of the modern service; and the most important feature of their work was the use they made of the organ, not merely for the reinforcement and duplication of the vocal parts, but as being able to contribute something of an independent nature to the composition which could not be supplied by the voices alone. A mere glance at the scores of Walmisley in D minor and Wesley in E will suffice to prove the value as well as the originality of these two composers in this particular field of work.

Little further need be said; once the possibilities had been discovered of using the organ for this type of accompaniment, the flood-gates were opened, for not only was there far greater scope for the composers' imagination, but fresh and almost endless variety of device was immediately made available; it followed also in the natural course of things that services should be written for special occasions with full orchestral accompaniment. The new features were necessarily abused by many composers, but the cathedral repertory of services has been much enriched since the days of Walmisley and Wesley; and standing first among a distinguished group of modern service-writers is Charles Villiers Stanford. Stanford's name is certain to live in connexion with his services even if all his other work should perish, and it is probable that his B flat service is more widely known than any English service written since the Reformation. SESQUI, a Latin word signifying, literally, the whole plus its half.

In musical terminology, the prefix Sesqui is used in combination with certain numeral adjectives, to express the proportion, either of harmonic intervals or of rhythmic combinations. (See PROPORTION and NOTATION.) W. S. R.

SESQUIALTERA, a compound organ stop consisting of several ranks of pipes, sometimes as many as five. Various combinations of intervals are used, but they only represent different positions of the third, fifth, and eighth of the ground-tone in the third or fourth octave above. The sesquialtera thus gives brilliance to the tone by reinforcing these upper partials. J. S. SESTIET, see SEKTET.

ŠEVČÍK, OTTAKAR (b. Horazdowitz, Bohemia, Mar. 22, 1852), violinist and pedagogue, of Czech nationality. His father, a teacher of the violin, after giving him elementary lessons, sent him in 1866 to the Conservatorium in Prague, where he studied under Anton Bennewitz until 1870, and then accepted an appointment as Konzertmeister of the Mozarteum in Salzburg. This engagement, varied by the organising of self-supporting concerts at Prague, lasted until 1873, in which year he made his début as a soloist at Vienna, becoming eventually Konzertmeister of the Komische Oper in that city. At the closing of the opera-house he gave concerts in Moscow, and in 1875 was appointed professor at the Imperial Music School in Kiev, remaining there till 1892, when he accepted an invitation from Anton Bennewitz, then director of the Prague Conservatorium, to return to Bohemia and fill the post of principal professor of the violin at that institution. Thenceforward, although he occasionally played in public (for the last time in 1898), he mainly devoted himself to teaching. His appointment happened to synchronise with the entry, as a pupil, of Jan KUBELIK, then 12 years of age, and possessed of a marvellous gift for technique. Ševčík taught him for six years, moulding him in accordance with his own special theories of teaching, to which Kubelik's success first drew the world's attention. This success was thought, however, to be very largely due to the young violinist's own natural ability, and it was not until, first, Kocian, and then, in a still greater degree, Marie Hall, confirmed, by the brilliance of their performances, the effectiveness of his system of training, that his reputation became established abroad. Pupils offered themselves in such great numbers, mainly from England and America, that only a small proportion of them could be accepted. Among them were the sons of Wilhelmj and Hugo Heermann, the daughter of Wieniawski, Zacharewitsch, Michel de Sicaud, Walter Schulze, Vivien Chartres, Leon Sametini, Zimbalist, Daisy Kennedy, and many others more locally known, who, after studying under Ševčík, received teaching appointments at various music schools. Under the Ševčík system nothing is left undone that methodical training of ear or muscles can accomplish. Ševčík's principles are embodied in his Method, which is a monument of patient toil that will secure him fame after his pupils are forgotten. It consists of four books. Book I. is a Violin Method for Beginners (in seven parts, op. 6). In this he has adopted for the early stages of practice what he calls his 'Semitone System.' Whereas in the ordinary diatonic scale the stoppings are unequal, the semitones which occur being produced on almost every string with the aid of different fingers, in this book scales are placed before the beginner, in which all the stoppings are the same on each string. This helps him to acquire quickly pure intonation, and enables him to devote his entire attention to the holding of the violin and the handling of the bow. Book II. contains Studies preparatory to the shake and for developing the touch (in two parts, op. 7). Changes of position and preparatory scale studies, op. 8, and Preparatory Studies in double stopping, op. 9. Book III. is a School of Violin Technique (in four parts, op. 1), for more advanced pupils, and is Ševčík's magnum opus. Book IV. is a School of Bowing Technique (in six parts, op. 2), in which appear some 4000 varieties of bowing in progressive order, with metronome marks, and exhaustive directions tending to the development of the bow arm.

His publications include a series of 'Bohemian dances' for violin solo. In 1886 the Czar Alexander II. conferred upon him the Order of St. Stanislaus for pedagogic services.

ŠEVČÍK-LHOTSKY QUARTET. A Czech string quartet originally founded in Warsaw, in 1903, by three pupils of Otakar Ševčík: Bohuslav Lhotsky (b. Libochovice, 1879), Karel Procházka (b. Domažlice, 1878) and Karel Moravec. The original violoncellist, Boguslav Váška, was succeeded by Ladislav Zelenka in 1911, who eventually joined the BOHEMIAN (CZECH) STRING QUARTET (q.v.), his place in Lhotsky's Quartet being filled by Antonio Fingerland. The quartet is permanently fixed in Prague, from which centre frequent tours have been made in Europe. England was visited in 1913 and 1923.

SÉVERAC, JOSEPH MARIE DÉODAT DE (b. St. Félix de Caraman-Lauragais, July 20, 1873; d. Céret, Pyrénées Orientales, Mar. 23, 1921). He first studied solfège and harmony at the Conservatoire of Toulouse, and in 1896 came to Paris, where he entered the Schola Cantorum, studying counterpoint with A. Mag-nard, and composition with V. d'Indy, until 1907. Highly gifted and profoundly musical, possessing the sense of colour and life, he was one of the most original musicians of his generation. His premature death was a great loss to the musical art of his country. His artistic personality affirms itself in striking fashion in his PF. works: 'Le Chant de la terre' (1900), 'En Languedoc' (1904), 'Baigneuses au soleil' (1908), 'Cerdaña' (1910), 'En vacances' (1910), 'Sous les lauriers roses' (1919), 'Le Soldat de plomb' (easy piece for four hands).

His songs are remarkable and attractive for the quality of their musical expression. For the stage he wrote 'Le Cœur du moulin' (1903-1908) (Opéra-Comique, Dec. 8, 1909), a lyric, poem in two acts; 'Héliogabale' (Béziers, Aug. 21, 1910), 'Hélène de Sparte' (incidental music) (Théâtre du Châtelet, May 5, 1912), etc. He composed organ and chamber music, motets, many unpublished compositions (list in Seré), and harmonised a number of 'Chansons anciennes.' His temperament somewhat resembled that of Ch. Bordes. De Séverac possessed a special aptitude for translating into music the atmosphere of nature in general, and specially that of his native country. M. L. P.

SEVERI, FRANCESCO (b. Perugia; d. Rome, Dec. 25, 1630), was from Dec. 31, 1613, a singer in the Papal Chapel. He composed 'Salmi passeggiati . . . sopra i falsobordoni' (1615); 1-3 part arie to sing to the guitar, harpsichord, etc. (1626).

SEVERN, THOMAS HENRY (b. London, Nov. 5, 1801; d. Wandsworth, Apr. 15, 1881), brother of Joseph Severn the painter, the intimate friend of Keats, Leigh Hunt, etc., became, after many difficulties, manager of Farn's music-business at 72 Lombard Street. He was the first conductor of the City of London Classical Harmonists, started in 1831. He was virtually self-taught, and his knowledge of music was derived from study of the scores of the great masters, and from practice. Severn was the author of an opera, and of various songs which were very popular in their time; a cantata, 'The Spirit of the Shell'; two Te Deums (Novello & Co.), etc. etc. a.

SEVILLANA, see SONG, subsection SPAIN (4).

SEXT (Lat. officium (vel oratio) ad horam sextam; ad sextam), the last but one of the 'Lesser Hours' in the Roman Breviary.

The plain-song music for Sext will be found in the Antiphonal. w. s. R.

SEXTET (or SESTET) (Fr. sextuor; Ger. Sextett; Ital. sestetto), a composition for six instruments or voices. The instrumental sextet for strings alone or for strings and wind or piano-forte is apt to encroach somewhat upon the domain of the small orchestra. If the string quartet is the ideal combination for combined solo-playing, it follows that the addition of parts tends to defeat its object, for the ear cannot take in more than a certain amount of multiplicity of detail, while masses of rich tone-colour, whether the writing is polyphonic or harmonic in its main outline, take one beyond the medium. Nevertheless, Brahms's sextets for two violins, two violas and two violoncellos are notable examples, both of the form and of his own style. String sextets have also been written by Dvořák, Goossens (three violins, viola and two violoncellos), Holbrooke, Reger, Schönberg and Tchaikovsky. Haydn's 'Echo' sextet is for four violins and two violoncellos.

Other combinations have been employed: Beethoven's op. 81b is for strings and two horns,¹ and his op. 71 is for clarinets, horns and bassoons.² Holbrooke has written for pianoforte and wind and for pianoforte and strings, including double-bass, and there is the well-known pianoforte and wind sextet of Thuille and a similar work by Pijper. (See CHAMBER MUSIC.)

Vocal sextets occur in operas where the situation makes them possible. In the older operas the concerted finales are often found to be built up upon the vocal combination of the protagonists; that at the close of 'Don Giovanni' being especially noteworthy, as in the usual version of the opera this section is omitted.

SEXTOLET (Fr. sextolet; Ger. Sextole; Ital. sestina), a group of six notes of equal length, played in the time of four ordinary notes of the same species. To distinguish them from regular notes of like form the number 6 is placed above or below the group. The true sextolet is formed from a triplet, by dividing each note into two, thus giving six notes, the first of which alone is accented; but there is also a similar group of six notes, far more frequently used than the real sextolet, in which a slight accent is given to the fourth note as well as the first. This group, which really consists of two triplets, is properly known as the double triplet, and should be marked with the figure 3 over the second and fifth notes, though it is frequently marked with 6, and called a sextolet. The difference is well shown in the following two extracts from the Largo of Beethoven's concerto in C, op. 15. (See also TRIPLET.)

¹ A 1st horn part is in existence, on which Beethoven has written, 6 tet of mine. God knows where the other parts are.

² In a letter of Aug. 8, 1809, Beethoven writes, 'One of my earlier things, and not only that, but written in a single night.' (Stoll's New Bridge, No. 84.)

To ensure correct accentuation such passages are better grouped thus:

SEXTUS (Pars sexta, sextuplum; Eng. the sixth voice, or part). In the partbooks of the 15th and 16th centuries four voices only were, as a general rule, mentioned by name, the cantus, altus, tenore and bassus. When a fifth voice was needed, it was called quintus, or pars quinta, and corresponded exactly in compass with one of the first four. When yet another voice was added, it was called sextus, or pars sexta, and corresponded in compass with another original voice-part. The extra part, therefore, represented sometimes an additional treble, sometimes an alto, sometimes a tenor, and sometimes a bass; and always corresponded in compass with some other part in equal importance with itself.

SEYFRIED, IGNAZ XAVER, RITTER VON (b. Vienna, Aug. 15, 1776; d. Aug. 26, 1841), was originally intended for the law, but his talent for music was so decided that, encouraged by Peter Winter, he determined to become a professional musician. In this his intimacy with Mozart and subsequent acquaintance with Beethoven were of much use. His teachers were Kozeluh for the PF. and organ, and Haydn for theory. In 1797 he became joint conductor of Schikaneder's theatre with Henneberg, a post he retained in the new Theatre 'an-der-Wien' from its opening in 1801 till 1826. The first work he produced there was a setting of Schikaneder's comic opera 'Der Lowenbrunnen' (1797), and the second, a grand opera 'Der Wundermann am Rheinfalle' (1799), on which Haydn wrote him a very complimentary letter. These were succeeded by innumerable operas great and small, operettas, Singspiele, music for melodramas, plays (including some by Schiller and Grillparzer), ballets, and pantomimes. Specially successful were his biblical dramas, 'Saul, König von Israel' (1810), 'Abraham' (1817), 'Die Maccabäer', and 'Die Israeliten in der Wüste.' The music to 'Ahasverus' (1823) he arranged from piano pieces by Mozart, and the favourite Singspiel, 'Die Ochsenmenette' (1823) (an adaptation of Hofmann's vaudeville 'Le Menuet du bœuf') was similarly a pasticcio from Haydn's works. His church music, widely known and partly printed, included many masses and Requiems, motets, offertories, graduales, a 'Libera' for men's voices composed for Beethoven's funeral, etc. (See Q.-L.) Seyfried also contributed articles to Schilling's Universal Lexicon der Tonkunst, Schumann's Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, the Leipziger allg. Zeitung, and Cäcilia, besides editing Albrechtsberger's complete works—the Generalbass-Schule, Compositionslehre, and a Supplement in three volumes on playing from score (Haslinger)—and Beethoven's Studies in Counterpoint (1832). Nottebohm's critical investigations reduced this last work to its proper value.

Seyfried was elected an honorary or a corresponding member of innumerable musical societies at home and abroad. His pupils included Louis Schlösser, Karl Krebs, Heinrich Ernst, Skiwa, Baron Joseph Pasqualati, Carl Lewy, Heissler, Kessler, J. Fischhof, Sulzer, Carl Haslinger, Parish-Alvars, R. Mulder, S. Kuhe, Walther von Goethe, Baron Hermann Löwenskiöld, F. von Suppé, Köhler and Basadonna.

His closing years were saddened by misfortune. He was buried in the Wahringer cemetery (Ortsfriedhof), near Beethoven and Schubert. C. F. P.

SFOGATO (open, airy), a word used in rare instances by Chopin (as in the 'Barcarole') in certain of those little cadenzas and ornaments that he is so fond of using, to indicate what may be called his own peculiar touch, a delicate and, as it were, ethereal tone, which can only be produced upon the pianoforte, and then only by skilful performers. 'Exhalation' is the only word that conveys an idea of this tone when it is produced. A 'Soprano sfogato' is a thin, acute voice. M.

SFORZANDO (SFORZATO), 'forced'; a direction usually found in its abbreviated form sf. or sfz. referring to single notes or groups of notes which are to be especially emphasised. It is nearly equivalent to the accent -- , but is less apt to be overlooked in performance, and is therefore used in all important passages. M.

SGAMBATI, GIOVANNI (b. Rome, May 28, 1843; d. Dec. 15, 1914), a remarkable pianist and composer. His mother, an Englishwoman, was the daughter of Joseph Gott the sculptor, a native of London, who had for many years practised his art in Rome. Giovanni was intended for his father's profession, that of an advocate, and he would have been educated with that view but for his strong turn for music. He took his first lessons in pianoforte-playing at the age of 5 from Amerigo Barberi, author of a treatise on harmony, who used to pride himself on the fact that his own teacher had been a pupil of Clementi. After the death of his father in 1849 young Sgambati's mother migrated with her two children to Trevi in Umbria, where she married again. Here Giovanni's lessons, supplemented by a course of harmony, were continued under Natalucci, a former pupil of Zingarelli, at the Conservatorio di Naples. From the age of 6 the boy often played in public, sang contralto in church, conducted small orchestras, and was known as the author of several sacred pieces. In 1860 he settled in Rome and soon became famous for his playing, and for the classical character of his programmes.

His favourite composers were Beethoven, Chopin and Schumann, and he was an excellent interpreter of the fugues of Bach and Handel. Shortly after this he was on the point of going to Germany to study when the arrival of Liszt in Rome saved him from that necessity. With him Sgambati studied long and diligently. He soon began to give orchestral concerts in the 'Galleria Dantesca,' which, as the 'Sala Dante,' was for many years the only concert-hall in Rome. Here, under Sgambati's direction, the symphonies and concertos of the German masters, until then unknown in the papal city, at length found a hearing. Beethoven's 'Eroica' was introduced to the Roman public and the 'Emperor' concerto was played to them by Sgambati for the first time, just as later they learned at his hands to know and appreciate Brahms, Saint-Saëns and later writers.

At the same time Sgambati was busy with his compositions. In 1864 he wrote a string quartet; in 1866, a pianoforte quintet (F minor, op. 4), an overture for full orchestra to Cossa's 'Cola di Rienzi,' together with other works, and in the same year he conducted Liszt's 'Dante' symphony (Feb. 26) with great success and credit to himself.

In company with Liszt, he visited Germany in 1869, and at Munich heard Wagner's music for the first time. Sgambati's talent naturally attracted the notice of von Keudell, the well-known amateur and German ambassador in Rome. At the orchestral concerts which he conducted at the embassy many of his works were first heard. Here also, in 1876, he made the acquaintance of Wagner, in whose honour the ambassador one evening gave a concert consisting entirely of Sgambati's compositions, including two pianoforte quintets and several songs. Wagner, much surprised to find in Rome a composer who made music of this kind, expressed a wish to hear it again, and on the following evening the programme was privately repeated for the delectation of the master, who immediately wrote to the publishing-house of Schott, advising them to purchase and print Sgambati's works without delay. The firm then published the two quintets, as well as a prelude and fugue for pianoforte.

Encouraged by this well-merited recognition Sgambati wrote a Festival-overture and a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, his symphony in D, produced at a concert in the 'Sala Dante' early in 1881 and repeated on Mar. 28 of that year at the Quirinal, being the first work of the kind ever given at the Italian court, in the presence of King Humbert and his Consort, Queen Margherita, to whom it was dedicated. In 1882 Sgambati paid his first visit to England and played his pianoforte concerto at the Philharmonic concert of May 11. His symphony was given at the Crystal Palace on June 10 under the composer's direction. Both works were well received, but the symphony made much the greater impression of the two.

His quartet for strings in D flat, printed about this time, is one of the works by which Sgambati is best known. First played in London by the Kneisel Quartet of Boston, it was afterwards included by Joachim and Piatti, along with his second pianoforte quintet, in the repertory of the Popular Concerts, and eventually attained wide popularity throughout Europe. Two years later (1884) Sgambati conducted the symphony in Paris, where he had been invited as representative of Italy at the International Concerts given in the Trocadéro. In 1886 he was named one of the five corresponding members of the French Institute to fill the place vacated by Liszt. In 1887 he was invited to conduct his second symphony, in E flat (written in 1883), and to execute his first quintet at the great musical festival of the Tonkünstler-Versammlung in Cologne.

In the same year he wrote, in honour of the wedding of the Duke of Aosta, an 'Epitalamio sinfonico,' which takes the form of a suite, though considerably more developed than is usually the case in compositions so described. After its production at Turin the author conducted performances of the work in Milan and Rome, and brought it to London on the occasion of his second visit in 1891, when it was given at a Philharmonic concert. During the same season he gave a concert of his own compositions at Princes' Hall, and was commanded to Windsor, where he played before Queen Victoria. One of the most memorable journeys made by Sgambati to foreign countries included a visit to Russia in the autumn of 1903. Received with enthusiasm, he gave concerts, consisting chiefly of his own works, at St. Petersburg, Moscow and other places in Northern Europe, with such conspicuous success that they would have welcomed him gladly another year.

To commemorate the death of King Humbert he wrote a 'Messa da Requiem' for chorus, baritone solo and orchestra, which was produced at the Pantheon, Jan. 17, 1896, and several times repeated. It was also given in Germany, at Cologne in Nov. 1906, in the composer's presence, and at Mayence in Mar. 1907. The Requiem is a fine piece of religious writing, in strict conformity with the spirit of the sacred text, modern without extravagance of any kind, and its themes well developed, though not so diffusely as to render it unsuitable for performance on liturgical occasions.

Sgambati devoted the energies of his best years to teaching; and, as a result, must be considered the founder, with his colleague Pinelli, of the Liceo Musicale in connexion with the Accademia di S. Cecilia in Rome (q.v.). Beginning with a free class for the pianoforte in 1869 he persevered in giving instruction of the soundest description.

His success as a writer for the pianoforte was due to his rare knowledge of its resources, to his facility in producing required effects with the simplest means, to his complete command of harmonic combinations of the subtlest kind, and to the exquisite finish given to even the least of his inspirations. With Sgambati device is rarely evident. His figures of accompaniment are as spontaneous as the melodies they sustain. Certain of his minor compositions, such as the beautiful intermezzo in op. 21 and certain numbers in his 'Pièces lyriques' (op. 23) and in his 'Mélodies poétiques' (op. 36), may be cited as reaching a level which in little descriptive pieces of the kind has rarely been surpassed. His more important pianoforte pieces, his chamber-music and his orchestral writings, taken together, place him at the head of those Italian musicians of the latter part of the 19th century, who, not writing for the stage, have moulded their work on classic models.

His native city owes him a lasting debt as its apostle of classical music, as teacher, performer and director. His efforts did not go unrecognised in high places. His influence was felt and appreciated at the Italian court, where he was appointed pianist and director of Queen Margherita's Quintet, and named, by motu proprio of King Victor Emmanuel III. in 1903, Commendatore of the Order of SS. Maurice and Lazarus.

BIRL.—FRITZ VOLBACH, Giovanni Sgambati. Katalog seiner hauptsächlichsten Werke bis auf die Neuzeit vervollständigt, mit ausführlichen Erläuterungen, Erweisen von Auführungen und einer Einleitung. (Schott, Mainz, 1912.)

SHAKE OR TRILL (Fr. trille, formerly tremblement, cadence; Ger. Triller; Ital. trillo). The shake, one of the earliest in use among the ancient graces, is also the chief and most frequent ornament of modern music, both vocal and instrumental. It consists of the regular and rapid alternation of a given note with the note above, such alternation continuing for the full duration of the written note.

The shake is the head of a family of ornaments, all founded on the alternation of a principal note with a subsidiary note one degree either above or below it. (See MORIENT; PRALLTRILLER; RIBATTUTA; ORNAMENTS.)

The sign of the shake is in modern music tr. (generally followed by a wavy line ~~~~~ if over a long note), and in older music tr. tr., tr., and occasionally +, placed over or under the note; and it is rendered in two different ways, beginning with either the principal or the upper note, as in Example 1:

1. Written. Performed. Or thus.

These two modes of performance differ considerably in effect, because the accent, which is always perceptible, however slight it may be, is given in the one case to the principal and in the other to the subsidiary note, and it is therefore important to ascertain which of the two methods should be adopted in any given case. Most of the earlier masters, including C. P. E. Bach, Marpurg, Türk, etc., held, what was the absolute rule of the classical French school up to the end of the 18th century, that all trills should begin with the upper note, while 19th-century authorities such as Hummel, Czerny and Moscheles have preferred to begin on the principal note. This diversity of opinion indicates two different views of the very nature and meaning of the shake; according to the latter, it is a trembling or pulsation—the reiteration of the principal note, though subject to continual momentary interruptions from the subsidiary note, gives a certain undulating effect not unlike that of the tremulant of the organ; according to the former, the shake is derived from the still older APPOGGIATURA (q.v.), and consists of a series of appoggiaturas with their resolutions—is in fact a kind of elaborated appoggiatura,—and as such requires the accent to fall upon the upper or subsidiary note. Marpurg says

'the trill derives its origin from an appoggiatura (Vorschlag von oben) and is in fact a series of descending appoggiaturas executed with the greatest rapidity,' and Emanuel Bach, speaking of the employment of the shake in ancient (German) music, says 'formerly the trill was usually only introduced after an appoggiatura,' and he gives the following example:

Nevertheless, the theory which derives the shake from a trembling or pulsation, and therefore places the accent on the principal note, in which manner most shakes in modern music are executed, has the advantage of considerable, if not the highest antiquity. Compare Caccini's trillo and gruppo quoted under ORNAMENTS.

Playford, in his Introduction to the Skill of Musick (1655), quotes an anonymous treatise on 'the Italian manner of singing,' in which precisely the same two graces are described.¹ Commenting on the shake, Playford says:

'I have heard of some that have attained it after this manner, in singing a plain-song of six notes up and six down, they have in the midst of every note bent or shaken with their finger upon their throat, which by often practice came to do the same notes exactly without.'

It seems then clear that the original intention of a shake was to produce a trembling effect, and so the custom of beginning with the principal note may be held justified.

In performing the works of the great masters from the time of Bach to Beethoven then, it should be understood that, according to the rule laid down by contemporary teachers, the shake begins with the upper or subsidiary note, but it would not be safe to conclude that this rule is to be invariably followed. In some cases we find the opposite effect definitely indicated by a small note placed before the principal note of the shake, and on the same line or space, thus—and even when there is no small note it is no doubt correct to perform all shakes which are situated like those of the above example in the same manner, that is, beginning with the principal note. So therefore a shake at the beginning of a phrase or after a rest (Ex. 4), or after a downward leap (Ex. 5), or when preceded by a note one degree below it (Ex. 6) should begin on the principal note.

¹ The author of this treatise is said by Playford to have been a pupil of the celebrated Scipione della Palla, who was also Caccini's master.

4. BACH, Prelude No. 16, Book I.

5. BACH, Art of Fugue, No. 8.

6. BACH, Sonata for PF. and Flute, No. 6.

It is also customary to begin with the principal note when the note bearing the shake is preceded by a note one degree above it (Ex. 7), especially if the tempo be quick (Ex. 8), in which case the trill resembles the PRALLTRILLER (q.v.), the only difference being that the three notes of which it is composed are of equal length, instead of the last being the longest.

7. BACH, Organ Fugue in F.

8. MOZART, Sonata in F.

If, however, the note preceding the shake is slurred to it (Ex. 9 a), or if the trill note is preceded by an appoggiatura (Ex. 9 b), the trill begins with the upper note; and this upper note is tied to the preceding note, thus delaying the entrance of the shake in a manner precisely similar to the bound Pralltriller (cf. PRALLTRILLER, Ex. 3). A trill so situated is called in German der gebundene Triller (the bound trill).

9. (a) BACH, Concerto for two Pianos.

(b) HAYDN, Trio in E minor.

When the note carrying a shake is preceded by a short note of the same name (Ex. 10), the upper note always begins, unless the anticipating note is marked staccato (Ex. 11), in which case the shake begins with the principal note.

10. BACH, Chromatic Fantasia.

11. MOZART, Sonata in C minor.

Certain later composers, when a trill beginning with the subsidiary note is required, have indicated it by a small grace-note, written immediately before the trill-note (Ex. 12). This grace-note is occasionally met with in older music (see Clementi, sonata in B minor), but its employment was objected to by Türk, Marpurg and others, as liable to be confused with the real appoggiatura of the bound trill, as in Ex. 9. This objection does not hold in modern music, since the bound trill is no longer used.

12. BEETHOVEN, Sonata, Op. 53, Finale.

Immediately before the final note of a shake a new subsidiary note is generally introduced, situated one degree below the principal note. This and the concluding principal note together form what is called the turn of the shake, though the name is not strictly appropriate, since it properly belongs to a separate species of ornament of which the turn of a shake forms in fact the second half only.¹ (See TURN.) The turn is variously indicated, sometimes by two small grace-notes (Ex. 13), sometimes by notes of ordinary size (Ex. 14), and in old music by the signs tr, tr, or tr.

13. CLEMENTI, 14. HANDEL, Gigue Sonata in C. (Suite 14).

Sometimes the turn is not indicated at all, but it has nevertheless to be introduced if the shake is followed by an accented note (Ex. 15). If, however, the next following note is unaccented, no turn is required, but an extra principal note is added to the last couple of notes, that the trill may end as well as begin with the principal note (Ex. 16). When the trill is followed by a rest, a turn is generally made, though it is perhaps not necessary unless specially indicated (Ex. 17).

15. MOZART, 'Lison dormait,' Var. 8.

16. CLEMENTI, Sonata in G.

17. BEETHOVEN, Trio, Op. 97.

When a note ornamented by a shake is followed by another note of the same pitch, the lower subsidiary note only is added to the end of the shake, and the succeeding written note serves to complete the turn. Even when the trill-note is tied to the next following, this extra lower note is required, provided the second written note is short, and occurs on an accented beat (Ex. 18). If the second note is long, the two tied notes are considered as forming one long note, and the shake is therefore continued throughout the whole value.

18. BACH, Fugue No. 15, Vol. II.

Very similar is the rendering of a shake on a dotted note: the turn ends on the dot, which thus takes the place of the second of the two notes of the same pitch. Thus the effect of the two modes of writing shown in Ex. 19 a and b would be the same. If, however, the dotted note is followed by a note a degree lower, no turn is required (Ex. 20).

19. HANDEL, Suite 10. Allemande.

Rendering of both.

20. HANDEL, Suite 10. Allegro.

Trills on very short notes require no turn, but consist merely of a triplet.

Besides the several modes of ending a shake, the beginning can also be varied by the addition of what is called the upper or lower prefix. The upper prefix is not met with in modern music, but occurs frequently in the works of Bach and Handel. Its sign is a tail turned upwards from the beginning of the ordinary trill mark, and its rendering is as follows—

21. BACH, Partita No. 1, Sarabande.

The lower prefix consists of a single lower subsidiary note prefixed to the first note of a shake which begins with the principal note, or of two notes, lower and principal, prefixed to the first note of a shake beginning with the upper note. It is indicated in various ways, by a single small grace-note (Ex. 22), by two (Ex. 23), or three grace-notes (Ex. 24), and in old music by a tail turned downwards from the beginning of the trill mark (Ex. 25), the rendering in all cases being that shown in Ex. 26.

From a composer's habit of writing the lower prefix with one, two or three notes, his intentions respecting the beginning of the ordinary shake without prefix, as to whether it should begin with the principal or the subsidiary note, may generally be inferred. For since it would be incorrect to render Ex. 23 or 24 in the manner shown in Ex. 27, which involves the repetition of a note, and a consequent break of legato—it follows that a composer who chooses the form Ex. 23 to express the prefix intends the shake to begin with the upper note, while the use of Ex. 24 shows that a shake beginning with the principal note is generally intended.

That the form Ex. 22 always implies the shake beginning with the principal note is not so clear (although there is no doubt that it usually does so), for a prefix is possible which leaps from the lower to the upper subsidiary note. This exceptional form is frequently employed by Mozart, and is marked as in Ex. 28. It bears a close resemblance to the DOUBLES APPOGGIATURA (q.v.).

28. MOZART, sonata in F. Adagio.

Among later composers, Chopin and Weber almost invariably write the prefix with two notes (Ex. 23); Beethoven uses two notes in his earlier works (see op. 2, No. 2, Largo, bar 10), but afterwards generally one (see op. 57).

F. T.

SHAKESPEARE, WILLIAM (b. Croydon, June 16, 1849), composer, vocalist, pianist. At the age of 13 he was appointed organist at the church where formerly he had attracted attention in the choir. In 1862 he began a three years' course of study of harmony and counterpoint under Molique; but after that master's death, having in 1866 gained the King's Scholarship at the R.A.M., continued his studies there for five years under Sir W. Sterndale Bennett. Whilst at the R.A.M. he produced and performed at the students' concerts a pianoforte sonata, a pianoforte trio, a capriccio for pianoforte and orchestra, and a pianoforte concerto; and attracted some notice as a solo-player.

He was elected Mendelssohn Scholar in 1871, for composition and pianoforte-playing, and in accordance with the wish of the Committee entered the Conservatorium at Leipzig. There, whilst under the instruction of the director, Carl Reinecke, he produced and conducted in the Gewandhaus a symphony in C minor. Having discovered himself to be the possessor of a tenor voice, he was sent by the Mendelssohn Scholarship Committee to study singing with Lamperti at Milan, and there remained for two and a half years. But though singing was his chief pursuit he did not neglect composition, and while in Italy wrote two overtures, two string quartets and other works.

In 1875 he returned to England, and entered upon the career of a concert and oratorio singer. He was appointed in 1878 professor of singing, and in 1880 conductor of the concerts, at the R.A.M. This latter office he resigned in 1886, but as a teacher of singing both at the R.A.M. and privately he has enjoyed a wide reputation. In 1924 he published Plain Words on Singing (Putnam).

SHAMUS O'BRIEN, romantic comic opera in 2 acts; text by G. H. Jessop (after J. Sheridan Le Fanu); music by Stanford, op. 61. Produced Opéra-Comique Theatre, London, Mar. 2, 1896.

SHANTY (CHANTY), a song used chiefly by sailors to give time to the pulling of a rope, or other matter where a united exertion is essential. It is doubtful as to derivation, whether from the French root, 'chant,' or whether by reason of its coming from a section of men in the 'lumber' trade in America or Canada, who, living in 'shanties' or roughly built wooden huts, are sometimes called 'shanty men.' In American publications the spelling 'shanty' for the song is generally employed.

It must be also noticed that most of the modern 'chanties' appear to have crossed the Atlantic and to have a distinctly American influence.

The sailor's shanty is different in all respects from the song he sings to amuse himself or his comrades. It is a work song and not a play song. The shanty must now be almost spoken of in the past tense, as an obsolete portion of sea life, for the use of steam has obviated much of the pulling and hauling on ships. In steamers sails are seldom used, and the raising of the anchor, the pumping of the bilgewater from the ship, with many other things that formerly were done by manual labour, are now the work of the donkey-engine. In the old sailing vessels where every sail had to be raised by hand, many a time with the wind pulling adversely at the canvas, the task of a ship's crew was no light affair. The mate, probably seeing the futile efforts of the men to raise the heavy-yard, would call for a shanty. This would be responded to by the 'shanty-man,' as the general leader was usually called. He would sing some kind of familiar nonsense-verse, the crew joining in with a recognised chorus at certain words where the united pull would come, as for instance:

Haul the Bowline.

Solo.—We'll haul on the bowline
So early in the morning.
We'll haul on the bowline
The bowline haul.

Chorus.—We'll haul on the bowline
The bully ship 's a-rolling.
We'll haul on the bowline
The bowline haul, etc.

The musical rhythm is found to be a great help in getting the united effort at the required instant.

Shanties are divided into different classes. One of them is recognised as the 'bunt' shanty, which is or was used in reefing sail. The men on the yard with their feet in the foot-ropes have to pull in the 'bunt' or loose sail, reefing it by knotting together the reef lines attached to the sail. The general bunt chant was

'We'll tauten the bunt, and we'll furl, hey I
And pay Paddy Doyle for his boots.'

The pumping shanties were generally more of a connected narrative song, as the pumping being merely a monotonous up and down motion, required a prolonged rather than a great strain. This may be said of the capstan shanties, the men walking round the capstan and thrusting against the capstan bars to raise the anchor.

While many of these shanties are universal in English-speaking ships, yet there are considerable differences in the tunes and versions of the words used.

The familiar ones are: 'Whisky for my Johnnie,' 'The Rio Grande,' 'The Wide Missouri,' 'Reuben Ranzo,' 'Old Storm Along,' 'Blow the man down,' 'Tom's gone to llo,' and some others. As before stated, there are a great number that mention American localities, 'Mobile Bay,' 'The Banks of the Sacramento,' and others, which have emanated from America and got diffused among ships.

'Leave her, Johnnie, leave her,' is sometimes used as a shanty, but its original purpose was to describe in doggerel verse the character of the vessel and its officers as the men were paid off. For instance it might run:

'Oh, the captain he is a very good man,
Leave her, Johnnie, leave her,
But the mate isn't worth an old tin pan,
Sing leave her, Johnnie, leave her.'

and so forth. 'Outward Bound,' beginning:

'To Liverpool docks we had adieu
To Sall, and Susie, and Kitty too.
The anchor's weigh'd, the sail's unfurl'd
We're bound to cross the watery world.
For don't you see we're outward bound,
Hurrah! we're outward bound, etc.'

may be used as a capstan shanty. The docks mentioned will, of course, vary with the port of departure. Shanties, though not so named, have been in use in all nations, savage and civilised, for the same purpose that the British shanty is or was employed, to give a measured rhythm for the pulling of oars and other matters connected with the working of a vessel. The Nile boat-songs, the Italian barcaroles, the Highland boat-songs, as well as the Chinese and Canadian, have all had old specimens musically noted down.

The sailors' shanty has been dealt with in American and English magazine articles, while Miss L. A. Smith's 'Music of the Waters' contains an interesting collection of this class of music.

SHARP (Fr. dièse, Ger. Kreuz, Ital. diessie)

♯: the sign for raising a note by a semitone.

Placed immediately after the clef they govern every occurrence of the note they affect throughout the composition; thus the keys with one sharp or more in the signature are known as the sharp keys. When introduced in the course of the music they hold good until the end of the bar in which they occur, unless cancelled by a natural.

In the notation of the 17th and early 18th centuries the sharp had a slightly different form, ♯ or ×. The latter is now become the sign of the double sharp.

F♯, C♯, etc., are termed in French Fa dièse, Ut dièse, etc.; in German Fis, Cis, etc. In Germany the ♯ was at one time used to express the major key. Beethoven inscribed the Leonora Overture No. 1 (in C major) 'Ouverture in C♯.' This custom is now happily disused.

The term 'sharp' and its derivatives are also used to express a raising of the pitch, intentional or otherwise. (See ACCIDENTALS; INTONATION; SIGNATURE.)

SHARP, CECIL JAMES (b. London, Nov. 22, 1859; d. there, June 23, 1924), was eminent as a student of English folk-song and dance.

His researches not only added enormously to the musician's knowledge of these subjects, but his life devoted to them in what may be called a missionary spirit resulted in a popular revival which seems destined to produce far-reaching results.

Sharp, the son of a city merchant whose hobby was architecture, early imbibed from his father a knowledge and love of the English cathedrals. They were the starting-point of his subsequent passionate devotion to the life and indigenous art of his country. He was educated at Uppingham and at Clare College, Cambridge (whence he took the degree B.Mus.), then went to Australia where at twenty-four he became Associate to the Chief Justice of Southern Australia. Music also claimed him there, for he was (1889-92) organist of the cathedral at Adelaide where he also established a music school. Returning to England he was (1896-1905) principal of the Hampstead Conservatoire, and during these years the main preoccupation of his life began. In 1899 he first saw the Morris danced at Headington (Oxfordshire), and the realisation that in the songs and dances of the countryside there still lingered a national art unrecognised by townsmen caused him to undertake innumerable journeys to record with notebook and pencil whatever might be gleaned. He recognised that others had been before him in this quest,¹ but he brought to it an ardour greater than that of most of his forerunners. His acquisitions were issued in the several collections of 'Folk-songs from Somerset' (1904-09) and in a sketch of the general field of research issued as English Folk-song, some Conclusions (1907). He investigated the sword dance of the North and the country dance of the Midlands, and interpreted Playford's Dancing Master (see PLAYFORD) in the light of his experience of the latter. The chief of his publications in these directions are enumerated below. Meantime he had become a member of the already existing FOLK-SONG SOCIETY (q.v.), and in 1911 he founded the English Folk Dance Society for the revival of the art. He gathered round him a number of young men and women who entered into his enthusiasm; among them was George BUTTERWORTH (q.v.) who collaborated in many of his publications. Amongst his minor services was the adaptation of music and dance from traditional English sources for Granville Barker's production of 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' (Savoy, 1914). The war, which claimed the younger members of Sharp's fraternity for other duties, broke up the team work of what had become a powerful movement, but his own activities were unabated. He visited America in order to collect the songs and dances which had lived on in the Southern Appalachian mountains, since their transportation there from England by the first settlers. He found there many primitive forms of the songs already noted in England with others. His 'English Folk-songs from the South Appalachians' (some of them collected by Olive Dame Campbell, 1917) contains nearly 500 songs, etc. His last years were spent in consolidating his work by re-issues of selected editions of his songs, with the revision of accompaniments thereto and by re-establishing the work of the Folk Dance Society particularly in connexion with the competitive festivals. He was engaged on a translation of Thoinot Arbeau's Orchésographie (see ARBEAU) and a History of the Dance when he died. The following is a list of Sharp's principal publications:

A Book of British Song. 1902.

Folk-songs from Somerset (5 series, with C. L. Marson). 1904-09.

SHARPE, ETHEL, see HOBDAV (3).

SHARPE, (1) HERBERT FRANCIS (b. Halifax, Mar. 1, 1861; d. S. Kensington, London, Oct. 14, 1925), won a pianoforte scholarship at the opening of the National Training School, where he afterwards succeeded Eugène d'Albert as Queen's Scholar. He appeared as a finished pianist in 1882, and gave many concerts in the provinces as well as in London, where he organised several series of very interesting trio concerts in 1899-1902. He was appointed a professor at the R.C.M. in 1884, and in 1890 became an examiner for the Associated Board. In such work the greater part of his life was spent, and he was actively engaged in teaching up to the time of his sudden death. He wrote a comic opera in three acts (still in MS.), a concert overture for orchestra, pieces for one and two pianos, for flute or piano, for violin and piano, etc., besides partsongs, vocal trios, and songs. An excellent 'Pianoforte School' is his op. 60 (Brit. Mus. Biog.). M.

His son, (2) CEDRIC (b. London, Apr. 13, 1891), violoncellist, gained a scholarship at the R.C.M. (1907) where he studied under W. H. Squire. He has made his mark as a leading player in London orchestras and as a fine chamber music-player, more especially with the Philharmonic String Quartet. C.

SHARP (or ACUTE) MIXTURE, an organ stop consisting chiefly of pipes representing the higher partial tones, overtones or harmonics.

According to Dr. E. J. Hopkins, a sharp mixture is one of four ranks giving a sharp clear tone, consisting of the following intervals in relation to the unison: 19th, 22nd, 26th, 29th, or g' , c' , g' , c''' , in relation to CC or 8 ft. C. T. E.

SHAW (1) GEOFFREY TURTON (b. London, Nov. 14, 1879) was a chorister of St. Paul's Cathedral under Sir George Martin, and later organ scholar at Caius College, Cambridge, where he studied under Sir Charles Stanford and Dr. Chas. Wood. He is an inspector of music to the Board of Education and has devoted himself to the furtherance of popular organisations, both in the schools and training colleges and by means of such unofficial activities as summer schools for teachers and competitive festivals. He followed his brother as organist of St. Mary's, Primrose Hill. His compositions include partsongs and unison songs (for list see B.M.S. Ann. 1920) and he has co-operated with his brother in editing song books.

(2) MARTIN (b. London, Mar. 9, 1876), brother of the above, studied at the R.C.M. and held several posts as a church organist. He founded the Purcell Operatic Society, which began its activities with 'Dido and Æneas' at the Hampstead Conservatoire, May 18, 1900, and subsequently at the Coronet Theatre. The masque from 'Diocletian' was given at Queen Street Theatre, Kingsway, and although the society was short-lived, it did important work in reviving public interest in Purcell's dramatic music.

As organist of St. Mary's, Primrose Hill, he worked for a purer style of church music, and identified himself with every movement in the direction of national revival. He edited 'Songs of Britain,' 'The English Carol Book,' 'League of Nations Song Book,' and with his brother, the 'Motherland Song Book,' and published (1921) The Principles of English Church Music Composition.

His own compositions are numerous, and he has been particularly successful as a song writer. His ballad opera, 'Mr. Pepys,' libretto by Clifford Bax, was produced at the Everyman Theatre, Hampstead, in 1926. c.

SHAW, MARY (MRS. ALFRED SHAW) (b. 1814; d. Hadleigh Hall, Suffolk, Sept. 9, 1876), daughter of John Postans, messman at the Guard Room, St. James's Palace, was a student at the R.A.M. from Sept. 1828 to June 1831, and afterwards a pupil of Sir George Smart. Miss Postans appeared in public as a contralto singer in 1834, and at the Amateur Musical Festival in Exeter Hall in November of that year attracted great attention by the beauty of her voice and the excellence of her style. In 1835 she was engaged at the Concert of Ancient Music and the York Festival, and about the end of the year became the wife of Alfred Shaw, an artist of some repute. In 1836 she appeared at the Norwich and Liverpool Festivals, at the latter of which she sang the contralto part in 'St. Paul,' on its first performance in England. In 1837 she was engaged at the Philharmonic and Sacred Harmonic Societies and Birmingham Festival. In 1838, after fulfilling an engagement at the Gloucester Festival, she left England and appeared at the Gewandhaus concerts, under Mendelssohn. A letter from him to the directors of the Philharmonic Society, dated Jan. 19, 1839, speaks of Clara Novello and Mrs. Shaw as 'the best concert-singers we have had in this country for a long time.' From Germany she proceeded to Italy, and appeared at La Scala, Milan, Nov. 17, 1839, in Verdi's 'Oberto.' She returned to England in 1842, and appeared at Covent Garden with Adelaide Kemble; in 1843 at the Sacred Harmonic Society with Clara Novello; and afterwards at the Birmingham Festival. Her brilliant career was suddenly arrested by a heavy visitation. Her husband became deranged, and the calamity so seriously shocked her whole system that the vocal organs became affected, and she was unable to sing in tune. She resorted to teaching, for three or four years appearing in public at an annual benefit concert. After her husband's death in 1847 she married J. F. Robinson, a country solicitor, and retired from the profession.

SHAWM, a wind instrument of the oboe type, with a double reed but a larger conical bore and a wide bell. The name is generally said to be a corruption of the French chalumeau, but it would be more correct to say that both words have been derived from the same source, the Lat. calamus, 'a reed,' through the diminutive calamellus. In mediæval times the word appears as calamel, challemelle or chalemie in France; caramillo and charamella in Spain and Italy; Schalmei or Schalmei in Germany; and shalmee, shalm or shawm in England. It is not until the 16th century that the form chalumeau occurs, and in the next century it was used to denote a distinct instrument with cylindrical bore and single reed, the precursor of the modern clarinet. As shown by an ancient fresco in the British Museum, an instrument similar to the shawm was known to the Romans, but its popularity in Europe is traceable to the Arabic and Saracenic influences of the 12th and 13th centuries (see PIPES, EVOLUTION OF). In the 16th century shawms were made of various sizes from high treble to contra-bass, the larger forms being generally known on the Continent under the names Pommer and Bombardt. In England the title shawm included all sizes; hence Drayton (Polyolbion, vol. iv.) speaks of the 'shrillest Shawm,' and an old proverb of the time of Henry VIII., formerly inscribed on the walls of Leckington Manor House, Yorkshire, states that:

'A shawme makethe a swete sounde for he tynthe [the] basse :

It mounteth not to hy but kepthe rule and space :
Yet yf it be blowne wythe to a vehement wynde,
It makithe it to mysgoverne oute of his kynde.
(MS. copy Brit. Mus. Bib. Reg. 18 D. II.)'

In the Privy Purse Expenses of Henry VIII. is the following entry :

'1530. For ij sagbuttes ij Tenor Shalmes and two trebull Shalmesse x li. x s.'

Illustrations of the various kinds of shawms are given by Virdung (Musica Getutsch, 1511), Praetorius (Sciagraphia, 1620) and Mersenne (Harmonie universelle, 1635); also of existing instruments in Day's Musical Instruments in the Military Exhibition (1891), Kappey's Military Music and in Mus. T., Aug. 1906. (See PLATE LXXV. Nos. 5-8).

The high treble shawm is still used on the continent with the bagpipe (cornemuse) by itinerant musicians; in Brittany it is called bombardt and in Italy cionnamella or cenne mella (see PIFERO). The word shawm disappeared from general use in England during the early part of the 17th century, in favour of the title hoboy, though this name appears as early as 1561 in the opera 'Ferrex and Porrex.' In 1607 the Edinburgh town musicians consisted of players on 'chalmis and howboyis,' from which it may be inferred that by that time the two instruments had become distinct.

For the term 'wayghte' as applied to the shawm see WARIS, and for the subsequent history of the instrument see OBOE. F. W. G.

SHEDLOCK, JOHN SOUTH (b. Reading, Sept. 29, 1843; d. London, Jan. 9, 1919), musical critic, was a pupil of Lübeck for the piano and of Edouard Lalo for composition. Before going to Paris for his musical studies he had taken the degree of B.A. at the London University in 1864. From the time of his return to England he was active as a teacher, and occasionally played in public. In 1879 he was appointed critic of The Academy, in succession to Prout, and became engaged almost exclusively in musical literature. He was appointed critic of The Athenæum in 1901, retiring in 1916. He was also editor of the Musical Monthly Record for many years. Besides journalistic work, he did much of an archaeological kind. A series of articles on Beethoven's sketch-books (Mus. T., 1892) led to his discovery of a copy of Cramer's studies annotated by Beethoven, at Berlin. This was published as 'The Beethoven-Cramer Studies' in 1893. Other works on Beethoven consisted of two volumes of letters translated into English (reissued in an abridged edition, 1 vol., 1926) and Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas, the Origins and Respective Values of various Readings. In 1895 he edited two of Kuhnau's 'Biblichen Sonaten,' and a selection of harpsichord pieces by Pasquini and others. In the same year appeared his most important work, a treatise on The Pianoforte Sonata, which was translated two years afterwards into German by Olga Stieglitz. His chief composition is a quartet for pianoforte and strings, written in 1886. m., with addns.

SHEFFIELD. The Sheffield festival came rapidly into the first rank by reason of its magnificent chorus-singing, due to the exceptional choir-training skill of Henry COWARD (q.v.). This notable Yorkshire music-meeting originated in a very modest way, nothing more than a performance of Mendelssohn's 'Elijah' in 1895, conducted by Coward. In the following year (1896) the first festival proper, lasting two days, was held, when the works performed included 'Elijah,' 'The Golden Legend' (Sullivan), 'Faust' (Berlioz) and 'Job' (Parry).

It was not, however, until the meeting of 1899 (three days) that the singing of the chorus made the fame of the Sheffield Festival. On that occasion the programme included:

'Messiah,' 'King Olaf' (Elgar), 'Samson and Delilah' (Saint-Saëns), 'The Golden Legend,' 'The Choral Symphony,' 'King Saul' (Parry), and the 'Hymn of Fraize.'

August Manns conducted on both occasions.

At the festival of 1902 the following works were performed, under the conductorship of Henry J. Wood:

'Elijah,' 'Gareth and Lynette' (a cantata composed for the occasion by Coward), 'Triumphs' (Brahms), 'The Dream of Gerontius' and 'Coronation Ode' (Elgar), 'Wanderer's Sturmlied' (Richard Strauss), 'Israel in Egypt' (selection), 'Stabat Mater' (Dvořák), 'Jesu, priceless Treasure' (Bach), 'Még Blane' (Coleridge-Taylor), 'Bæstad,' symphonic poem for organ and orchestra (Fritz Volbach), 'Blest Pair of Sirrins' (Parry), and 'The Hymn of Fraize.'

Weingartner conducted the 1905 festival, at which Cliffe's 'Ode to the North-East Wind' and Nicholas Gatty's 'Fly, envious Time' were heard for the first time, and two 8-part choruses by Weingartner, 'The House of Dreams' and 'The Song of the Storm,' had their first performance in England. Bach's B minor Mass, Mozart's Requiem and Schumann's 'Paradise and the Peri' were included in the programme.

The 1908 festival was under Henry J. Wood's conductorship. There were no actual novelties, but the 'Sea Drift' of Delius was heard for the first time in England, and Debussy rescored his early cantata, 'L'Enfant prodigue,' for the occasion. The 'St. Matthew' Passion, Beethoven Choral Symphony, Berlioz's 'To Deum,' Franck's 'Béatitudes,' and Walford Davies's 'Everyman,' were among the more important works in the programme.

For the 1911 festival the time was changed from Oct. to Apr., and Henry J. Wood resumed the conductorship, and in addition the duties of chorus-master, which Coward, who had acted in that capacity from the beginning, resigned. There was nothing new in the programme, but Georg Schumann's oratorio 'Ruth' was given for the first time in this country, Bach's B minor Mass and 'St. Matthew Passion' were included in the programme, and native music was represented by the first part of Bantock's 'Omar Khayyam.'

Preparations were made for a festival in 1914, but the war intervened, and since then the festival has been in abeyance, and is understood to be awaiting the erection of a City Hall, for which a site has been secured and plans drawn up.

None of the existing musical societies of Sheffield are of very long standing, and the oldest seems to be the AMATEUR MUSICAL SOCIETY, which was founded in 1864 as a singing class, and for some years gave private concerts to which only members and their friends were admitted. The first conductor was an amateur, H. W. Ibbotson, and he was followed in about five years' time by F. Schöllhammer; in 1904 Henry J. Wood and J. A. Rodgers were joint conductors, and in 1921 J. F. Staton followed them. The Society introduced to Sheffield Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' (1876), Bach's 'Magnificat' (1877), Elgar's 'Kin'

The Society which bulks largely in the music of Sheffield is the MUSICAL UNION, founded in 1876, and thence onwards to now (1927) under the conductorship of Coward. Among the long list of works given during the half-century of its existence may be mentioned the B minor Mass, and 'St. Matthew' Passion of Bach, Beethoven's Mass in D and Choral Symphony, and many native compositions, such as Elgar's 'Gerontius,' etc., Parry's 'Judith,' 'Job,' etc., Bantock's 'Atalanta' and 'Vanity of Vanities,' Macmillan's 'England' (composed at Ruhleben), Holst's 'Hymn of Jesus' and Ethel Smyth's Mass in D. The Musical Union has acquired a more than local reputation by its extensive tours. It visited London in 1902 (under Weingartner) and on many later occasions, Germany in 1906, and again in 1910, Canada in 1908, circumnavigated the world in a six months' tour (these foreign experiences being shared by some Leeds singers), and took a prominent part in the Paris International Festival of 1912. From 1897 it has furnished a contingent to the Handel Festivals.

Perhaps the most remarkable results produced by the local resources of Sheffield have been the annual performances of the Sheffield and district GRAND OPERA SOCIETY, which since its foundation in 1920 has given, on a complete scale, remarkably efficient performances of (inter alia) 'Tannhäuser,' 'Lohengrin,' 'Aida,' 'Carmen' and 'Esmeralda.' Staton was the conductor up to 1925, when he was succeeded by John Cope.

Sheffield has been so exclusively interested in choral music that it has proved a difficult task to arouse much enthusiasm for orchestral music. An attempt was made in 1909 to form a permanent local orchestra, and 'Promenade' concerts were given from then to 1915 under the conductorship of J. A. Rodgers, on whose death they were continued under Wood in 1919 to 1920-21. The financial results were not commensurate with their artistic success, and their place was taken by two concerts by the Queen's Hall Orchestra included in the Subscription Series. In helping to create a taste for orchestral music the University String Orchestra, under Mr. Linfoot, which began its operations in 1919, is doing a useful work.

In chamber music the 'Five o'clock' Concerts, organised during the war and carried on ever since, by the Misses Foxon, have filled a too conspicuous gap in Sheffield music. With the aid chiefly of local musicians, supplemented by distinguished artists from outside Sheffield, about eight concerts are given each season, the programmes of which are invariably of great artistic interest, and are seldom without some feature that is rare or at least unfamiliar. The University mid-day recitals, organised by Mrs. J. B. Leathes, also deserve mention in this connexion.

SHEENSHIN, ALEXANDER ALEXEYEVICH (b. Nov. 19, 1890), composer, studied under Glière, Grechaninov and Javorsky. He was appointed professor at the Moscow State Conservatoire in 1922, and composer to the Children's Theatre, Moscow (1920). He has written an orchestral poem, op. 5; a PF. quintet in D min. SHEPHERD, ARTHUR (b. Paris, Idaho, U.S.A., Feb. 19, 1880), American conductor and composer. He studied at the New England Conservatory, with Dennée and Faelten in piano, with Goetschius and Chadwick in composition. In 1897-1908 he taught and conducted in Salt Lake City, Utah; in 1908-20 he taught at the New England Conservatory and was for a time conductor of the Cecilia Society (choral) of Boston. Since 1920 he has been associate conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra. His compositions include several overtures and orchestral suites; a Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra; choral pieces; a piano sonata; and smaller piano pieces and songs.

SHEPHERD (SHEPHEARD, SHEPPARD, SHEPPERD), (1) JOHN (b. early part of 16th cent.; d. (?) 1563), was a chorister of St. Paul's under Thomas Mulliner. In 1542 he was appointed instructor of the choristers and organist of Magdalen College, Oxford, which office he resigned in 1543, was reappointed to it in 1545, and held it until 1547. He was a Fellow of the College from 1549-51 and was in the Royal Chapel of Queen Mary. On Apr. 21, 1554, having then been a student in music for 20 years, he supplicated for the degree of Mus.D., but it does not appear whether he actually took the degree. John Day's 'Certain Notes,' etc., 1580, contains two anthems a 4 by him—'I give you a new commandment,' and 'Submit yourselves.' Another book of Day's, the 'Whole Psalms in four parts,' 1563, has a 'Prayer' by him, 'O Lord of hostes.' Barnard prints a four-part anthem, 'Haste thee.' Hawkins prints a motet in three parts by him, 'Steven first after Christ for Gods worde his blood spent,' and a melodious little 'Poynete'—a fugal piece for four voices of seven bars length. Burney¹ complains that the motet is not a good specimen, and prints another, 'Esurientes,' for five voices from the Christ Church MSS., on which he pronounces Shepherd to have been superior to any composer of the reign of Henry VIII. In the Durham part-books, the anthem 'O Lord the maker of all thing' usually assigned to Henry VIII., is accredited to Shepherd. It is more probably by William Mundy. Much of his church music is preserved in the Music School, Oxford; the MSS. at Christ Church contain five complete portions of the Magnificat and some motets, also complete. The great majority of Shepherd's motets in the library are incomplete, as the tenor partbook is wanting. A 'Deus misereatur' and Gloria in short score, written on two six-lines staves and barred with twelve minims to the bar, is in a MS. organ-book, (6). In the British Museum (Add. MSS. 15,166, 29,289. 30,480) are treble parts of many of his English compositions, amongst them 2 M. and E. Services with Creed; 2 Te Deums and Magnificats, 2 Creeds and 7 Anthems. Add. MSS. 4900, 29,246, contain four pieces with lute accompaniment, and Add. MSS. 17,802-5 have no fewer than four Masses!—'The western wynde,' 'The French Masse,' 'Be not afraid,' and 'Playn song Mass for a Mene'; four Alleluias, and ten Latin Motets, all for four voices complete. The R.C.M. possesses four Latin motets, and a 'First Service' by him. Morley in his Introduction includes him amongst 'famous Englishmen.'

Another (2) JOHN SHEPHERD, possibly a son of the above, was sworn a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, Dec. 1, 1606. (Rimbault's Old Chequebook, p. 43.) Perhaps it was he who added a Kyrie to Johnson's service in G, in the Cathedral Library, Ely. (See Dickson's Catalogue, 32, 37.) Perhaps, also, he is the 'Thos. Shepherd' of Tudway (iv. 72). W. H. SHEPHERD, WILLIAM (d. Jan. 19, 1812), an Edinburgh composer, violinist and music-publisher. About 1793 he issued a 'Collection of Strathspey Reels' dedicated to Miss Abercromby, and a similar one about 1802-03. In 1796 he entered into partnership with Nathaniel Gow, in a music-publishing business, at 41 North Bridge, Edinburgh, removing before 1804 to 16 Princes Street.

Gow and Shepherd were unfortunate in their speculations, and Shepherd appears to have been deeply involved at his death. F. K.

SHEPHERD'S PIPE,¹ a name given to the pastoral oboe or musette. It was an instrument with a double reed like that of the bagpipe chanter, and was sometimes combined with a windbag. (See BAGPIPE, subsection MUSETTE). It was made in several sizes, constituting a family or 'consort' similar to the viols, recorders and other instruments. Its origin in the simple reed is well given in Chappell's History of Music, vol. i. p. 259.

An excellent drawing of its various forms, with the method of holding it, is to be found in a Traité de la musette, by Jean Girin of Lyons, 1572, where it is distinguished from the 'Cromorne' and 'Hautbois.' The bagpipe form with drones and windbag is also engraved.

SHEREMETIEV, ALEXANDER DMITRIEVICH, Count (b. 1859). His ancestor, Peter Borisov, had been one of the first noblemen to establish a private choir in the 17th century, while his father's church choral choir had become widely famous under the baton of Lomakin. Count Alexander Sheremetiev started his choir in 1884, under the conductorship of Archangelsky. In 1882 he had already organised a symphony orchestra. In 1898 he began to give national concerts in St. Petersburg, which gradually acquired the character of symphony concerts at popular prices, and were very highly rated from the artistic point of view. In 1902 Count Sheremetiev became intendant of the Imperial court chapels.

SHERIDAN, MARGARET (b. Castlebar, Co. Mayo, Oct. 15, 1889), operatic soprano. An orphan from the age of 4, she was brought up at a convent until she was 17, when she attracted notice by her successes at a Dublin competition festival. A subscription was raised for her vocal education, and in Sept. 1909 she entered the R.A.M., where she became a pupil of William Shakespeare and remained until the end of 1911, having won a silver medal. After further study in Italy she made a successful début in opera and appeared several times at La Scala. In 1919 she made her first appearance during the summer season at Covent Garden as Madama Butterfly. The part proved somewhat beyond her powers, but her pleasing voice and artistic training enabled her to create a favourable impression, and this was enhanced later in the season by her sympathetic impersonation of the heroine in Mascagni's opera, 'Iris,' then given for the first time in England. Subsequently, besides going the round of the principal Italian theatres, she was engaged to sing at the Chicago Opera House in 1923-24, and there again met with considerable success.

1885-88. In 1889 he won the Mendelssohn prize with a Requiem for voices and orchestra. He was appointed a teacher in the Dresden Conservatorium in 1893, and professor in 1911. He won considerable success both as a pianist and composer in Germany. His works include a piano concerto, 2 symphonies, overtures, a violin sonata (C minor), 2 sonatas for violoncello, music for piano, organ, etc., as well as songs. In Feb. 1907 he gave a concert of unpublished compositions of his own, in the Palmengarten, Dresden, the programme of which consisted of a sonata for two pianos, a suite for clarinet and piano, and a quintet for piano and strings. SHIELD, WILLIAM (b. Whickham, Durham, Mar. 5, 1748; d. Berners Street, London, Jan. 25, 1829), composer of opera, etc., son of a singing-master. He received his first musical instruction when 6 years old, from his father, but, losing his parent three years later, he was apprenticed to a boat-builder at South Shields. His master, however, permitted him to pursue his musical studies, and he obtained some lessons in thorough-bass from Charles Avison, and occasionally played the violin at music meetings in the neighbourhood. On the expiration of his apprenticeship, having acquired sufficient knowledge to lead the subscription concerts at Newcastle, he determined upon making music his profession, and removed to Scarborough, where he became leader at the theatre and concerts. Whilst there he produced his first composition, an anthem for the opening of a new church at Sunderland. Having been heard by Fischer and Borghi, they recommended him to Giardini, by whom he was engaged in 1772 as a second violin in the Opera band. In 1773 he was promoted to the post of principal viola which he held for eighteen years, and which he also filled at all the principal concerts.

In 1778 he produced, at the Haymarket, his first dramatic piece, the comic opera 'The Flitch of Bacon.' This led to his being engaged as composer to Covent Garden Theatre, a post which he occupied until his resignation, 1791. During his engagement he composed many operas and other pieces. In 1791 he made the acquaintance of Haydn, and was wont to say that in four days, during which he accompanied Haydn from London to Taplow and back, he gained more knowledge than he had done by study in any four years of his life. In the same year he visited France and Italy. In 1792 he was re-engaged as composer at Covent Garden, in which capacity he acted until 1797. In 1807 he gave up all connexion with the theatre. He was appointed master of the King's Musick in 1817.

He published at various times, 'A Collection of Favourite Songs, To which is added a Duet for two Violins'; 'A Collection of Canzonets and an Elegy'; and 'A Canto, consisting of Ballads, Rounds, Glees, etc.'; likewise 'Six Trios for two Violins and Bass,' and 'Six Duos for two Violins.' He was also author of An Introduction to Harmony, 1800; and Rudiments of Thorough Bass, about 1815. His dramatic compositions, consisting of operas, musical farces and pantomimes, were as follow:

'The Flitch of Bacon,' 1778; 'Lord Mayor's Day,' 1789; 'The Poor Soldier,' 'Rosina,' 'Harlequin Fiar Bacon,' 1783; 'Robin Hood,' 'The Noble Peasant,' 'Pontaniebleau,' 'The Magic Cavern,' 1784; 'Love in a Camp,' 'The Nunney,' 'The Choleric Father,' 'Oma!,' 1785; 'Richard Coeur de Lion,' 'The Enchanted Castle,' 1786; 'The Highland Reel,' 'Marian,' 'The Prophet,' 'Alduin,' 1788; 'The Crusade,' 'The Picture of Paris,' 1790; 'The Woodman,' 'Oscar and Malvina,' (with Revell), 1791; 'Harlequin Bridge,' 1792; 'Harlequin's Museum,' 'The Dead Lover,' 'The Midnight Wanderers,' 'Sprigs of Laurels,' 1793; 'Arrived at Portsmouth,' 'The Travellers in Switzerland,' 'Nesley Abbey,' 1794; 'The Mysteries of the Castle,' 1795; 'Abroad and at Home,' 'Lock and Key,' 1796; 'The Italian Villagers,' 'The Village Fete,' 'Wicklow Gold Mines,' 1797; 'The Farmer,' 1798; 'Two Faces under a Hood,' 1807.

In many of his pieces he introduced songs, etc., selected from the works of other composers, English and foreign; and was thereby the means of making the general public acquainted with many beautiful melodies of which they would otherwise have remained ignorant.

Shield's melodies charm by their simple, natural beauty; at once vigorous and refined, they appeal directly to the hearts of Englishmen. But he also wrote songs of agility, to display the powers of Mrs. Billington and others. Among his most popular songs are 'The Thorn,' 'The Wolf,' 'The Heaving of the Lead,' 'Old Towler,' 'The Ploughboy' and 'The Post Captain'; but these are but some of the most prominent. Shield died at his residence, 31 Berners Street, and was buried on Feb. 4 in the south cloister of Westminster Abbey. With the exception of his fine tenor viola, reputed a Stainer, which he bequeathed to George IV. (who accepted the gift, but directed that its utmost value should be paid to the testator's presumed widow), he left his whole estate to his 'beloved partner, Ann [Stokes], Mrs. Shield upwards of forty years.' His valuable musical library was sold in July 1829. On Oct. 19, 1891, a memorial cross was erected to his memory in Whickham Churchyard, Durham, and a slab in Westminster Abbey (1892), both due to the efforts of John Robinson of Sunderland.

SHIFT (1). In playing the violin, or any of the instruments belonging to that family, an executant effects a 'shift' when the left hand passes from one established position to another. Thus, when the hand moves up or down the finger-board the player was said to be 'on the shift.' The term was also used to denote the positions themselves, the second position being known as the 'half-shift,' the third position as the 'whole-shift,' and the fourth position as the 'double-shift.'

This technical acquirement, which is now an exact and indispensable means of reaching every note within the compass of the violin (see FINGERING, VIOLIN), evidently originated in Italy. There is a certain amount of ambiguity surrounding its use by viol-players previous to its introduction among violinists; but it is quite certain that before the 17th century there are no indications of any such custom. During the 17th century, however, there is little doubt that it was employed by the best viol-players of the day. Christopher Simpson clearly demonstrates its use in The Division Viol (second edition, London, 1667), wherein he states, under 'The ordering of the fingers in gradual notes,' that

'in any point of Division which reaches to the lower frets or beyond them; the highest note thereof is always stopt either with the third or fourth finger.'

The first tentative advances towards the adoption of the 'shift' took the form of an extension of the little finger in the first position, and the feat of touching the first C on the chanterelle of the violin by this means was looked upon as a daring undertaking. As a natural consequence, the executant's ability rested almost entirely upon his manner of playing l'ut, and so sensational was the effect of its advent upon the listeners that an involuntary murmur of 'Gare l'ut' was wont, it is said, to escape from the lips of his listeners. Beyond a doubt, many professional violinists could shift in the first three positions by the year 1655, for Merseenne (Harmonie universelle) speaks with admiration of those players who could mount up to the octave of each string. Then in 1658 Anthony Wood in his Life describes the wonderful playing of Thomas Baltzar—the Paganini of his day—whom he saw

'run up his fingers to the end of the finger-board of the violin and run them back insensibly and all with alacrity and in very good tune, which I am sure any in England never saw the like before.'

To Mattæi—who came to England in 1672—is accorded the invention of the 'half-shift,' or second position. But although the 'shift' was favoured by professional players of exceptional ability at this period, its adoption was far from general, owing to the confused methods of holding the violin which continued well into the next century. Lully, who was himself a violinist, gives an idea of the capacity of the ordinary orchestral technique by choosing a test piece for those desiring to gain the 'dignus est intrare' of his band in which no C on the chanterelle occurred. For thirty years the entr'acte from his opera of 'Atys' served this purpose. Even in Leopold Mozart's time the question of holding the violin was far from settled, for, in his Violin School (1756), he mentions that there are two ways of holding the violin, the first being 'against the breast'—which position he regards as an obstacle to 'shifting'—and the second is to place the violin under the chin and rest it on the shoulder. The best professional players adopted the latter method, and their example finding favour with lesser artists was the means of abolishing the 'breast position' and bringing the 'shift' into general use.

The 'shift' on the violoncello was doubtless derived from the violin, and is governed by the same rules. The 'thumb movement,' or 'shifting of the thumb' which was the means of facilitating the use of the high positions on the violoncello, was first employed—and it is said invented—by the French artist Berteau in the first half of the 18th century.

(2) In trombone-playing, 'shift' signifies an alteration in position of the movable slide, by means of which the fundamental length of the instrument is increased. The home position of the slide is known as the No. 1 'position,' and the successive shifts, lowering the pitch by successive semitones, give respectively the second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth and seventh 'positions,' the number of the 'position' being thus always one higher than the number of semitones by which the pitch is lowered (see TROMBONE).

SHINNER, EMILY (b. Cheltenham, July 7, 1862; d. July 17, 1901), began the study of the violin at the age of 7. In 1874 she went to Berlin, and for two years studied under H. Jacobsen, a pupil of Joachim, female violinists not being at that time admissible to the Hochschule. In 1876 this restriction was taken away, and Miss Shinner was among the first admitted. In Oct. 1877 she became a pupil of Joachim, and remained with him for three years. In Feb. 1881 she came to London, and after being heard at several private concerts (among others at one given by the Bach Choir), made her début at a concert given by H. R. Bird in the Kensington Town Hall, in Brahms's sonata in G, etc. At the London Musical Society's concert of June 29, 1882, she played David's concerto in E minor with great success, and from that time held a high position among English artists, her style being pure and refined, and her power of interpreting works of a high intellectual order being very remarkable. She appeared at the Popular Concert on Feb. 9, and at the Crystal Palace on Mar. 8, 1884; in 1887 she organised a successful quartet party of women. In Jan. 1889 she married Capt. A. F. Liddell.

SHIRREFFS, ANDREW (b. 1762; d. circa 1807), an Aberdeen musician and poet. He wrote a once popular pastoral musical comedy 'Jamie and Beas, or the Laird in Disguise' in five acts, modelled upon Allan Ramsay's Gentle Shepherd. This was published in 1787; and the musical part of it advertised as for sale in 1788. He was composer of 'Forty Pieces of Original Music,' published by Stewart & Co., Edinburgh. Shirreffs was M.A. of Marischal College, Aberdeen (1783), and edited the Aberdeen Chronicle and the Caledonian Magazine. He came to London in 1798. He was originally a bookbinder, was lame, and his portrait is prefixed to his volume of poems, 1790. Burns mentions having met him, and refers to him as 'a little decreped body, with some abilities.'

SHOFAR (SHOPHAR; Heb. Šofar), the Jewish ram's-horn instrument, used in the synagogue worship. The natural horn is flattened in section, and a cup mouthpiece is formed at the small end (see PLATE LXXXIII. No. 2). The instrument, or an imitation of its effect, is introduced into the scores of Macfarren's 'John the Baptist' and Elgar's 'Apostles.' (See HEBREW MUSIC.)

SHORE, (1) MATTHIAS (d. 1700), was one of the trumpeters in ordinary to James II. in 1685, and a few years afterwards was promoted to the post of Sergeant Trumpeter, in which he distinguished himself by the rigorous exaction of his fees of office. (See TRUMPETER.) He left three children:

(2) WILLIAM (d. Dec. 1707), also one of the King's trumpeters in ordinary, succeeded his father as Sergeant Trumpeter. He was buried at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. He followed his father's example in the severe exaction of fees.

(3) CATHERINE (b. circa 1668; d. circa 1730) was a pupil of Henry Purcell for singing and the harpsichord. In 1693 she became the wife of Colley Cibber, without consent of her father, whose resentment was not, however, of very long duration, as when he made his will, Mar. 5, 1695-96, he bequeathed to her one-third of the residue of his property. Shortly after her marriage Mrs. Cibber appeared on the stage as a singer, and, among other songs, sang the second part of Purcell's air 'Genius of England' ('Don Quixote,' Part II.), to her brother John's trumpet accompaniment.

(4) JOHN (d. Nov. 20, 1752), the most celebrated trumpeter of his time, in 1707 succeeded his brother William as Sergeant Trumpeter. Purcell composed for him obligato parts to many songs, which may be seen in the 'Orpheus Britannicus,' and which fully attest his skill. His playing is highly commended in the Gentleman's Journal for Jan. 1691-92, where in an account of the celebration on St. Cecilia's Day in the preceding November, we read:

'Whilst the company is at table the hautboys and trumpets play successively. Mr. Showers hath taught the latter of late years to sound with all the softness imaginable; they played us some flat tunes made by Mr. Finger with a general applause; it being a thing formerly thought impossible upon an instrument designed for a sharp key.'

His name appears in 1711 as one of the twenty-four musicians to Queen Anne, and also as lutenist to the Chapel Royal.¹ He is said to have been the inventor of the tuning-fork, and also to have split his lip in sounding the trumpet, thereby incapacitating himself for performing. In 1749 he married a Mrs. Speed with a fortune of £15,000.² He died at the alleged age of 90, but it is very probable that his age was overstated.

SHORT, PETER, an early London music printer and publisher, who printed a number of madrigal books and some early musical treatises. He worked 'at the signe of the Starre' on Bread Street Hill from about 1584, and his issues include Morley's Plaine and Easie Introduction to practical Musick, 1597; Holborne's Citharn Schoole, 1597; 'Seuen Sobs of a Sorrowfull Soule for Sin,' 1597; Dowland's 'First Booke of Songes,' 1597; Morley's 'Canzonets,' 1597; Farnaby's 'Canzonets,' 1598; Cavendish's 'Ayres,' 1599, and some other works. He was succeeded in business at the same address, between 1603 and 1608, by Humfrey Lowndes, who reissued Morley's Introduction. F. K.

SHORT OCTAVE. In the early days of harmony, and indeed until the whole circle of keys was made available in practical music, the chromatic notes in the lowest octave of the keyboard were not wanted, since they were not required as basses. The evidence of pictorial representations shows that as early as the 14th century the expedient was adopted of omitting some of the strings or organ pipes belonging to such keys, and letting their places be taken by strings and pipes tuned to notes below the apparent notes. Various systems of these effecting a saving of space in the organ will be found explained under ORGAN, Vol. III. p. 748. For similar expedients in the SPINET see that article, Vol. V. p. 93. The 'Fitzwilliam Virginal Book' contains indirect evidence that 'short octaves' were in general use early in the 17th century; in one piece, the player's left hand is required to strike this chord which is of course impossible on a full keyboard; on one with a short octave in which the low G sharp key is attached to the string tuned to the low E, the chord does not exceed the limit of the ordinary player's hand. M.

SHORT SCORE, a term meaning the condensation of a vocal or instrumental score into an ad libitum part for piano or organ.

SHRUBSOLE, WILLIAM (b. Canterbury, Jan. 1760; d. London, Jan. 18, 1806), organist and hymn composer, was for seven years chorister at the Cathedral there. He studied the organ during this time, and was in 1782 appointed organist to Bangor Cathedral. While here he gave great offence to the Dean and Chapter by his association with dissenters, and by 'frequenting conventicles'; this led to his dismissal in 1784. He came to London, and immediately got a post as organist at Lady Huntingdon's Chapel, Spafelds, Clerkenwell, which he held till his death. He was buried in Bunhill Fields, and his monument was restored in 1892, mainly by the exertions of F. G. Edwards.

Shrubsole is best remembered by the composition of the fine hymn tune 'Miles Lane,' which appeared in the Gospel Magazine as early as 1779. F. K.

SHUDI, BURKAT (b. Schwanden, Glarus, Switzerland, Mar. 13, 1702; d. London, Aug. 19, 1773), famous harpsichord-maker and founder of the house of Broadwood. Burkatt Shudi, as he inscribed his name upon his instruments, was properly BURKHARDT TSCHUDI, and was a cadet of a noble family belonging to Glarus in Switzerland.¹ He came to England in 1718 as a simple journeyman joiner.² When he turned to harpsichord-making is not known, but we are told by Burney, who knew Shudi and old Kirkman well, that they were both employed in London by Tabel* (a Fleming who had settled in Swallow Street with all the traditions of his famous countrymen, the Ruckers), and Burney calls them Tabel's foremen, perhaps meaning his principal workmen. The anecdote given by Burney, in Roes's Cyclopædia, of Kirkman's hasty wedding with his master's widow, and acquisition with her of Tabel's stock-in-trade, gives no information about Shudi, who, according to the Daily Advertiser, Oct. 5, 1742, 'removed from Meard's Street in Dean Street, Soho, to Great Pulteney Street, Golden Square' (the house occupied by his descendants, the Broadwoods, until 1904). Shudi was then styled 'Harpsichord Maker to H.R.H. the Prince of Wales.' The earliest business record of Shudi occurs in the diary of John Hervey, 1st Earl of Bristol (1688-1742), under date '11th April, 1733. Paid B. Shudi for tuning the harpsichord, 17/6,' which looks like the previous year's tunings, seven in all. The earliest known double harpsichord of his in existence was acquired by Paul de Wit, of Leipzig, in Rome in 1901, bearing in it the name of 'Anna Strada, 1731,' a singer made famous by Handel, who, as a personal friend of Shudi, may have given it to her. (See BROADWOOD; KIRKMAN.)

Kirkman had the King's Arms for the sign of his business in Broad Street, Carnaby Market; Shudi, the Plume of Feathers at the house now 33 Great Pulteney Street. We may trace the choice of signs of these old colleagues and now rival makers to the divided patronage of the King (George II.) and Prince of Wales, who were notoriously unfriendly. No doubt Handel's friendship was of great value to Shudi; few harpsichords were then made, as owing to the relatively high price, and the great expense and trouble of keeping them in order, they were only for the rich. But the tuning and repairing alone would keep a business going; harpsichords lasted long, and were submitted to restoration and alteration that would surprise the amateur of the present day.³

The Shudi harpsichord, formerly Queen Charlotte's, now in Windsor Castle, is dated 1740. It has a 'Lute' stop, a pleasing variation of timbre, and, like the pedal, of English invention in the previous century.

² See Schweizerische Lexikon, Zürich, 1795, art. 'Tschudi.'

James Shudi Broadwood (MS. notes, 1838) accredits his grandfather Shudi with the gift of a harpsichord to Frederick the Great, Shudi being a staunch Protestant and regarding Frederick as the leader and champion of the Protestant cause. Broadwood, moreover, believed that a portrait of Shudi, which remained until a few years since in one of the rooms in Great Pulteney Street, represented him as engaged in tuning the identical harpsichord thus bestowed. Shudi's first wife¹ and two sons are also in the picture, a reproduction of which serves as the frontispiece to Rimbault's History of the Pianoforte. The elder boy, apparently nine years old, was born in 1736. This synchronises the picture with Frederick's victory and the peace concluded the exist, are of the soundest possible workmanship, discrediting Burney's assertion of the want of durability of his harpsichords,² a reproach, however, which Burney goes on to say could not be alleged against Shudi's son-in-law and successor, Broadwood. He, however, praises Shudi's tone as refined and delicate. The Potsdam harpsichords were made with Shudi's Venetian swell, for which the pedals still exist, but it was probably not to the German taste of the time and was therefore removed. Hopkins, in his comprehensive work upon the organ, says the original organ swell was the 'nagshead,' a mere shutter, invented by Abraham Jordan in 1712. But to imitate its effect in the harpsichord we know that Plenius about 1750, and also in following year (1745). But the writer could not find this instrument either in Potsdam or Berlin in 1881. The tradition about it is, however, strengthened by the fact that in 1766 Frederick obtained from Shudi two special double harpsichords for his new palace at Potsdam, and which are now in the Hohenzollern Museum. Instead of the anglicised 'Shudi,' they are accurately inscribed 'Tschudi.' One has silver legs, etc.; the other rests upon a partially gilded stand. Following Burney, who, however, only describes the first one, they appear to have been placed in the apartments of the Princess Amelia and the Prince of Prussia. These instruments, like all Shudi's which still

London, by a pedal movement, gradually raised and lowered a portion of the top or cover. This, coming into general use, Shudi improved upon it by his important invention of the 'Venetian swell' on the principle of a Venetian blind, which he patented Dec. 18, 1769. He probably delayed taking out the patent until it became necessary by his partnership with John Broadwood, who had also become his son-in-law,³ earlier in the same year. This invention was subsequently transferred to the organ. (See SWELL.)

In Pohl's Mozart in London (Vienna, 1867)

² By his marriage with Barbara Shudi, sept. Mar. 12, 1748; married to John Broadwood, Jan. 2, 1769; d. July 8, 1776. The first wife of John Broadwood, she was the mother of James Shudi Broadwood (b. Dec. 20, 1772; d. Aug. 8, 1851), and grandmother of Henry F. Broadwood and Walter Stewart Broadwood.

'Herr Thudy' is credited with the invention of the 'machine stop';¹ but, as he did not patent it, perhaps he was not the actual inventor.

In a Kirkman harpsichord of 1758 there is neither swell nor machine pedal, nor even a 'Buff stop'; but Kirkman was conservative, Shudi progressive, and his harpsichords were less powerful but sweeter in tone than those of Kirkman.

A harpsichord exists inscribed with the joint names of Shudi and Broadwood, dated 1770, although Shudi made harpsichords for himself after that date and independent of the partnership, as we know by existing instruments and by his will. The last harpsichord made at Pulteney Street (Mar. 1793) was made for Henry de la Mainie, of Cork, with his cipher, £84. About 1772 he retired to a house in Charlotte Street, leaving the business premises to his son-in-law, John Broadwood, and died Aug. 19, 1773. The next day a harpsichord was shipped to 'the Empress,' ordered by Joseph II. for Maria Theresa. The harpsichord that was Haydn's, acquired for the museum at Vienna at a cost of £110 sterling, was also a 'Shudi and Broadwood,' but this was the younger Burkat Shudi, who was in partnership with John Broadwood from 1773 to about 1782 and died in 1803.

A list of the existing harpsichords by Shudi and Shudi & Broadwood, as far as is known,² is given on the preceding page: all but one are double harpsichords. The price of a single harpsichord about 1770 was 35 guineas; with octava (i.e. octave string), 40 guineas; with octava and swell, 50 guineas. A double harpsichord with swell was 80 guineas.³

SHUDI, JOSHUA, harpsichord-maker and pupil of Burkat Shudi, appears from his advertisement in the Gazetteer of Jan. 12, 1767, to have set up for himself about that time at the Golden Guitar, Silver Street, Golden Square, London. An advertisement of his widow, Mary Shudi, then of Berwick Street, St. James's, in the Public Advertiser of Jan. 16, 1775, announces his death and her continuance of the business, and as there is a fine harpsichord still existing, said to have a romantic history and bearing the name and date of Joshua Shudi, 1770, it is evident that she continued to use her late husband's name, or dated instruments of his make when she sold them.

SHUTTLEWORTH, OBADIAH (d. circa 1735), son of Thos. Shuttleworth of Spitalfields, who had acquired some money by vending MS. copies of Corelli's works before they were published in England. He was an excellent violinist, and was principal violin at the Swan Tavern concerts, Cornhill, from their beginning in 1728 until his death. He was also a skilful organist, and in 1724 succeeded Philip Hart as organist of St. Michael's, Cornhill, and a few years afterwards was appointed one of the organists of the Temple Church. He composed twelve concertos and some sonatas for the violin, which he kept in MS., his only printed compositions being two concertos adapted from the first and eleventh concertos of Corelli. These were published by Joseph Hare, at the Viol and Flute in Cornhill, and were engraved by T. Cross: the date is about 1726.

SIBELIUS, JEAN (b. Tavastehus, Finland, Dec. 8, 1865), composer, descends from purely Finnish parentage on both sides, his father, a well-known doctor, springing from old peasant stock and his mother from a clerical family. He differs in this respect from his immediate forerunners who laid the foundations of a national school of Finnish music, but who were either settlers from North Germany or partly Swedish by race (see SONG, section FINLAND).

Although Sibelius evinced a remarkable musical talent at an early age, he was given a classical education and studied law at the university of Helsingfors. But the call of his chosen art proved too urgent, and he entered the conservatoire of that city, studying for three years under Wegelius, then the leader of the national movement, standing half-way between Pacius, who only ventured on a somewhat timid racial expression in comparatively simple songs and male-voice choruses, and Kajanus, the first to interpret Finnish folk-lore through the medium of instrumental music. Sibelius afterwards went to Berlin, where he came under the tuition of Bargiel and Becker, and subsequently to Vienna, where he finished his studies with Goldmark and Robert Fuchs. It was perhaps because he never came under the influence of any dominant foreign master that his strong individuality revealed itself at once in the first works written after his return to his native country in 1893. Even then he already had in his possession a symphony for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, 'Kullervo,' the first work of his based on the Finnish national epic, the Kalevala, which, however, he did not allow to be published. An opera, 'The Maid in the Tower,' was produced at Helsingfors in 1896. In little more than three years after his return home, during which time he taught the violin and theory at the Helsingfors conservatoire, he won such recognition as a national composer that a life grant was offered him by the state in 1897, on which he was able to retire and to devote himself entirely to a creative career. His life has since been outwardly uneventful, interrupted only by periodical journeys abroad and a visit to the U.S.A., where in 1914 he resumed his teaching activities for a short time at the New England Conservatoire in Boston. He paid several visits to England, the two most important occurring in 1912, when the fourth symphony was produced at the Birmingham Festival, and in 1921, when he appeared several times at Queen's Hall at the invitation of Sir Henry J. Wood, introducing to London the fifth symphony and 'The Oceanides' (written in 1914 for the combined New York and Boston symphony orchestras). Both his 50th and 60th birthdays were celebrated in Helsingfors as events of national importance. On the former occasion the fifth symphony was produced and on the latter the seventh. (See list below.)

Sibelius is regarded by his compatriots with the veneration which only so highly cultured, united and sanely democratic a people, and perhaps only a small people, can accord to a creative artist of their own race. He is in the fullest sense of the term a musical patriot and has enriched Finnish music, both officially and spontaneously, with a large number of works likely to form part of Finland's national art treasures for all time. Among the works due to his sense of public duty may be mentioned the tone poem, 'Finlandia' (op. 26), 'The Origin of Fire' (op. 32), written for the inauguration of the Finnish National Theatre in 1902, the Marches for the Finnish Infantry and the Scouts (op. 91) and the Carillon (op. 65) for the new church of Berghäll, a modern suburb of Helsingfors. But the composer's real significance as a national tone poet reveals itself in the music based on the country's rich store of ancient saga and due only to the inner promptings of his creative imagination. To this category belong, first and foremost, the symphonic works inspired by the Kalevala, including the 'Kullervo' symphony, and 'The Origin of Fire' for male voices and orchestra already mentioned, as well as the orchestral Legends, 'The Swan of Tuonela' and 'Lemminkäinen's Homecoming' (op. 22), the symphonic fantasia, 'Pohjola's Daughter' (op. 49) and the three piano pieces on the 'Kyllikki' episode (op. 41). No less profoundly national, though more indefinite as regards the poetic basis, are the tone poems for orchestra, 'Night Ride and Sunrise' (op. 55) and 'The Bard' (op. 64), the suite for strings, 'Rakastava' (op. 14), the 'Spring Song' for orchestra (op. 16) which depicts the pathos of the sudden outburst of the brief northern summer season, the funeral march 'In Memoriam' (op. 59) and works for chorus and orchestra such as the 'Impromptu' (op. 19), 'The Ferryman's Brides' (op. 33) and 'The Captive Queen' (op. 48), the latter plainly symbolic of Finland's dependence and yearning for liberty.

The most popular, however, of all these patriotic works, and those which were the first to establish Sibelius's reputation outside his own country, are the symphonic poem, 'En Saga' (op. 9) and the somewhat external and frankly popular 'Finlandia' (op. 26). The latter reproduces so faithfully the outward features and the spirit of Finnish folk-song that it was at first found hard to believe in the originality of the thematic material. The tunes were all the composer's own, but the work has by this time become the treasured possession of his compatriots and the typical musical manifestation of Finnish patriotism for the rest of the world. Still national, but more localised, are the 'Karelia' overture and suite (opp. 10 & 11), which characterise the inhabitants of the south-eastern province of Finland, a type distinguished by a gayer, livelier and more amiable, but less steadfast, temperament than that of the western and northern Finn, the Tavast.

For Sibelius this temporary visit to Karelia was only one of his many excursions, some of which, in the artistic sense, took him even farther afield. In his incidental music especially he transplants himself temporarily to foreign soil and shows himself as a versatile artist by no means always narrowly confined to his native earth. In the music to Adolf Paul's 'King Christian II' (op. 27) and in that to Strindberg's 'Svanenhvit' (op. 54) he is attracted respectively by Swedish history and Swedish fairy-tale; Maeterlinck's 'Pelléas et Mélisande' (op. 46) takes him to mid-Europe, and Procopé's 'Belshazzar's Feast' (op. 51) to the east. The 'Scènes historiques' for orchestra (opp. 25 & 66) touch upon various mediaeval countries. His occasional predilection for classical subjects, as in the symphonic poem, 'The Oceanides' (op. 73), the orchestral dance intermezzi 'The Dryad' (op. 45, No. 1) and 'Pan and Echo' (op. 53), and the 'Song of the Athenians' (op. 31), go far to support Mrs. Rosa Newmarch's assertion that she detects a pre-natal Hellenic strain in the composer. In all his temperamental complexity, which is indeed characteristic of the Finn and explained by the chequered racial and political history to which he is heir, Sibelius represents the type of the Tavast, with his intense love of the native soil, his brooding melancholy and sullen obstinacy in the face of oppression and climatic rigour, which can at times blaze into fierce anger or seek relief in reckless enjoyment of the hour. The predominant traits of his most representative works are an almost passionate adoration of nature, a patriotism that is never vainglorious, and a resoluteness tempered at times by a deep and genuine tenderness free from sentimental ostentation. All this is almost incessantly accompanied by a ground bass that plays up and down the gamut of a fundamental sorrow varying between dreamy sadness and utter despair.

SYMPHONIES.—In content and form the symphonies are entirely personal creations evincing a powerful mentality unrestrained by historical precedent and uncomplicated by æsthetic preconceptions. Sibelius uses just as much of the traditional symphonic form as will hold his ideas together without in any way constraining them. His characteristic method of working with short motives in a kind of mosaic style rather than with elaborate themes which take their recognised places as first, second and auxiliary subjects, would not readily fall into the orthodox formula. He is averse to thematic developments which merely sustain the framework of a movement without expressing anything of vital importance; all that concerns him is a lucid statement of what is uppermost in his mind, without any explanatory parentheses and oratorical perorations. This elliptical manner may disconcert the hearer who expects a certain amount of relaxation into decorative or transitional passages in a symphonic movement, and to him Sibelius may seem almost brutally abrupt and cursory, but familiarity with this compact and pithy style makes it appear immensely satisfying to those who can accustom themselves to understand the general statement of a syllogism without the adduction of minor premises and conclusions.

It is difficult to give decided preference to any one of the seven symphonies, which differ greatly from each other. No. 1 (op. 39) will give most satisfaction to those who insist on purity of classical form regardless of its suitability to the subject-matter. In Nos. 2 and 3 (opp. 43 and 52) a successive advance towards personal freedom may be traced, and in No. 4 (op. 63), with its mystical and almost primitive nature worship, complete maturity in the way of adjusting matter and manner is reached. Most akin in spirit to this work, although less free and fantastic, is the equally admirable No. 6¹ (op. 104), which again seems to have grown from the primeval soil of Finland, while No. 5 (op. 82) is distinguished by a simplicity and comparative gaiety that will probably make it the most readily accessible and popular in time to come. No. 7 (op. 105), in one continuous movement, is distinguished by an almost Beethoven-like grandeur and solemnity that indicates a work written for a special occasion.

The violin concerto (op. 47) may be grouped with the symphonies, with which it has the characteristic freedom of form in common. The solo part, though extremely difficult, gives little opportunity for purely technical display; it is closely interwoven with the symphonic tissue, and the work is therefore neglected by the average virtuoso.

CHAMBER MUSIC, ETC.—The only important chamber work by Sibelius is the string quartet, 'Voces intimæ' (op. 56), cast in suite rather than sonata form. It affords an interesting example of the composer's manner of sustaining one mood throughout a whole movement, in spite of great variety in detail.

Sibelius does not write particularly well for the piano, and although some of his genre pieces may be ranked with similar small works by Grieg or MacDowell, he has contributed nothing of vital significance to keyboard literature. The 'Kyllikki' pieces (op. 41) and the sonata (op. 12) are the most interesting of the piano works, and the 3 sonatinas (op. 67) contain much that is highly characteristic. His writing for violin and violoncello is more congenial to the instruments, but most of the pieces are quite unimportant; notable exceptions are the two works for violin and orchestra (opp. 69 and 77) and 'Malinconia' (op. 20) for violoncello and piano.

VOCAL MUSIC stands next in importance to Sibelius's orchestral works on folk-lore subjects and to the symphonies. The works for chorus and orchestra have already been mentioned, but to a country that cultivates unaccompanied choral singing so extensively as Finland does, his output of partsongs, although small, is of even greater consequence. The three partsongs for male voices (op. 18) are among his best and most individual work, and the Latin Hymn (op. 21) must also be singled out.

The songs of Sibelius are not far short of 100 in number and cover a truly Schubertian variety of subjects. Although the poetry he set is chiefly in the Swedish tongue, it is culled almost exclusively from his native soil, for, owing to Finland's extensive Swedish culture, the native poets Runeberg, Rydberg, Topelius, Tavaststjerna and others on whose work Sibelius has drawn wrote in the Scandinavian language. The songs are predominantly melodic, and in the piano parts mere accompanying on the one side and undue symphonic or pictorial elaboration on the other are avoided with equal felicity. The music illuminates and intensifies the mood and feeling of the poetry without duplicating its verbal imagery.

There is no need to deal at length with the popular aspects of Sibelius's work. Such things as 'Finlandia,' the 'Valse triste' the 'Romance' in D \flat for piano, and songs like 'Black Roses' and 'The Tryst' have become so familiar that they are liable to obscure the larger and profounder works.

Immaturity and dependence on other composers' influences are, strange to say, absent from the beginning. Whatever procedures he may have learnt, as, for instance, from the French impressionists, he absorbed entirely into his musical personality, and affinities with

Grieg and other Scandinavian composers are due to environment rather than to conscious imitation. At weak moments, indeed, there is something of a familiar type of mild northern balladry about his music. Curiously enough, there is little change of outlook or steady progress to be discerned in his chronological catalogue. The early 'En Saga' seems as mature and complete to-day as the last two symphonies, and the latest piano pieces are no better than, and not essentially different from, the first 'six impromptus.'

In summing up the art of Sibelius, it might be said that it takes its root in the soil of his native country, but becomes individualised in its growth by contact with the composer's experience of life, which is never impeded by aesthetic prepossessions. He has a strong personal bias which, combined with his racial consciousness, eschews convention by the substitution of an artistic code of his own. His work is neither deliberately modern nor studiously archaic; it is simply, in its most characteristic manifestations, unlike any other music.

SIBONI, (1) GIUSEPPE (b. Forlì,¹ Jan. 27, 1780; d. Copenhagen, Mar. 23, 1839), made his debut as a tenor singer at Florence in 1797, and after singing in Genoa, Milan and Prague, appeared at the King's Theatre, London, in 1806, and sang for the following three seasons. In 1810, 1811, 1812, 1813 and 1814 he was in Vienna, where he sang at the first performances of Beethoven's 'Wellington's Sieg' and 'Tremate empl.' In 1813 he sang at Prague, and after engagements at Naples and St. Petersburg (1818) settled at Copenhagen in Oct. 1819, where he lived for the rest of his life, occupying the post of director of the Royal Opera and of the Conservatorium. He was married three times, his second wife being a sister of Schubert's friend, von Schober. Many of Paër's tenor parts were written for him.

(2) ERIK ANTON WALDEMAR (b. Copenhagen, Aug. 26, 1829; d. there, Feb. 22, 1892), son of the above, learnt the pianoforte from Courländer and Goetze, composition from F. Vogel, and harmony from J. P. E. Hartmann. In Sept. 1847 he went to Leipzig, and studied under Moscheles and Hauptmann, but on the outbreak of the Schleswig-Holstein insurrection he enlisted as a volunteer in the Danish army, and took part in the campaign of 1848. In 1851 he went to Vienna, and studied counterpoint under Sechter until 1853, when he returned to Copenhagen, visiting Paris on his way. Among his pupils at this time were our own Queen Alexandra, her sister, the Empress of Russia, and the Landgrave

Frederick William of Hesse Cassel. In 1864 Siboni was appointed organist and professor of music at the Royal Academy of Music of Sorø, in Seeland, a post he resigned on account of health in 1883; he returned to Copenhagen. The following are his chief compositions:

1. PUBLISHED

Three Impromptus for PF. for 4 hands (op. 1); Organ Preludes: Quartet for PF and Strings (op. 10), Tragic Overture in C minor. (op. 14); Songs and PF. pieces.

2. UNPUBLISHED

Two Danish operas—'Loreley,' in 1 act; 'Carl den Andens Flugt,' in 3 acts (libretto on subject from English History by Professor Thomas Overkoul), successfully performed at the Royal Theatre of Copenhagen in 1861; Psalm cxi for Bass Solo, Chorus and Orchestra; 'Sabbat Maier,' for Soli, Chorus, Orchestra and Organ; Cantata, 'The Battle of Murtén,' for Soli, Male Chorus and Orchestra; 'The Assault of Copenhagen,' Cantata for Soli, Chorus and Orchestra; two Symphonies, Concert Overture, PF Concerto; String Quartet; PF Trio; Duet for 2 PFs, Romances for PF and Violin, and PF and Violoncello, etc., many of them performed at concerts in Copenhagen.

SICARD, LAURENT, a 17th-century tenor singer, attached to the Sainte-chapelle under Louis XIII. He edited 17 books of 'Airs sérieux et à boire,' 2 and 3 v., with basso continuo, published by Ballard between 1686 and 1683.

SICILIANA, SICILIANO, SICILIENNE, a dance-rhythm closely allied to the Pastorale. The name is derived from a dance-song popular in Sicily, analogous to the Tuscan Rispetti.¹ Walther (Lexicon, 1732) classes these compositions as canzonettas, dividing them into Neapolitan and Sicilian, the latter being like jigs, written in rondo form, in 12-8 or 6-8 time. The Siciliana was sometimes used for the slow movement of suites and sonatas (as in Bach's violin sonata in G minor), but is of more frequent occurrence in vocal music, in which Handel, following the great Italian masters, made great use of it. Amongst later composers, Meyerbeer has applied the name to the movement 'O fortune, à ton caprice' in the finale to Act I. of 'Robert le Diable,' although it has little in common with the older examples. The Siciliana is generally written in 6-8, but sometimes in 12-8 time, and is usually in a minor key. In the bar of six quavers, the first note is usually a dotted quaver, and the fourth a crotchet, followed by two semiquavers. The Siciliana is sometimes in one movement, but usually ends with a repetition of the first part. It should be played rather quickly, but not so fast as the Pastorale, care being taken not to drag the time and to avoid all strong accentuation, smoothness being an important characteristic of this species of composition.

SIEBENHAAR, MALACHIAS (b. Creibitz, Mar. 6, 1616; d. Magdeburg, Jan. 6, 1685), studied at Wittenberg, where he became the friend of Phil. von Zesen. In 1644 he was cantor at the town-school, Magdeburg; in 1656 second preacher at St. Ulrich, there. He composed motets and songs, and collaborated in von Zesen's collections of songs (Q.-L.; Riemann).

SIÉBER (1), JEAN GEORGES (b. Franconie, 1734; d. 1815), horn-player and music publisher, came to Paris in 1758. He was French horn-player at the Comédie Française in 1763, then at the Opéra. It would appear that on the advice of J. C. Bach he took up music publishing in 1771, succeeding Huberty.

(2) His son, GEORGES JULIEN (d. 1834), took over the business (Hôtel d'Aligre, 123 rue Saint Honoré).

The Siébers have published a considerable number of the works of Boccherini, J. C. Bach, Borghi, Gaviniès, St. Georges, Gossec, Haydn, Krumpholtz, Mozart, Pugnani, Stamitz, Vanhall, etc. They have greatly aided in the spread of new symphonic works, not only in Paris, but also in Mannheim and Vienna.

SIEFERT, PAUL (b. Danzig, 1586; d. there, May 6, 1666), a pupil of Sweelinck, at first member of the chapel of Sigismund III. at Warsaw. In 1623 he was organist at St. Mary's, Danzig. He was a prolific composer, who was always quarrelling with the Kapellmeisters for not doing justice to the performance of his works. This led to a published controversy between him and Marco Scacchi (q.v.), who in 1640 had criticised his psalms. Only 2 books of Psalms 4-8 v., a Te Deum, etc., and some organ pieces of his are still in existence (Q.-L.; Riemann).

SIÈGE DE CORINTHE, LE, lyric tragedy in 3 acts; words by Soumet and Balocchi, music by Roasini. Produced Opéra, Oct. 9, 1826. It was an adaptation and extension of 'MAOMETTO SECONDO' (q.v.).

SIFACE, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO GROSSI, (b. La Chiesina, near Pescia, Feb. 12, 1653; d. May 29, 1697), soprano, is said to have been a pupil of Redi. If so, this must have been Tommaso Redi, who became maestro di cappella at Loreto towards the end of the 17th century, although, as he was Siface's contemporary, it seems improbable that he should have been his instructor. Siface was admitted into the Pope's chapel in Apr. 1675. He would seem at that time to have been already known by the sobriquet which has always distinguished him, and which he owed to his famous impersonation of Siface or Syphax in some opera.²

Siface's voice, an artificial soprano, was full and beautiful; his style of singing broad, noble and very expressive. Mancini extols his choir-singing as being remarkable for its excellence. In 1679 he was at Venice for the Carnival, acting with great success in the performances of Pallavicini's 'Nerone,' of which a description may be found in the Mercurie galant of the same year. After this he came to England, and Hawkins mentions him as pre-eminent among all the foreign singers of that period. He was for a time attached to James II.'s chapel,¹ but soon returned to Italy. In the second part of Playford's collection, 'Musick's Handmaid' (1689), there is an air by Purcell, entitled 'Sefacchi's farewell,' which refers to Siface's departure from this country.

This great singer was murdered by the brothers of the Marchesa Marsili,² while travelling from Bologna to Ferrara.³ He is referred to in Dufey's 'Fool's Preferment' (1688), Act. I. Sc. i.

SIGISMONDO D' INDIA, CAVALIERE (b. Palermo, end of 16th cent.), director of the chamber music of the Duke of Savoy; from 1612 maestro di cappella of the Cardinal Maurice of Savoy. In 1627 the cardinal is called Sabandia. Sigismondo lived at Turin; he composed two books of church concerts for voices, 1 book of motets, 8 books of madrigals, 2 books of villanelle, etc. (See Q.-L.)

SIGNA, opera in 2 acts, libretto (founded on Ouida's story) by G. à Beckett, H. Rudall, and F. E. Weatherley; Italian version by G. Mazzucato. Music by F. H. Cowen. Produced (in Italian) Teatro dal Verme, Milan, Nov. 12, 1893, in 4 acts, reduced to 3, and ultimately to 2; Covent Garden, June 30, 1894. M.

SIGNALS, see MILITARY SOUNDS AND SIGNALS.

SIGNATURE. (1) KEY-SIGNATURE (Fr. armure, armature; signes accidentales; Ger. Vorzeichnung, properly reguläre Vorzeichnung). The group of sharp or flat signs placed at the beginning of a composition, immediately after the clef, or in the course of a composition generally after a double-bar. They affect all notes of the same names as the degrees on which they stand, and thus define the key, major or minor, of the composition (cf. KEY, SCALE, ACCIDENTAL).

The following is a table of key signatures:

(2) TIME-SIGNATURE (Lat. signum modi, vel temporis, vel prolationis; Ger. Taktzeichen). A sign placed after the clef and key signature (where one is used) in order to give notice of the time in which a composition is written.

These signs and their evolution are fully described under NOTATION, Vol. III. p. 656. (See also TIME.)

SIGNORUCCI, POMPEO, maestro di cappella, 1794, and organist at Borgo San Sepolcro (Toscana, Arezzo); in 1608 maestro di cappella at Pisa Cathedral and Accademico Unisono of Perugia. Banchieri⁴ calls him maestro di cappella of Siena. He wrote several books of masses, psalms, madrigals and church concerts, some motets and canzoni in collective volumes (Q.-L.).

SIGTENHORST MEYER, BERNHARD VAN DER (b. Amsterdam, June 17, 1888), one of the most independent and most distinctively national composers among the younger Dutch school. He was a pupil of Bernard Zweers, Daniel de Lange and J. B. C. de Pauw, besides studying the methods of French masters in Paris. Any tendencies towards a French style of writing were quickly removed by his determination to retain his Dutch nationality as a composer and by a journey to Java and the East where he received many impressions subsequently expressed in his music. Himself a pianist of considerable ability, a large proportion of his music consists of pieces for his own instrument describing his impressions of various places. Technically there is little of the 'impressionist' in his work, and besides the piano-forte pieces he has attempted many other forms. His one opera, 'De Verzoeking van Boeddha' (The Temptation of Buddha) to words by Rient van Santen, is written for soli, women's chorus, string orchestra, harps and celesta.

The following is a list of his works:

- ⁴ De Witte Reiger and 'Het Naardermeer,' two songs published before his op. 1 and without opus number.
- Op. 1. Van de Bloemen, four pieces for piano.
 2. Het Oude China, four pieces for piano.
 3. By den Tempel, 3 liederen.
 4. Van de Vogels, 3 pieces for piano.
 5. Fluitelingen, 3 liederen.
 6. Stemmingen, 3 liederen.
 7. Stabat Mater for vocal quartet or mixed choir a capella.
 8. De Verzoeking van Boeddha, opera.
 9. 6 Gesichten op den Paj, for piano.
 10. Doodte Steden, 2 liederen.
 11. De Maas, 3 pieces for piano.
 12. St. Quentin, 3 pieces for piano.
 13. 1st String Quartet (in 3 movements): The Worship of the Magi, The Flight into Egypt, The Driving of the Money Changers out of the Temple, The Burial, and The Angels by the Grave.
 14. Oude Kasteelen, 3 pieces for piano.

SIGURD, opera in 5 acts; text by Du Locle and A. Blau, music by Ernest Reyer. Produced Brussels, Jan. 7, 1884; Covent Garden, July 15 of the same year; Opéra, Paris, June 12, 1885.

SILAS, ÉDOUARD (b. Amsterdam, Aug. 22, 1827; d. London, Feb. 8, 1909), pianist and composer. His first teacher was Neher, one of the court orchestra at Mannheim. He first appeared in public at Amsterdam in 1837; he studied the piano in 1839 with Lacombe, in 1842 he was placed under Kalkbrenner at Paris, and soon afterwards entered the Conservatoire under Benoist for the organ and Halévy for composition. In 1849 he obtained the first prize for the former. In 1850 he came to England; played first at Liverpool, and made his first appearance in London at the Musical Union, May 21. From that date Silas was established in London as teacher, and as organist of the Roman Catholic chapel at Kingston-on-Thames. His oratorio 'Joash' (words compiled by G. Linley) was produced at the Norwich Festival of 1863. A symphony in A (op. 19) was produced by the Musical Society of London, Apr. 22, 1863; repeated at the Crystal Palace, Feb. 20, 1864; and afterwards published. A concerto for PF. and orchestra in D minor is also published. A fantasia and an Élégie, both for PF. and orchestra, were given at the Crystal Palace in 1865 and 1873. Three Mythological Pieces for orchestra were played at a Philharmonic Concert in 1888. In 1866 he received the prize of the Belgian competition for sacred music for his Mass for four voices and organ.

Silas is the author of a Treatise on Musical Notation, and an Essay on a new method of Harmony—both unpublished. An English opera, 'Nitocris'; overture and incidental music to 'Fanchette'; a musical comédietta, 'Love's Dilemma'; a Cantata; an Ave Verum; O Salutaris (2); a symphony in C major; and other compositions remained unpublished. The list of his published instrumental works is very large, and includes many organ pieces which became popular, PF. pieces, among which the best known are gavotte in E minor, bourrée in G minor, 'Malvina' (romance), suite in A minor, op. 103, six duets, etc. etc.

Silas was for many years a teacher of harmony at the G.S.M. and the London Academy of Music.

SILBERMANN, a family of organ-builders, clavicord and pianoforte makers, of Saxon origin, of whom the most renowned were (1) ANDREAS (b. Kleinbobritzsch, near Frauen-stein, Saxony, May 16, 1678; d. Mar. 16, 1734¹), who built the Strassburg Cathedral organ, and (2) GOTTFRIED, who built the organs of Freiberg and Dresden, and was the first to construct the pianoforte in Germany. His work receives special notice below. Following Gerber's Lexicon, they were sons² of Michael Silbermann, a carpenter at Kleinbobritzsch. Andreas was brought up to his father's craft, and travelled, according to the custom of the country, in 1700. He learnt organ-building, and in 1703 we find him settled in that vocation at Strassburg. According to Hopkins and Rimbault³ he built the Strassburg organ—his greatest work of 29 recorded by them—in 1714–16. He had nine sons, of whom three were organ-builders, and after the father's death carried on the business in common. Of the three, (3) JOHANN ANDREAS, the eldest (b. Strassburg, June 26, 1712; d. Feb. 11, 1783), built the Predigerkirche organ at Strassburg, and that of the Abbey of St. Blaise in the Black Forest. In all he built fifty-four organs, in addition to writing a history of the city of Strassburg, published 1775. His son (4) JOHANN JOSIAS (d. June 3, 1786) was a musical instrument maker. The next son of Andreas, (5) JOHANN DANIEL (b. Mar. 31, 1717; d. Leipzig, May 6, 1766), was employed by his uncle (2) GOTTFRIED, and was intrusted after his uncle's death with the completion of the famous organ (in the Hofkirche) in Dresden. Mooser,⁴ however, who claims to follow good authorities, attributes the completion of this instrument to Zacharias Hildebrand. Be this as it may, Johann Daniel remained at Dresden, a keyed-instrument maker and constructor of ingenious barrel-organs. A composition of his is preserved in Marburg's 'Raccolta' (1757). (6) JOHANN HEINRICH, the youngest son of Andreas (b. Sept. 24, 1727; d. Strassburg, Jan. 15, 1799). His pianofortes were well known in Paris; he made them with organ pedals, and constructed a harpsichord of which the longest strings were of what may be called the natural length, 16 feet!

But the greatest of the Silbermann family was (2) GOTTFRIED (b. Kleinbobritzsch, near Frauenstein, Jan. 14,⁵ 1683; d. Dresden, Aug. 4, 1753). He was at first placed with a bookbinder, but soon quitted him and went to (1) ANDREAS at Strassburg. Having got into trouble by the attempted abduction of a nun, he had to quit that city in 1707 and go back to Frauenstein, where he built his first organ (afterwards destroyed by fire, the fate of several of his instruments). He appears to have settled at Freiberg in 1709, and remained there for some years. He built the cathedral organ there in 1714. He built, in all, forty-seven organs in Saxony.¹ He never married, and died while engaged upon his finest work, the Dresden court organ. Although receiving what we should call very low prices for his organs, by living a frugal life he became comparatively rich, and his talent and exceptional force of character enabled him to achieve an eminent position.

His clavichords were as celebrated as his organs. Emanuel Bach had one of them for nearly half a century, and the instrument, many years after it was made, when heard under the hands of that gifted and sympathetic player, excited the admiration of Burney.² It cannot be doubted that he was the first German who made a pianoforte. He was already settled in Dresden in 1725, when König translated into German Scipione Maffei's account of the invention of the pianoforte at Florence by Cristofori. This fact has been already mentioned (see PIANOFORTE), and we now add some further particulars gained by personal search and inspection at Potsdam in 1881. We know from Agricola, one of J. S. Bach's pupils, that in 1736 Gottfried Silbermann submitted two pianofortes of his make to that great master. Bach finding much fault with them, Gottfried was annoyed, and for some time desisted from further experiments in that direction. It is possible that the intercourse between Dresden and Northern Italy enabled him, either then or later, to see a Florentine pianoforte. It is certain that three grand pianofortes made by him and acquired by Frederick the Great³ for Potsdam—where they still remain in the music-rooms of the Stadtschloss, Sans Souci and Neues Palais,⁴ inhabited by that monarch—are, with unimportant differences, repetitions of the Cristofori pianofortes existing at Florence. Frederick is said to have acquired more than three, but no others are now to be found. Burney's depreciation of the work of Germans in their own country finds no support in the admirable work of Gottfried Silbermann in these pianofortes. If its durability needed other testimony, we might refer to one of his pianofortes which Zelter met with at Weimar in 1804, and praised to Goethe; and to another spoken of by Mooser in 1857 as having been up to a then recent date used at the meetings of the Freemasons' Lodge at

SILCHER, FRIEDRICH (b. Schnaith, near Schorndorf, Württemberg, June 27, 1789; d. Tübingen, Aug. 26, 1860), composer of Lieder, was taught music by his father, and by Auberlin, organist at Fellbach, near Stuttgart. He was educated for a schoolmaster, and his first post was at Ludwigsburg, where he began to compose. In 1815 he took a conductorship at Stuttgart, and composed a cantata, which procured him, in 1817, the post of conductor to the University of Tübingen. This he held till 1860, when he retired, and died shortly after. His most important publications are—'Sechs vierstimmige Hymnen' (Laupp), 'Dreistimmiges würtemb. Choralbuch' (ibid.), and 'Swabian, Thuringian, and Franconian Volkslieder,' 12 parts), many of which are his own compositions. Several of Silcher's melodies published in his 'Sammlung deutscher Volkslieder,' etc., have become true songs of the people, such as 'Ännchen von Tharau,' 'Morgen muss ich fort von hier,' 'Ich weiss nicht was soll es bedeuten,' 'Zu Strassburg auf der Schanz,' etc. The Lieder were published simultaneously for one and two voices with PF. and for four men's voices. He edited a Method for harmony and composition in 1851. A biographical sketch of Silcher by Köstlin appeared in 1877. F. G.

SILOTI, ALEXANDER (b. near Charkov, Southern Russia, Oct. 10, 1863; d. 1919), a remarkable pianist, and one of the most eminent of Liszt's pupils. He was born on his father's estate, studied at the Moscow Conservatorium from 1875-81 under Swerew, Nicolas Rubinstein, Tchaikovsky and Hubert, and from 1883-86 with Liszt. After 1883, when he appeared at Leipzig at a concert of the Tonkünstlerversammlung, he was regarded as one of the leading Russian pianists, but he had already appeared with success in Moscow in 1880. From that year till 1890 he was professor at the Moscow Conservatorium; then he sojourned for several years out of his own country in such places as Frankfort-on-Main, Antwerp and Leipzig, conducted the Moscow Philharmonic concerts in 1901-02, and

⁴ The Silbermann piano Burney mentions was that of the Neues Palais. He must have heard the one at Sans Souci, although he does not say so. In all probability the piano J. S. Bach played upon specially, on the occasion of his visit to Frederick the Great, was the one still in the Stadtschloss, the town palace of Potsdam.

He remained in Russia through the Revolution, but escaped in 1919, coming to England where he played, as well as in Germany, and subsequently going to America.

SILVA, ANDREAS DE, was a singer in the Papal Chapel, 1519, and the first to be described as Papal composer.¹ In 1522 he appears to have been in the chapel of the Duke of Mantua. It is natural to identify him with Andreas Sylvanus, from whom Glarean quotes the Kyrie and Osanna of a very peculiar Mass for three voices, 'Malheur me bat,' also with the Andreas Sylvanus to whom Sebastian Virdung refers as the intimate friend for whom he wrote his Musica getutschet, 1511. But Eitner in Q.-L. and Monatshefte, xxvi. p. 47, refuses to accept this identification, because he thinks Virdung's friend must have been a German; and if de Silva had been a German it is unlikely that his works would have found their way into French collections like those of Attaignant, or Italian collections like those of Gardane and Petrucci. This reasoning, however, is not very convincing, all the less that Eitner himself assumes that the Sylvanus who is the author of the Mass 'Malheur me bat' is identical with the Sylvanus the friend of Virdung. In any case the Sylvanus of the Mass 'Malheur me bat' is more likely to have been a Netherlander than a German and to be identical with de Silva than with the Sylvanus of Virdung. That de Silva was known in Germany appears from the reception of an Italian madrigal by him, 'Chesentisti Madonna,' in Ott's 'Liederbuch,' 1544, attributed to him in all the four part-books. This madrigal has a surprising degree of expressiveness for the time at which it must be supposed to have been written. Besides the works of Silva in the collections of the time, there are two masses and seven motets by him in the Archives of the Papal Chapel. One of the motets, 'Illumina oculos meos, a 6,' deserves notice, as being that on which Palestrina based one of his more important masses a 6, bearing the same title. Among other MS. motets of Silva enumerated in Q.-L. there are two mentioned together, 'Virtute magna' and 'O Regem coeli,' both a 4. Possibly the theme of the two four-part masses of Palestrina in his first book, 1554, may be taken from these motets. J. R. M.

SILVANA, also called 'Silvana das Waldmädchen,' or 'das stumme Waldmädchen'—the dumb Wood-maiden; romantic opera in 3 acts; words by F. K. Hiemer; music by Weber; completed Feb. 23, 1810; produced Frankfurt, Sept. 18, 1810. It is probably founded to some extent on his early opera 'Das Waldmädchen' (1800), which was afterwards burnt; and was to a small extent employed in 'Abu Hassan' and 'Freischütz.' The overture was used by Weber as the prelude to his music for the wedding of Prince John of Saxony; and he wrote seven variations for clarinet and P.F., for H. Bärmann, on an air from it, 'Warum musst' ich.' It was produced in English (as 'Sylvana'), Surrey Theatre, under Elliston's management, Sept. 2, 1828. It was again revived, with a revised libretto by Herr Pasqué, and with 'musical amplifications,' at Hamburg and Lübeck in the spring of 1885. G.

SILVANI, GROSEFFO ANTONIO (b. Bologna, late 17th cent.; d. before 1727), was maestro di cappella at S. Stefano from 1702-25. 2. Inni sacri per tutto l'anno a voce sola. 1702.
3. Sacri responsori per . . . la settimana santa a 4 voci. 1704.

SIMMS, (1) JOHN (b. Stourbridge, Wores., 1744; d. 1824), organist and violinist, founder of a family of organists. He devoted much time to the construction and improvement of various musical instruments, and was one of the early makers of the 'upright harpsichord.' His eight sons held organistships in Birmingham, Stourbridge and the neighbourhood. The most noted of these were (2) BISHOP, organist of St. Philip's Church (now the Cathedral), 1790-1830, and St. Mary's Chapel, Birmingham. He played at the Commemoration Service held at St. Philip's after the Battle of Waterloo; (3) JAMES, organist of Bromsgrove and Chaddesley; (4) EDWARD, organist of Ashburn and Oakover; (5) JESSE, organist of Handsworth Old Church; (6) SAMUEL, organist of St. Thomas's Church, Stourbridge, for fifty-four years; (7) HENRY, also organist at Stourbridge. (8) HENRY, second son of Jesse (5), succeeded Bishop at St. Philip's and held the post for forty years.

(9) EDWARD (b. 1800; d. 1892), organist, pianist and teacher, eldest son of Jesse (5), was organist at St. Michael's Church, Coventry, for fifty-eight years and conductor of the Coventry Choral Union, studied under Kalkbrenner in London whilst still a boy, and at the age of 13 was appointed organist at Wombourne, near Wolverhampton. George Eliot was one of his pupils.

(10) SAMUEL (b. 1835; d. 1885), son of Samuel (6), succeeded his father as organist at St. Thomas's Church, Stourbridge, remaining there for twenty-six years. He then became organist and choirmaster at St. Cyprian's Church, Hay Mills, Birmingham, until his death five years later. His son, (11) SAMUEL, succeeded him (1885). The Birmingham Glee Union singers were connected with St. Cyprian's; and the choir furnished some of the most noted local singers at the Birmingham Musical Festivals.

(12) FRANCIS HENRY (b. Stourbridge, 1853; d. New Orleans, U.S.A., 1901), grandson of Henry (7), was a pupil of Dr. Arnold. In 1875 he gained in open competition the organistship of All Saints Church, Ryde, I. W. He remained there for fourteen years, and founded and conducted the Ryde Philharmonic Society, which is still (1926) in existence. In 1889 he went to New Orleans to train and introduce the first boy-choir in that city. This was in connexion with St. Paul's Episcopal Church, where he was organist and choirmaster until his death. He was director of music at the H. Sophie Newcomb Memorial College (Tulane University).

SIMON, ANTON YULEVICH (b. France, 1851), composer, received his musical education at the Paris Conservatoire and migrated to Moscow in 1871, where he became conductor to the Théâtre Bouffe. He was appointed professor of the pianoforte to the school of the Philharmonic Society in 1891, and a year or two later he was made superintendent of the orchestras of the imperial theatres in Moscow and musical director of the Alexandrovsky Institute. The following is a summary of his principal works :

Wilde, Moscow, 1900); 'The Stars' (ballet in 5 acts, Moscow, 1902); 'Living Flowers' (op. 58, ballet in 1 act); 'Kamerada' (mime-drama in 4 acts, Moscow, 1902).

G.

SIMONETTI, ACHILLE (b. Turin, June 12, 1859), violinist and composer. In early youth he studied the violin under Gamba, and composition under Pedrotti, late principal of Rossini's Conservatorio in Pesaro. Later, proceeding to Genoa, he placed himself in the hands of Camillo Sivori, who took great interest in him, and whose clear-cut style and Italian temperament are reflected in his playing. After some successful appearances in Marseilles and Lyons he went to Paris to receive further tuition from Charles Dancla (violin), and Massenet (counterpoint), passed four winters at Nice, and then visited England to fulfil an engagement to tour with the Marie Rozé Company and B. Schönbberger the pianist. He settled in London and became well known as soloist and member of the LONDON TRIO (q.v.), whilst he occasionally visited Vienna and other continental cities. Besides a series of graceful soli for the violin, which have achieved considerable popularity, he wrote two sonatas for violin and pianoforte and two string quartets.

SIMONS-CANDEILLE, see CANDEILLE (2).
SIMOUTRE, NICOLAS EUGÈNE (b. Mirecourt, Apr. 19, 1839), a French violin-maker, the patentee of certain inventions by which he claimed to improve the tone of violins and instruments of that class—either of defective or feeble timbre. The son of a lutier, he was first the pupil of his father, then of Darce in Paris and lastly of Roth in Strassburg. He began work as an independent maker at Basle in 1859, and there published in 1883 his brochure entitled Aux amateurs du violon. In 1886 a second brochure—Un Progrès en lutherie—appeared, a German edition being published at the same time entitled Ein Fortschritt in der Geigenbaukunst (Rixheim, 1886, 2nd edition, 1887). In 1889 he brought out a small Supplement to the above pamphlets. The two last-named works deal mainly with his inventions. The principal of these, called 'Le Support harmonique,' was based upon Savart's scientific discovery that the belly of a violin vibrates unequally. Testing the nodal lines formed by sand distributed upon the belly of a violin when in vibration, Simoutre observed that the fibres of the wood vibrated in alternate sections, i.e. one and three vibrated in unison, likewise two and four, and that the vibrations of one and two were as much in opposition to one another as were three and four. Starting from this point, he applied himself to the discovery of a system which should stop the vibrations of alternate fibre sections so as to allow the rest to vibrate in unison, and this he claimed to do with his patent 'support harmonique.' Briefly, this invention consists in glueing two small sections of wood—variable in form and dimensions according to the effect required—upon the centre of the belly and back of the violin transversely. This method, he considered, concentrated the vibrations near the sound-post—where they are most numerous—and by so doing increased the sonority of the instrument so furnished, and at the same time prevented the belly from sinking under the pressure of the bridge. Various experiments for ascertaining the best thickness and forms of the 'support harmonique' resulted in the discovery that an innovation in the form of the bass bar was necessary where the new system was employed. A semi-detached bar slightly scooped out at the centre, and glued only at each end to the belly of the violin, was patented by Simoutre, that form proving most efficacious where the violin was free from cracks, etc. A third patent applies to the setting of the sound-post in one of the two small circular grooves made for it in the lower 'support harmonique.' In 1896 this maker settled in Paris at 38 Rue de l'Échiquier, where he worked for many years in partnership with his son.

SIMPSON, (SYMPSON) CHRISTOPHER (d. 1669), a distinguished 17th-century viola da gamba player famous in his day both as an executant and a theoretic musician. Very little is known of his life, and the exact date of his birth remains problematical, but the few facts that have come to light reveal him to have been the son of a Yorkshire yeoman—a descendant of some Nottinghamshire Simpsons, who spelt their name with a y (vide Harl. MS. 5800)—a man commended by his fellows for his upright habits, and a staunch upholder of the Cavalier Party against the Parliament. He joined the Royalist army under the command of William Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle, in 1643. He alludes in a passing phrase to the hardships and poverty he endured at this period in his 'Introduction' to the second edition of his Division Viol, 1667, when he thanks his patron—Sir Robert Bolles¹ for the 'Cheerful Maintenance' he had afforded him. This Sir Robert Bolles and his family were all ardent patrons of music, and at the end of the civil war Christopher Simpson enjoyed their hospitality at their residence, Scampton, Lincolnshire. To him was assigned the musical tuition of Sir Robert's son and heir, John Bolles, and a certain Sir John Barber, and in this congenial musical atmosphere Simpson began to write his valuable book of instructions for the gamba, which he called The Division Viol. The excellence of this work is confirmed by Sir Roger L'Estrange, himself a distinguished gamba player, who remarks in the preface to the second edition that 'it is not only the Best but the only Treatise I find extant upon this argument.' Simpson's pupil, John Bolles, attained a high degree of proficiency as a viola da gamba player, and a laudatory 'Ode' addressed to him while in Rome is inserted by Simpson, with pardonable pride, in the second edition of his Division Viol. On assuming the title at the death of his father, John Bolles showed his regard for his old master by continuing the patronage which had previously been extended him by Sir Robert. This was fortunate; as was also the fact that Simpson's publications brought him in a good income, for Sir R. Bolles, whose will he witnessed, left him only the sum of £5. Before that event came to pass the eminent gambist had purchased a house and farm—'Hunt-house'—near Pickering, in Yorkshire, and settled this property, by deed, upon his nephew Christopher the son of Stephen Simpson. According to evidence gained from Simpson's will, he died in the year 1669, between the 5th May and the 29th July. Apparently his demise took place at one of Sir John Bolles's residences, for although Hawkins (History) states that he died at Turnstile, Holborn, where he had lived for many years, his contemporary Anthony à Wood records 'Anno 1669, Mr. Christopher Symphon, a famous musitian, died at Sir John Bolles house, whether in Lyncolnshire or London I know not.' Although nothing is definitely known as to whether Simpson married or not, it may be assumed, from his leaving all his property to his nephew, and all his 'musick-books or whatsoever is of that concernment' to Sir John Bolles, that he did not.

Simpson's skill was greatly respected by his contemporaries, and musicians such as Locke, Salmon, Mace, and Sir Roger L'Estrange have shown their esteem by their various complimentary allusions to him. He lived in an age when the gamba was much cultivated, both by professionals and amateurs; but besides being the best authority on that instrument he was a composer of talent, and Mace (Musick's Monument, 1676) ranks him with William Lawes and John Jenkins as a composer of 'Fancies.' The Bodleian (Mus. Sch.) possesses a portrait of Simpson, and there is a miniature of him by T. Flaxman.

SIMPSON, JOHN (d. circa 1747), a London music-publisher and instrument-seller of some note. As may be gathered from one of his early engraved labels, he had been employed by Mrs.

Hare of Cornhill, the widow of Joseph HARE (q.v.), but about 1734 he began business on his own account at the 'Viol and Flute' in Sweeting's Alley, a street running out of Cornhill, at the back part of the Royal Exchange. In Simpson's early business career this was named 'Swithen's Alley,' but in 1741 references to Simpson give this address indifferently with 'Sweeting's Alley.' He first published sheet songs, which he afterwards gathered into the two volumes as 'Thesaurus musicus' (c. 1745-47), and had probably bought the stock and plates of both Mrs. Hare and B. Cooke. He was in business connexion with the proprietors of the 'Printing-house in Bow Church yard,' who were successors to CLUER (q.v.).

Simpson's most notable publications are: 'Thesaurus musicus,' in which 'God save the King' probably first appeared; Carey's 'Musical Century,' 1740; 'Calliope,' 1746; and much other music now of considerable antiquarian interest. He was succeeded by John Cox, who reissued from Simpson's plates.

At Cox's death, or retirement, Robert Bremner, Thorowgood, and the Thompson family became possessed of many of Simpson's plates, and republished some of his works. In 1770, and thirty years later, Simpson's premises were occupied by John and James Simpson, apparently descendants, who were flute-makers, and, in a small way, music-publishers. Later than this (c. 1825) a John Simpson was manufacturer and teacher of the flute and flageolet at 266 Regent Street.

He was subsequently in the royal band at Copenhagen. He published the following works: 'Opusculum neuer Pauanen, Galliarden, Couranten vnd Volten,' Frankfurt, 1610; 'Pauanen, Volten und Galliarden, Frankfurt, 1611; 'Opus Newer Paduanen, Galliarden, Intradon, . . . mit 5 Stim.,' Hamburg, 1617, and 'Taffel Consort allerhand lustige Lieder von 4 Instrumenten und Generalbass,' Hamburg, 1621, containing, besides pieces by Simpson himself, some by Peter Phillips, John Dowland, Robert and Edward Johnson, and others.

SIMROCK, a famous German music-publishing house, founded in 1790 at Bonn by (1) NIKOLAUS SIMROCK (1752-1834), second waldhorn player in the Elector's band, to which Beethoven and his father belonged. The first of Beethoven's works on which Simrock's name appears as original publisher is the Kreutzer Sonata, op. 47, issued in 1805. But he published for Beethoven an 'Edition très correcte' of the two sonatas in G and D minor (op. 31, Nos. 1 and 2), which Nageli had printed so shamefully; and there is evidence in the letters that Simrock was concerned in others of Beethoven's early works. The next was the sextet for strings and two horns, op. 81b (1810); then the two sonatas for PF. and violoncello, op. 102 (1817); the ten themes with variations for PF. and violin or flute, op. 107 (1820).

He was succeeded in 1834 by (2) PETER JOSEPH (d. 1888), and about 1870 his successor, (3) FRITZ AUGUST (b. Jan. 2, 1838; d. Lausanne, Aug. 20, 1901), founded the Berlin house, and there published the principal works of Brahms. (Q.-L.) His nephew (4) HANS (d. Berlin, June 26, 1910) succeeded, but in 1902 the firm became a company. G.

Šin studied at the Prague Conservatoire, became a professor in 1920, and in 1922 was appointed the administrative head of that institution. He has written a symphonic poem, 'Tilottama'; a string quartet; and a considerable number of pianoforte pieces, some admirably adapted for children's use; two albums of pianoforte pieces (publishers, Chadim and Hudební Matic, Prague). SINCLAIR, GEORGE ROBERTSON, Mus.D. (b. Croydon, Oct. 28, 1863; d. Birmingham, Feb. 7, 1917), son of Robert Sharpe Sinclair, LL.D., Director of Public Instruction in India, was educated at St. Michael's College, Tenbury, and at the Royal Irish Academy of Music. He studied successively under Sir Frederick Gore Ouseley, Sir Robert Stewart and Dr. C. H. Lloyd. In 1879 he became assistant organist of Gloucester Cathedral, and organist and choirmaster of St. Mary de Crypt, Gloucester; in 1880, at the age of 17, he was appointed organist and choirmaster of Truro Cathedral. From 1889 until his death he filled the post of organist of Hereford Cathedral with distinction, and his conducting of the Hereford (Three Choirs) Festivals from 1891 to 1912 brought him into contact with the most eminent English musicians of the time, and ripened his experience as a conductor. In this capacity he exhibited very remarkable powers, being in sympathy with every school of excellence, and being able to impress his own reading of the classical and other works upon all under his command. He was conductor of various Hereford and Herefordshire societies, both choral and orchestral, and of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society (1899-1917). In 1895 he was made an honorary member of the R.A.M., having been L.R.A.M. since 1887, and received the degree of Mus.D. from the Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1904 he was made an honorary fellow of the R.C.O. He was also an ardent Freemason, a Past Grand Organist of England, a Past Master of the Palladian Lodge, No. 120, and Master of the 'Vaga' Lodge, No. 3146. His impetuous character, his skilful pedal-playing, the barking of his dog, and other things, are immortalised in the eleventh variation of Elgar's 'Enigma' set for orchestra. (See Mus. T., 1906, pp. 168 ff.) M.

SINCLAIR, JOHN (b. near Edinburgh, Dec. 9, 1791; d. Margate, Sept. 23, 1857), was instructed in music from childhood, and while still young joined the band of a Scotch regiment as a clarinet-player. He also taught singing in Aberdeen, and acquired sufficient means to purchase his discharge from the regiment. Possessed of a fine tenor voice, he was desirous of trying his fortune upon the stage, came to London and appeared anonymously as Capt. Cheerly in Shield's 'Lock and Key' at the Haymarket, Sept. 7, 1810. His success led to his becoming a pupil of Thomas Welsh. He was engaged at Covent Garden, where he appeared Sept. 30, 1811, as Don Carlos in Sheridan and Linley's 'Duenna.' He remained there for seven seasons, during which he had many original parts. He was the first singer of the long popular recitative and air 'The Pilgrim of Love' in Bishop's 'Noble Outlaw,' produced Apr. 7, 1815. He also sang originally in Bishop's 'Guy Mannerling' and 'The Slave,' and Davy's 'Rob Roy,' and acquired great popularity by his performance of Apollo in 'Midas.' In Apr. 1819 he visited Paris and studied under Pellegriani, and thence proceeded to Milan and placed himself under Banderelli. In May 1821 he went to Naples, where he received advice and instruction from Rossini. In 1822 he sang, mostly in Rossini's operas, at Pisa and Bologna. In 1823 he was engaged at Venice, where Rossini wrote for him the part of Idreno in 'Semiramide.' After singing at Genoa he returned to England, and reappeared at Covent Garden, Nov. 19, 1823, as Prince Orlando in 'The Cabinet,' his voice and style having greatly improved. He continued at the theatre for a season or two; in 1828 and 1829 was engaged at the Adelphi, and in 1829-30 at Drury Lane. He then visited America; and on his return retired from public life. W. H. SINDING, CHRISTIAN (b. Kongberg, Norway, Jan. 11, 1856), became a student at Leipzig, at Munich and at Berlin, after which he settled in Christiania and devoted himself to composition.

A very talented pianist, he has written much for his own instrument as well as for stringed instruments. His principal works are the rondo infinito for orchestra, op. 42; two violin concertos (in A, op. 45, and D major, op. 60); piano concerto in D flat, op. 6; quintet in E minor, op. 5; trio in D major, op. 23; variations for two pianos, op. 2; suite, op. 3; studies, op. 7; sonatas for violin and piano; suite for violin and piano, op. 14; caprices, op. 44; burlesques, op. 48; six pieces, op. 49; string quartet, op. 70; three symphonies (D minor, op. 21; D major, op. 83; F major, op. 121); besides many songs and many arrangements of Folk-songs. An opera, 'Det Hellige Bjerg' (The Holy Mount), was produced at Dessau in 1914. Nikisch produced the F major symphony at Leipzig in 1921. Sinding's music is characterised by great facility in construction, tunefulness, variety and elegance. He is always intelligent, and even if not deep is a very pleasing writer, who secures the interest of his auditor.

SINGAKADEMIE, see BERLIN.

SINGING is the musical expression of the voice. It is part of our natural condition to possess organs for the production of sound, and perceptions to make them musical, and, being thus equipped, it is but natural that the art of music should be intimately associated with human life.

Like many of the other animals, we express our pain, sorrow, joy, pleasure, hunger, rage, satisfaction and love in sounds which have their vital and instinctive meaning like any of the actions or gestures associated with the elemental functions of human nature. We have no more necessity than they have, however imitative we may be, to look to external phenomena for the origin of this wonderful possession. It is natural to the infant to cry when it is cold or hungry, and to crow when it is pleased. So, with the growth of sensibility and perception, a little child knows how to plead with its voice, in tones quite different from those of mere asking, without any vocal training whatever. The same instinct which has enabled the child to appeal to its parents and fellow-creatures has taught man to approach his God with praise and supplication. But the most remarkable indication of the instinctiveness of song is the characteristic growth of the voice organs at the outset of manhood and womanhood. It is as if the full development of the body were crowned with the completion of the instruments of sound, which express with such particular eloquence the passions and emotions attendant upon the great mystery of sex.

Through the growth and refinement of our perceptions, the art of singing becomes the musical expression of every emotion suggested by thought and imagination.

It not infrequently happens that individuals are born to attain by the light of nature to a high degree of accomplishment in this art; and even when this is not so, the inherent sincerity of imperfect singing can sometimes appeal more powerfully to our feelings than the most efficient training could make it do. While the whole of humanity is probably in some measure acquainted with the feeling of a desire to sing, and the form and condition of the vocal instruments appear to be as a rule normally fitted for the production of musical sound, the wonder is that everybody cannot do it. But there is no doubt that the fault lies more often in defective musical perception than in the condition of the organs of voice.

Music demands a high development of a particular sense, the foundation of which is inborn, though its perfection requires cultivation; and therefore there are individuals who have all the materials for singing, but are still without the faculty of using them for that purpose. Another important obstacle to the acquirement of the power of singing is that, with the intellectual development of the race has arisen a demand for perfection in speech and diction, which often interferes with the process of vocal training.

It should be remembered that language is a purely artificial acquisition of mankind. We all have to spend years in acquiring habits of speech so that we may understand and explain the ordinary circumstances of life. So local is this, that we grow up speaking the language which prevails around us, by the simple process of imitation, without thinking whether its sounds are musical or not, and this introduces a series of common difficulties which are more linguistic than vocal, and which will be considered more fully later on.

It thus becomes apparent that the art of singing has within it a great deal that is quite outside the province of music. For although the musical expression of the voice is of prime importance, the whole foundations of the instruments involved belong strictly to the province of physiology, like any of the other natural functions of the body, and by far the greater share of its educational side belongs to the study of the speech organs.

The science of phonology (i.e. the science of vocal sound) has been specialised from its parent science of physiology, so that it may occupy itself solely with the study of all the problems involved in this important subject, and, by an obligatory knowledge of music and languages, carry out its conclusions in the service of the art.

The first step towards understanding singing is to acquire a knowledge of the forces and instruments which it employs, and their phonological outline should, therefore, be made clear before the fuller details are filled in.

The voice is built upon the same physical principles as a reed-pipe of an organ. There is (1) a wind-chest in which the air is compressed; (2) a 'reed' which vibrates and produces the sound; and (3) a resonator, which gives it certain qualities.

(1) By the act of breathing out, we compress the air which has been taken into the chest. This force in being liberated causes (2) the vocal 'reed' to vibrate when we bring it into position and the sound thus produced is then modified by (3) the resonator, formed by the hollows in the neck, mouth and nose, which give quality to the sound, and impress upon it the characteristics of language.

Under these headings the components of the voice can be studied separately, and their more complex combined performances are then more easily understood.

THE BREATH.—The ordinary breathing of everyday life brings oxygen into contact with the blood in the lungs and carries carbonic acid away from it. Elevation of the ribs expands the chest and increases its circumference, and the contraction of the diaphragm lowers its floor and enlarges its capacity in a downward direction. The two actions go on together and draw a sufficient volume of fresh air (30 cubic inches) into the lungs with a slow, easy movement. The used air is more quickly emitted, principally by the elastic recoil of the lungs and chest, and after that there is a slight pause. This occurs about fifteen times a minute.

Breathing for singing is very different. Its whole object is to maintain a long and well-regulated air-pressure for the production of sound. A full breath must often be taken very rapidly, and then kept in a state of controlled compression for as much as 20 seconds. Thus the number of respirations possible in a minute may be reduced to a minimum. This necessitates a much larger volume of breath than is ordinarily needed, not only for the length of time the sound may have to continue, but also for the supply of oxygen to the blood. The first point is, therefore, to secure the power of taking in a large volume of air as quickly as possible. The second point is to give it out with carefully regulated force, for upon this the controlled production of sound entirely depends.

BREATHING IN.—The largest amount of air can be inhaled by the properly combined action of raising the ribs (costal breathing) and of contracting the diaphragm (diaphragmatic breathing). The latter has also been called 'abdominal' breathing, from the fact that the diaphragm is hidden and the evidence of its contraction is the protrusion of the abdominal wall caused by lowering the roof of that cavity. Men make more use of the diaphragm than women, whose upper ribs are more movable, but singers of both sexes have to make good use of both diaphragm and ribs.

There are reasons, especially in women, against the extreme use of the diaphragm on account of the pressure it exerts upon the abdominal organs, besides the difficulty of controlling the breath when so taken. This has caused a great deal of misunderstanding between doctors and singing-masters, and has produced extreme views on either side, neither of which can be supported by phonology.

When the ribs are fully raised, and especially the lower ones (6th-10th) which are the most elastic and movable, and correspond to the thickest part of the lungs, not only is the circumference of the chest increased and its floor widened, but the roof and upper part of the abdomen is also enlarged. Under these circumstances a considerable contraction of the diaphragm will cause no more than a protrusion of the upper part of the abdomen, that is, above the waist and between the margins of the ribs in front, without causing any harmful pressure upon the abdominal organs. The more the lower ribs expand, the more the diaphragm may descend with impunity, and a large in-take of breath can be obtained without danger. It has been called 'central' breathing, because the principal expansion takes place in the centre at the level of the space between the 6th and 7th ribs, and is designed to promote a good proportion of both actions, and to avoid the disproportionate or exclusive use of either the too high costal and clavicular breathing, or the too low purely abdominal breathing, both of which are sometimes advocated by extremists.

BREATHING OUT.—In order to secure an even and continuous air-pressure three forces have to be considered :

1. The elastic recoil of the inflated lungs and expanded chest ;
2. The contraction of abdominal muscles that assist the relaxed diaphragm to return to its place ; and
3. The contraction of muscles that pull down the ribs.

The elastic recoil does most of the work in ordinary breathing out, and is most useful in producing sound, only it is a force that begins with a maximum and rapidly diminishes.

To make the force continuous, it must be augmented by one of the others. These may act together or separately. If they act together they must maintain their proper proportion throughout. If they act separately the diaphragm must be replaced by abdominal contraction first, that is, before the ribs are allowed to descend, for, as has already been stated, the subsidence of the expanded chest while the diaphragm is contracted causes too much abdominal distension.

Those who have developed a good expansion of the lower ribs will be able to maintain that expansion while the diaphragm is supported by the abdominal muscles, and the upper part of the abdomen becomes concave before the ribs are allowed to descend. In this manner very great delicacy in breath-control can be exercised. When the capacity is large enough the ribs can be kept expanded while the diaphragm moves to and fro, opposed by the abdominal muscles, and thus the breathing both in and out becomes entirely diaphragmatic or abdominal. This is the only form in which this is permissible, namely, when the ribs are fully expanded all the time and the movement of the abdominal wall is confined to the region above the waist.

Towards the end of a very long phrase, however, the ribs will have to come down. It is better then that only the lower ribs should be relaxed while the upper ribs remain raised as part of a permanent position.

The permanent expansion of the ribs is partly secured by straightening the upper part of the spine in standing or sitting up straight, and the larger amount of residual air retained in the lungs is of great value in maintaining continuity of air-pressure and tone.

It will be noted that the form of breathing here explained and advocated is practically invisible. It is also designed to add to volume the continuity and control of air-pressure necessary to good phrasing. The permanent expansion of the ribs also assists resonance in the neck, an advantage which will be dealt with later.

The VOCAL REED is formed by two elastic membranes or cords which can be drawn together from their position of rest, so that they meet like curtains, and completely close the air-passage at the upper end of the windpipe, where the larynx begins. Their front ends are fixed close together to the shield cartilage, and behind they are attached to two small triangular cartilages which move very freely upon the thick ring-shaped cartilage supporting them. During breathing in they are wide apart, and during breathing out they approach one another. In the act of whispering, they are definitely drawn, so as to reduce the opening between their edges considerably.

As soon as air-pressure acts upon the elasticity of the edges of the membranes they vibrate, in accordance with the physical laws which govern the action of 'reeds' in general. This may happen before the whole passage is occluded, and a soft 'breathy' note is produced, but the reed acts most strongly and perfectly when the two cartilages are brought into close contact, so that the whole air-pressure acts upon the vibrating edges of the membranes, and is converted into sound.

Singing is practically confined to the last position. The tremor of the elastic membranes rapidly opens and closes the fine slit between their edges and releases the air-pressure in a quick succession of minute puffs. One group of muscles regulates the movements of the small triangular cartilages, by the action of which the membranes are brought together and drawn aside. Another group is concerned with tightening and loosening the membranes, and thereby regulates the tension upon which the rapidity of their vibration depends.

VOCAL COMPASS.—Every vocal reed may be expected to have a compass of two octaves which can be controlled by this function of tension and relaxation, and it must not be forgotten that this tension is an unconscious act guided solely by sound perception or 'ear,' and cannot be appreciated by any muscular sense as in the case of a voluntary movement.

The general pitch of every voice is determined by the size of the membranes. In men they are both wider and thicker than in women, and their length is generally estimated at about $\frac{1}{10}$ ths of an inch, and $\frac{1}{12}$ ths of an inch in women.

Roughly speaking, the male voice is about an octave lower than the female, but in either sex all degrees of general pitch exist between certain limits. For convenience three types are usually considered—high, low and middle. The majority of voices are near the middle type in both sexes, while exceptional instances of abnormally high or low are sometimes met with.

The male alto voice has an intermediate position between the two groups, but being an unnatural product it cannot be considered with the others.

Thus every voice has its middle note whence it may be expected to range to the extent of an octave upwards and downwards by performing the same muscular action. In the figure the middle note of each voice is indicated by a double vertical line.

Besides the tension of the membranes there is another physical condition which undergoes variation with every change of pitch, and that is the air-pressure exerted by the breath.

From experiments¹ it is found that the air-pressure varies in about the same ratio as the tension.

Therefore, in a general plan of the vocal compass, the middle note may be regarded as the product of both mean tension and mean air-pressure. The tension is well known to vary in the ratio of the square of the vibrations, and thus both the tension and air-pressure may be represented by the numbers 1, 4, 9, 16, 25, while the vibrations are as 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, in the diagram appended.

Pressure and Tension.	Vibrations.	Compass.	Working Capacity.
Extreme = 25	5	4th + 5th
High = 16	4	3rd + 4th
= 9	3	2nd + 3rd
Mean = 4	2	Centre
Low = 1	1	1st + 2nd
Extreme		1st + 5th

The working capacity of the voice is here represented by a triangle whose apex is opposite the centre of the compass, which signifies that the middle can do the most work when the whole compass is evenly balanced throughout. Then by a common control of tension and pressure the vibrations are varied so that the notes of a two-octave compass can be used at will. With training an extension upwards and downwards of a third more may still be possible, but it is always desirable that the extremes of the voice should be kept for exceptional use only. Composers are accustomed to fix the voices for which they write by the extreme limits only, which is not phonological. It is more important to adapt the principal share of the work to the centre of the voice.

A more or less exact method of estimating the amount of work demanded by a vocal composition has been made use of in the 'song diagram,' of which two examples are here given. Without considering accidentals, the values of the notes are added together and arranged according to pitch. Starting from a vertical line upon which the pitch is indicated, the total values are expressed in horizontal black lines. The diagram so obtained shows upon what notes the principal work lies, and the application to that of the centre of the 'working capacity' reveals at once the type of voice to which the composition is suited.

The example from 'Tristan and Isolde' shows that Wagner demands for the part of Isolde a high soprano voice of exceptional development, with its centre on b', and a full compass of over two octaves. Mozart's 'Il mio tesoro' only once touches the upper limit of the ordinary tenor compass, and yet it lies so much in the upper part of the voice that it is best suited to a high tenor with a centre above a.

The examination of a great number of these diagrams, which are easily made upon paper ruled in squares, will explain a great deal that is interesting to the practical musician, but they do not supply more than a part of what is called the 'tessitura' of vocal music, which includes the length and distribution of phrases and pauses, as well as the declamatory consideration of the question of vocality.

Many voices have been ruined by composers' neglect of vocal considerations, and it is not uncommon to find soprano singers who have lost the middle of the voice entirely. It is not difficult to calculate the great relief to the forces of tension and breath-pressure which even slight transposition will give; and, conversely, the amount of strain which has to be borne by the voice, if the work is pitched too high, cannot fail to wear out and distort the instrument prematurely.

These considerations might with advantage be taken into account by those who are responsible for modern musical PRON (q.v.). It is to be hoped that a wider phonological knowledge may tend to remove some of the bitter struggles that are too often witnessed in the performance of modern music.

ATTACK.—The question of the attack of a note has been much debated among masters. Manuel Garcia, and others who followed him, have insisted upon what he himself described as a 'very slight cough' before a note in order to secure a distinct attack upon it.

Above the vocal membranes and parallel with them are two muscular folds called the false vocal cords, or ventricular bands. In conjunction with the muscles that bring the membranes together, they form a strong constrictor of the air-passage, to close it firmly when required. This occurs always in swallowing, when the chest has to be held inflated to support a strong muscular action, and also in coughing. The elastic vocal membranes are themselves unable to restrain any air-pressure in the chest, so it was thought necessary to accumulate a little force by constriction with these ventricular bands, and by suddenly relaxing them to allow the force to impinge upon the membranes which were supposed to be held in readiness for the sudden shock. There is no doubt that a crisp attack can be effected in this way, but the sound of the note is always preceded by an explosive noise however lightly it may be done.

The first phonological objection to this 'shock of the glottis' (coup de glotte) is that it is quite unnecessary. When the breath is under control and intimately associated as it ought to be with the production of sound, the simultaneous onset of breath force and the proper approximation of the membranes produces a perfectly clear and clean attack, straight upon the note by the ordinary natural action performed with decision.

The introduction of any constriction above the reed cannot be regarded as a natural part of the action of attack. Moreover, the quasi-spasmodic act of constriction produces often an unduly hard attack which is not good for the vocal reed, and its constant repetition produces congestion of the parts around the cartilages, and a troublesome desire to clear the throat.

Phonology insists that the production of sound is always the result of an expiratory act, and that every sound effect, whether it be strong or soft, quick or gradual, must be the outcome of a similar intention in the breath-control. Such control leaves the throat free to its unconscious action, which would be destroyed by any muscular constriction in the larynx.

The 'shock of the glottis' is part of a time-worn tradition in the teaching of singing, and is often heard in voices that are beautiful as well as in those that are hard and throaty; it is sometimes regarded as essential to the proper pronunciation of German and some other languages of a guttural nature, but artificial fashions of speech cannot be tolerated if they are opposed to the natural uses of the voice organs.

The cessation of a note is brought about by the withdrawal of the membranes. As a rule the membranes spring back elastically to their open position, and some breath-pressure escapes in a puff after the note. The amount of this escape, and consequently the sound it makes, is a matter of breath-control. A high note is naturally followed by a strong burst, because the pressure is higher than that of a low note. The free release, as this is called, is not objected to in operatic singing, and there is nothing to say against it on phonological grounds. Moreover, it is useful in getting rid of carbonic acid, and in facilitating the quick taking of another breath. It may therefore be left to discretion to make the sound of the release inaudible by breath-control.

Under no circumstances should the note be stopped by constriction of any part of the throat, which is frequently associated with the equally detrimental attack by 'shock' just referred to. Many singers deceive themselves in the belief that their throats remain open when their notes cease.

One of the difficulties in showing the natural behaviour of the vocal membranes with the laryngoscope is that the power of tolerating a mirror in the back of the throat itself requires a long course of training without which the organs under observation cannot act naturally.

THE RESONATOR.—The second vocal instrument, the resonator, belongs, as such, to a later date in the evolution of the voice as we now hear it. The particular function of the resonator, which warrants its being treated as a separate instrument, is its power of modifying sound by assuming different shapes, which is made use of in the formation of language.

Every hollow space enclosed within walls, but communicating with the outer air, is capable of allowing only certain sound vibrations or waves to continue within it. This is called its resonant note, and its pitch corresponds with the size, and its character with the shape, of the resonant cavity or resonator. The pitch is also affected by the size of its opening. Partly closing it not only changes the character of the note, but also lowers its pitch.

In the case of the voice, in which the reed is strong and the resonator comparatively weak, much of the fullness of the sound must depend upon keeping the openings free. At the same time the cavities should be made as large as possible in order to keep their resonant pitches low, and thereby impart a richer tone to the voice.

The size of the resonator varies a little among men; in women it is about 20 per cent smaller, and in children, smaller still. But all, by the same physiological action, can bring it into similar positions, and thus it is the shape of the resonator that gives characteristic qualities to speech, and language is as intelligible in the mouth of a child as in that of a giant.

The sounds of language are divided into two groups.

1. Vowel sounds, due to open and expanded positions of the resonator suitable for continuous sounds of the best possible quality.

2. Consonants, due to more or less closed positions, and movements of the resonator which give certain characters to the approach to and departure from the vowel positions.

The position of the resonator in forming the vowel sounds is a most important question in the art of singing.

So much latitude is permitted in ordinary speaking that pronunciation in singing has been looked upon as something quite different from it. But when the sound of the voice is at its best, the resonator is in the position most favourable to sound. This principle applies as strongly to speaking as it does to singing, and when singers do not sing as they would speak, it is either because they do not speak properly, or they do not use the resonator naturally.

It cannot be too strongly insisted upon that if the principles of good resonance are carefully adhered to from the first, speech, being solely a matter of education, can always be made beautiful.

This is generally neglected in our schools, where children learn their habits of speech, but it is absolutely essential to singing, and not infrequently it happens that a great part of vocal training is spent upon teaching a singer to use the resonator properly, for the first time.

VOWEL SOUNDS.—In studying the sounds belonging to the five signs U, O, A, E, I, the Italian pronunciation is here adopted—

	U	O	A	E	I
English Equivalent	(oo)	(or)	(ah)	(eh)	(ee)

The position A is that in which the whole passage is open and expanded to the fullest extent convenient (natural habits never go to extremes), and from it the others are differentiated by two principal actions.

1. Closure of the opening by the lips, and
2. Raising and advancing the body of the tongue.

Since A is taken as the basis of our resonance, its position must be closely defined.

The jaw is open at least an inch between the front teeth.

The lips are at rest upon the teeth, and not retracted at the sides.

The tongue lies flat upon the floor of the mouth with its tip and margins touching the backs of the lower teeth.

The base of the tongue is flat enough to make the back of the throat visible from the front.

The palate is held up just enough to prevent breath passing into the nose, but without any conscious effort.

The neck is fully expanded by the combined actions of holding the head erect, the ribs raised, and drawing down the larynx, more by the action of the sterno-thyroid muscles which act upon the larynx from below, than by the sterno-hyoid muscles which bring down the base of the tongue. This position has the form of a double resonator, with two principal resonance chambers uniting in the middle at right angles, where they are joined by a third accessory chamber, the nose.

The back chamber in the neck is shaped like a bag, wide below, where the vocal reed is placed, and narrow above, where it opens into the back of the mouth by an oval opening. The front chamber, in the mouth, is shaped like an irregular hemisphere, with a flat floor and an arched roof and a large round opening in front.

Although the whole resonator acts as one, the back chamber may be said to have most to do with the full resonance of vocal sound; while to the more variable cavity of the mouth is given the office of forming all the characteristics of language. The accessory cavity of the nose adds to the sound the nasal resonance when required, through the opening controlled by the soft palate. The resonant properties of cavities are demonstrated by blowing a stream of air through or across them, so that their resonant notes can be heard by themselves. This occurs in the whispering voice. The partly closed glottis allows the breath to rush through it without producing any vocal note, and the rushing sound awakens the resonant notes of the air-chambers so distinctly that not only are all the qualities of language distinguishable, but with a little practice the pitch of the resonant notes of the various vowel sounds can be detected. These notes are most distinct, and deeply pitched in the whispering here employed, which requires a fully expanded and open resonator and a reef out-breath with no constriction of the throat whatever.

Following these rules the pitch of the vowel A is commonly found to be c' or c'' among men—and about a minor third higher, e'' or e' , among women.

The double nature of the resonator can be shown by introducing a tuning-fork of the right pitch into the throat. A strong reinforcement occurs in that position, indicating a 'node' at the junction of the two chambers, as would be expected. The resonant note may, therefore, be said to belong to both the mouth and the neck cavity acting in unison. This is an important acoustical point, which receives further confirmation in the formation of the other vowels.

The first group of vowels derived from A, by closing the opening with the lips, are three varieties of O, and U which is the most closed. By various degrees of this action, but keeping the jaw still open to the extent of an inch between the front teeth, the positions are obtained for :

	A	O ¹	O ²	O ³	U
English Equivalent	ah	not	or	oh	oo.

By every successive degree of closing, the pitch of the resonant note is lowered, and thus are indicated the several positions which produce the notes of a scale as a simple way of fixing them.

By rounding the lips enough to lower the pitch of A a whole fifth, a good resonant position is found for U (oo), and the deep, middle and shallow forms of O find their proper places upon the three notes intervening.

It will be noticed in practice, as well as in physiological works, that with the closure of the lips there is at the same time a lowering of the larynx and a slight raising of the base of the tongue. Both these actions tend to enlarge and close in the chamber in the neck, and by thus lowering its pitch they maintain the unison of the two chambers, as may be further shown by tapping the cheek and the neck, when both are found to possess the same note.

Whispered Resonances.

The second group of vowel sounds owe their character to the position of the tongue. The jaw remains open about an inch as before, then the tongue, with its tip against the back of the front teeth, advances and rises. The lips remain still, the larynx is drawn upwards by the movement of the tongue, but this is restrained to some extent by maintaining the expansion of the neck as in the position of A. This action raises the resonant pitch of the mouth because it becomes gradually encroached upon by the body of the tongue, but while it makes the mouth cavity smaller, it makes the neck cavity larger. When the tongue is so far forward as to touch with its margin the upper molar teeth, the pitch of the mouth resonance may be raised a sixth and the neck resonance lowered a third.

This is the position allotted to the vowel E neck resonance a fifth, will give a suitable resonance to the vowel I (ee).

The perfect concords of an octave (1 to 2) and a twelfth (1 to 3) established for the relation of the chambers in these two vowel sounds is not a mere accident. It is more probable that the selection of these sounds as pure vowel sounds in all languages has been due to their particular resonant advantages, for the resonance of a double resonator can only go on perfectly when the component chambers are either in unison or simply related. A further point in the formation of the vowel sounds E and I is that the orifice between the two chambers is made smaller by the approach of the tongue to the hard palate. This lowers the pitch of both, so that the division of the chambers does not take place in linear measurement as upon a monochord.

Intermediate between A and E there are several positions which belong to some of the English vowel sounds in common use. The first movement of the tongue is principally forward, and enlarges the opening of the throat, raising the resonant pitch of both chambers while they remain in unison. This position belongs to the sounds of the unaccented a in 'alone,' the u in 'up' and the o in 'love.' But after this the unison can no longer be maintained owing to the disparity of the chambers, and we find their pitches a third apart, which is not very good for the resonance of the sound er as in 'earth.' The shallow ä as in 'hat' has resonance chambers a fifth apart, and in the short é as in 'get' they differ by a sixth. Hence all these indefinitely resonated sounds are those which are more frequently varied in pronunciation than any others, and are the most difficult to fix in singing. Between E and I is the short i as in 'hit,' in which the chambers are a tenth apart.

The full resonator scale is therefore constructed as follows. The several positions are Resonator Scale of Whispered Vowel Sounds.

(eh) A still further advance of the tongue to its extreme position, when it has raised the mouth resonance an octave, and lowered the marked by Roman numbers to indicate them for all voices in relation to the pitch of A, which governs that of the others in each individual case. To these must be added in English the more open 'oo' sound in 'good,' 'would, etc., which is on I⁴ between U (oo) and O¹ (oh).

Besides these thirteen simple sounds in English there are several compounds which require a movement from one position to another while the breath continues.

Whispered Resonances.

The use of the resonator scale is of similar service in fixing the vowel pronunciation of other languages, and French and German sounds have all their places in relation to the sound of A, slight differences only having to be made to suit national peculiarities.

The same relations will be found to exist, whatever the resonant pitch of A may be. The pitch of U, a fifth lower, and of I (ee), an octave higher, will always be the limits of the scale of twelve notes, although in languages with fewer vowels some of the notes will not be occupied.

It must be remembered that all these sounds have to do solely with whispered speech, and are in no way connected with the notes of the vocal reed.

With a little practice the notes of the resonator scale can be heard without difficulty. By tapping with the finger upon the neck, the resonant notes of the back chamber will be heard to rise with the others, up to No. VI., and then fall again as shown in the scale. They can also be heard by the subject himself when the ears are completely stopped.

The CONSONANTS are important to the art of speaking, and therefore also to singing, for they all represent different methods of opening and closing the vowel positions. They are conveniently classified in next column:

It will be noticed that the jaw is only closed when the teeth are obliged to be together to form S,SH, and their sounding companions Z,J (soft), otherwise it must always be kept as wide open as the consonant will allow, in order to have less to do in reaching the vowel positions, which are all open.

What is generally known as 'forward diction' depends upon this condition, and the free use of the tip of the tongue, the lips and the teeth.

The base of the tongue in K and G is brought forward to the hard palate, and not allowed to close up the throat at the back.

This action is easier before A, O and U, when the tongue is either flat or its base somewhat raised; but before E and I, in which the front of the tongue is high and forward in the mouth, the consonants K and G have been softened by all races who have come under Latin influence (French, Spanish, Italian and part of English) into an aspirated or partly explosive sound better suited to the position of the tongue.

TONE COLOUR AND REGISTERS.—The importation of language into the art of song has thus involved the careful cultivation of those positions and movements of the resonator which are best calculated to liberate the sound of the vocal reed, and at the same time express with particular distinctness all the various qualities of speech. But the sound of the voice includes yet another quality, namely that of 'tone' or 'tone colour,' which depends upon whether the maximum of resonation is used or not. This is the especial function of the chamber in the neck.

The formative actions of the front of the mouth may or may not be accompanied by the full expansion of the back chamber of the resonator, and thus the total sound will be full and rich or shallow and light, as the singer thinks fit.

After these considerations it is not difficult to perceive that the question of registers has been confused by the assumption that the different tones of voice were produced by different actions of the vocal reed. The terms 'head register' and 'chest register' have, no doubt, been intended to mean conditions in which the singer has felt the sound in the head and in the chest. The former signifies the absence, and the latter the presence, of expansion in the neck.

The chest itself is occupied with the air-pressure and cannot be regarded as a resonator, since it is practically closed, except for the minute slit through which the pressure issues. The 'head register' has been further confounded with the compression of the membranes which also occurs in the upper notes of many voices.

Certain descriptions of the vocal membranes in explanation of the different 'registers' have been given, and named 'lower thick,' 'upper thick,' 'middle,' 'lower thin,' 'upper thin,' etc. (Lennox Browne), but they have not been confirmed by further observation.

As at present known the membranes behave in the same way throughout the entire compass, and their compression in the high notes must be regarded as a departure from the natural process.

The true high note requires a development of breath power and control, and it would be better for their instrument if singers would refrain from singing by compression, and be satisfied with the compass that their breath power can give them. High notes might become rarer, but their sound would be of better quality.

Other forms of 'register' due to alternative resonation are used as the singer wishes to express different tone-colour. But by insisting upon the maintenance of the double character of the resonator with all articulation in the front of the mouth, and resonant control in the neck, there are no sudden changes which could produce an obligatory 'register.'

Variety of colour due to control of the resonation of the neck may occur in all parts of the voice. When, however, the base of the tongue is pressed down so as to produce a heavy resonation in the mouth, at the expense of that in the neck, as well as to the detriment of good diction which requires the tongue to be free, it may readily occur that a sudden change has to be made near the middle of the voice, on passing from one note to the next.

Phonology is as much opposed to fictitious tone as to fictitious notes, and prefers to sacrifice the heavy tone of a voice if it is not natural to it, that is, if it is not obtained by the natural actions which are known to govern the sounds of the voice—in this case by expansion of the neck. Therefore the so-called 'registers' cannot be accepted as natural. That they are often acquired is beyond doubt, but it is astonishing how they disappear when singers are relieved of the necessity of thinking about them.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.—Phonology does not acknowledge some of the common methods of singing teachers, but it is able to support, on rational grounds, some of the best traditions of the great masters, which are the foundation of the following picture of the use of the singing voice.

The singer stands erect with a broadly expanded chest. He takes a deep breath by expanding both chest and abdomen at the level of the 6th-7th rib. He opens his mouth and throat to the position suitable for the pronunciation of A (ah), and at the same time he thinks of the note he is about to sing. Without allowing the ribs to yield he strikes the note by breathing out with decision, by a contraction at the upper part of the abdomen and a simultaneous approximation of the vocal membranes. If the note is in the middle of his compass, he will sing a succession of notes up to an octave higher and down to an octave lower, and back again, without any movement of his mouth or ribs; being conscious only of the breath force, which produces the notes he hears in his mind. The notes are lifted up and let down upon the breath pressure, controlled by the muscular action felt in the region of the lower ribs.

By changing the position of the resonator other vowel qualities can be given to the whole process, but under all circumstances the production of the notes remains the same. By movements of the resonator before and after the open vowel positions the effects of consonants can be introduced for the formation of words. By expanding the neck from below, a full resonant tone can be given, or withheld, according to the 'colour' required. The throat is always free, that is, relaxed, open and unconscious.

This is a brief picture of what singing is in the individual, illustrating the action of the two instruments which combine to produce the sound of the voice. The one instrument expresses in music the emotions of the soul, while the other expresses in words the poetic thoughts of the mind. It is the office of the musical composer to bring these two together into the form of song.

Just as it is essential to the writer of vocal music to understand thoroughly the technique of the living instrument for which he writes, so is it also a necessary part of singing to be acquainted with the manner in which the dual expression is conceived in the song. Phonology has supplied the singer with an absolutely material estimate of work to be done by the voice, in the 'song diagrams' already referred to, but in order to show how the vocal instruments are to be used in the service of art its analysis of song must be carried further.

As presented upon the page, a song consists of a line of music written upon a staff, and a line of words below it, in ordinary character. It is evident therefore from the first that the vocal reed or instrument of music has to perform a musical composition; while the resonator or instrument of speech has to perform a composition in verse. All that can be said about the performance of music by an instrument, or about the recitation of verse, is applicable to the vocal reed and the resonator, each by itself. The vocal reed, however, has two offices to perform. It is either behaving as a true instrument of music, giving utterance to feelings in the direct manner belonging to its nature, or it is lending itself as an instrument of sound to assist, by emphasis and inflexion, the sense of words. In the former case its action is melodic; in the latter, declamatory.

The line of music may be intended by the composer to be interpreted in either of these senses, or it may happen that the feeling suggested by the words is so perfectly treated in the application to it of a form of melody, that both are satisfied, and the song is both melodic and declamatory. Examples of this are rare, and it more often happens that either one or the other element predominates. Not infrequently, however, it occurs that they clash, so that neither is satisfactory.

The rhythm of music, with its division into time measures, and the rhythm of words, with their arrangement into metrical verse, only indicate motion, and when these are applied to one another only the rhythm in which they may move together is emphasised, and nothing more. This cannot be regarded as song composition.

It is the sense of words and not the sound that stimulates the musical sense. The music thus evolved may have no melodic form of its own, in which case it is declamatory, or it may add to the words the power of its own form of expression and become melodic.

Periodicity in poetic expression is as necessary to verse as it is to music, and the study of the works of Heine gives a striking illustration of its force. The period of two lines, in which he usually expressed his thoughts, presented to the musician the simplest foundation for melodic form, and how that appealed to the melodic genius of Schubert is seen distinctly in such a masterpiece as 'Am Meer.'

The suiting of music to words may appear to be a subject belonging to the art of composition, but it is necessary to consider it from the point of view of singing, since it forms the foundation of the singer's attitude of mind. The singer must know how to direct his technical ability, and must have some distinct mental intention in singing, or the performance will be nothing more than the mechanical recitation of words and notes.

The sense of the words is always to be considered first, since that is generally the most obvious. With a little analysis the poet's scheme of conveying a succession of ideas may next be detected. It will not then be difficult to see at once whether the composer has adapted these ideas to a corresponding scheme of melodic form, or whether he has been content to use his music as a means of supporting the words only; and the value of the music as depicting the poetic intention can be readily estimated.

It is not within the scope of this article to carry such analysis into the extensive field of existing examples of song-writing. Modern music is full of examples of declamatory song distorted and exaggerated by the musical exigencies of the pianoforte and orchestral accompaniment.

The melodic form is regarded as a survival of the past which does not really belong to present methods of musical expression. In fact, the sound as well as the sense of the voice has been almost swamped by the wealth of instrumentation which is considered necessary for modern ears. How far this can be carried it is impossible to say, but it is quite possible that singing will soon be regarded as a separate form of art, and composers will either write for the voice or for the orchestra, but not for both together.

In estimating the general character of modern and ancient music the singer can thus realise what part it is that his voice has to take. Throughout the works of the old Italian, English and German masters, up to the end of the 18th century, he will find abundant opportunity for the full exercise of the natural instrument of song. A more highly cultured and intellectually restrained form was the outcome of the literary period which we owe to the German lyric poets, and perfection of diction, with a refined use of musical expression, characterises the 'Lied' and those songs of other nations which are conceived upon that model.

Of the vocal necessities of modern music no more need be said than that the singer must be able to realise the situation. The voice is a living thing, and can be ruined by the strain of singing too loud and too high, as only too many modern singers have discovered, but its powers of endurance, if properly treated, are remarkable, and every singer who understands his work ought to know where to stop.

Besides an excellent technique and an intelligent sense for music and poetry, the singer only requires the sincerity which brings to his art the charm of his own personality. If any technique could possibly be learned in order to obtain that inestimable quality, phonology would certainly point to the exercise of the most truly vital of all human functions, and recommend the free and unhindered service of the breath.

SINGSPIEL. This term has been in use in Germany for the last 300 years to denote a dramatic representation with music; not any one particular kind—singing being capable of being employed in such various ways—but any entertainment in which spoken dialogue and singing alternate. In time speech gave way at intervals not only to singing, but to singing by several voices at once. Later, when the spoken dialogue had been brought into entire subjection to music, as was the case in Italy after the revolution effected in the whole nature of dramatic representation by the rise of opera, not only concerted vocal pieces were introduced into the German Singspiel, but instrumental music and its protégé monody as well.

We find the earliest traces of the Singspiel in the German miracle-plays, which were gradually developed outside the churches from the Passions given inside them. The Passions were sung throughout, while in the miracle-plays spoken words in German were introduced, the singing still being in Latin, as for example in the 'Ludus paschalis de passione Domini' MS. of the 13th century. In course of time the Latin text and consequently the music were thrust into the background. In a 14th-century MS. called 'Marienklage,' preserved in the convent of Lichtenhalt near Baden, Mary sings in German. Indeed we already find the typical German miracle-play in the 'Spiel von den zehn Jungfrauen' performed at Eisenach in 1322, in which all the words sung are German. These plays were generally performed on the eves of the great festivals, such as Whitsunday, Epiphany, etc. Gradually the ecclesiastical element disappeared, leaving only the secular, and thus originated the Shrove Tuesday plays, in which the characteristics of whole classes of society, priests, doctors, travelling scholars, etc., were held up to ridicule. Nuremberg and Augsburg were specially celebrated for these plays, written for the most part by Hans Rosenblut (about 1405), Hans Folz of Worms (about 1480), both living in Nuremberg, and Nicolaus Mercator. They gradually, however, degenerated into obscene pieces, until in the 16th century Hans Sachs and Jakob Ayer (both of whom introduced music into their plays) started the movement which ended in the reformation of the German stage. By Ayer we still have a 'Schöns neus singets Spiel,' 'Der Münch im Kesskorb,' sung in 1618 by five persons 'entirely on the melody of the English Roland.' This melody is repeated fifty-four times, and one cannot help suspecting that the English stage was to some extent Ayer's model.

A reaction from these 'people's plays' (as they might be called) was caused by the 'school plays' in Latin, annually performed by the pupils of the Jesuits. Between the acts German interludes with music were introduced, and these were virtually Singspiele in the modern sense. The first Singspiel in imitation of the Italian opera without any spoken dialogue was the lost 'Dafne,' written by Martin Opitz and composed by Heinrich Schütz in 1627. The earliest instance of an independent German Singspiel with singing and spoken dialogue was 'Seelewig,' a sacred Waldgedicht or Freudenspiel. In a spoken play by Harsdörffer (1644) were introduced arias after the Italian manner, composed¹ by Sigmund Gottlieb Staden (q.v.). The piece is intended for private performance, and written for three trebles, two altos, two tenors, one bass, three violins, three flutes, three reeds and one large horn, the bass being taken throughout by a theorbo. No two voices ever sing at the same time, and the instruments have short symphonies to themselves. The only regular stage at that time was the Italian opera-house of each capital (that of Vienna being built in 1651, and that of Dresden in 1667) and of Nuremberg and other imperial cities. The German Singspiel found a home in Hamburg in the theatre built in 1678, but soon encountered a formidable rival in German opera, founded by Reinhard Keiser. After this, half a century went by before the Singspiel was heard of again.

In 1743 the Döbbelin company in Berlin produced without success a German Liederspiel, 'Der Teufel ist los,' founded on the English piece 'The Devil to pay,' followed by Schürer's 'Doris' (1747) and Scheibe's 'Thusnelda' (1749), both very successful. Thus encouraged, Koch's company began to play Singspiele in Leipzig, Weimar, and Berlin, their first piece being 'Die verwandelten Weiber,' another version of 'The Devil to pay,' written by C. F. Weisse, composed by J. A. Hiller, and produced at Leipzig in 1764 with great success. The same authors produced a succession of similar pieces, 'Der lustige Schuster' (1765), 'Lottchen am Hofe,' and 'Die Liebe auf dem Lande' (1767), 'Die Jagd' (1771), 'Ärndtekrantz' and 'Der Dorfbarbier' (1772). Neefe, Reichardt, Stegmann, Schweitzer, and others, brought to perfection this new species, now called operetta.

Independently of all this going on in North Germany, the German Singspiel had sprung up in Vienna, starting, curiously enough, with 'Die doppelte Verwandlung' (1767), an adaptation from the French 'Le Diable à quatre,' Sedaine's version of 'The Devil to pay.' Werner, Haydn's predecessor at Eisenstadt, had already produced at the court (German) theatre a Tafelstück (i.e. piece intended for private performance) called 'Der Wienerische Tändelmarkt' (1760). The marionette plays, of which Haydn was so fond, were Singspiele, and he supplied the court of Esterházy with 'Philemon und Baucis' (1773), 'Genoveva' (1777), 'Dido,' a parody on a grand opera (1778), and 'Die erfüllte Raube' (1780). 'Der krumme Teufel,' to words by Kurz, was a real Singspiel. Dittersdorf's 'Doktor und Apotheker,' 'Liebe im Narrenhause,' 'Hieronymus Knicker,' 'Rothe Käppchen,' etc., produced at the imperial Nationaltheater, were brilliant successes. Kauer (1751-1831) composed no fewer than 200 Singspiele, and Schenk was almost equally prolific. The classic Singspiel was founded by Mozart with his 'Entführung' (July 12, 1782), which, according to Goethe, threw everything else of the kind into the shade. 'Die Zauberflöte' (1791), too, was styled a Singspiel on the title-page of the PF. score. From this point the Singspiel proper becomes continually rarer, though Wenzel Müller's 'Schwester von Prag,' 'Das neue Sonntagskind,' and a few more deserve mention. Lortzing's works are a mixture of opera and Singspiel, certain numbers in the 'Czaar und Zimmermann,' 'Waffenschmied,' and 'Undine' being quite in the Lied-style, and the music consequently of secondary importance, while in others the music undoubtedly assists in developing the characters, and raises these portions to the dignity of opera. We are here brought face to face with the main distinction between opera and Singspiel; the latter by no means excludes occasional recitative in place of the spoken dialogue, but the moment the music helps to develop the dramatic dénouement we have to do with opera and not with Singspiel. SINIGAGLIA, LEONE (b. Turin, Aug. 14, 1868), was a pupil of the Conservatorio of his native city, and subsequently studied with Mandyczewski in Vienna, where he enjoyed the friendship and advice of Dvořák, Goldmark, and other musicians. His early works include a number of violin and violoncello pieces, songs, female choruses, etc., and one of these, op. 5, a 'concert étude' for string quartet, was often played by the Bohemian Quartet. His op. 19 is a set of variations on Schubert's 'Haidenröseln' for oboe and piano; op. 20 is a brilliant and very successful violin concerto in A; op. 22 is a set of variations on a theme by Brahms, for quartet; op. 26 is a 'Rapsodia piemontese' for violin and orchestra; and op. 27 is a string quartet in D, which has won great favour from many of the continental organisations. Two pieces for horn and piano, op. 28, and a romance in A for violin and orchestra, are among his more recent works; and two 'Danze piemontesi' for orchestra, op. 31, are arrangements of genuine popular themes. These have been arranged in a variety of ways, and are very successful. M.

Several of Sinigaglia's orchestral works have been repeatedly played in England, and have been appreciated for their light handling and the distinctive flavour given to his ideas by the Piedmontese folk-song of which he is a student. These include, beside the Rapsodia mentioned above, a 'Danza piemontese' for orchestra, op. 31, and a suite 'Piemonte,' also for orchestra. His overture to Goldini's comedy, Le Baruffe Chiozzote, op. 32, has also become popular. Sinigaglia has edited as his op. 40 a series of Piedmontese folk-melodies in 2 volumes. A list of his works was published in the periodical Il Pianoforte, anno 2, No. 12. C.

SINK-A-PACE—also written CINQUE-PACE, CINQUA-PACE, CINQUE PASS, CINQUE PAS, SINQUA-PACE, SINQUE-PACE, ZINCK-PASS and SINCOPAS—a name by which the original Galliard was known.

Praetorius' says that a Galliard has five steps and is therefore called a Cinque Pas. These five steps, or rather combinations of steps, are well described in Arbeau's Orchésographie (Langres, 1588). In later times the Galliard became so altered by the addition of new steps, that the original form of the dance seems to have been distinguished by the name Cinq Pas. It is frequently mentioned by the Elizabethan writers, well-known examples being the allusions in Shakespeare's 'Much Ado about Nothing' (Act ii. Sc. 1), 'Twelfth Night' (Act i. Sc. 3), Marston's 'Satiromastix' (Act i.), and Sir John Davies's 'Orchestra' (stanza 67). The following less-known quotation is from the 'Histriomastix' (Part 1) of Prynne (who was especially bitter against this dance):

'Alas there are but few who finde that narrow way, . . . and those few what are they? Not dancers, but mourners: not laughers, but weepers; whose tune is Lachrymae, whose musicke, sighes for sinne; who know no other Cinqua-pace but this to Heaven, to goe mourning all the day long for their iniquities; to mourne in secret like Doves, to chatter like cranes for their owne and others sinnes.'

The following example of a Cinque-pace is given by Wolfgang Caspar Printz, in his Phrynis Mitilenaense, oder Satyrischer Componist (Dresden, 1696), as a specimen of 'Trichonum iambicum.' A longer example will be found in Daune's edition of the 17th century Skene MS. (Edinburgh, 1838).

SIREN. This, though not strictly a musical instrument, has rendered such good service to acoustical science that it deserves brief notice ; for fuller details the works referred to below must be consulted. Lord Rayleigh¹ describes it as 'A stiff disc, capable of revolving about its centre, and pierced with one or more sets of holes arranged at equal intervals round the circumference of circles concentric with the disc. A windpipe in connection with bellows is presented perpendicularly to the disc, its open end being opposite to one of the circles, which contains a set of holes. When the bellows are worked, the stream of air escapes freely if a hole is opposite to the end of the pipe ; but otherwise it is obstructed. As the disc turns, puffs of air in succession escape through it, until when the velocity is sufficient, these blend into a note the pitch of which rises continually with the rapid sequence of the puffs. One of the most important facts in the whole science of Acoustics is exemplified by the siren—namely, that the pitch of a note depends upon the period of its vibration. The size and shape of the holes, the force of the wind, and other elements of the problem may be varied ; but if the number of puffs in a given time, such as one second, remains unchanged, so does the pitch. We may even dispense with wind altogether, and produce a note by allowing a card to tap against the edges of the holes as they revolve ; the pitch will still be the same.'

The Siren may be defined as a wind instrument, in which the successive air-waves are produced not at random or by consonance, but by circular rotatory motion, which is susceptible of accurate adjustment as well as measurement. It was originally invented by Cagniard de la Tour, who made it needlessly complicated by using the force of the wind to drive the rotating disc as well as to produce the required note. For this purpose the speaking holes in the top of the small wind-chest were pierced in an oblique direction ; those in the disc sloping in an opposite diagonal. There was also a counting apparatus attached to the upper part of the main axis, with two dials for registering the number of rotations in a given time. This form has been faithfully reproduced in every manual of Physics.² The name is said to have been somewhat fancifully, and indeed incorrectly, given it from Homer's sirens, on account of its property of singing under water. It is true that if water be forced through it after the fashion of the turbine, a buzzing or humming sound is produced. Seebeck and others effected material improvements, but the only two which need special notice are the instruments constructed by Helmholtz and Rudolph Koenig respectively. The former is figured and described in that author's Tonempfindungen,³ and consists essentially of two sirens united on a single axis, each disc of which possesses four rows of holes susceptible of being separately opened, thus giving means for producing a large variety of intervals.

The upper wind-chest, which looks downwards, can be rotated on its feeding-tube so as to bring about varying changes of phase between the two discs. With this instrument Helmholtz succeeded in producing excellent results, using a small electromotor for driving it at a uniform rate.

The siren of Rudolph Koenig of Paris is a far more imposing instrument. It was made for W. Spottiswoode, P.R.S., was exhibited by the writer at the British Association meeting at York in 1881, and is now in the physical laboratory of the College of Science at Bristol. It is furnished with more than a dozen rotating discs of different kinds, which fit on to a vertical spindle, above a wind-chest of large size fitted with a keyboard of eight notes. A strong clockwork actuated by heavy weights forms the motive power, and an ingenious counting apparatus is made not only to record the number of rotations, but also to set going automatically a watch movement, and thus obtain by one motion of the observer's hand the speed of the disc, and the time of the observation. By properly computing the rings of perforations, the harmonic series is given by one disc, and the enharmonic scale by another. Indeed there is hardly any law of musical acoustics which it cannot be made to illustrate.⁴ For purposes of demonstration the siren is excellent, and also for the illustration of perfect musical intervals ; but for the accurate determination of absolute pitch it is far inferior to Lissajous's optical method ; and still more so to the tuning-fork method, described under SCHEIBLER, and to Prof. M'Leod's Cycloscope. SIRMEN (SYRMEN), MADDALENA LOMBARDINI (b. Venice, 1735 ?), a distinguished 18th-century violinist and composer for her instrument, who later, for some unknown reason, discarded her first profession for that of singer.

According to Dr. Burney, Maddalena Lombardini received her musical education at the Venetian 'Conservatorio dei Mendicanti,' and ten or more years before Tartini's death in 1770, she was profiting by his tuition. At this time she probably lived in Padua, so as to be near her master, but in 1760 she had apparently returned to Venice, where she received several letters from him, testifying to the keen interest he took in her career. The carefully written instructions as to bowing and fingering which he sent her in a letter⁵ dated Padua, Mar. 5, 1760, constitute a valuable treatise on the art of violin-playing. Dr. Burney's excellent English version appeared in 1779, with the original text and the translation on opposite pages. It was printed in London 'for R. Bremner, opposite Somerset House in the Strand ; by George Bigg, successor to Mr. Dryden Leach.' Although a copy of this work is rarely met with now, the substance of the pamphlet has been frequently quoted and reprinted in full in modern works on the violin. Between 1760 and 1768 Maddalena Lombardini toured in Italy, where she is said to have proved a worthy rival of Tartini's greatest pupil—Nardini. During her travels the young virtuosa met Ludovico Sirmen, violinist and conductor at Sta. Maria Maddalena in Bergamo. The acquaintance eventually ended in marriage, and a visit to Paris, where the couple were heard at a Concert Spirituel on Monday, Aug. 15, 1768. The Mercure de France speaks in glowing terms of M. and Madame Sirmen's execution of a double violin concerto of their own composition. In 1771, Signora Sirmen came to London, where her début took place at the King's Theatre, on Thursday, Jan. 9. J. C. Bach's oratorio, 'Giosafè di Giuda,' was the pièce de résistance of the evening. Duport (cadet) played a violoncello solo after the first act, and in the second act, after the duettino, there was a 'Concerto on the Violin by the celebrated Mrs. Lombardini Sirmen.' Her success in the Metropolis was apparently instantaneous, and was repeated on the 10th, 16th, 17th, 23rd and 24th of the same month. During the following February she played frequently at the highest class concerts in London. On Feb. 15 she performed a violin concerto between the first and second parts of Handel's 'Judas Maccabæus' at Covent Garden, and on the 20th between the first and second parts of the 'Messiah.' Her Benefit Concert, under the direction of Bach and Abel, took place at Almack's on Apr. 15; Guadagni, Wendling, Fischer, and other celebrated artists of the day assisted her; but Madame Sirmen, either for a whim, or by request, abandoned for this occasion the instrument on which she excelled, and, according to the advertisement in the Public Advertiser of that date, played 'A Concerto on the Harpsichord.' In the month of May her services as violinist were in constant requisition. She repeated her triumphs at the King's Theatre, and, besides playing her violin concertos, contributed some violin obbligati to the songs of the principal vocalists. The Public Advertiser of May 28, 1771, announces 'The celebrated Signora Sirmen on the violin, being her last performance this season.' The following year she returned to London, and took up her abode in Half Moon Street, Piccadilly. Her services were more than ever sought after. She appeared at nearly all the Lenten Oratorio Concerts at Covent Garden, playing violin concertos between the parts. On Mar. 26, 1772, she had another benefit concert, and on Apr. 1 she introduced a new violin concerto by the eminent violoncellist Cirri, after the second part of Handel's 'Messiah' at Covent Garden. Her final appearance in England is so announced in the Public Advertiser of Apr. 10, at the newly organised Concert Spirituel held in the same building. Apparently this was not only Signora Sirmen's last performance in England, but it was the end of her brilliant career as a violinist. Whether she was unable to sustain the high reputation she had achieved, or whether she was drawn away from her original bent by the dazzling example of Miss Schmeling (afterwards Madame Mara), can only be surmised. In any case she came to London again in 1774, and according to Dr. Burney¹ her last visit to the metropolis was in the capacity of a singer, in which her success was questionable.

'In "Scotlands" and "The Cid"'—runs the note—'Madame Syrmén, the scholar of Tartini who was justly admired for her polished and expressive manner of playing the violin, appeared as a singer in the second woman, but having been first woman so long upon her instrument, she degraded herself by assuming a character in which, though not destitute of voice and taste, she laid no claim to superiority.'

After this unfortunate attempt the erstwhile distinguished violinist drifted to the Continent again, and in 1782 she was singing secondary parts at the court theatre in Dresden. In May 1785 she made her last recorded appearance as a violinist at a Concert Spirituel in Paris, but without success, by reason, according to the Mercure de France, of the old-fashioned and worn-out music that she played. The fulfilment of the brilliant promise of Signora Sirmen's early career appears to have been arrested after her two brief seasons in London, and for this reason she is chiefly remembered, not so much as a violinist, but as the recipient of Tartini's notable letter.

Her compositions comprise :

1. Six trios à deux violons et violoncelle obligé. Œuvre premier (Wolker and Genaud, Boho).
2. Six Quartettes à deux violons, alto et basse (written in conjunction with her husband) Berault, Paris (1759), also Longman & Broderip, London.
3. Six duos for two violins (dedicated to the Duke of Gloucester). William Napier, London.
4. Six concertos for violin with an accompaniment for two violins, alto, bass, hautboy, and two horns. Bummel, Amsterdam.
5. Six Sonates à deux violons. Bummel, Amsterdam. In the Berlin Bibliothek a copy of these sonatas is embellished with a picture of Maddalena Sirmen.
6. Six concertos adapted for the harpsichord by Signor Giordani (London, 1780) Longman & Broderip, Cheapside, and No. 3 Haymarket. J. A. Hiller mentions a concerto which was published in Venice.

SIR ROGER DE COVERLY,² the only one of the numerous old English dances which has retained its popularity until the present day, is probably a tune of north-country origin. Chappell (Popular Music, vol. ii.) says that he possesses a MS. version of it called 'Old Roger or Coverlay for evermore, a Lancashire Hornpipe,' and in 'The First and Second Division Violin' (in the B.M. Catalogue attributed to John Eccles, and dated 1705) another version of it is entitled 'Roger of Coverly the true Cheisers way.' Moreover, the Calverley family, from one of whose ancestors the tune is said to derive its name,³ have been from time immemorial inhabitants of the Yorkshire village which bears their name. The editor of the Skene MS., on the strength of a MS. version dated 1706, claims the tune as Scottish, and says that it is well known north of the Tweed as 'The Maltman comes on Monday.' According to Dr. Rim-bault,¹ the earliest printed version of it occurs in Playford's 'Division Violin' (1685). In 'The Dancing Master' it is first found at page 167 of the 9th edition, published in 1695, where the tune and directions for the dance are given exactly as follows :

³ See Notes and Queries, vol. I, No. 23, p. 365.

Roger of Coverly.
Longways for as many as will.

The 1. man go below the 2. wo. then round, and so below the 2. man into his own place; then the 1. wo. go below the 2. man, then round him, and so below the 2. wo. into her own place. The 1. cu. (first couple) cross over below the 2. cu. and take hands and turn round twice, then lead up through and cast off into the 2. cu. place. W. B. S.

The Scots song, 'The Maltman comes on Monday,' is not, as erroneously asserted by Chappell, by Allan Ramsay, although it is inserted in the first volume of his Tea-Table Miscellany, 1724. The English title is not so easily disposed of.

The Spectator, 2nd number, 1711, speaks of Sir Roger de Coverley as a gentleman of Worcestershire, and that 'His great grandfather was the inventor of the famous country dance which is called after him.'

Fanciful as this is, it shows that the dance, at that time, was considered an old one. Another origin for the name of the tune is based on a MS. in the writer's possession, inscribed 'For the violin, Patrick Cumming, his Book: Edinburgh, 1723.' At the end the name is repeated, and the date 1724 given. The tune stands as follows, although the Scottish SCORDATURA (q.v.) is likely to puzzle the casual reader, since the first notes which appear as G, A, B, C sound A, B, C, D.

The Maltman, or Roger the Cavalier.
Scordatura (not given in the MS.).

¹ Notes and Queries, I. No. 8.

It is well known that the name 'Roger' was bestowed upon the Royalists during the Civil War, and it is suggested that 'Coverly' is really a corruption of 'Cavalier.'

As the dance, later, was almost invariably used at the conclusion of a ball, it was frequently called 'The Finishing Dance.' See Wilson's Companion to the Ball-Room, circa 1816, and Chappell's Popular Music for the modern figure. According to an early correspondent of Notes and Queries, the tune was known in Virginia, U.S.A., as 'My Aunt Margery.' F. K.

SISTINE CHOIR ² (Ital. Il Collegio dei Cappellani Cantori della Cappella Pontificia), a collegiate body, consisting of thirty-two choral chaplains, domiciled—though not in any special buildings of their own—at Rome, where for many centuries they have enjoyed the exclusive privilege of singing at all those solemn services and ecclesiastical functions in which the Pope officiates in person.

The genealogy of the Papal Choir may be traced back to a period of very remote antiquity. It is said—and the tradition is worthy of credit—that a school for the education of chorists was founded in Rome early in the 4th century by S. Sylvester, whose pontificate lasted from the year 314-35. That S. Hilarius (461-468) established one, not much more than a century later, is certain. These institutions, after the lapse of another hundred years, were supplemented by new ones on a larger scale. On the destruction of the monastery of Monte Cassino by the Lombards, in the year 580, the Benedictine Fathers fled to Rome; and, under the protection of Pope Pelagius II. (577-90), established themselves in a new home near the Lateran Basilica, where they opened schools for the preparation of candidates for holy orders. S. Gregory the Great (590-604) took advantage of this circumstance while working out his system of reform, and turned the seminaries to account as schools of singing. (See SONG SCHOOL.) Under his care they prospered exceedingly, and in process of time attained proportions which enabled him to supply the various Basilicas with singers, who assembled on the greater festivals, and attended the Pope wherever he officiated. And thus arose the practice to which the Church was eventually indebted for the magnificent services of the Sistine Chapel.

These early Scholae Cantorum—sometimes called Orphanotrophia, in allusion to the number of fatherless children which they sheltered—were governed by an ecclesiastic of high rank, called the Primicerius, who, assisted by a Secundicerius destined afterwards to succeed him in his office, exercised absolute control over the youths and children committed to his care. Boys were admitted into the preparatory school (Parsium) at a very early age; and if of gentle birth, became at the same time members of the papal household, holding a status like that of the pages at a secular court. After passing through the necessary preparation, the choristers were permitted to take part in the most solemn services of the Church: and when their voices changed, were either prepared for the priesthood or provided for as Cubicularii. The older members of the Scholae were called Subdeacons; but the title was only an honorary one. By their help Rome was so liberally supplied with singers that on more than one occasion the Pope was able to send out skilled instructors for the purpose of encouraging the purest style of ecclesiastical singing in other countries¹; and, as we hear of no important modification of the system before the beginning of the 14th century, we are justified in believing that it fulfilled its purpose perfectly.

A great change, however, took place during the pontificate of Clement V. (1305-14), who in the year 1305 transferred the Chair of S. Peter to Avignon, leaving his Primicerius and Schola Cantorum behind him in Rome. Too much oppressed by political and ecclesiastical troubles to devote his time to the regulation of details, Pope Clement naturally left the management of his chapel to underlings, who suffered the music to degenerate to a very unsatisfactory level. His successor, John XXII. (1316-34), issued in 1323 the well-known Bull, 'Docta sanctorum,' for the purpose of restraining his singers from corrupting the simplicity of plain-song, either by subjecting it to the laws of measured music, or by overloading it with ornamentation. It is doubtful whether the provisions of this Bull were fully carried out after the decease of its author, whose immediate successor, Benedict XII. (1334-42), was too fond of splendid ceremonial to raise any strong objection on the score of its elaborateness to the music sung by the twelve choral chaplains who officiated in his private chapel. Indeed, the management of the choir employed by Benedict and his successors at Avignon differed altogether from that of the Roman Schola, which was still carried on under the Primicerius. In Rome, the choristers were taught on the old traditional system, almost from their infancy. At Avignon, the most welcome recruits were French and Flemish singers, who had already earned a brilliant reputation. Now, in those days the best singers were, for the most part, the best composers also; and in the Low Countries the art of composition was rapidly advancing towards a state of perfection elsewhere unknown. It followed, therefore, that the choir at Avignon contained some of the greatest musicians in Europe, and was indebted to them for faux-bourbons and other polyphonic music, scarcely ever heard at that period except in the Netherlands.

In 1377 Pope Gregory XI. (1370-78) returned to Rome, and carried his choir with him. The contrast between the rival schools now became more apparent than ever; yet by some means they amalgamated completely. The probability is that Gregory himself united them, forming the two choirs into one body, which was no longer called the Schola Cantorum, nor governed by a Primicerius, but was henceforth known as the Collegio dei Cappellani Cantori, and placed under the command of an ecclesiastic who held the appointment for life, and bore the title of 'Maestro della Cappella Pontificia.' The precise year in which this change took place cannot be ascertained; though it is certain that the new title was borne by Angelo, Abbot of S. Maria de Rivaldis, in 1397—twenty years after the return from Avignon. After this, we hear of no other maestro till 1464, when the appointment was conferred upon Niccolò Fabri, Governor of Rome, who held it for two years. From 1469 onwards the list includes the names of fourteen ecclesiastics, of whom all, except the last, were Bishops. The most celebrated of them was Elziario GENER, of Carpentras, 'Vescovo in partibus' (1516-26?), and the last of the series was Monsignor Antonio Boccapadule (1574-86). Pope Sixtus V. (1585-90) issued Sept. 1, 1586, a Bull ('In suprema'), by virtue of which he conferred upon the college the right of electing, from among their own body, an officer, to whom was committed the duty of governing the choir, for three, six, or twelve months, or in perpetuity, according to the pleasure of the electors.² It was clear that the maestri so elected must necessarily be deprived of many of the privileges enjoyed by the ecclesiastical dignitaries who had preceded them; but, by way of compensation, they were invested with all which were not inseparable from the status of a Bishop; and these were still further increased by Pope Clement XIII. in the Bull 'Cum retinendi,' August 31, 1762. It was ultimately arranged that the election should take place annually, and this custom has ever since been strictly observed. The first maestro so chosen was Giovanni Antonio Merlo, who served during the year 1587. Since his time the election has always been fixed for Dec. 28; and for very many years it has been the invariable custom to elect the principal bass.

The Flemish singers, having once obtained a recognised position in the choir, soon began to exercise an irresistible influence over it, and, through it, over every other choir in Christendom. Among the first of whom we have any certain account was Guglielmo DUFAY (q.v.).

The number of singers, which at Avignon had been limited to twelve, was in the 16th century increased to twenty-four, and not very long afterwards raised to thirty-two, which figure still represents the normal strength of the choir, though the assistance of additional ripeni is sometimes permitted on extraordinary occasions. After the formal admission of the Netherlanders the compositions sung in the Papal Chapel were almost entirely supplied by the cappellani cantori themselves. The custom was, when any member of the college had produced a mass or other great work, to have it roughly written out, and rehearsed by the entire body of singers, who afterwards decided whether or not it was worthy of their acceptance. If the votes were in its favour, the original autograph was placed in the hands of the Scrittori—of whom four were usually kept in full employment—and by them copied, in stencilled notes large enough to be read by the entire choir at once, into huge partbooks,¹ formed of entire sheets of parchment, of which a large collection, richly illuminated and magnificently bound, is still preserved among the Archives of the Sistine Chapel, though a vast number were destroyed in the conflagration which ensued on the invasion of Rome by Charles V. in 1527.

It was Pope Sixtus V. who, at the time of his reform in the government of the choir, mentioned above, conferred upon Palestrina,² the title of Composer to the Pontifical Chapel. The office was renewed, after Palestrina's death, in favour of Felice Anerio, but was never conferred on any other member of the college. The most famous musicians who sang in the choir³ after Palestrina were Giov. Maria Nanini, admitted in 1577, Luca Marenzio (1584), Rug-gerio Giovanelli (1599), and Gregorio Allegri (1629–52). Adami also mentions Victoria, whose name, however, is not to be found in any official register. Among more modern maestri the three most notable were, Tommaso Bai, who held the office of maestro in 1714; the Cavaliere Giuseppe Santarelli—Dr. Burney's friend—who entered the choir as an artificial soprano singer in 1749, and died in 1790; and the Abbate BAINI (q.v.), who was received into the college in 1795, became maestro in 1817, and died in 1844. By special favour of Pope Gregory XVI., Bains retained his office for life, but no later maestro has enjoyed the same privilege.

The two settings of the Miserere by Bai and Bains, which for many years past have been used alternately with that of Allegri, are the only works added to the repertory of the chapel since the death of the last-named maestro. Indeed, neither the constitution nor the habits of the college have, since Palestrina, undergone any important change—except, perhaps, in one particular, to be mentioned presently; and hence it is its performances are so infinitely valuable, as traditional indices of the style of singing cultivated at the period which produced the 'Missa Papæ Marcelli,' the 'Impropria,' and the 'Lamentations.'

The one point in which a change has taken place is the selection of voices; and it is necessary to remark that, as the change did not take place until seven years after Palestrina's death, the idea that we cannot sing his music in England as he intended it to be sung, for lack of the necessary voices, is altogether untenable. In early times, as we have already seen, the chapel was supplied with soprani, and in all probability with contralti also, by means of the Orphanotropa or Scholæ Cantorum, exactly as English cathedrals are now supplied by means of the Choristers' Schools. That this plan was continued until quite late in the 16th century is sufficiently proved by the fact that, between 1561 and 1571, Palestrina held the joint offices of maestro di cappella and maestro dei fanciulli di coro at the Church of Sta. Maria Maggiore, while, between 1539 and 1553 the post of 'Maestro de' Putti,' at the Cappella Giulia, was successively filled by Arcadelt, Rubino, Basso, Ferrabosco, and Roselli. During the latter half of the 16th century, however, these youthful treble voices were gradually supplanted by a new kind of adult male soprano, called the soprano falsetto, imported, in the first instance, from Spain, in which country it was extensively cultivated by means of some peculiar system of training, the secret of which has never publicly transpired.⁴ At the close of the 16th century,

² On the whole of Palestrina's relations with the Papal Choir, which research had proved to be very different from those described by Bains, Reckstroff's principal authority, see the article PALESTRINA.

³ A catalogue of the singers of the Cappella Pontificia was published in R.M.J., 1907.

Spanish sopranos were in very great request; and were, indeed, preferred to all others, until the year 1601, when a far more momentous change was introduced.

During nearly the whole of the 17th and the greater part of the 18th centuries the theatres of Europe were supplied with adult male soprano and contralto voices, preserved by a process so barbarous, that at one time it was forbidden in Italy on pain of death. Yet notwithstanding this penalty the system prospered, and enriched the stage with many of its most accomplished ornaments, such as Nicolini Grimaldi, Senesino, Carestini, Pacchierotti, Farinelli and others. It has been said that Farinelli's wonderful voice was accidentally preserved, and the story is probably true; for it is certain that very fine voices are sometimes preserved by accident, and quite reasonable to suppose that such accidents may very frequently happen, though should the sufferers possess no musical talent one is not likely to hear of them. In these purely accidental cases no singer with a good voice has even been refused admission into the pontifical choir; but the transgression of the law, which was formerly punishable with death, now renders the offender de facto excommunicate, and therefore effectually prevents his reception into the Collegio. One of the most learned and accomplished musicians in Rome, in command of one of its most celebrated choirs, remembered the admission of three artificial voices, accidentally produced, while he was studying under Baini. Two of them proved too weak to be used, except as ripieni; but the third developed into a magnificent soprano. The trained soprano falsetto, which needs no accident to produce it, is not yet extinct.¹

Italian choirmasters draw a careful distinction between the different voices they employ. The Voce bianca or naturale is by no means uncommon, but produces only contralto singers. The true adult soprano, arte fatta (made by method²), is an excessively rare voice, produced 'rather in the head than in the chest or throat,' and lasting, generally, to extreme old age, to the astonishment of the uninitiated hearer, who cannot understand its co-existence with a long white beard.³ The occurrence of such phenomena is, however, so exceptional, that Pope Pius IX. founded the Scuola di S. Salvatore, near St. Peter's, for the express purpose of supplying the choirs of Rome with boys, subject, as in England, to be discharged on the breaking of their voices.

It remains only to say a few words concerning the style of singing practised by this matchless choir, and the lessons to be learned from it.

For the last three centuries at least there have been preserved certain traditional ornaments and forms of expression which are profound mysteries to the uninitiated (see ALLEGRI; IMPROPERIA). For instance, the Second and Third Lamentations on the three last days in Holy Week are sung, as is generally supposed, by a high voice; but when that voice is too weak for the task it is assisted by another, which, even in the most difficult abbellimenti, keeps so exactly with it that the two voices are invariably mistaken for one. Again, there has long been a traditional way of making crescendi and diminuendi which has astonished even the most experienced choirmasters. The secret of this wonderful effect is that not only the amount of tone produced by each individual voice, but the actual number of voices employed, is gradually increased in the one case and diminished in the other. Such effects would no doubt be condemned by English choirmasters as 'tricks,' but they are not tricks. No means can be so condemned, with justice, provided the effect they produce be artistic and legitimate.

SIVORI, ERNESTO CAMILLO (b. Genoa, Oct. 25, 1815; d. Via Giulia, Genoa, Feb. 19, 1894), a great violinist. He began the violin at 5, under Restano, and continued it under Costa until about the year 1823, when Paganini met with him, and was so much struck with his talent, as not only to give him lessons, but to compose six sonatas and a concertino for violin, guitar, tenor and violoncello, which they were accustomed to play together, Paganini taking the guitar. This was sufficient to launch the lad into Paganini's style. After a stay of six months in his native city, Paganini left for a tour in Germany in 1824, but before his departure he demonstrated the interest he took in young Sivori by desiring that he should accompany him on his travels. Owing to the child's tender years, however, his parents refused to abandon him to the care of the great violinist. This being the case, Paganini recommended the elder Sivori to place his son with his own former master, Giacomo Costa, and for three years this teacher guided the child's studies so adroitly that when Paganini returned to Genoa in 1827 he found him well equipped as a classical player. Though perfectly satisfied with the progress of his protégé, he at the same time considered him lacking in virtuosity, and there fore suggested a change from Costa's scholastic method to the more volatile system of his intimate friend Dellepiane. Again the boy's progress was astonishing, and at length his father, conquering his objections to a musical career for his son, became desirous that he should make some public appearances outside his own country.

Accordingly, accompanied by his master Dellepiane, Camillo Sivori travelled first to Turin, where he played at a concert on May 3, 1827. He next appeared at Susa on the 5th, Saint Michel 6th, Chambéry 7th, Lyons 16th, Paris 18th, and made his début in London on the 25th. Two days later he was again in Paris, where the Duchesse de Noailles, the Duc de Berri and most of the dilettanti of the town interested themselves in him, as did likewise Rossini, Cherubini, Baillot and other eminent musicians of the day. He gave a very successful concert in Paris on Dec. 4. In 1828 Sivori repeated his first triumphs in Paris and London. The autumn of the same year was spent by him in touring in the French provinces. After an absence of eighteen months he at length returned to Genoa in Jan. 1829, and devoted himself earnestly to studying composition with Giovanni Serra, a profound theorist of the classical school, then occupying the post of musical director at the Teatro Carlo Felice in Genoa. During the year 1829 Sivori did little else but study, only acting at intervals as Dellepiane's substitute at the Teatro Carlo Felice, and also at the Conservatorio when the latter was taken ill. He generously gave the entire benefit of these services to his old master, and after Dellepiane's death extended the same charity to his impoverished widow and child for the space of a year. Feb. 1834 found Sivori again in England making his début as a quartet-player in the Queen's Square 'Select Society' meetings at Alsager's house, and on Mar. 28 he played in the first performance of Cherubini's Requiem.

He next traversed Italy, beginning with Florence, in 1839; then in 1841 and 1842 visited Prague, Vienna, Leipzig, Berlin, Frankfurt, Brussels, St. Petersburg and Moscow. On Jan. 29, 1843, he made his entrées to Paris with a movement from a concerto of his own, his performance of which carried away his audience and procured him a special medal. He also made a vast impression in chamber-music. The brilliantly successful appearance of Jan. 29—when he played his own concerto in E flat, Paganini's concerto in B minor, and the same composer's 'Moise,' for the G string—took place at the Conservatoire, and that institution presented him with its gold medal of honour. From Paris he went to London, where he made his first appearance at the Philharmonic in May, playing his concerto in A at the same concerts on June 5, 1843, and repeating it on the 19th (Spohr was in London at the same time); returned in 1844, when Mendelssohn, Joachim, Hallé, Piatti and Ernst were here also, and in 1845, when he assisted in the famous performances of Beethoven's Quartets at Alsager's house (see ALSAGER), played at the Musical Union on June 24, etc. etc. Tours in Great Britain and Ireland, and in Holland followed, and in the ensuing year he gave a concert at Brussels (on Mar. 12), returning from thence to Paris and playing en route at Liège, Antwerp, Ghent, etc. The season of 1844 was again successfully occupied in London with his own concert at Her Majesty's Theatre, an appearance at a Philharmonic concert under Mendelssohn: a farewell concert at Hanover Square Rooms, where he played the 'Kreutzer Sonata' with Julius Benedict—a performance which was repeated at the Melodists' Club—and numerous private engagements. In August, Sivori in company with Dohler, Piatti, Henry Russell and Lablache, jun., made a tour of Great Britain. After playing at Hamburg he came to London again during the season of 1845. In 1846 he was again there; on June 27, played Mendelssohn's concerto at a Philharmonic Concert, and was solo violin at Jullien's 'Concerts d'Été.'

He then left for America, in which he remained till 1850, travelling from the Northern States, by Mexico and Panama, to Valparaiso, Rio, Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, and narrowly escaping death by yellow fever. In 1850 he returned to Genoa, and shortly after lost nearly all the money he had made in the new world by an imprudent speculation. In 1851 he was again in Great Britain, touring throughout the whole country. In London he played at Professor Ella's Musical Union concert with Golinelli (pianist) and Piatti. In 1852 he played in Beethoven's triple concerto in C—with Piatti as violoncellist—at the New Philharmonic Society at Exeter Hall under Berlioz's baton. A tour in Scotland in 1853 was followed by a tour in Switzerland, where he broke his wrist in an unfortunate carriage accident at Geneva. On Dec. 15 Sivori played at La Pergola, Florence, returning to Genoa in time for the opening of the Teatro Apollonio. In 1854 he toured in France, and the following year, he married the actress Ortensia Damain, after which he toured in Spain, where the Queen made him Knight of the Order of Carlos III. From Spain he went to Portugal, where the King made him Knight of the Order of Christ the King, and in the spring of 1856 he made appearances in Belgium, Holland and Germany. In 1857 Sivori toured in England with Piatti, and the fourteen-year-old pianist, Arthur Napoleon. In 1862 he scored one more success in Paris in the B minor concerto of Paganini. In 1864 he revisited London, and appeared at the Musical Union and elsewhere. In 1869 Sivori appeared at some of the Monday Popular Concerts in London, and in 1870 toured in France, after which he returned to Genoa and there led a quiet life until his death.

As a man he was always liked—'little, good-tempered, warm-hearted, intelligent Camillo Sivori' is the description of him by an English journalist. He was the only direct pupil of Paganini, and his playing was that of a virtuoso of the Paganini school, with a prodigious command of difficulties, especially of double-stopping, second only to his master. His tone was silvery and clear, but rather thin. His style—judged by a classical standard—was cold and affected, and had little real feeling.

His compositions include:

Two concertos for violin in F flat and A; capriccio, La Génoise; op. 12, Tarantelle napolitaine, violin and orchestra, or piano; Deux duos concertants for pianoforte and violin; duet for violin and double bass, written with Boissini; Fantaisie Caprice in E, Fantaisie Étude, op. 10; Fantaisie, Fleurs de Naples; Souvenir de Norma; Carnaval de Chili; Carnaval de Cuba; Carnaval américain; Tempest Music (Milan, 1800); Folies espagnoles; Variations on 'Nel cor non più mi sento' and 'Le Pirate'; Three Fantaisias upon airs from 'La sonnambula', 'L'Éclair', 'Zepateado'; Fantasia on airs from 'Un ballo in maschera', 'Il Trovatore', Lucia di Lammermoor; Andante Spianato; 'Trio Romances sans paroles', with pianoforte accompaniment.

SIXTH, the interval which embraces six degrees of the scale. There are three forms—the major, the minor and the augmented. (1) The major sixth, as CA, contains 9 mean semitones, and the ratio of its limiting sounds in the true scale is 5 : 3. It is a concord, and in harmony is regarded as the first inversion of the minor common chord. (2) The minor sixth, as CA♭ or EC, contains 8 semitones, and the ratio of its limiting sounds is 8 : 5. It is also a concord and in harmony regarded as the first inversion of the major common chord. (3) The augmented sixth, which is arrived at by flattening the lower or sharpening the upper extreme sound of a major sixth, as D♭ B, or A♭ F♯, contains 10 semitones, and the ratio of the limiting sounds is 125 : 72. The augmented sixth is a discord, and is usually resolved by moving each note a semitone outwards to the octave, the sharpening or flattening of one of the extreme sounds already implying a straining in that direction. Three forms of the augmented sixth are distinguished by special names: when it is accompanied by the major third it is called 'Italian' (see a); when to this is added the augmented fourth, it is called 'French' (see b); and when the major third and fifth are present (c) it is called 'German.'

The Neapolitan Sixth is the name by which a chord consisting of a minor sixth and minor third on the subdominant has long been known; as (d) in the key of C minor. (See INTERVALS; HARMONY.)

SJÖGREN, EMIL (b. Stockholm, June 6, 1853; d. there, Mar. 1918), studied first at the Conservatoire there, and afterwards at Berlin under Kiel for composition and Haupt for the organ. In 1884-85 he made tours through Europe, visiting Vienna, Munich, Venice and Paris. During a stay at Meran he was for six months under the influence of Lange Müller, which affected his work very deeply. From 1891 Sjögren was organist at the Yohannekyrka at Stockholm, where he was employed in teaching and in composition of all kinds; chiefly for piano solo, violin and piano, and songs. He was a composer whose works do not display the almost exclusively Scandinavian character of Grieg, but who shows an infusion of German ideas. Among his best-known works are 'Der Contrabandista,' op. 9, for bass voice; 'Eretikon,' op. 10, for piano; 'Novelettes,' op. 14, for piano; the three sonatas, op. 19, op. 24, op. 32, in G minor, E minor and G minor, for violin and piano; the two sonatas, op. 35 and op. 44, in E minor and A major for piano. Besides these Sjögren wrote a great number of melodies, and detached pieces for the piano. He also wrote much for the voice, as well as many pieces for the organ. His music showed a certain amount of Scandinavian style, coupled with a warm emotionalism which was derived from more southern countries.

SKETCH (Fr. esquisse; Ger. Skizze; Ital. schizzo). (1) This name is strictly applied to the preliminary jotting down of a musical idea, or to memoranda of special points of development or orchestration, used by composers in the process of bringing their works to perfection. To analyse the various books of extant sketches by great masters would lie outside the scope of this Dictionary; we may point out that various sketch-books of Beethoven have been published, which are essential to a knowledge of his methods of working.

(2) A short movement, usually written for the pianoforte, and deriving its name, in some cases, from its descriptive character, in others, from the slowness of its construction.

ŠKROUP, FRANTIŠEK JAN (b. Vosice, near Pardubice, Bohemia, 1801; d. Rotterdam, Feb. 7, 1862). Composer of the first Czech opera and of the Czech national anthem, 'Kde domov můj' ('There, where our home is'). He was by profession a lawyer, but gained some experience as a singer and amateur conductor. In 1823 a German opera by Weigl, based on 'The Swiss Family,' was given in Czech, a unique event at that period. Its success was so great that the promoters of the scheme determined to go a step further and produce an opera composed by a Czech to a Czech libretto. Škroup undertook the work, and, having secured the literary services of Chmelenský, he started upon an opera entitled 'Dráteník' ('The Tinker'). The opera was produced at the festival of Candlemas, 1826. Its reception was extraordinarily enthusiastic, for it had the prestige of being the first native opera ever staged in Bohemia. The music was bright, fluent and uninspired. The brisk overture, in the early Mozartian style, is the best part of the work. There is not much attempt at dramatic characterisation, and the reflection of the folk element is superficial. The national hymn of the Czechs, taken from one of Škroup's later works ('Fidlovačka'), was subsequently interpolated at the close of 'Dráteník.' A facsimile reprint of the work, with its original, semi-German, typography, was published by the Umělecká Beseda (Society of Arts) in 1913 (Prague). Škroup attempted a more ambitious task in 'The Marriage of Libuša' (1834), but he had not the depth and imagination necessary for epic opera. He was conductor of the State theatre, Prague, from 1827-57, and was the first Czech to occupy this position, which only a few years before had been filled by Carl Maria Weber. Honour is due to Škroup for the industry with which he worked to raise himself from the status of an amateur to such a high position. His last successes as a conductor in Prague were in Wagnerian opera: 'Tannhäuser' (1854), 'Lohengrin' (1856) and 'The Flying Dutchman' (1856). He moved to Rotterdam in 1860. His other operas include 'Oldřich and Božena' (Czech); 'Der Geisterbräut', 'Drahomíra', 'Der Meergensee' (German); incidental music to Tyl's farce 'Fidlovačka' (1883). Škroup did not found a school of national opera. Between the production of 'Dráteník' and Smetana's first opera, 'The Brandenburgers in Bohemia'—an interval of thirty years—there was no further progress in this direction.

SKUHERSKÝ, FRANTIŠEK, Z. (b. Opocno, July 31, 1830; d. Budějovice, Aug. 19, 1892, Czech teacher, theorist and composer. He began life as a medical student, but his inclination to music was so strong that he abandoned this career and studied musical theory under KITTl (q.v.), director of the Prague Conservatoire, and PITsCH (q.v.), director of the Organ School. From 1854-66 Skuherský was director of the Musical Union of Innsbruck, when he was appointed principal of the Organ School in Prague. Other posts came his way: that of court pianist to the Emperor Ferdinand, and director of the court orchestra (1869); lecturer of musical theory at the Czech University, Prague (1882-87). He made a journey to Rome and Regensburg in order to study old church music, especially the Gregorian. He was an hon. member of the Society for the Reform of Church Music in Bohemia (1884). As a teacher he exercised a considerable influence in a progressive direction. His literary work, which must take precedence of his compositions, includes: Theory of Musical Composition (1881); Musical Form (1879); Theory of Harmony (1885); The Organ, its management and preservation; Theoretical and Practical Organ School. Compositions—operas: 'Samo' (1854); 'Vladimír, bohův zvolenec' (Vladimír, God's chosen), 1863; 'Lova' (1868); 'Rector and General' (comic opera); symphonic poem, 'May'; three fugues for orchestra; pianoforte trio, string quartet and pianoforte quintet.

SLEZAK, LEO (b. Schönberg, Moravia, Aug. 18, 1875), operatic tenor. He was working at a technical institute to become an engineer when his voice developed, and after a brief period of study he made a promising début at Brunn, Mar. 17, 1896, as Lohengrin. He was then engaged for some years at the Berlin Royal Opera, during which he appeared at Covent Garden in 1900, singing Lohengrin to the Elsa of Milka Ternina. Although his vocal method was then rather severely criticised, he accepted an offer to transfer from Berlin to Vienna, where he sang at the Imperial Opera (1901-11). At last, however, in 1908, he decided to go to Paris to study under Jean de Reszke, and both voice and method underwent a marked improvement, the quality and resonance of the head notes gaining especially. This was made manifest at Covent Garden, when he reappeared (June 2, 1909) in a notable revival of Verdi's 'Otello,' singing his exacting music with robust power and beauty of tone. He was at once engaged to undertake the same part at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and made his American début therein in Nov. 1909. He remained for three seasons and gave song recitals in several cities. He afterwards won increased fame at the leading European opera houses in the dramatic rôles of Wagner and Meyerbeer.

(2) (Fr. glissade or port de voix; Ital. portamento.) To violinists the 'slide' is one of the principal vehicles of expression, at the same time affording a means of passing from one note to another at a distance. The rules governing the 'slide' are not restricted, as its use and effect entirely depend upon the judgment of the player, but the following directions are generally observed: (1) A 'slide' is effected by allowing the finger already upon the string to move up or down to within a fourth or third of the new note. Care should be taken to keep the fingers strictly within the range of each new position. Another kind of 'slide' is made by moving the finger over two or more adjoining semitones, without interruption.

In imitation of the matchless legato which the human voice alone can attain, violinists frequently employ a 'slide' limited to adjoining notes. A third 'slide' is entirely of a brilliant type, and belongs to the virtuoso, par excellence, having originated with Paganini. It consists in executing chromatic passages, singly or in thirds, octaves or other combinations, entirely with the same fingers. Paganini's music abounds in this species of 'slide,' as also do the compositions of the masters of the Belgian and French school, who adopted his methods. This 'slide' did not come into general use until the end of the 18th century or beginning of the 19th. Yet its sister acquirements, the tremolo and shift, were known to violinists a century earlier. Mersenne (Harm. universelle, 1636) speaks with delight of such professional violinists as 'les Sieurs Bocan, Lazarin' and others, who employed a certain 'tremblement qui ravissent l'esprit,' and the same author mentions the violinists who could mount to the octave on every string. Notwithstanding the lack of any direct mention of the 'slide' previous to the 18th century, the following remark by Jean Rousseau in his Traité de la viole (1687) might indicate that the eminent viola da gamba player, Hottman, was acquainted with it:

'It was he [Hottman] who in France first composed melodies (pièces d'harmonie) regulated for the viol, so as to make the effect of beautiful singing (beaux chants) in imitation of the voice.'

Corelli in the first half of the 17th century founded the correct position and independence of the left hand, but it is doubtful whether he, or his immediate successors, knew the use of the 'slide.' Even at the beginning of the 18th century the generality of violinists relied mostly upon every species of turn and flourish to give expression to their playing. To the 'Beat,' 'Back Fall,' 'Double Backfall,' 'Springer,' etc., writers of violin methods devoted elaborate attention, and, curiously enough, as though foreshadowing the coming of the 'slide,' these very turns were in France called by the name now employed in that country for its English equivalent, i.e. porte de voix. Neither Leopold Mozart nor Geminani in the middle of the 18th century mentions the 'slide,' but like their predecessors they consider good taste entirely dependent on the judicious employment of turns. But with Viotti's advent, and his establishment of the French School, the old methods began to give way to a truer mode of expression which found its medium in the change of position on the same string. Viotti's most gifted pupil, Rode, was particularly devoted to this method of playing tender phrases, and no violinist cultivated it more carefully than Rode's imitator and admirer Spohr. The compositions of the latter are full of examples of the 'slide' in its most classical form, and his Violin School contains some of the best instructions and examples of the art to be found.

(3) A contrivance fitted in some form or other to nearly all wind instruments for the purpose of adjusting the pitch by altering the length of the vibrating air-column. It is also applied in a special form to trombones and to some trumpets for the purpose of filling up those notes of the chromatic scale which lie between the various harmonics or 'open' notes. For this particular use of the slide principle see TROMBONE and TRUMPET.

For the attainment of the first object the slide may be simple, as on the flute, or U-shaped, as is usual on brass instruments. As the slide is used only for the general adjustment of pitch, it should not move too freely, in case the setting should be accidentally altered. In addition to this main or 'tuning' slide, brass valve instruments are fitted with slides to the valves for slight adjustments of pitch and for the easy removal of condensed moisture. In instruments such as the flute and clarinet, the speaking length of which varies with the opening of the different side-holes, any permissible alteration of pitch by means of the tuning-slide, or its equivalent in the form of socketed joints, is necessarily small. The reason for this is that the length added by the extension of the slide cannot bear a uniform proportion to the virtually different lengths of the instrument as determined by the different side-holes; therefore, no considerable alteration of pitch can be obtained on such an instrument without throwing it out of tune within itself. This apparently trifling matter is practically important, and the want of apprehension of it has led many to under-estimate the difficulty and cost of carrying out such a change of pitch as was determined on by the Philharmonic Society of London in 1896, when the present (low) PITCH (q.v.) was introduced. The slow progress of the change is largely due to the limitation of the efficiency of the slide, and the consequent need of new instruments constructed to the required pitch.

Attempts have been made to adapt the shifting slide as used on the trombone to the French horn, but the particular proportions of this instrument and others of the horn type do not admit of a successful application of the slide in this way.

SLIVINSKI, JOSEPH VON (b. Warsaw, Dec. 15, 1865), studied at Warsaw Conservatorium under Strobl; at Vienna with Leschetizky for four years; and finally with Rubinstein at St. Petersburg. His first appearance in public was in 1890, and he was not long in finding his way to England, where he first appeared at a recital of his own in St. James's Hall, May 17, 1892. In Jan. 1893 he played at one of Henschel's London Symphony Concerts; at the Crystal Palace, Mar. 4; and at the Philharmonic, Mar. 9 of the same year. In the following November he made his first appearance in New York. His playing is remarkable for poetical feeling, as well as for surprising brilliance of touch (Baker).

M.

SLOW MOVEMENT, a generic term for all pieces in slow time, whether separate or forming part of a larger work. It is specially applied to such pieces when they occur in a work in sonata-form. The right of any movement to this title must depend rather on its character than its time indication, for many movements marked Allegretto are strictly slow movements.

M.

SLUR (Fr. légature, Ger. Bindungszeichen, Ital. legatura). A curved line drawn over or under a group of notes indicating that the notes included within its limits are to be performed with smoothness, if on a stringed instrument, by a single stroke of the bow, or in singing, in a single breath. (See LEGATO and PHRASING.) In vocal music the slur is employed to indicate the use of PORTAMENTO (q.v.), and it is also very generally placed over two or more notes which are sung to a single syllable. In this case, however, the sign is superfluous, since if the passage consists of quavers or shorter notes, the connexion can be shown by writing them in groups instead of separately, while even if the notes are crotchets, the fact of there being but a single syllable sufficiently indicates the legato. Moreover, an effect analogous to the slur in instrumental music, whereby the second of two notes is curtailed and weakened, is perfectly possible in singing, and may very probably have been intended by the earlier composers where the sign of the slur is employed. This view is insisted upon by Mendelssohn, who in a letter to G. A. Macfarren¹ strongly objects to the engravers of his edition of 'Israel in Egypt' placing the slur over two quavers or semi-quavers which are to be sung to one word.

When the slur is used in combination with a series of dots, thus , it indicates the effect called mezzo staccato. (See STACCATO.)

SMAREGLIA, ANTONIO (b. Pola, Istria,

May 5, 1854), Italian composer. His parents had decided that he should study engineering, but while attending classes at the Polytechnic in Vienna he happened to hear performances of Beethoven, Mozart and Wagner, which aroused in him such enthusiasm that he left Vienna and entered the Conservatorium at Milan (1872), where he applied himself to the study of composition for some years under Franco Faccio.

His first opera, 'Preziosa,' was given at the Dal Verme Theatre, Milan, in 1879, with considerable success, in spite of the obvious Wagnerian influence it betrays. Equally successful was the next venture, 'Bianca da Cervia,' performed at La Scala in 1882. 'Rè Nala' (Venice, 1887) was the first opera which made Smareglia known in Germany, where 'The Vassal of Szeged,' produced at Weimar (1889) under Richter, made a very favourable impression, confirmed later by Vienna, Gratz, Munich and Prague. Hanslick defined Smareglia's music on this occasion as 'Italian soul and melody wedded to German science and precision.' 'Cornelius Schutt' was given for the first time at Prague (1893), and soon after, on Brahms's urgent recommendation, at Vienna under Richter. 'Nozze Istriane' (Trieste, 1895), 'La Falena' (Venice, 1896), 'Oceana' (La Scala, 1902) and 'Abisso' (La Scala, 1914) complete the list of Smareglia's work for the theatre.

Smareglia occupies a singular position amongst modern Italian composers. The Wagnerian influence is unmistakable in his music, and perhaps stands in the way of the rapid and popular appreciation of his more personal qualities. Hanslick was perfectly correct in stating that Smareglia combines the skill of the German with the lyrical impetus of the Italian. In his masterly use of the orchestra, his command of harmony and counterpoint, he stands above his Italian contemporaries. But such music must inevitably show the defects of its qualities. The aristocratic taste of his lyricism has not aroused audiences as more commonplace and less distinguished gifts of others have done. Thus, in spite of the success of his works, he never aroused public curiosity and never won the freedom from material considerations which is the reward of popularity. Smareglia's life was embittered by the loss of his eyesight in 1900. Fortunately he was gifted with a marvellous memory. It was his habit in composing to memorise a whole scene of the libretto, improvise the music on the piano, and then write note for note what he had played. Thus when he became blind he was still able to dictate the whole score of the opera 'Oceana' from memory.

(1) GEORGE, a London music-publisher who had some skill as a performer on the double bass. He was one of a musical family, and the father of Sir George Smart (3). Before entering business, he was an assistant to Robert BREMNER, and had been possibly also employed by William NAPIER. He began in the music trade about 1770, his shop being at the corner of Argyll Street, and numbered 331 Oxford Street. He issued many minor publications, such as country dances and sheet music, and remained at 331 Oxford Street until one of the earliest years of the 19th century, the period of his death. George Smart was one of the founders of a benevolent society for musicians.

(2) THOMAS (d. Aug. 3, 1826¹), probably brother to the elder George Smart, was an organist at St. Clement's Danes in 1783. He composed many songs and pieces for the piano-forte and harpsichord. He set to music the well-known song on the death of General Wolfe by Tom Paine, beginning 'In a mouldering cave where the wretched retreat.' F. K.

(3) SIR GEORGE THOMAS, Knight (b. May 10, 1776; d. London, Feb. 23, 1867), son of George (1), received his early musical education as a chorister of the Chapel Royal under Dr. Ayrton. He learned organ-playing from Dr. Dupuis and composition from Dr. Arnold. On quitting the choir in 1791 he obtained the appointment of organist of St. James's Chapel, Hampstead Road, and was also engaged as a violinist at Salomon's concerts. At a rehearsal of a symphony of Haydn's for one of those concerts the drummer was absent, and Haydn, who was at the harpsichord, inquired if any one present could play the drums. Smart volunteered, but from inexperience was not very successful, whereupon the great composer, ascending the orchestra, gave him a practical lesson in the art of drumming. About the same time he practised as a teacher of the harpsichord and singing. He soon showed an aptitude for conducting musical performances. In 1811, having successfully conducted some concerts in Dublin, he was knighted by the Lord-Lieutenant. In 1813 he was chosen one of the original members of the Philharmonic Society, and between that date and 1844 conducted forty-nine of its concerts. From 1813-1825 he conducted the Lenten oratorios at one or other of the patent theatres, at one of which in 1814 he introduced Beethoven's 'Mount of Olives' to the English public. In 1818 he directed the City concerts established by Baron Heath. On Apr. 1, 1822, he was appointed one of the organists of the Chapel Royal in the room of Charles Knyvett, deceased. In 1825 he accompanied Charles Kemble to Germany to engage Weber to compose an opera for Covent Garden, and when Weber came to England in 1826 to bring out his 'Oberon' he was the guest of Sir George Smart, in whose house he died on June 5.² It was mainly by the exertions of Sir George Smart and Sir Julius Benedict that the statue of Weber at Dresden was erected, the greater part of the subscriptions having been collected in England. In 1836 Sir George introduced Mendelssohn's 'St. Paul' to England at the Liverpool Festival. (On his duties in connexion with the coronation of Queen Victoria, see Mus. T., 1902, p. 18.) On the death of Attwood in 1838 he was appointed one of the composers to the Chapel Royal.

To careful musicianship he added an administrative ability which eminently qualified him for the conductorship of musical festivals and other performances on a large scale, and his services were for many years in request on such occasions all over the country. He conducted festivals at Liverpool in 1823, 1827, 1830, 1833 and 1836; Norwich, 1824, 1827, 1830 and 1833; Bath, 1824; Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 1824 and 1842; Edinburgh, 1824; Bury St. Edmund's, 1828; Dublin and Derby, 1831; Cambridge, 1833 and 1835; Westminster Abbey, 1834; Hull, 1834 and 1840; and Exeter Hall and Manchester, 1836. He was long resorted to by singers desirous of acquiring the traditional manner of singing Handel's songs, which he had been taught by his father, who had seen Handel conduct his oratorios: among the many he so instructed were Sontag and Jenny Lind. He gave lessons in singing until he was past eighty. He edited Orlando Gibbons's Madrigals for the Musical Antiquarian Society, and the Dettingen Te Deum for the Handel Society. He took an active part in procuring the foundation of the Mendelssohn Scholarship. His compositions consist of anthems, chants, Kyries, psalm tunes and glees. In 1863 he published a collection of his anthems and another of his glees and canons. Two of his glees, 'The Squirrel' and 'The Butterfly's Ball,' were very popular. He died at his house in Bedford Square. A volume entitled Leaves from the Journal of Sir George Smart, by H. B. Cox and C. L. E. Cox, was published in 1907.

A younger son of George Smart (1) was (4) CHARLES FREDERICK, who was a chorister of the Chapel Royal, and afterwards a double-bass player in the principal orchestras. Older than Charles, but younger than George, was another brother,

(5) HENRY (b. London, 1778; d. Dublin, Nov. 27, 1823), for a time in his father's business, and subsequently (about 1803) in that of a brewer. This latter trade being unsuccessful, he returned to the musical profession. He had begun his musical education at an early age, and studied the violin under Wilhelm Cramer, in which he made such progress that when only 14 he was engaged at the Opera, the Concert of Ancient Music, and the Academy of Ancient Music. He was engaged as leader of the band at the Lyceum on its being opened as an English Opera-House in 1809, and continued so for several seasons. He was leader at Drury Lane Theatre from its opening in 1812 until 1821. On June 12, 1819, the band presented him with a silver cup as a token of their regard. He was leader of the Lenten oratorios from the time they came under the management of his brother, Sir George, in 1813, and a member of the Philharmonic Society's orchestra, which he occasionally led. In 1820 he established a manufactory of pianofortes, of a peculiar construction, and on July 22, 1823, obtained a patent for improvements in the construction of pianofortes. He went to Dublin to superintend the debut of his pupil, Miss Goward (afterwards Mrs. Keeley), where he was attacked by typhus fever, and died. His son,

(6) HENRY THOMAS (b. London, Oct. 26, 1813; d. July 6, 1879) (known as Henry Smart), was a prominent organist and composer. After declining a commission in the Indian army, he was articled to a solicitor, but quitted law for music, for which he had extraordinary natural faculties, and which he studied principally under W. H. Kearns, though he was to a great extent self-taught. In 1831 he became organist of the parish church of Blackburn, Lancashire, which he resigned in 1836. While at Blackburn he composed his first important work, an anthem for the tercentenary of the Reformation, in 1835. In 1836 he settled in London as organist to St. Philip's Church, Regent Street. In Mar. 1844 he was appointed to the organ of St. Luke's, Old Street, where he remained until 1864, when he was chosen organist of St. Pancras. He was an excellent organ-player, specially happy as an accompanist in the service, a splendid extemporiser, and a voluminous and admirable composer for the instrument. But his compositions were by no means confined to the organ. On May 26, 1855, an opera from his pen, 'Berta, or, The Gnome of the Hartzberg,' was successfully produced at the Haymarket. In 1864 he composed his cantata, 'The Bride of Dunkerron' (his best work), expressly for the Birmingham Festival. He produced two cantatas, 'King René's Daughter, 1871, and 'The Fishermidmaids,' both for female voices. An opera on the subject of 'The Surrender of Calais,' the libretto by Planché, originally intended for Mendelssohn, was put into his hands by Chappell, about 1852, but though considerable progress was made with it, it was never completed. A sacred cantata, 'Jacob,' was written for the Glasgow Festival, produced Nov. 10, 1873, and two large anthems for soli, chorus and organ were written for the Festivals of the London

Choral Choirs Association at St. Paul's in 1876 and 1878—'Sing to the Lord' and 'Lord, thou hast been our refuge.' For many years past his sight had been failing, and soon after 1864 he became too blind to write. All his compositions after that date therefore were committed to paper through dictation.

It is as a composer of partsongs and a writer for the organ that Henry Smart is remembered. His earlier partsongs, 'The Shepherd's Farewell,' 'The Waves' Reproof' and 'Ave Maria,' are lovely; and his organ pieces are full of charming melody and effective combinations. He edited Handel's thirteen Italian duets and two trios for the Handel Society.

In June 1879 the Government granted him a pension of £100 a year in acknowledgment of his services in the cause of music, but he did not live to enjoy it. He was buried in Hampstead Cemetery. His last composition was a Postlude in E♭ for the organ, finished very shortly before the end. His life was written by his friend Dr. Spark (Reeves, 1881). (See the Mus. T. for May 1902.) W. H. H.

SMERT, RICHARD (15th or early 16th cent.), early English composer, described in B.M. Add. MSS. 5665/7b-58 as 'de Plymtree, Co. Devon.' This MS. contains some 23 carols, possibly all by Smert and John Truelove ('Troulouffe'); 9 are unsigned, but the 8 following are by Smert:

'Nowelle . . . tyndynges gode y thing to telle,' 'Nowelle . . . who ys there that synghs so,' 'Man be Joyfull,' 'Have mery of me, kyng of blisse,' 'O clavis David,' 'Jhesu nil virginis,' 'Nascitur ex virgine,' 'Blessed mote thou be, swete ihesu.'

They are all for 2 solo voices with 3-part chorus, and the first 'Nowelle' in the above list was printed by Ritson in his 'Ancient Songs' and later by Stafford Smith in 'Musica Antiqua' (1812). Three others, 'Soli Deo sit laudum gloria,' 'O David thow nobelle key,' 'Nesciens mater virgo virum peperit,' are the joint work of Smert and Truelove, and the three remaining are apparently by Truelove alone, although Smert's name is also given at the end of the third, 'Jhesu fili Dei.' SMETANA, BEDŘICH (FREDERICK) (b. Litomyšl, S.E. Bohemia, Mar. 2, 1824; d. Prague, May 12, 1884), Czech composer, founder of the National School of modern Czech music.

Smetana's father, manager of the brewery on the estate of Count Waldstein, was something of an amateur musician, and played the violin. The boy seems to have rivalled Mozart as a youthful prodigy. At 5 he took part in a Haydn quartet; at 6 he made a public debut as a pianist, playing the overture to Auber's 'La Muette de Portici,' and at 8 he had composed a few dance tunes. He received no systematic tuition, but managed to acquire a good execution, and while at school at Plzeň (Pilsen) from 1840-43, he was much sought after in provincial society for his brilliant performances of Liszt, Thalberg and Henselt. These facile achievements did not stifle his wider ambitions. At this time he wrote in his diary: 'I wish to become a Mozart in composition and a Liszt in technique.' In Plzeň he associated frequently with the Kolař family whom he had known since 1831, when his father had migrated from Litomyšl to Jindřich-Hradec, and as a child he had played duets with the musically gifted daughter Kateřina Ottilie with whom he now—at the age of 19—fell seriously in love. Kateřina was then studying in Prague with Josef Proksch, the most esteemed pianoforte teacher in the capital. Thanks to her intercessions, the master interested himself also in Bedřich and offered to give him lessons on credit. This was the more helpful because, when after leaving school the youth determined to follow the musical profession, his father, whose fortunes had declined, regarded his choice with disfavour, and, finally, giving him 20 golden florins—his entire patrimony—saw him depart for Prague with many misgivings. Smetana was actually faced with extreme hardship when J. Křtěl (q.v.)—then Director of the Conservatoire—recommended him as resident music master in the family of Count Leopold Thun. The post had several advantages. While the family was living in Prague, Smetana was able to associate with musicians more experienced than himself, and in the holidays, spent at the Count's summer seats at Ronsperg, or Mon Repos, in N.E. Bohemia, he saw new aspects of scenery. His familiarity with the varied landscape and the rural customs of his native land is reflected in all his mature works. It was probably during these long quiet periods in the country, brooding on the vicissitudes of first love, that Smetana's ambitions turned from virtuosity to composition. His first truly personal avowal in music was the cycle of piano pieces 'Bagatelles and Impromptus' (1844), with their rather naïve sub-titles which reveal his preoccupations: Innocence, Idylle, Longing, Love, Discord, etc. The pieces have the lasting charm of sincerity and contain the germ of much that Smetana—the autobiographer, the individualist, the disciple of Liszt and Berlioz—expressed later on with greater power and depth in the operas, symphonic poems and string quartets.

In 1848, the year of the abortive revolution which only ended in the closer oppression of all Czech patriots, Smetana left the service of the Thuns. His views were openly on the side of national freedom, and during these stormy days he composed a march for the Students' Legion and a 'Solemn Overture,' op. 4; works which sufficed to make his name suspect. Thanks to Liszt's encouragement, he opened a private music school in Prague and married in 1849, Kateřina Kolař, who had succeeded him as teacher in the Thun family. The chief consolation of the difficult years which followed were his sympathetic relations with Liszt, Clara Schumann and other distinguished visitors to Prague. But success seemed impossible in the atmosphere of prejudice and suspicion which enveloped Bohemian patriots in the early 'fifties of last century. Smetana, like other gifted Czechs, accepted a post abroad—the conductorship of the Harmoniska Sällskapet at Gothenburg—which promised a livelihood and freer musical activity. Here he remained for five years (1856–61). During this period his nationalism, at least as regards music, was in abeyance. The group of symphonic poems which he composed in Northern Europe is inspired by other histories and literatures than those of Bohemia, and strongly influenced by Liszt. 'In the art of Weimar,' says Prof. Z. NEJEDLÝ (q.v.), 'Smetana found the answer to many questions which had previously exercised his mind. Liszt's symphonic poems appeared to him a bold solution, showing that music might also be brought into touch with the intellectual movements of the time; removed from its intellectual isolation and enabled to play its part in the fight for the progressive ideas which would give a better, freer impulse to the life of Europe.'

From Smetana's correspondence with Liszt and J. Srb we learn something of the origin of these early symphonic poems. They are frank programme music. Of 'Richard III., op. 12, the composer writes:

'From the first bar I have presented my own personification of Richard in musical form. This leading theme dominates the entire work in various guises. . . . Before the end, I have endeavoured to depict his dreadful dream in the tent. . . . The close tells of his fall. The middle section of the poem describes Richard the victorious king; from this point decadence gradually creeps in.'

'Wallenstein's Camp,' op. 14, followed in 1858. The score bears indications for cuts in the event of its being played in the form of an overture to Schiller's play. It is interesting to note that in this work Smetana completely ignores the opportunities which occur for the introduction of Bohemian folk melodies. The third of this group of works, 'Hakon Jarl,' op. 16, is based on a forgotten tragedy by the Danish poet Glensclager which offers some picturesque contrast between the vigorous pagan usurper, Hakon, and the weak King Olaf, with his rather colourless retinue of Christian priests and nobles. The three symphonic poems were all written during Smetana's Gothenburg period, but their first performances were reserved for Prague. Possibly Smetana's modesty caused him to withhold his own compositions from the programmes he conducted in Gothenburg, where he presented not merely the music of Wagner and Liszt—the most modern of that day—but also the classical masterpieces of Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn.

We hear very little of Smetana's domestic life during this time, but there is every reason to believe that his early romance with Kateřina turned out happily and that he sincerely mourned her premature death at Dresden, in April 1857, while on her way back to Bohemia, having suffered much from the rigours of the northern winters. That he married again a year later does not prove him callous. He must have needed a companion in exile, although that exile was tempered by much sympathetic appreciation on the part of his Swedish friends. His second wife, a fellow-countrywoman, Barbara Fernandini by name, soon grew homesick in Scandinavia, and Smetana had already foreseen the need to resign his post in Gothenburg when the march of events in his own country hastened his decision to return to Prague. It was due to Italy's victories over Austria, in 1859, that the iron-handed régime under which the Czechs had long suffered was somewhat relaxed, and the whole race began to awaken to fresh hopes and aspirations. The improvement in the political situation brought a responsive vibration into the intellectual and artistic life. The long cherished dream of possessing a theatre of their own in which plays and operas could be given in the Czech language now seemed realisable. With money raised by public subscription a modest Provisional Theatre (Prozatímní Divadlo) was opened in November 1862. In this enterprise, in the institution of subscription concerts given by a permanent orchestra, which eventually blossomed into the institution now known as the Czech Philharmonic Society, and in many subsequent musical activities, Smetana led the way (see PRAGUE). He became conductor of the distinguished choral society Hlahol, helped to found the Society of Artists (Umělecká Beseda), and generally speaking, fought the battle of modern music as opposed to Italian opera and a pernicious 'star' system. But his work went beyond mere organisation. All his creative faculties were soon concentrated on endowing his people with a series of musical works typically Czech in spirit and treatment. Smetana's aim reached above folk-song opera. In his opinion no national style could be built up on a mere imitation of the folk melodies. "The essence of his Czech spirit was thought; not playing with tones." Hence his Czech spirit in no way hindered his feeling of unity with the great world-masters, for, thus conceived, it was not 'national, but of a universal character' (Nejedlý). It was precisely this universalism and insight into all that pertained to musical progress that shortly drew upon Smetana the reproach of Wagnerism from a narrow-minded section of his own people.

The Provisional Opera House being an accomplished fact, the creation of a genuine Czech Opera became a question of national honour. The first of Smetana's eight patriotic operas, 'The Brandenburgers in Bohemia' (Braniboři u Čechách), was completed in 1863, but its production was delayed until January 1866, when the composer conducted it in person. The literary material of 'The Brandenburgers' has several points of resemblance to Moussorgsky's historical opera 'Boris Godounov.' It deals with the fortunes of a prince in his minority, a ruthless guardian, a host of avaricious Teutons swarming into Bohemia, as the Polish invaders strive to overrun Russia in 'Boris,' while a whole people rising in rebellion forms the chief protagonist of both dramas. But the librettist, Sabina, had no inspired basis, such as Poushkin's great tragedy, on which to build. The libretto has many faults. Nor had Smetana as yet found a unified and intensely personal musical style, although the work contains the germ of his maturer art in its moments of dramatic emotion, its lyrical flow and national tendency. 'The Brandenburgers,' received with enthusiasm, was subsequently eclipsed by the immense popularity of 'The Bartered Bride' (Prodána Nevěsta), but it has recently been revived and is now in the regular repertory of the National Theatre.

While waiting for the production of 'The Brandenburgers,' Smetana composed a comic opera of unrivalled freshness and gaiety of spirit. Throughout his life, which was darkened by much physical and mental suffering, the composer preserved a share of the unconquerable optimism which was his birth-right as a Czech. Nejedlý tells us that whereas life in the Bohemian towns was at that time still overshadowed by German oppression, rural Bohemia was—at least in Smetana's eyes—bright with mirth, a place of sunshine and hearty good humour. The libretto of 'Prodána Nevěsta' is also by Sabina, who shows himself much better able to deal with a tale of rustic life than with historical drama. He has given Smetana suggestions which the musician has filled out into a vivid and truthful picture of the national life. Although Smetana turns away from anything sordid or harrowing in peasant life, and sets his figures in a warm and happy atmosphere, there is a realism in the work which is too often ignored in a performance by foreign artists. The sparkling gaiety of the opera should never degenerate into caricature or broad farce. To the Czechs, the opera has a deeper meaning than it can ever convey to the outer world; for at the time when life was at its darkest they found stimulation in its raucy humour. To quote Nejedlý again:

'Since Mozart's time there has not been a composer who, with such refined art, and such alluring freshness, could delight the world with such warm, frank and genial humour as the author of "The Bartered Bride."'

From the moment this work was produced at the Provisional Theatre, in September 1870, the Czechs were enraptured by it. The serious operas which followed were often misunderstood by the public for which they were written. Each one consciously embodies some special idea—one might almost say lesson—which Smetana desired to impress upon his people. It took the critical acumen of Hostinský, Procházka and Nejedlý, as well as the devoted services of the conductor KOVAŘOVIC, to set Smetana's operas in a clear light before his fellow-countrymen.

'Dalibor,' which was first heard on the occasion of the laying of the foundation of the permanent National Theatre (Národní Divadlo) in Prague, on May 16, 1868, is based on a legend symbolical both of the temperament and national destiny of the Czechs. The tragic, semi-legendary hero Dalibor is the typical liberator, leader and loyal friend, 'the model of what the Czech ought to be.' He personifies the invincible national soul, just as his friend Zdeněk the minstrel, whose wraith visits the hero in the darkest hour of affliction, is typical of the spirit of hope speaking through the medium of music a message of confidence in a happier future. Musically, the opera is a remarkable example of monothematism, being built on one definite subject which generates a wealth of variants used for psychological suggestion. The work disappointed a public still intoxicated by the joyousness of 'The Bartered Bride.' Again accusations of 'Wagnerism' and 'Teutonium' were hurled at Smetana's head, and 'Dalibor,' revered to-day as a kind of fulfilled gospel to the Czechs, met with a cold reception. Nevertheless, as Nejedlý points out, Smetana had now successfully created a pair of contrasting works, grave and gay, basic types of Czech national opera, and had reached the years which mark the zenith of his powers (1868-74).

Smetana's fourth opera, 'Libuša,' was the outcome of the strong current of political and social aspiration which stirred Bohemia at the close of the 'sixties, and coincided with the founding of the National Opera House. The style of the work was conditioned by the events of the time. Smetana described it not as an opera or music drama, but as a 'solemn festival picture' (Slavné Tableau), and desired that it should only be presented 'on festivals which touch the whole Czech nation.'¹ The plot is based on a national legend: Libuša, foundress of Prague, finding the need of a consort to help her in ruling the country, takes the unusual and democratic course of choosing Přemysl, a wise and noble-hearted peasant, to be her husband. Libuša has the gift of prophecy, and in the final scene she evokes a vision of the splendid future of her country. Thus 'Libuša' is the apotheosis of the Czech people and justifies Smetana's subtitle. The work opens with a fine prelude based on the two chief themes—the motives of Libuša and Přemysl, preceded by a brilliant fanfare which recurs in the course of the opera, proclaiming the twofold affirmation of Bohemia's glorious past and future freedom. The work was first performed in the new National Theatre, on June 11, 1881. Smetana's deafness was then so great a hindrance to his conducting that he turned over the task to Adolf Čech.

'The Two Widows' (Dvě vdovy), 1874, offers a complete contrast to 'Libuša.' It is a drawing-room comedy opera taken from a little French play by Malloville and adapted to Czech surroundings. The music is lively and romantic, but it has not the spirit nor the bewitching gaiety of 'The Bartered Bride.'

There is as yet no sign of the disordered hearing and nerve trouble which were threatening Smetana in the music of the charming opera 'The Kiss' (Huňka), although in reality it was his first triumph over his terrible physical disability. It was written in the house of his son-in-law, the head forester at Jabkenice, in Northern Bohemia. Smetana calls this small masterpiece a comic opera, but its humour has a quality different from the rollicking fun of 'The Bartered Bride.' The quarrel over the kiss refused by the heroine to the too-impetuous lover, paltry as it seems at first, leads on to issues which border on tragedy. Sun and shadow alternate in the music. It was produced at the Provisional Theatre in November 1876, and is one of the most popular repertory operas in Czechoslovakia. It might possibly prove one of the most transplantable of Smetana's works.

'The Secret' (Tajemství), completed between 1876-78, is another opera of rustic life, but less touching and less sure in musical treatment than 'The Kiss.' Smetana's last completed opera, 'The Devil's Wall' (Čertova Stěna),² was begun in March 1881 and finished in April 1882. The score contains a pathetic note to the second act: 'Achieved in spite of terrible and constant hindrances.' The hindrances were ceaseless noises in the head and hours of deep depression and restlessness. Nevertheless, the music of the opera is coherent and melodious, although the freshness and ease of the earlier operas begins to fail. Moreover, the libretto is, to modern ideas, ultra-romantic and confused. The opera was cruelly assailed by Smetana's detractors on its first production in 1878; but on subsequent revival at the National Theatre, under the careful direction of Kovařovic, the public took it into favour and it has remained in the repertory. In 1883 Smetana began to work on 'Viola,' a libretto founded on Shakespeare's 'Twelfth Night' by Eliška KRÁSNOHORSKÁ (q.v.), but his powers of concentration had now gone for ever. The work did not progress beyond the first act.

On Mar. 2, 1884, a concert was organised in Prague in honour of the composer's sixtieth birthday, but he was too ill to be present. A few weeks later his friend Srb persuaded him to enter an asylum, where he died on May 12, 1884. Smetana is buried in the cemetery on the Vyšehrad (Prague), the legendary site of Libuša's court.

Side by side with the operas enumerated, Smetana composed a cycle of symphonic poems under the general title of 'Má Vlast' (My Country) which, although they are all founded on national subjects, have served to carry his fame further afield than any other examples of his art, always excepting the popular overture to 'The Bartered Bride.' There are six of these works: 1. 'Vyšehrad,' an evocation of Bohemia's past, composed after 'Dalibor' and 'Libuša,' and reflecting something of the tragedy of the first and the splendour of the latter opera; 2. 'Vltava,'¹ the epic of the river which, rising in the forest of Šumava, flows through Prague, past its ancient monuments, and is lost to view in the shining distance; 3. 'Šárka,' illustrating the story of the Czech Amazon, Šárka, beloved of the chieftain Ctirad—a drama of love and revenge; 4. 'From the Fields and Groves of Bohemia' (Z českých luhův a hájův), a pastoral containing a rural merrymaking; 5. 'Tábor,' named after the city most closely associated with Bohemia's struggles for religious and political freedom; the music largely based on the grand old Hussite Chorale 'All ye who are warriors of God'; 6. 'Blaník': legend tells how the Hussite heroes slumber within the mountain Blaník, ready at any moment to seize their arms and rise to the defence of their country. Smetana has attached clear programmes to each of these symphonic poems. The entire cycle is frequently given in Czechoslovakia in one programme. In 1909 Sir Henry J. Wood played the whole series in London in the course of the Promenade Concerts.

Smetana was never attracted to purely abstract music. Even in his chamber music he works on a definite and almost realistic programme. His two string quartets which he entitled 'From my Life,' are truly autobiographical. The first, in E minor, describes his youth; its yearning aspirations and ebullitions, his happy social life and innately Czech love of the dance, his passion for Kateřina, his mature development, and the suggestion of his future misfortune in the long-drawn screeching note from the violins in the finale. The subject of the quartet has created the form of the work which is clear and organic; while the quality of the music reflects more happiness than melancholy. Smetana enjoyed the inestimable advantage of a happy childhood, and his later sufferings never overshadowed his memories of it. The second quartet, in C minor, takes up the tale of Smetana's life after the catastrophe of deafness had befallen him. It was written in 1882, amid doubts and hopes as to its destiny, as he confides to his friend Srb in his correspondence. It has not the balance or clarity of the earlier work, but, played by the Bohemian (Czech) String Quartet, it never fails to awaken interest and emotion. Another chamber work of Smetana's, very little known in this country, is the sincere elegiac pianoforte trio in G minor, composed as early as 1855, in memory of his oldest daughter Frederica, who died at 5 years of age, having already given evidence of remarkable musical talent.

Smetana's pianoforte music shows in its brilliant virtuosity the influence of Liszt, and in its national tendency the influence of Chopin. It is not, however, in the least imitative. In several collections of polkas, he did for this purely Bohemian dance-form what the Polish musician achieved for the mazurka. The 'Czech Dances' (1878) are particularly exhilarating in their rhythmic variety and make great demands on the pianist. 'The Three Horsemen' (Trí jezdci), 'The Farmer's Song' (Roľnícká) and the 'Sea Song' (all for male voice choir) are fine examples of his choral style. 'Czech Song,' for mixed chorus and orchestra, embodies 'the charm, variety, joyousness and strength of Czech song, given with all the ecstasy of the Czech musician.'

Smetana's position in his own country is unique among musicians. Neither Chopin nor Grieg have quite the same powerful national significance. By his determined optimism and far-sightedness he made his art a wonderful stimulus to the national rebirth. His works are so permeated with the spirit of Czech history and nature; with the spirit of the national life in its widest sense; that they are 'the best medium for a Czech to become conscious of his national character.' We have seen by the centenary festival of his birth, celebrated in Czechoslovakia in March 1924, that he is loved, and his music known, throughout the land. Not a provincial town, not a remote village, which did not take some active part in this commemoration. As regards the world in general he has also claims to recognition, and the greatest of these is the joyousness which is the essence of his art. Nejedlý claims that

'this happy gift which has been bestowed not only upon the Czechs, but also upon Europeans in general, will be discovered more and more in proportion as it is noticed that it was not a strong feature in other musicians of the nineteenth century. . . . Art can never live merely by pessimism, scepticism and sadness. This is why mankind has always considered its special benefactors to be the artists who have been able to infuse gladness into human souls, and therefore joy in life for its own sake. In this respect the nineteenth century never saw a greater genius than Smetana.

SMTHERGELL, WILLIAM, a pianist in London, was author of A Treatise on Thorough Bass, 1794, and Rules for Thorough Bass, with three sonatas for harpsichord and violin (1795); he composed also six concertos for harpsichord or pianoforte with two violins and violoncello (1785), six duets for two violins, op. 17 (1880), six easy soli for violin (1790), six lessons for harpsichord, six overtures in eight parts, and a second set, op. 8. SMITH, ALICE MARY (Mrs. MEADOWS WHITE) (b. May 19, 1839; d. Dec. 4, 1884), a distinguished English composer. She was a pupil of Sir W. Sterndale Bennett and Sir

G. A. Macfarren; married Frederick Meadows White, Q.C. (afterwards a Judge for the County of Middlesex), Jan. 2, 1867, was elected Female Professional Associate of the Philharmonic Society in Nov. 1867, and Hon. Member of the R.A.M. in 1884.

She was a prolific composer of works of all dimensions. The list embraces:

Two symphonies, in C minor (1863), and G; overtures to 'Endymion' (1864, rewritten 1871), 'Lalla Rookh' (1865), 'Masque of Pandora', with two intermezzi (1878), and 'Jason' (1879), a concerto for clarinet and orchestra (1872); an introduction and allegro for PF and orchestra (1865); four PF quartets, in E♭ (1861), D (1864), E, and G minor; a PF trio in G (1862); three string quartets, in D (1862), A (1870), and G; also five cantatas for soli, chorus and orchestral accompaniment—'Rüdesheim' (1864), 'Gisela' (Cambridge, 1865), Kingsley's 'Ode to the North-East Wind' (Hackney Choral Association, 1880), Collins's 'Ode to the Passions' (Hereford Festival, 1882), Kingsley's 'Song of the Little Baiting' (1883), Kingsley's 'Red King' (1884); pantomime, 'The Dream' (1863); duet (S.T.) 'Maying', many solo-songs, duets, etc.

'Her music,' says the Athenæum of Dec. 13, 1884,

'is marked by elegance and grace rather than by any great individuality . . . that she was not deficient in power and energy is proved by portions of the "Ode to the North-East Wind," and "The Passions." Her forms were always clear and her ideas free from eccentricity; her sympathies were evidently with the classic rather than with the romantic school.'

SMITH, CHARLES (b. London, 1786; d. Crediton, Devon, Nov. 22, 1856), was in 1796 admitted a chorister of the Chapel Royal under Dr. Ayrton, but was withdrawn from the choir in 1798 and became a pupil of John Ashley. In 1800 he sang at the Oratorios, Ranelagh, etc. Upon the breaking of his voice in 1803 he acted as deputy organist for Knivett and Stafford Smith at the Chapel Royal, and soon afterwards became organist of Croydon Church. In 1807 he was appointed organist of Welbeck Chapel. He composed the music for the following dramatic pieces:

'Yea or No', 1809; 'The Tourist Friend', and 'Hill or Miss', 1810; 'Anything New', 1811; 'How to die for Love'; 'Knapsack, or the Forest Fiend', Lyceum, 1830.

In 1815 he appeared, with success, at the Oratorios as a baritone singer. In the next year he settled in Liverpool, where he resided for many years. He composed many songs and ballads, the best of which is 'The Battle of Hohenlinden.' He published in 1844 a work called 'Ancient Psalmody,' consisting of adaptations from music of Ravenscroft, Morley, etc. He ultimately retired to Crediton, Devon.

SMITH, DAVID STANLEY (b. Toledo, Ohio, U.S.A., July 6, 1877), American composer and teacher, studied composition with Parker at Yale, from which university he graduated in 1900, when his 'Ode for Commencement Day,' op. 4, was given. Later he studied in London, Munich and Paris, and in 1903 received his Mus.B. from Yale; North-western University made him Mus.D. in 1918. In 1903 he became an instructor in the Yale School of Music, subsequently becoming assistant and then full professor, and in 1920 succeeding Parker as Dean of the School. Since 1918 he has been conductor of the Horatio Parker Choir (formerly the Choral Art Club) of New Haven (Conn.), and since 1919 he has conducted the New Haven Symphony Orchestra.

His more important works include :

- Symphony No. 1, F minor, op. 28.

SMITH, EDWARD SYDNEY (b. Dorchester, July 14, 1839; d. London, Mar. 3, 1889), received his first musical instruction from his parents, and at the age of 16 went to Leipzig, where he studied the piano under Moscheles and Plaidy; the violoncello under Grutzmacher; harmony and counterpoint under Hauptmann, Richter and Papperitz; and composition under Rietz. He returned to England in 1858, and in the following year he settled in London, where he long enjoyed considerable reputation as a teacher. His compositions, which are confined to P.F. pieces, were extremely popular with the numerous class of performers whose tastes are satisfied by a maximum of brilliance combined with a minimum of difficulty. The most successful of his many pieces were 'La Harpe éolienne,' 'Le Jet d'eau,' 'The Spinning Wheel,' and a 'Tarantella' in E minor, which (like most of his compositions) have been published, and met with the same popularity on the Continent as in England. He is buried in Kensal Green Cemetery.

SMITH, ELIAS (late 16th and early 17th cent.), English organist and composer. He was organist of Gloucester Cathedral in 1620, and had possibly held this post for some time before this date (West's Cath. Org.). An anthem by him, 'How is the gould become dimme,' and described as 'for King Charles the Martyr,' is in some partbooks at Durham Cathedral. The tenor cantoris book belonging to this set is in B.M. Add. MSS. 30,478-9.

SMITH, 'FATHER,' the usual appellation of BERNARD SCHMIDT (b. Germany, c. 1630; d. 1708), a celebrated organ-builder who came to England in 1660 with two nephews, Gerard and Bernard,¹ his assistants. These two are very little known, although they built several fine instruments. To distinguish him from his nephews and express the reverence due to his abilities, he was called Father Smith.

His first organ in this country was that of the Royal Chapel at Whitehall, but this cannot have been, as formerly stated, that which Pepys heard and mentions in his Diary on July 8, 1660. Subsequently he built another for the Banqueting Hall of Whitehall (1699). (See ORGAN.) There is considerable uncertainty about the many organs in London and the provinces ascribed to him. It does not appear that he built for Westminster Abbey, but he built one for St. Margaret's, Westminster (1675), of which in the following year he was elected organist at a salary of £20 a year. He was now rapidly acquiring fame and was ultimately appointed Organ-maker in Ordinary to the King, apartments in Whitehall being allotted to him, called in the old plan 'The Organ-builder's Workhouse.'

In 1682 the treasurers of the Societies of the Temple had some conversation with Smith respecting the erection of an organ in their church. Subsequently Renatus Harris, who had warm supporters amongst the Benchers of the Inner Temple, was introduced to their notice. It was ultimately agreed that each artist should set up an organ in the church, and in 1684 both instruments were ready for competition. In 1685 the Benchers of the Middle Temple made choice of Smith's organ, which was played by Henry Purcell, but those of the Inner Temple dissented, and it was not until 1688 that Smith received payment for his instrument, namely, £1000.

In 1683 he contracted for the organ of Durham Cathedral. In consequence of the reputation he had acquired by these instruments, he was made choice of to build an organ for St. Paul's Cathedral then in course of erection. This instrument was opened on Dec. 2, 1697. Smith became court organ-builder to Queen Anne. His portrait is in the Examination Schools at Oxford.

In 1755 a Gerard Smith was organ-repairer to Chelsea Hospital. This was probably a grand-nephew of Father Smith, since from the date he could hardly have been his nephew.

BIBL.—ANDREW FREEMAN, Father Smith (published by Musical Opinion, 1926), contains the fullest examination of the evidence as to what organs Smith built and what remains of his work.

SMITH, (1) GEORGE TOWNSHEND (b. Horse-shoe Cloisters, Windsor, Nov. 14, 1813; d. Aug. 3, 1877), son of Edward Woodley Smith (b. May 23, 1775), a chorister of St. Paul's Cathedral, afterwards lay-vicar of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, from 1795 until his death, June 17, 1849.

George Townshend received his early musical education as a chorister of St. George's, Windsor. On quitting the choir he became a pupil of Highmore Skeats, the chapel organist, and afterwards came to London and studied under Samuel Wesley. He next obtained an appointment as organist at Eastbourne, whence he removed to King's Lynn on being chosen organist there. On Jan. 5, 1843, he was appointed organist of Hereford Cathedral. As such he became, ex officio, conductor of the Meeting of the Three Choirs at Hereford, besides discharging the duties of which post he voluntarily undertook the laborious office of honorary secretary to the festival, and by his untiring and energetic exertions, in the course of the twelve triennial festivals which he directed, raised it musically, from a low to a very high condition, and financially, from a heavy loss to a gain. He composed an 8-voice anthem and a Jubilate for the festivals, and other church music, as well as piano pieces of a popular kind.

His brother, (2) ALFRED MONTEM (b. Windsor, May 13, 1828; d. London, May 2, 1891), was also educated in the choir of St. George's. On quitting it he became a tenor singer, and after belonging to the choir of St. Andrew's, Wells Street, succeeded J. W. Hobbs as lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey; he was also a gentleman of the Chapel Royal (1858). He was distinguished as a ballad singer, and for his skill in recitative. He was a professor of singing at the R.A.M. and the Guildhall School.

Another brother, (3) SAMUEL (b. Eton, Aug. 29, 1821; d. Windsor, Jan. 1, 1917), was admitted in 1831 as one of the children of the Chapel Royal under William Hawes. Shortly after leaving the choir he obtained the appointment of organist at Hayes Church, Middlesex, and was subsequently organist at Eton and Egham. In 1857 he became organist at Trinity Church, Windsor, and in 1861 organist of the Parish Church. He issued some compilations of tunes and chants. w. h. h.

SMITH, JOHN, Mus.D. (b. Cambridge, 1797; d. Nov. 12, 1861). On Nov. 23, 1815, he was admitted to a situation in the choir of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, but failed to secure the appointment of vicar-choral owing to his having quarrelled and gone to law with the Dean in 1824. On Feb. 5, 1819, he was appointed a vicar-choral of St. Patrick's Cathedral. On July 7, 1827, the degree of Mus.D. was conferred upon him by the University of Dublin. He afterwards obtained the appointments of Chief Composer of the State Music, Master of the King's Band of State Musicians in Ireland, and Composer to the Chapel Royal, Dublin; and in 1845 was chosen professor of music in Dublin University. He composed 'The Revelation,' an oratorio, some church music, and several prize glees and other compositions. In 1837 he published a volume of Cathedral Music containing services and chants, and a 'Veni, Creator.' w. h. h.

SMITH, JOHN CHRISTOPHER (b. 1712; d. Oct. 3, 1795), was son of John Christopher Schmidt, of Anspach, who, a few years later, came to England and became Handel's treasurer. He was agent for the sale of Handel's music. While John Cluer engraved the several works published by Handel on his own behalf, Meares sold them in St. Paul's Churchyard, and Smith at the sign of 'The Hand and Musick-Book' in Coventry Street.

The younger Smith showing a fondness for music, Handel began teaching him when he was 13 years old. He afterwards studied composition under Dr. Pepusch and Thomas Roseingrave, and on Nov. 20, 1732, produced his English opera, 'Teraminta,' and in 1733 another opera, 'Ulysses.' In 1738 he composed an oratorio, 'David's Lamentation over Saul and Jonathan.' About 1745 he travelled on the Continent, remaining absent about three years. In 1754 he was appointed the first organist of the Foundling Hospital Chapel.¹

When Handel became blind Smith was employed as his amanuensis, and Handel's latest compositions were dictated to him. He also played the organ at Handel's oratorio performances. In 1754 he composed the opera of 'The Fairies,' altered from Shakespeare's 'A Midsummer Night's Dream,' which met with great success; in 1756 the opera of 'The Tempest,' adapted from Shakespeare's play, two songs in which, 'Full fathom five' and 'The owl is abroad,' long continued favourites; and in 1760 'The Enchanter,' a musical entertainment. Handel bequeathed to him all his original MS. scores, his harpsichord, his bust by Roubilliac and his portrait by Denner. After Handel's death Smith carried on the oratorios, in conjunction with Stanley, until 1774, when he retired and went to reside at Bath. Besides the before-mentioned works he composed 'Paradise Lost' (Covent Garden, 1760), 'Rebecca,' 'Judith,' 'Jehoshaphat' and 'Redemption,' oratorios (besides compiling two oratorios from Handel's works, 'Nabal' and 'Gideon'); 'Dario,' 'Issipile' and 'Il Ciro riconosciuto,' Italian operas; a Burial Service; and several miscellaneous vocal and instrumental pieces. (See Anecdotes of G. F. Handel and J. C. Smith.) George III. having continued to Smith a pension which had been granted by his mother, the Princess Dowager of Wales, Smith evinced his gratitude by presenting to the King all Handel's MS. scores—now in Roy. Lib., B.M.—the harpsichord and the bust by Roubilliac, retaining only the portrait by Denner. Three large collections of Handel's works exist in Smith's MS.: one belonged to H. B. Lennard, Hampstead, and is now in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge; another to Dr. Chrysander, now in the Hamburg Library; and a third to the Granville family of Wellesbourne Hall, Warwickshire. w. h. h., addna.

SMITH, JOHN STAFFORD (b. Gloucester, 1750; d. London, Sept. 21, 1836), son of Martin Smith, organist of Gloucester Cathedral from 1743-82, obtained his earliest musical instruction from his father, and was soon afterwards sent to London to study under Dr. Boyce, and also became a chorister of the Chapel Royal under James Nares. On quitting the choir he became an able organist, an efficient tenor singer, an excellent composer and an accomplished musical antiquary.

In 1773 he was awarded two prizes by the Catch Club, one for a catch, 'Here flat,' and the other for a canon, 'O remember not the sins.' In the next four years he gained prizes for the following compositions: 'Let happy lovers fly,' glee, 1774; 'Since Phillis has bubbled,' catch, and 'Blest pair of syrens,' glee (five voices), 1775; 'While fools their time,' glee, 1776; and 'Return, blest days,' glee, 1777. The tune of his song 'Anacreon in Heaven' has attained posthumous fame as the STAR-SPANGLED BANNER (q.v.). He rendered great assistance to Sir John Hawkins in the production of his History, not only by reducing ancient compositions into modern notation, but also by the loan of some valuable early MSS. from his extensive and curious library, from which Sir John culled several pieces to enrich his Appendix. In 1779 he published among which is the Agincourt song, 'Our king went forth to Normandy.' In 1780 he won another prize from the Catch Club by his ode, 'When to the Muses' haunted hill.' He published at various times five collections of glees, containing compositions which place him in the foremost rank of English glee composers. Besides his prize glees they include 'As on a summer's day,' 'What shall he have that killed the deer?' 'Hark, the hollow woods resounding,' and the madrigal 'Flora now calleth forth each flower.' Fourteen glees, fourteen catches, four canons, two rounds, an ode, a madrigal and a motet by him are given in Warren's collections. He also published a collection of songs (1785), and 'Twelve Chants composed for the use of the Choirs of the Church of England.' On Dec. 16, 1784, after having for many years officiated as a deputy, he was appointed a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, and on Feb. 22, 1785, a lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey, being installed, after his year of probation, Apr. 18, 1786. In 1790 he was engaged as organist at Gloucester Festival. In 1793 he published a volume of 'Anthems, composed for the Choir Service of the Church of England.' In 1802, upon the death of Dr. Arnold, he was appointed one of the organists of the Chapel Royal, and on May 14, 1805, upon the resignation of Dr. Ayrton, succeeded him as master of the children. In 1812 he produced his interesting work MUSICA ANTIQUA (q.v.). In June 1817 he resigned the mastership of the children of the Chapel Royal. Besides the before-named compositions he produced 'An Ode on the First of April,' for voices and instruments, which was never published. A MS. Introduction to the Art of composing Music, by him, is in the library of the Sacred Harmonic Society, now at the R.C.M., which also contains his Musical Commonplace Book. By his will, dated Jan. 21, 1834, he bequeathed all his property to his only surviving daughter, Gertrude Stafford Smith, and appointed her sole executrix. A few years afterwards she became insane, and in 1844 the Commissioner in Lunacy ordered that her property should be realised and the proceeds invested for her benefit. Through ignorance or carelessness the contents of her house (which included her father's valuable library, remarkably rich in ancient English musical manuscripts) were entrusted for sale to an incompetent auctioneer. The library was sold Apr. 24, 1844, such books as were described at all being catalogued from the backs and heaped together in lots, each containing a dozen or more works; 2191 volumes were thrown into lots described as 'Fifty books, various,' etc. The printed music was similarly dealt with; the MSS. were not even described as such, but were lumped in lots of twenties and fifties, and called so many 'volumes of music.' 578 volumes were so disposed of, and there were besides five lots each containing 'a quantity of music.' The sale took place in Gray's Inn Road; Smith's name did not appear on the catalogue; nothing was done to attract the attention of the musical world, and two dealers, who had obtained information of the sale, purchased many of the lots at very low prices. These after a time were brought into the market, but it is feared the greater part of the MSS. is altogether lost.

SMITH, ROBERT (b. circa 1648; d. Nov. 22, 1675), English composer, chiefly of instrumental music and incidental music to plays. When Captain Cooke undertook the reorganisation of the Chapel Royal after the Restoration, Smith, with Humfrey (b. 1647) and Blow (b. 1649), was one of his first set of choir-boys. He was probably one of those 'who were composers while they were still children of His Majesties Chappell.' Clifford's 'Collection' (2nd edition, 1664) contains the words of 5 anthems by Humfrey, 3 by Blow and 6 by Smith. On leaving the Chapel Royal, Smith seems to have devoted himself to secular composition. In 1672 he composed the music for Shadwell's 'Epsom Wells,' and two years later (Aug. 3), a warrant was issued 'to swear and admit Robert Smyth musician in ordinary to his Majesty in place of Pelham Humphries, deceased.'

Like Humfrey and Purcell, Smith died young, and only a year afterwards a similar warrant was issued 'to admit Richard Hart musician in ordinary to his Majesty for the late, in the place of Robert Smyth, deceased.'

Tcm D'Urfe, in a passage from his 'Fool turn'd Critick' (1678), refers to '... Bob Smith ... late Composer to the King's Play-House ... a very Excellent Fellow ... and one the Town mases very much.'

The following collections contain music by Smith:

1673. Matthew Locke, 'Melothesia' (3 pieces for harpsichord).
1673. Playford, 'Choice Songs and Ayres' (21 songs and dialogues).
1676. Playford, 'Choice Ayres, Songs and Dialogues' (all Smith's songs in the 1673 edn., with others added).
1682. Thomas Greeting, 'The Pleasant Companion' (a stage-act lesson called 'The Harle of Sandwich Farewell').

Many of these are in MS. in the British Museum and elsewhere, but the following appear to be unprinted:

- 'O Time, thy wings' (dialogue between Philander, Time and Death).
Ch. Ch. 23. Score.
'No, no, 'tis vain.' B.M. Add. MS. 29,396.

Ch. Ch. also contains a piece for harpsichord and over 100 compositions for various string combinations by him. (See Mus. Ant. Apr. 1911, from which most of the above details are taken.)

See Mus. Ant. II. 171 and iv. 120.

SMITH, ROBERT (b. Cambridge, 1689; d. there, 1768), Plumian professor of astronomy, master of Trinity College, Cambridge, from 1742. He wrote Harmonics or the Philosophy of Musical Sounds (Cambridge, 1749, 2nd enlarged edition, London, 1759, with Postscript upon the changeable Harpsichord, 1762).

SMITH, ROBERT ARCHIBALD (b. Reading, Nov. 16, 1780; d. Jan. 3, 1829). His father, a Paisley silk-weaver, finding his trade declining in Reading, removed back to Paisley in 1800. Robert soon showed a great aptitude for music, and at ten could play the violin. In 1807 he was appointed precentor at the Abbey Church, Paisley, a situation which he filled for many years. While there he made the acquaintance of Robert Tannahill the poet, many of whose fine lyrics he set to music. One of these, 'Jessie, the Flow'r o' Dunblane,' published in 1808, at once made its mark, and was universally admired.

Smith possessed a fine vein of melody, and in vocal composition had at that time perhaps no equal in Scotland. In 1820 he began to publish (edited by Lady Nairne and other ladies) 'The Scottish Minstrel' (6 vols. 8vo, 1820-24), containing several hundreds of the best Scottish songs, not a few of them his own, frequently without indication. It is still considered a good compilation. In Aug. 1823 he obtained the leadership of the psalmody at St. George's Church, Edinburgh. Besides anthems and other pieces (published in 1810 and 1819, most of the former written for the boys of George Heriot's Hospital), Smith now found time to publish his 'Irish Minstrel,' which was suppressed owing to an infringement of Moore's copyright, followed in 1826 by an Introduction to Singing, and in 1827 by 'Select Melodies of all Nations,' in one volume, one of his best works.

In 1828 he brought out his 'Sacred Harmony of the Church of Scotland,' by which he is now best known. His health was at no time robust, and he suffered from dyspepsia, from which he died. He was buried in St. Cuthbert's churchyard.

The late George Hogarth says:

'Smith was a musician of sterling talent. . . . His compositions are tender, and tinged with melancholy; simple and unpretending, and always graceful and unaffectedly elegant. . . . He had the admirable good sense to know how far he could safely penetrate into the depths of counterpoint and modulation without losing his way; and accordingly his music is entirely free from scientific pedantry.'

His most popular pieces are the songs, 'Jessie the Flow'r o' Dunblane' and 'Bonnie Mary Hay'; the duet, 'Row weel, my boatie'; the trio 'Ave Sanctissima'; and the anthems, 'Sing unto God,' and 'How beautiful upon the mountains'; although many more might be named which are yet frequently sung. An excellent memoir of Smith is attached to an edition of Tannahill's poems edited by Philip Ramsay, Edinburgh, 1851.

SMITH, THEODORE, an 18th-19th century excellent pianist and prolific composer, born at Hanover, according to Fétis, who gives no authority. Probably he lived in Germany for some time, as some of his compositions were published by Hummel in Berlin and by Bossler at Speyer. The greater part of his life was evidently spent in London, where he enjoyed great popularity, especially as a vocal and instrumental composer, whose works appeared between 1770 and 1810, and a song, 'Over the sunny hills,' was republished in 1856. He composed church music, an opera, 'Alfred,' vocal duets, songs, concertos and sonatas for harpsichord or PF., with and without accompaniment, duets for harp and PF., etc. Some of his songs were favourites at the public gardens. Some of his compositions are given in Q.-L.

SMOLENSKY, STEPHEN VASSILIEVICH (b. Kazan, 1843; d. there, Aug. 6, 1909), a leading authority on Russian church music. Having had unusual opportunities of gaining an insight into the customs and peculiarities of the sect known as 'Old Believers,' who have preserved the church music in its primitive forms, Smolensky was led to make a special study of the old manuscripts of the Solovetsky library, preserved in the Clerical Academy at Kazan. In 1889 he became director of the Synodal School and Choir in Moscow, and in the same year was appointed successor to the ecclesiastic Razoumovsky, as professor of the history of church music at the Moscow Conservatorium. While working at the Synodal School, Smolensky formed a unique collection of manuscripts from the 15th to the 19th century, including many rare chants and other examples of sacred music. In 1901-03 he directed the Imperial court chapels. Among his numerous contributions to the abstruse and complicated subject on which he was an authority the principal are: A Course of Church-Chant Singing (Moscow, 1900, 5th edition); Old Choral Manuscripts in the Synodal School, Moscow (St. Petersburg, 1899); Ancient Notation of the Russian Church-Chants (1901).

SMORZANDO (Ital., 'fading away'). A term with the same meaning as MORENDO (g.v.), but used indiscriminately in the course of a piece.

SMYTH, DAME ETHEL MARY (b. London, Apr. 23, 1858), composer, daughter of General J. H. Smyth, late of the Royal Artillery.

For a short time in 1877 she studied at the Leipzig Conservatorium, and under Heinrich von Herzogenberg after leaving that institution. At Leipzig a quintet for strings was performed with success in 1884, and a sonata for piano and violin in 1887. This latter is numbered op. 7, opp. 3 and 4 being books of songs, op. 5 a sonata¹ in A minor for violoncello and piano. After her student days she does not appear to have used opus numbers. A serenade for orchestra in four movements, in D, was given at the Crystal Palace, Apr. 26, 1890; and an overture, 'Antony and Cleopatra,' on Oct. 18 of the same year, the latter being repeated at one of Henschel's London Symphony Concerts in 1892. A far more important work, a Mass in D, was performed at the Albert Hall, under Barnby's direction, Jan. 18, 1893. This work definitely placed the composer among the most eminent composers of her time, and easily at the head of all those of her own sex. The most striking thing about it was the entire absence of the qualities that are usually associated with feminine productions; throughout, it was virile, masterly in construction and workmanship, and particularly remarkable for the excellence and rich colouring of the orchestration. The Mass in D, however, was not again performed until 1924, when it was given under the direction of Adrian Boult, first at Birmingham, then at Queen's Hall, London, with the Birmingham choir. By that time the composer's fame had been established in opera, she had taken a share in the successful campaign for women's suffrage, and had received the title Dame of the British Empire.

Her 'Fantasio' (libretto founded by herself on De Musset) was produced at Weimar in 1898 in unfortunate conditions, and it was not until its revival at Carlsruhe in Feb. 1901 that it could be properly judged. The one-act 'Der Wald' was given at Dresden in Sept. 1901; it was produced at Covent Garden, July 18, 1902, with very great success, given again at the Metropolitan Opera-House, New York, in Mar.

1903, and again at Covent Garden on June 26, 1903. It was evident that here was a work of highly romantic character (the treatment of the spirits of the wood as the primary agents in the drama is full of suggestive beauty), by one who had mastered not only all the secrets of stage effect, but who understood how to make her climaxes impressive, and how to differentiate her characters. The German libretto of this, like that of her former work, was written by the composer herself.

Her crowning achievement was the three-act opera 'Les Naufrageurs' ('The Wreckers'), produced at Leipzig as 'Strandrecht' on Nov. 11, 1906. The libretto, by H. B. Leforestier, bears some slight traces of being originally intended to suit the conventions of the Paris Opéra-Comique rather than the German stage; but in any language the wonderful power of the conception, musical and dramatic, must make itself felt. In spite of a performance which was so far from ideal that the composer refused to allow it to be repeated at the same theatre, the work created a profound impression. It was given with far more care and success at Prague on Dec. 22 of the same year. In England 'The Wreckers' was heard first at the 'Afternoon Theatre' (His Majesty's) under Thomas Beecham, June 22, 1909, then at Covent Garden, Mar. 1, 1910. The fine treatment of the choruses in the first act, the orchestral introduction to the second act, and, in the same section, the great love-duet which rises in intensity of emotion with the rising of the beacon-flame lit by the lovers to warn ships from the dangers of the coast; and, in the third act, the whole treatment of the final situation, in which the lovers are left by the people to be drowned by the advancing tide, all these points are among the most remarkable things in modern opera, and it is difficult to point to a work of any nationality since Wagner that has a more direct appeal to the emotions, or that is more skilfully planned and carried out. M., addns.

LATER YEARS

During her earlier years Ethel Smyth had lived largely on the Continent. From about the time of the production of 'The Wreckers' she began to be better known in her own country; for while the operatic field remained as limited as ever, British music was becoming a fashion in the concert-room, and moreover feminism was receiving notoriety from the campaign of the militant suffragists. A number of compositions, including the early violin and piano sonata (A minor), the string quartet (E minor), songs ('La Danse,' 'Chrysilla,' 'Anacreontic ode'), with accompaniment for flute, harp, strings, triangle and tambourine, were given with some frequency in chamber music programmes, and two short choral pieces ('Sleepless Dreams' and 'Hey Nonny No!') were brought out at Queen's Hall by the London Choral Society in 1910. In this year she received the degree of Doctor of Music honoris causa from Durham University.

Ethel Smyth's labours in the cause of women's suffrage bore musical fruit in several vocal pieces performed at a concert of her own compositions which she gave at Queen's Hall, Apr. 1, 1911. Among these was a 'March of the Women,' which was much heard in the streets of London as an accompaniment to the processions of the Women's Social and Political Union at about this time. Eventually she introduced the tune into the overture of her next opera, 'The Boatswain's Mate,' produced by Beecham at the Shaftesbury Theatre, Jan. 28, 1916.

'The Boatswain's Mate' bears the stamp of having been written for the English stage by one whose stage technique was acquired in Germany. Ethel Smyth wrote her own libretto on a story by W. W. Jacobs in Captains All. That it is one in which the efficiency of the woman is more than a match for the craft of the men no doubt made its theme congenial to the composer. She took pains to underline this leading motive by making the landlady of the 'Beehive' deal competently not only with the sham burglary of the sailor and the soldier, but with a policeman and a chorus of drunken haymakers in turn. Apart from such moral as this idea may contain, 'The Boatswain's Mate' is conceived in the spirit of light comedy, and the first act is carried out in the manner of English ballad opera, with songs (including a few folk-tunes used incidentally) and concerted numbers interspersed between spoken dialogue. The music of the second act, however, is continuous, and the influence of the German tradition is felt in its general texture, and particularly in the final monologue of the heroine. The whole work is full of brilliant points of humorous characterisation, amongst which nothing is better done than the chorus of haymakers above alluded to. It has passed into the regular repertory of the 'Old Vic,' for which theatre the composer prepared (1921) a version of the score for small orchestra.

Ethel Smyth's later compositions for the stage consist of two one-act operas; 'Fête Galante' (Birmingham Repertory Theatre, June 3, 1923, and subsequently at Covent Garden by the B.N.O.C. and elsewhere) and 'Entente Cordiale' (R.C.M., July 22, 1925); first public performance, Theatre Royal, Bristol, Oct. 20, 1928. The former, called 'a dance dream in one act,' after a romance of Maurice Baring, is a delicate fantasy ending in tragedy; the latter is a ballad opera on the lines of 'The Boatswain's Mate,' but relieved of any suggestion of purpose behind the farcical situation produced from the British soldier's ignorance of the French language. Both these works were produced under the composer's direction, and of late years she has frequently conducted her own works, including part of the Mass at Gloucester in 1925. Wood produced her new concerto for violin, horn and orchestra at Queen's Hall, Mar. 5, 1927. She has also written two books of autobiography, the first of which, Impressions that Remained (1919, 2 vols.), was hailed as a work of literary genius apart from the intrinsic interest of its matter. It was followed by Streaks of Life (1921).

SNARE, a piece of catgut rather loosely stretched across the head of a certain type of drum, which, jarring against the vellum when the drum is struck, produces a peculiar effect. (See DRUM 3.) A group of from four to ten snares is employed. (See also PIPE AND TABOR.) SNETZLER, JOHN (b. Passau, Germany, c. 1710; d. London, end of 18th or beginning of 19th cent.). This truly eminent organ-builder, after acquiring some fame in his own country, was induced to settle in England in 1740. His first organ was that built for Handel in 1741, and used at the first performance of 'Messiah' in Dublin (Apr. 13, 1742). He built the organ for Chesterfield Church in 1741 and opened a factory in London in 1775. He built the noble instrument at Lynn Regis (1754); a very fine one at St. Martin's, Leicester (1774); that of the German Lutheran Chapel in the Savoy, which was the first in this country provided with a pedal clavier; and many others, including chamber organs of high quality. Two stories are current of his imperfect way of speaking English and his quaint expressions. At the competition for the place of organist to his new organ at Halifax (1766), he was so annoyed by the rapid playing of Dr. Robert Wainwright, that he paced the church, exclaiming, 'He do run over de keys like one cat, and do not give my pipes time to shpeak.' And at Lynn he told the churchwardens, upon their asking him what their old organ would be worth if repaired, 'If they would lay out £100 upon it, perhaps it would be worth fifty.'

Snetzler lived to an advanced age. He was the friend and executor of SHUDI (q.v.) who left him his ring containing 'Frederick's picture.' Having saved sufficient money, he returned to his native country; but after being so long accustomed to London porter and English fare, he found in his old age that he could not do without them, so he returned to London. His successor was Ohrmann. (See HILL, W., & SON.)

SNODHAM, THOMAS, an early London music printer. He was the son-in-law of Thomas EAST (Este), and succeeded to the latter's business in 1609.

He published a great number of the madrigal books of his period, as Byrd's 'Psalms, Songs, and Sonnets,' 1611; Maynard's 'The XII. Wonders of the World set and composed for the Viol de Gamba,' 1611; Robert Tailour's 'Sacred Hymns,' 1615; a second edition of 'Pammelia,' and other works. By reason of some of his imprints reading 'Thomas Este alias Snodham,' it has been considered that East changed his name. This, however, is a mistake, the fact being that Snodham (who had married into the family and obtained the business) merely desired to be associated with the better-known name. F. K.

SNOW, VALENTINE (d. Dec. 1770), was possibly son of Moses Snow, gentleman of the Chapel Royal from 1689 until his death, Dec. 20, 1702, and also lay-vicar of Westminster Abbey (Mus.B. Cambridge, 1606), and a minor composer. Valentine Snow became the finest performer upon the trumpet of his day; was a member of Handel's oratorio orchestra; and it was for him that the latter wrote the obbligate trumpet parts in 'Messiah,' 'Samson,' 'Dettingen Te Deum,' 'Judas Maccabæus,' etc. No better evidence of his ability can be required. In Jan. 1753 he was appointed (in succession to John Shore, deceased) Sergeant Trumpeter to the King, which office he held until his death. W. H. H.

SOCIETÀ ARMONICA (1827-50), founded about 1827 for the purpose of giving subscription concerts in which symphonies, overtures, and occasionally instrumental chamber works were intermingled with vocal numbers usually drawn from the Italian operas. H. Forbes was the conductor, and Tolbecque and the younger Mori were the leaders of the band. Beethoven's overture in C major, Berlioz's overture to 'Les Francs Juges,' Reissiger's overture in F minor, and the overture to 'Les Huguenots,' were among the works which gained a first hearing in England at the Society's concerts; and Weber's Mass in G was also produced. Among the vocalists who assisted in the concerts were Mmes. Grisi, Persiani, Albertazzi, Bishop, Alfred Shaw, Miss Clara Novello and Miss Birch; Phillips, Rubini, Tamburini and Lablache, Mario and Ivanoff. The band included Spagnoletti, A. Griesbach, Willy, Wagstaff, Dando, Patey, Jay, Alsop, Lindley, Hatton, Brookes, Dragonetti, Howell, Card, Ribas, Barrett, Harper, etc. Henri Herz, the pianist and composer, and Hausmann the violinist, made their first appearance in this country at the Società Armonica. The concerts were successively held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern in the Strand, Freemasons' Tavern, and the Opera Concert room in the Haymarket.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH COMPOSERS (1905-18). This Society was founded in 1905 with the primary object of promoting the publication of works by British composers. Two years after the Society's formation the number of members (composers) and associates (others interested in the movement) was 254, while 44 works of various kinds, principally chamber-music and songs, had been published. The publication of music was undertaken by the Society, either by defraying the whole or part of the cost, or at the sole expense of the composer concerned (see AVISON EDITION). The Society also gave concerts of British music. With the increasing interest on the part of the general musical public in native work and the development in opportunities for obtaining a hearing in one way or another, the immediate need for the Society's activities diminished and it was dissolved in 1918. The balance of the Society's funds was handed over to the Manns Memorial Fund, a small charity administered by the R.A.M., R.C.M. and G.S.M. on behalf of indigent and deserving students. Frederick Corder was one of the chief promoters of the Society, and he acted as chairman throughout its existence. N. C. G.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS, THE (1834-65), was founded in 1834 with the object of advancing native talent in composition and performance. In the original prospectus of the Society attention was called to the contrast between the encouragement offered to British painting, sculpture, and the tributary arts at the Royal Academy, and the comparative neglect of English music and English musicians, the overwhelming preponderance of foreign compositions in all musical performances being cited as 'calculated to impress the public with the idea that musical genius is an alien to this country,' and as tending also 'to repress those energies and to extinguish that emulation in the breast of the youthful aspirant, which alone can lead to pre-eminence.' One of the rules adopted was to exclude all foreign music from the programmes of the Society's concerts and to admit none but natives of Great Britain among its members; but this was set aside in 1841, when the Committee reported in favour of 'introducing a limited proportion of music by composers not members of the Society either British or foreign,' and the suggestion was adopted, though not without strong opposition, in which the editor of the *Musical World*¹ joined.

In its earlier days the Society achieved a complete success, numbering in 1836 as many as 350 members, while its finances were also in a prosperous state. It not only gave concerts of works of established merit, but adopted a system of trial performances at which many new compositions were heard. The programmes included the names of all the leading English writers of the day, who as a rule conducted their own works, among them:

Cipriani Potter, G. A. Macfarren, W. H. Holmes, W. L. Phillips, Sterndale Bennett, J. Hullish, J. H. Griesbach, T. German Reed, W. M. Rooke, H. Westrop, Joseph Barnett, H. C. Litolf, C. Lucas, T. M. Mudie, James Calkin, and John Goss.

The music included orchestral and chamber compositions, varied by vocal soli and part-music, to which nearly all the above-named composers contributed, and the members in turn directed the performances. After 1837 the Society began to decline, and even when the introduction of music by foreign composers was resolved upon, in the hope of creating more general interest in the concerts, it failed to restore the Society to prosperity, and after another period of far from successful management a special appeal for support was put forth at the close of 1854. At that date the members included:

H. C. Banister, W. S. Bennett, H. Blagrove, J. B. Calkin, C. Coote, J. T. Cooper, W. H. Holmes, C. E. Horsley, H. Lazarus, E. J. Loder, Kate Loder (Lady Thompson), C. Neate, W. S. Rockstro, C. Severn, C. Steggall, C. E. Stephens, J. W. Thirlwall, H. J. Trust, F. Westlake, H. Westrop, J. Zerbin, and Sir George Smart.

This effort was ridiculed in the Musical World of Dec. 16, 1854, on the ground that the Society had no true claim to its title, as many composers and artists of note held aloof from it. The movement served, however, to draw some new friends to the ranks, and as a means of fulfilling its objects prizes were offered for chamber compositions, which were gained in 1861 by Ebenezer Prout and Edward Perry for string quintets; in 1863 by J. Lea Summers and W. Gibbons, also for string quintets; and in 1864 by Ebenezer Prout and J. Lea Summers, for quartets for piano and strings. The umpires on these occasions included Joachim, Molique, Piatti, Cipriani Potter, G. A. Macfarren, A. Mellon, T. M. Mudie and H. Leslie. In 1865 the Society was dissolved, its library was sold by Puttick & Simpson, and C. E. Stephens was appointed custodian of the minute-books, etc. The secretaries of the Society were J. R. Tutton (its founder), 1834-35; G. J. Baker, 1835 until his death in 1851; J. Rackham, 1851-54; W. W. Grice, 1854-55. The honorary treasurers were the three brothers Erat, in succession to each other, in 1834-58; and Cipriani Potter held the post in 1858-65. The Society and its library were housed gratuitously at 23 Berners Street, by Erat, from 1834 until 1858, when they gave up the premises; 1858-59 in Wornum's Music Hall, Store Street; 1860 in St. Martin's Hall until its destruction by fire on Aug. 26, 1860 (when the Society's property was saved); 1860-62 at 44 Charlotte Street, Fitzroy Square, by permission of H. Webb; and 1862-65 at Collard's, Grosvenor Street, free of all expense. For the first five years the concerts were given at the Hanover Square Rooms, and the trials of orchestral and chamber works were subsequently held at those rooms or at the above-named buildings. On July 20, 1843, the Society gave a complimentary concert to Spohr at Erat's, and on June 15, 1844, at the same place, a complimentary concert to Mendelssohn.

SOCIETY OF WOMEN MUSICIANS. This society was founded in 1911 by Gertrude Eaton and Marion M. Scott, with offices at the Women's Institute, Victoria Street, moving to 74 Grosvenor Street, W.1, in 1920. By its organisation of lectures and debates on musical subjects, performances of the music of composer-members, meetings for the practice and study of chamber-music, etc., it has done much to consolidate the musical activities and fellowship of women musicians. It possesses two libraries, a general one of music and books, and a collection of British chamber music formed by W. W. Cobbett (q.v.) and presented to the Society in 1924; the latter is available to the general public. The first president of the Society was Liza Lehmann, among others who have filled that post being Cécile C. Chaminade, Katharine Eggar, Marie Brena, Kathleen Schlesinger and Fanny Davies.

SÖDERMAN, AUGUST JOHAN (b. Stockholm, July 17, 1732; d. there, Feb. 10, 1876), a prominent Swedish composer.

His father was director of the orchestra at a minor theatre. At an early age he displayed traces of musical genius, and when 18 years of age was selected by Stjernström, the director of the orchestra at the Royal theatre in Stockholm, as instructor to a company of musicians, then on a tour to Finland. On his return Söderman wrote his first operetta, with the fantastic title, 'The Devil's first Rudiments of Learning,' which was performed at the Mindre theatre at Stockholm, Sept. 14, 1856. During the following two years he stayed in Leipzig, studying under Richter and Hauptmann; in the year 1860 he was appointed chorus-master at the Royal Opera in Stockholm; and from that date until his election as a member of the Swedish Academy of Music, his life was occupied in minor offices in the musical world. About 1865 the generosity of Jenny Lind enabled him to continue his studies in Germany.

His works are about sixty in number—operettas, songs, ballads, partsongs, funeral marches, and cantatas; of which, however, only half have been printed, and these at the expense of the Swedish Government after his death. Of the printed works we can only mention a few, besides the above-mentioned, namely, two operettas, 'The Wedding at Ulfåsa' and 'Regina von Emmeritz'; overture and incidental music to 'The Maid of Orleans'; songs; trios for male voices, containing the Finnish national air 'Suomi säng'; a quartet for female voices, 'Bröllop,' very popular in Germany, a Circassian dance, and a concert-overture; also 'Sacred songs for organ,' containing a number of hymns of great beauty and purity, of which the best known are a Benedictus and an Agnus Dei. Though a Protestant, his chef-d'œuvre is a Mass for soli, chorus and orchestra, which has only been rarely performed in Stockholm, but is considered by his countrymen as equal to any by the great composers, and which is animated by such sincere devotion, and stamped by such a high degree of originality and masterly finish, as to rank among the choicest gems of Swedish music.

Another of his works worth mention is his music to the poetry of Bellman. This poet, whose genius is akin to that of Marlowe, has written a number of rhapsodies, depicting the gay, jovial and careless nature of the Swede, with a force of animal spirit and genuine originality which few other poets have equalled; and to these productions, which every Swede knows by heart, Söderman set music.

The foreign composers who seem to have influenced his more elaborate productions are Beethoven, Schubert and, in particular, Schumann. His compositions, though thoroughly Swedish, are not national; they bear the impress of the vigorous and energetic nature of the Northerner, which makes Scandinavian compositions so charming. On Söderman's death, a national subscription was at once raised in Sweden for the benefit of his widow and children. It was a token of the gratitude and respect of a musical nation for a great composer. C. S.*

SOGGETTO (Ital.), subject or theme. The true subject of an orthodox Fugue as opposed to the Andamento, which is a subject of abnormal length; and the Attacco, which is a mere Point of Imitation.

In its most regular form, the Soggetto consists of a single homogeneous section; as in No. 1 of 'Das wohltemperirte Clavier.' Occasionally, however, its division into two sections is very clearly marked; as in No. 7 of the same. Subjects of this last-named class frequently make a very near approach to the Andamento, from which they sometimes differ only in their less extended dimensions. (See ANDAMENTO; ATTACCO; FUGUE.) W. SOKALSKY, (1) PETER PETROVICH (b. Kharkov, Sept. 26, 1832; d. Odessa, Mar. 1887), was educated at the University of Kharkov, and while acting as under-master in one of the public schools in the town began to collect the folk-songs of the district. Later in life (1857–1860) he was Secretary to the Russian Consulate in New York, and on his return to Russia became editor of the Odessa News. Sokalsky composed several operas: 'Maria' ('Mazeppa'), 'A Night in May' and 'The Siege of Doubno' (from Gogol's Tarass Boulba). His articles on the Chinese Scale in Russian National Music, and Russian National Music (Kharkov, 1888), are valuable to students of this subject.

(2) VLADIMIR IVANOVICH (b. Heidelberg, May 6, 1863), his nephew, studied law at the university of Kharkov. His unpublished compositions include a symphony in G minor (Kharkov, 1894), a dramatic fantasia, an Eastern march and an 'Andante elegiaco' for violoncello and orchestra. His pianoforte pieces, 'Impressions musicales' op. 1, the pianoforte suite 'In the Meadows,' and some songs have been published. R. N.

SOKOLOV, NICHOLAS ALEXANDROVICH (b. St. Petersburg, 1859; d. 1922), composer, studied at the Conservatorium, St. Petersburg, from 1877–85 and was a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov. His chief compositions are: 'Elegy' (op. 4), and incidental music to Shakespeare's 'Winter's Tale,' for orchestra; three string quartets, opp. 7, 14 and 20; eight pieces for violin and pianoforte; six for violoncello and pianoforte; seven choruses a cappella; four choruses for female voices; about eighty songs, and a ballet entitled 'The Wild Swans.'

SOLDAT, MARIE (Madame SOLDAT-RÖGER) (b. Graz, Mar. 25, 1864), violinist. In her eighth year she took up the violin, under Pleiner, and appeared in public when 10 years of age, performing the 'Fantaisie-Caprice' of Vieuxtemps. Coming under the influence of Joachim and Brahms she resumed study in the Berlin Hochschule in 1879, remaining there till 1882 and gaining the Mendelssohn prize. She subsequently took private lessons from Joachim, whose repertory both of solo and chamber music she adopted, making a special study of the Brahms concerto, which she introduced for the first time to a Viennese audience under Richter. In 1889 she was married to Röger, a lawyer by profession, but continued her public career. She travelled a great deal as a soloist, visiting England occasionally (playing for the first time at a concert of the Bach Choir, Mar. 1, 1888), and had a following among those who admire solid before brilliant acquirements. w. w. o.

SOLEER, FR. ANTONIO (b. Olot, Catalonia; d. Escorial, 1783), Spanish composer. A pupil of the Escolania at Montserrat, he became maestro de capilla at Lérida and then a monk in the Escorial, where he played the organ and performed and wrote chamber music for the Infante D. Gabriel de Bourbon. His quartets (org. and str.) remain in MS. (Escorial and Bibl. Nac., Madrid). His interesting collection of harpsichord music, showing the influence of Domenico Scarlatti and popular Spanish rhythms, was printed in London.

Soler also composed music for plays and interludes by Calderón and other Spanish dramatists of the 17th century (MSS. Escorial, Archivo de Música), which were performed in the following century by monks and seminarists. He published a theoretical text-book, Clave de modulación y antigüedades de la musica, Madrid, 1762, and wrote a quantity of church music, both a cappella and with organ and strings. A Requiem (8 v. and continuo) was printed by Eslava. J. B. T.

SOLESMESES, a village near Le Mans, whose Benedictine monastery has become famous through the labours of its monks in the restoration of liturgical music, for which they established a printing press, with special type.

The order of the 'Congregation of France,' better known in England as the 'Benedictines of Solesmes,' was founded in 1833 by Dom Prosper Guéranger, who became the first Abbot. Under Guéranger and his successors, Solesmes became a centre for the study and execution of plain-song, and was visited by many students from all parts of Europe. In 1901, however, owing to their non-compliance with the new Law of Associations, the monks were expelled from Solesmes, and moved in a body to Appuldurcombe, in the Isle of Wight. In 1909 they settled at Quarr Abbey, near Ryde.¹ Their printing-press having been confiscated by the French Government, the publication of their works was transferred to the firm of Desclée et Cie, Tournai, Belgium. Their choir in the Isle of Wight became the practical exponent of their method.

The work of reform began under Dom Guéranger, who, wishing to restore Gregorian music to its earliest known form,² engaged his colleagues Dom Pothier (d. 1923) and Dom Jausions (d. 1870) to examine and compare manuscripts, laying down as a principle that 'where the manuscripts of different periods and different countries agree in their version of a melody, it may be affirmed that the true Gregorian text has been discovered.'

But it was of little use to discover the true text unless the proper method of its performance could also be found. At that time Gregorian music, following the traditions of Zarlino and others, was sung in a slow, heavy, unaccented and unrhythmic style, and accompanied on the organ by a separate chord to each note. This style was afterwards alluded to by the Solesmes monks as the 'hammered,' 'martelé,' style. Guéranger and Pothier, on studying the theoretical works of the 9th and 10th centuries, found that plain-song had anciently a rhythm peculiar to itself, differing in important particulars from that of measured music. The first result of this discovery was that Dom Guéranger 'was able to give the singing at Solesmes a rhythm that no one had yet dreamed of,'³ and from henceforth the chief aim of the musicians of Solesmes was to perfect the rhythmical theory as well as the musical readings.

In 1881 the first edition appeared of 'Les Mélodies grégoriennes, d'après la tradition,' by Dom Pothier, treating the whole theory of plain-song from an entirely new point of view. This important work has formed the basis of all subsequent studies.

The investigations now went on more earnestly than ever. Photography was called in to aid, monks were sent to the principal libraries of Europe to photograph codices, and the year 1883 saw the publication by Dom Pothier of the 'Liber gradualis a Gregorio Magno olim ordinatus, cum notis musicis . . . restitutis in usum congregationis Benedictinae Galliarum.' This was followed in 1891 by the 'Liber antiphonarius pro vespere et completorio,' also by Pothier, and in 1896 by the ³ Plain-Chant and Solesmes. Cagin and Mocquereau.

'Liber usualis missae et officii,' by Mocquereau.

But others besides the monks of Solesmes were now in the field, endeavouring to reform the liturgical music. Chief among them was Frederic Pustet of Ratisbon, who obtained from Pius IX. a decree under which he was given, by the Congregation of Sacred Rites, the sole right for thirty years of republishing the celebrated 'Medicean' edition authorised by Paul V. in 1614. The same authority recognised Pustet's publication as the official version of plain-song, and recommended it for use in the whole of the Roman Church. The privileges thus given were confirmed by the next Pope, Leo XIII.

This version (known as the 'Ratisbon' edition), which also claims to be the true music of Gregory, is founded on an entirely different principle from that of Solesmes. It is explained thus in the Magister choralis of Haberl (Ratisbon, 1893):

'Since the 13th century a principle has existed of improving the melodies by cutting down their enormous length, which arose, partly through a bad method of execution, and partly through the manerem of singers. . . . The revision undertaken by the Congregation of Sacred Rites by order of Pius IX. put the foundation of the Roman Chant on the system followed since the Council of Trent.'

The Solesmes view is that at the time the Medicean edition was authorised, plain-song had reached, not its highest development, but its most decadent stage: that in the time of Palestrina, who is supposed to have had a hand in preparing the edition (see PALESTRINA, p. 24) the traditions of its proper performance had been forgotten for centuries; and that its real apogee was immediately after the time of Gregory the Great, when it was collected and written down, and its method of performance described by the theoretical writers.

To support the truth of these views Dom André Mocquereau (later Prior of the Abbey), who brought exceptional musical training to bear on the work, began in 1889 a quarterly publication, entitled Paléographie musicale, consisting of photographic facsimiles of Gregorian, Ambrosian, Mozarabic and Gallican manuscripts, together with exhaustive discussions of the various questions involved. The melodies obtained through the comparative study of many manuscripts on the principle laid down by Guéranger, when sung by the Solesmes choir according to the method explained in the Paléographie, proved to be of greater artistic and æsthetic excellence than any other form of plain-song.

Owing to the support given to the Ratisbon edition, the monks did not at first obtain recognition beyond their monastery and a few similar establishments. Their labours were, however, rewarded when in 1904 the new Pope, Pius X., who was well versed in music, established a Papal Commission to prepare a new Official Edition, and at the same time wrote to Dom Paul Dolatte, the Abbot, appointing the monks of Solesmes to be the editors. This edition, known as the 'Vatican edition,' is primarily based on the 'Liber gradualis'; but in the preparation of that work the learned editor had not the abundant means of research at his disposal which have since been available; hence certain deficiencies became apparent when the 'Liber gradualis' came into use. These were removed in the Vatican edition, while the monks issued for their own use a special Vatican edition containing the marks of expression as performed by them.

The practical application of the laws of rhythm to the chant is described in the various 'Methods of Plain-Chant' that have issued from the Solesmes and other presses. The theory underlying what is known to modern students of plain-song as 'Free Rhythm' may be briefly described as follows. Free rhythm arose from the setting of the words of Scripture to music at a time when the idea that melody could have a rhythm of its own, to which the words sung must conform in respect of time-duration, had not yet been thought of. Free rhythm practically obeys all the laws of modern musical rhythm except that of definitely fixed time-relationship. Writing in the 11th century, when its laws were still understood, and when what we call 'Free' was called by musicians 'Prose Rhythm,' Arbo says:

'Good Prose Rhythm requires that there should be a rough balance in the groups of syllables, and, naturally, also in the groups of accents and in the members of sentences' but they are not to be subjected to the rigorous laws of metre.

In 'Syllabic Plain-song,' in which each syllable has a single note (or at most two or three notes very occasionally), the accentuation of the melody is ruled by that of the words. For rhythmical purposes, as well as for the understanding of the ideas to be expressed by them, words are divided into accented and unaccented syllables, and are also grouped into sentences and 'members of sentences.' This is a law of all language, and syllabic plain-song is simply prose language uttered in melody instead of being spoken. The technical plain-song names for sentences and members of sentences are distinctiones major and minor, and the distinctiones are separated by caesuras. At each caesura there is a mora ultimæ vocis (ritardando) which obeys certain rules.

In 'Melismatic Plain-song,' of which the short passage quoted below is an example, the same laws of 'distinctions' caesuras and 'moræ' are applied, the syllables and words of prose being represented in the melody by the groups of neumes, which may not only occur in connexion with the single verbal syllables, but may form long 'Melismata,' apart from the words. The technical name for the melisma is 'Pneuma,' i.e. 'Breathing,' which must not be confounded with 'Neuma,' a note, or group of notes. The intimate relation as to rhythm between the neume in melody and the syllable in words is shown by the fact that groups of notes are often called 'Syllabæ' by the ancient writers. The chant is now executed more rapidly than in the days of the 'hammered' style; and the notes have no relative time-value, but take their duration from the syllables in syllabic, and from certain rules in melismatic melody.

The opening phrase of the Gradual 'Justus ut palma,' as found in the Ratisbon and Solesmes books respectively, will serve to show the difference between the two versions. The difference in method of performance can only be observed by a visit to one of the many churches in which Solesmes plain-song is now cultivated. Below it is appended the Solesmes example in modern notation, as nearly as its rhythm can be expressed, free rhythm not admitting the exact relation implied by crotchets and quavers. The official organ of the Solesmes Abbey is the Revue grégorienne, a bi-monthly periodical, edited by Canon Norbert Rousseau of the Grand Séminaire du Mans, in conjunction with the Benedictines of Solesmes.

SOL-FA. To 'sol-fa' is to sing a passage or a piece of vocal music, giving to the notes, not the words, but the syllables, Do (C), Re (D), Mi (E), Fa (F), Sol (G), La (A), Si (B), Do (C). Why the two syllables Sol and Fa should have been chosen to designate this process in preference to Do Re, or Re Mi, does not appear. (See TONIC SOL-FA and SOLMISATION.)

In a hymn written by Arrigo Boito and composed by Mancinelli, for the opening of the monument of Guido d'Arezzo at Rome, the seven syllables are thus employed:

*'Uhl di Guido regola superna
 Misuratrice facile de' suoni
 Solenne or tu laude a te stessa intonai, Sillaba eterna.'*

The roll or stick with which the conductors of church choirs in Italy beat the time is called the Solfa.

SOLFEGGIO (Fr. solfège), an exercise for the voice, to be executed either upon vocal sounds only or upon the syllables of the 'sol-fa' notation. At one period the two methods were known by different names, the former being called a vocalizzo (Fr. vocalise) and the latter a solfeggio. Now both are known as solfeggi, although the term vocalizzo is still applied occasionally to melodies sung without consonants. There is no need to point out here the antique origin of the sol-fa or the purposes to which it came in course of time to be adapted (see SOLMISATION). It cannot be doubted, however, that the use of the syllabic form, alike for the identification of the notes of the diatonic scale and the value of its aid for correctly uniting vowels and consonants in the study of singing, constituted the root idea of the term Solfeggio. Its strict application goes back to the days of Tosi and even more remote authorities. It was employed in the same literal sense by Crescentini, the great interpreter of Cimarosa and Cherubini (after he had left the stage and taken up teaching at Naples), in his celebrated collection of vocal exercises. We find the distinction between the two terms first relaxed in the 'Solfèges d'Italie' published in Paris in 1786. The exercises in this volume were by Scarlatti, Porpora, Caffaro and other eminent Italian musicians, and could be treated either as solfeggi or vocalizzi. The same freedom of choice was allowed in the case of the later and still more remarkable collection entitled 'Solfèges du Conservatoire,' published by Heugel and edited by Édouard Batiste. It was so entitled because the exercises were all composed by professors (inspecteurs) of the Conservatoire, headed by its director, Cherubini, who in that capacity wrote a large quantity of solfeggi. Some of the examples here given are extraordinarily difficult, and they throw an interesting light upon the nature of the talent and the capacity for prolonged study that were expected from young singers of the French school in those days. Canons and fugues abound; a fugue by Catel is in 5-4 time; and there is an exercise by Cherubini in 5 parts, written in strict counterpoint. Clearly solfeggi of this calibre could only have been intended for and mastered by students whose course of instruction extended over a period of several years.

The plan of the above collections was essentially progressive—presenting a gradual crescendo of difficulty; and that plan has been imitated in all later volumes of the kind, being never departed from, nor, indeed, improved upon. On the other hand, their general level of technical difficulty has shown an almost continuous tendency to descend to a lower plane, in order presumably to meet the requirements of a less exacting age. The result has been to lessen the value of this form of study and to affect the standard of the art of vocalisation. Again, the earlier imitators of the 'Solfèges,' although they worked singly and not in groups, were still most of them, despite their Italian birth, attached to the Paris Conservatoire, and they possessed the merit of developing the solfeggio along the lines of contemporary musical progress. The volumes separately produced by celebrated teachers such as Bordogni, Panzeron, Panofka and Vaccaj were followed by the less difficult exercises of Concone, Lamperti and Nava, which were, however, somewhat inferior to the later ones of J. Faure, Lablache and the Marchesia. (It may be noted that, so far as the present writer is aware, Manuel Garcia never taught his pupils solfeggi of any kind, but made use only of the exercises included in his famous Traité de l'art du chant.) Among the still more recent collections that have flooded the music-stores of Western Europe and America one at least deserves mention, both for the originality and skill shown in the illustration of modern intervals and rhythms, and for the fact that it marks a return to the old system of employing various prominent composers upon a single volume. The 'Répertoire moderne de vocalises-études,' as it is called, consists so far of three books, and the names of the writers include those of Fauré, Huß, Florent Schmitt, Dukas, Hahn, Vincent d'Indy, Laparra, Ravel, Leroux, Bourgault-Ducoudray, Rabaud, Vidal and Widor.

Subjoined is a list of the best-known collections of solfeggi or vocalises extant at the present time, given under the names of the publishing houses in London at which they are still procurable:

SOLIÉ (SOULIER), (1) JEAN PIERRE (b. Nîmes, 1755; d. Paris, Aug. 6, 1812), was both singer and composer at the Opéra-Comique in its early days. The son of a violoncellist he learnt that instrument, and had a good musical education at the Nîmes mairie, after which he played in the orchestra and taught singing till his début as a tenor in 1778. His success in the provinces tempted him to go to Paris, but he failed at first, in 1782, and remained away till after three years' success in the largest theatre of Lyons. He was engaged in 1787 for the Opéra-Comique, where he remained, gradually making his way upwards to the first place in the company, especially after relinquishing the part of tenor de goût for that of baritone. The baritone was then a novelty, and Méhul wrote for Solié several parts which have since become identified with his name. He next tried his hand at composition, and with equal success, for his opéras-comiques number 33 in all, 'Jean et Geneviève' (1792) being the first, and 'Les Ménestrels,' three acts (1811), the last. 'Le Jockey' (Jan. 6), 'Le Secret' (Apr. 20, 1796), 'Le Chapitre second' (June 17, 1799) in one act; and 'Le Diable à quatre' (Nov. 30, 1809), and 'Mademoiselle de Guise' in three (Mar. 17, 1808), were published. Many of the airs became favourites with the vaudeville writers, and were set to a variety of words. Several may be found in the 'Clé du caveau.'

Solié had several sons; the eldest drowned himself in 1802; but (2) ÉMILE (b. Paris, 1801) published in 1847 two pamphlets on the Opéra-Comique and Opéra; also some short biographies of French musicians. He left a son, (3) CHARLES, a conductor, who produced at Nice, in 1879, an opéra-comique, 'Scheinn Baba, ou l'intrigue du harem,' three acts.

SOLMISATION (Lat. solmisatio). The method of illustrating the construction of the musical scale by means of certain syllables, so associated with the sounds of which it is composed as to exemplify both their relative proportions, and the functions they discharge as individual members of a system based upon fixed mathematical principles.

The laws of solmisation first appear among the Greeks, and after making the necessary allowance for differences of tonality, the principle in those earlier times was precisely the principle by which we are guided now. Its essence consisted in the adaptation to the tetrachord of such syllables as should ensure the recognition of the hemitone, wherever it occurred. Now, the hemitone of the Greeks, though not absolutely identical with our diatonic semitone, was its undoubted homologue;¹ and throughout their system this hemitone occurred between the first and second sounds of every tetrachord; just as, in our major scale, the semitones occur between the third and fourth degrees of the two disjunct tetrachords by which the complete octave is represented. Therefore they ordained that the four sounds of the tetrachord should be represented by the four syllables, ra, re, ry, rw; and that, in passing from one tetrachord to another, the position of these syllables should be so modified as in every case to place the hemitone between ra and re, and the two following tones between re and ry, and ry and rw respectively.

When, early in the 11th century, Guido d' Arezzo substituted his hexachords for the tetrachords of the Greek system, he was so fully alive to the value of this principle that he adapted it to another set of syllables, sufficiently extended to embrace six sounds instead of four. It is said that in the choice of these he was guided by a singular coincidence. Observing that the melody of a hymn, written about the year 770 by Paulus Diaconus, for the festival of St. John the Baptist, was so constructed that its successive phrases began with the six sounds of the hexachord, taken in their regular order, he adopted the syllables sung to these notes as the basis of his new system of Solmisation, changing them from hexachord to hexachord, on principles to be hereafter described, exactly as the Greeks had formerly changed their four syllables from tetrachord to tetrachord.

It will be seen from this example that the syllables, Ut, Re, Mi, Fa, Sol, La,² were originally sung to the notes C, D, E, F, G, A; that is to say, to the six sounds of the natural hexachord; and that the semitone fell between the third and fourth syllables, Mi and Fa, and these only. (See HEXACHORD.) But, when applied to the hard hexachord, these same six syllables represented the notes G, A, B, C, D, E; while, in the soft hexachord, they were sung to F, G, A, B \flat , C, D. The note C therefore was sometimes represented by Ut, sometimes by Fa and sometimes by Sol, according to the hexachord in which it occurred; and was consequently called, in general terms, C sol-fa-ut. In like manner A was represented either by La, Mi or Re; and was hence called A la-mi-re, as indicated in our example by the syllables printed

² Gerard Vossius in his tract De quatuor artibus popularibus (Amsterdam, 1650), mentions the following distich as having been written, shortly after the time of Guido, for the purpose of impressing the six syllables upon the learner's memory—
Cur adhibes trieti numeros cantantque labor?
UT ELEVET MISERUM FATUM SOLITOQUE LABORE.

above the staff. But under no possible circumstances could the semitone occur between any other syllables than Mi and Fa; and herein, as we shall presently see, lay the true value of the system.

So long as the compass of the melody under treatment did not exceed that of a single hexachord, the application of this principle was simple enough; but, for the solmisation of melodies embracing a more extended range, it was found necessary to introduce certain changes, called mutations, based upon a system corresponding exactly with the practice of the Greeks. (See MUTATION.) Whenever a given melody extended (or modulated) from one hexachord into another, the syllables pertaining to the new series were substituted for those belonging to the old one, at some convenient point, and continued in regular succession until it became convenient to change them back again; by which means the compass of the scale could be enlarged to any required extent.

For instance, in the following example the passage begins at (a), in the natural hexachord of C, but extends upwards three notes beyond its compass, and borrows a B \flat from the soft hexachord of F. As it is not considered desirable to defer the change until the extreme limits of the first hexachord have been reached, it may here be most conveniently made at the note G. Now, in the natural hexachord, G is represented by the syllable Sol; in the soft hexachord, by Re. In this case, therefore, we have only to substitute Re for Sol at this point; and to continue the solmisation proper to the soft hexachord to the end of the passage, taking no notice of the syllable printed in italics.

At (b), on the other hand, the passage extends downwards, from the hexachord of G, into that of C. Here, the change may be most conveniently effected by substituting the La of the last-named hexachord for the Re of the first, at the note A.

The first of these mutations is called Sol-re, in allusion to its peculiar interchange of syllables; the second is called Re-la. As a general rule, Re is found to be the most convenient syllable for ascending mutations, and La for those which extend downwards, in accordance with the recommendation contained in the following distich.

'Vocibus utaris solum mutando duabus
Per re quidem sursum mutatur, per la deorsum.'

This rule, however, does not exclude the occasional use of the forms contained in the subjoined table, though the direct change from the hard to the soft hexachord, and vice versa, is not recommended.

The principle upon which this ancient system was based is that of 'the Movable Ut'—or, as we should now call it, 'the Movable Do'; an arrangement which assists the learner very materially, by the recognition of a governing syllable, which, changing with the key, regulates the position of every other syllable in the series, calls attention to the relative proportions existing between the root of the scale and its attendant sounds, and, in pointing out the peculiar characteristics of each subordinate member of the system, lays emphatic stress upon its connexion with its fellow degrees, and thus teaches the ear, as well as the understanding.

So long as the ecclesiastical modes continued in use Guido's system answered its purpose so thoroughly that any attempt to improve upon it would certainly have ended in failure. But when the functions of the leading-note were brought more prominently into notice, the demand for a change became daily more and more urgent. The completion of the octave rendered it not only desirable, but imperatively necessary that the sounds should no longer be arranged in hexachords, but in heptachords or septonaries, for which purpose an extended syllabic arrangement was needed. We have been unable to trace back the definite use of a seventh syllable to an earlier date than the year 1599, when the subject was broached by Erich van der Putten (Erycius Puteanus) of Dordrecht, who, at pages 54, 55 of his Pallas modulata,¹ proposed the use of BI, deriving the idea from the second syllable of labii. No long time, however, elapsed before an overwhelming majority of theorists decided upon the adoption of SI, the two letters of which were suggested by the initials of 'Sancte Ioannes'—the Adonic verse which follows the three Sapphics in the Hymn already quoted.² The use of this syllable was strongly advocated by Sethus Calvisius in his Exercitatio musicae tertia, printed in 1611. Since then, various attempts have been made to supplant it in favour of Sa, Za, Ci, Be, Te and other open syllables; but the suggested changes have rarely survived their originators, though another one, of little less importance—the substitution of Do for Ut on account of its greater resonance—has, for more than two hundred years, been almost universally accepted. (See Do.) Lorenzo Penna,³ writing in 1672, speaks of Do as then in general use in Italy; and Gerolamo Cantone⁴ alludes to it, in nearly similar terms, in 1678, since which period the use of Ut has been discontinued, not only in Italy, but in every country in Europe except France.

In Germany and the Netherlands far more sweeping changes than these have been proposed from time to time, and even temporarily accepted. Huberto Waelrant (1517-95) introduced, at Antwerp, a system called 'Bocedisation' or 'Bobisation,' founded on seven syllables—Bo, Ce, Di, Ga, Lo, Ma, Ni—which have since been called the 'Voces Belgicae.' At Stuttgart Daniel Hitzler (1676-1635) based a system of 'Bobisation' upon La, Be, Ce, De, Me, Fe, Ge. A century later Graun (1701-59) invented a method of 'Damenisation,' founded upon the particles Da, Me, Ni, Po, Tu, Lo, Be. But none of these methods have survived.

In England the use of the syllables Ut and Re died out completely before the middle of the 17th century; and recurring changes of Mi, Fa, Sol, La, were used, alone, for the solmisation of all kinds of melodies. Butler mentions this method as being in general use in 1636⁵; and Playford calls attention to the same fact in 1655.⁶

In France the original syllables, with the added Si, took firmer root than in Italy; for it had long been the custom, in the Neapolitan schools, to use the series beginning with Do for those keys only in which the third is Major. For Minor keys the Neapolitans begin with Re, using Fa for an accidental flat and Mi for a sharp. (For further modifications in methods of solmisation, see the Sammelbände of the Int. Mus. Ges. i. 535, and Tonic Sol-Fa.)

SOLO (Ital., 'alone,' a piece or passage executed by one voice or performer. Airs are sol; a pianoforte piece for two hands is a pianoforte solo. A violin solo, strictly speaking, is a piece for the violin alone, like Bach's unaccompanied sonatas; but the term is often used loosely for a concerto or other piece in which the solo instrument is accompanied by the band, the pianoforte, etc.

In an orchestral piece where one instrument has a passage which is intended to sound out prominently, it is marked 'solo,' as in the second subject of the Adagio in Beethoven's symphony No. 4, which is for the 1st clarinet, and marked sol; in the flute solo near the end of the working-out in the Leonora overture (where, however, the bassoon, equally solo, is merely marked '1'); and in a thousand other instances. In arrangements of pianoforte concertos for two hands, the entry of the solo instrument is marked sol, to distinguish it from the compressed accompaniment. (See TASTO SOLO.) G.

SOLOMON. (1) A serenata by William Boyce to words by Edward Moore, produced 1743. The song 'Softly rise, O southern breeze' was popular for many years.

(2) An oratorio of Handel; composed between 'Alexander Balus' and 'Theodora.' It was begun on May 5, 1748, and the memorandum at the end of the work is 'G. F. Handel, Jun 13, 1748, statis 63. Völlig geendiget.' The words of the oratorio are supposed to be by Dr. Morell; but this is not certain. It was produced at Covent Garden Theatre, Mar. 17, 1749, 'with a Concerto,' and was revived by Sir G. Smart at Exeter Hall, Apr. 14, 1836. The Sacred Harmonic Society followed, Dec. 3, 1838; and with Costa's additional accompaniments, Apr. 8, 1870. G.

SOLO ORGAN, a manual or clavier of an organ having stops associated with it which for the most part are intended for use solo, that is, in single notes as opposed to chords. The solo organ is generally a fourth manual placed above that of the swell; but it occasionally supersedes the choir organ, and is then placed below the 'Great' manual. The stops of the solo organ (with the exception of reeds on a high wind pressure) are usually enclosed in a swell-box. (See ORGAN; ORGAN-PLAYING.)

SOLO STOP. (1) A stop or register of a solo organ or fourth manual. (2) Any stop which can be used as a solo—that is, in single notes, e.g. a clarinet on the choir organ; a cornopean, hautboy or other reed on the swell organ; a clarabella or flute on either of the three manuals great, swell or choir. (See ORGAN: Vocabulary of Stops.) J. S.

SOLOVIEV, NICHOLAS THEOPHANTOVICH (b. Petrozavodsk, May 9—Apr. 27, O.S.—1846), was intended for the medical profession, but entered the St. Petersburg Conservatorium in 1868, eventually passing into Zarembo's class for composition. In 1871 Serov, being then upon his deathbed, entrusted the orchestration of his music-drama, 'The Power of Evil,' to Soloviev. About this time his symphonic picture, 'Russians and Mongols,' was given at one of the concerts of the Russian Musical Society. In 1874 Soloviev became a professor at the St. Petersburg Conservatorium. Of his three operas 'Cordelia' (1885) is the best known, having been widely performed in Russia, and also at Prague in 1890. Other compositions comprise a cantata for the bi-centenary of the birth of Peter the Great; an orchestral fantasia on a folk-song; and a number of songs and pieces for pianoforte. As a critic, Soloviev wrote for the Novoe Vremya, Novosti, Rossia, etc. He was also well known as a collector of folk-songs.

SOMERVELL, ARTHUR (b. Wintermere, June 5, 1863), Principal Inspector of Music to the Board of Education and Scottish Education Department (Whitehall), has devoted mainly to the interests of education a career which began with conspicuous promise as a composer.

Somervell was educated at Uppingham School (from 1877) and King's College, Cambridge (B.A. 1883, Mus.D. 1903). At the University he studied music with Stanford, then went to Berlin to study at the Hochschule with Kiel and Bargiel. In 1885 he entered the R.C.M., and after two years there became a private pupil of Parry. In 1894 he joined the teaching staff of the R.C.M., and in 1901 began his work as an inspector which led to his present important appointment. Apart from songs, which from the first were his most spontaneous form of expression in music, he made his mark in composition with several large works, a Mass in C minor (Bach Choir, 1891), an orchestral ballad, 'Helen of Kirkconnell' (Philharmonic, 1893), and a cantata, 'The Forsaken Merman' (Leeds Festival, 1895). He also wrote 'A Song of Praise' (1891) and 'The Power of Sound' (1895) for the popular festival at Kendal in which he was personally interested, and which has played an important part in the development of the COMPETITION FESTIVALS (q.v.). Among later works for the older type of festival were 'Ode to the Sea' (Birmingham, 1897) and 'Intimations of Immortality' (Leeds, 1907).

In later years Somervell has turned more to instrumental composition. His symphonic variations for piano and orchestra, 'Normandy,' a symphony in D minor ('Thalassa') and a 'Concertstück' for violin and orchestra all appeared at about the same time (1912-13). The symphony was first heard under Nikisch at Queen's Hall (Feb. 17, 1913). A quintet for clarinet and strings (London, 1919) and a piano concerto (Guildford, 1921) belong to the same period of composition though their public performance was delayed. The symphony aroused considerable interest on its first appearance because of its complete detachment from all the more sensational acquisitions of contemporary orchestral technique. It was recognised as a sincere and undeniably beautiful piece of writing in a style which would have been perfectly familiar to audiences of 1850 or thereabout. Somervell's art has remained true to the saying that a man's life 'consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.' It is always economical of means, direct and unaffected. These qualities give eloquence to his numerous songs, settings of many lyrics of the English poets from Shakespeare to those of the 19th century. They include four cycles: 'Maud' (Tennyson), 'The Shropshire Lad' (Housman), 'James Lee's Wife' (Browning) and 'Love in Springtime.' Of these the 'Maud' cycle takes a place among the classics of English song for the complete unity of feeling existing between poetry and music. The following is a summary of his major compositions. SOMIS, (I) GIOVANNI BATTISTA (b. Piedmont, 1676; d. Turin, Aug. 14, 1763), violinist, studied first under Corelli at Rome, and afterwards under Vivaldi at Venice. Hubert Le Blanc, quoted in Baillot's Violin Tutor, praises the majesty of his style and command over his bow. After his return to Turin he was appointed solo violinist to the King, and leader of the royal band, a position he retained until his death. After having once settled at Turin he appears scarcely ever to have left it; and so few of his compositions were published that there is little opportunity of directly forming an estimate of him as a player; but judging from the style of his numerous and well-known pupils, Somis did not merely hand on the traditions of the great Italian masters, but formed a style of his own, more brilliant and more emotional, marking technically, and also, in a sense, musically, a decided forward step in the art of playing the violin. As the head and founder of the Piedmontese School, and the teacher of Leclair, Giardini, Chiabran and Pugnani—the latter again the teacher of Viotti—he occupies a prominent place in the history of violin-playing, and forms the connecting-link between the classical schools of Italy and France. Fétis names as his only published work 'Opera prima di sonate a violino e violoncello o cembalo. Roma 1722'; but a set of sonatas, op. 4, was published in Paris in 1726, and twelve sonatas, op. 6, in 1734. Besides these, an edition of some of his works appeared at Amsterdam, and a concerto is in MS. in the State collection at Dresden (Q.-L.).

(2) LORENZO, apparently a younger brother of Giov. Battista, who also lived at Turin, later residing in Paris, where his second book of 8 chamber sonatas for violin and basso continuo was published in 1740. They show a great advance technically, as well as in respect of their musical conception, and this is noticeable also in two MS. concertos for violin by Lorenzo, one apparently autograph, now in the possession of Newman Flower (see also the sonata op. 2 no. 6 arranged by Alfred Moffat). It appears doubtful whether some of the great violinists who are simply called 'pupils of Somis' are not pupils of Lorenzo instead of Giovanni Battista, to whom they were attributed by biographers ignorant even of Lorenzo's existence. A portrait of the two brothers, painted in 1765 by a third brother, Ignazio, is in the Liceo Musicale, Bologna. E. V. D. S.

SOMMACAMPAGNA, GIDINO DA, c. 1350, author of a Trattato de li rithimi volgari, which sheds important light upon the song-forms of the 14th century (Riemann).

SOMMER, HANS (HANS FRIEDRICH AUGUST ZINCKEN, the last name occasionally transformed into 'NECKENIZ') (b. Brunswick, July 20, 1837; d. there, Apr. 28, 1922), composer, was educated at Göttingen, where he became professor of Physics; subsequently he was appointed director of the technical High School of his native place, a post he gave up in 1884. In 1885 he settled in Berlin, in 1888 in Weimar, and in 1898 returned to Brunswick. He won success on the operatic stage with his later dramatic works in a fantastic form: 'Der Nachtwächter' and 'Loreley' were both given in Brunswick—the first in 1865, the second in 1891; in 1894 a one-act piece, 'Saint Foix,' was given at Munich, two other one-act operas deserve mention, 'Der Meermann,' at Weimar in 1896, and 'Augustin'; 'Münchhausen,' in three acts, and 'Räbezah!l' were given in Brunswick in 1904; 'Riquet à la houppe' at the same theatre on Apr. 14, 1907, and 'Der Waldschratt' in 1912.

It is by his songs that Sommer's name is best known in England: his op. 3, 'Mädchenlied,' from Julius Wolff's Wilde Jäger; his op. 4, three sets of songs from the same poet's Hunold Singuf; his op. 5, a set from Wolff's Tannhäuser; his op. 6, to words from Carmen Sylva's Sappho, and his songs to words of different authors, opp. 8, 9, 10, 11, 12 and 16, contain many things that are effective for the voice, well expressed, original, and full of a sort of ingenuity that delights all cultivated amateurs. In particular his 'Stell dich ein' from op. 4, a vocal obligato to a brilliant pianoforte waltz, and 'Am Waldteiche,' in which the alternate Latin and German words of the poem are cleverly set to music in different styles, are in their way little triumphs of art. He made several contributions to musical literature, such as his Über die Wertschätzung der Musik (1898). M.

SOMMEROPHON, an instrument of the saxhorn or bombardon class, named after its inventor. It was largely played in the Exhibition of 1851. 'The Euphonic horn of Herr Sommer' is honourably mentioned in the Reports of the Juries (pp. 331, 335) as 'an instrument of great power as well as sweetness of tone.' W. H. S.

SONATA (Fr. and Ger. Sonate). The history of the sonata is the history of an attempt to cope with one of the most singular problems ever presented to the mind of man, and its solution is one of the most successful achievements of his artistic instincts. A sonata is, as its name implies, a sound-piece, and a sound-piece alone; in its purest and most perfect examples it is unexplained by title or text, and unassisted by voices; it is nothing but an unlimited concatenation of musical notes. Such notes have individually no significance; and even the simplest principles of their relative definition and juxtaposition, such as are necessary to make the most elementary music, had to be drawn from the inner self and the consciousness of things which belong to man's nature only, without the possibility of finding guidance or more than the crudest suggestion from the observation of things external. Yet the structural principles by which such unpromising materials become intelligible have been so ordered and developed by the unaided musical instinct of many successive generations of composers, as to render possible long works which not only penetrate and stir us in detail, but are in their entire mass direct, consistent and convincing. Such works, in their completest and most severely abstract forms, are sonatas.

The name seems to have been first adopted purely as the antithesis to CANTATA (q.v.), the musical piece that was sung. It begins to come into notice about the same time as that form of composition, soon after the era of the most marked revolution in music, which began at the end of the 16th century; when a band of enthusiasts, led by visionary ideals, unconsciously sowed the seed of modern music in an attempt to wrest the monopoly of the art in its highest forms from the predominant influence of the Church, and to make it serve for the expression of human feelings of more comprehensive range. At this time the possibilities of polyphony in its ecclesiastical forms may well have seemed almost exhausted, and men turned about to find new fields which should give scope for a greater number of workers. The nature of their speculations and the associations of the old order of things alike conspired to direct their attention first to opera and cantata, and here they had something to guide them; but for abstract instrumental music of the sonata kind they had for a long time no clue. The first suggestion was clearly accidental. It appears probable that the excessive elaboration of the madrigal led to the practice of accompanying the voice parts with viols; and from this the step is but short to leaving the viols by themselves and making a vague kind of chamber music without the voices. This appears to have been the source of the instrumental canzonas which were written in tolerable numbers till some way into the 18th century. It does not appear that any distinct rules for their construction were recognised, but the examination of a large number, written at different periods from Frescobaldi to J. S. Bach, proves the uniform object of the composers to have been a lax kind of fugue, such as might have served in its main outlines for the vocal madrigals. Burney says the earliest examples of 'Sonatas' he had been able to discover in his devoted inquiries were by Turini, published at Venice in 1624. His description of those he examined answers perfectly to the character of the canzonas, for, he says, they consist of one movement, in fugue and imitation throughout. Sonatas did not, however, rest long at this point of simplicity, but were destined very early to absorb material from other sources; and though the canzona kind of movement maintained its distinct position through many changes in its environment, and is still found in the violin sonatas of J. S. Bach, Handel and Porpora, the madrigal, which was its source, soon ceased to have direct influence upon three parts of the more complete structure. The suggestion for these came from the dance and the newly invented opera or dramatic cantata. The former had existed and made the chief staple of instrumental music for generations, but it requires to be well understood that its direct connexion with dancing puts it out of the category of abstract music of the kind which was now obscurely germinating. The dances were understood through their relation with one order of dance motions. There would be the order of rhythmic motions which, taken together, was called a branle, another that was called a pavan, another a gigue; and each dance-tune maintained the distinctive rhythm and style throughout. On the other hand, the radical principle of the sonata, developed in the course of generations, is the compounding of a limitless variety of rhythms; and though isolated passages may be justly interpreted as representing gestures of an ideal dance kind, like that of the ancients, it is not through this association that the group of movements taken as a whole is understood, but by the disposition of such elements and others in relation to one another. This conception took time to develop, though it is curious how early composers began to perceive the radical difference between the suite and the sonata. Occasionally a doubt seems to be implied by confusing the names together or by actually calling a collection of dance-tunes a sonata; but it can hardly be questioned that from almost the earliest times, as is proved by a strong majority of cases, there was a sort of undefined presentiment that their developments lay along totally different paths. In the first attempts to form an aggregate of distinct movements, the composers had to take their forms where they could find them; and among these were the familiar dance-tunes, which for a long while held a prominent position in the heterogeneous group of movements, and were only in late times transmuted into the scherzo which supplanted the minuet and trio in one case, and the finale or rondo, which ultimately took the place of the gigue, or chaconne, or other similar dance-forms as the last member of the group.

The third source, as above mentioned, was the drama, and from this two general ideas were derivable: one from the short passages of instrumental prelude or interlude, and the other from the vocal portions. Of these, the first was intelligible in the drama through its relation to some point in the story, but it also early attained to a crude condition of form which was equally available apart from the drama. The other produced at first the vaguest and most rhapsodical of all the movements, as the type taken was the irregular declamatory recitative which appears to have abounded in the early operas.

EMERGENCE (17TH CENTURY).—It is hardly likely that it will ever be ascertained who first experimented in sonatas of several distinct movements. Many composers are mentioned in different places as having contributed works of the kind, such as Farina, Cesti, Graziani, among Italians, Rosenmüller among Germans, and John Jenkins among Englishmen. Burney also mentions a Michael Angelo Rossi,¹ whose date is given as from about 1620 to 1660. The actual structure of large numbers of sonatas composed in different parts of Europe soon after this time, proves a tolerably clear consent as to the arrangement and quality of the movements. A fine vigorous example is a sonata in C minor for violin and figured bass, by H. J. F. Biber, a German, said to have been first published in 1681. This consists of five movements in alternate slow and quick time. The first is an introductory largo of contrapuntal character, with clear and consistent treatment in the fugally imitative manner; the second is a passacaglia, which answers roughly to a continuous string of variations on a short well-marked period; the third is a rhapsodical movement consisting of interspersed portions of poco lento, presto and adagio, leading into a gavotte; and the last is a further rhapsodical movement alternating adagio and allegro. In this group the influence of the madrigal or canzona happens to be absent; the derivation of the movement being—in the first, the contrapuntalism of the music of the Church, in the second and fourth, dances, and in the third and fifth, probably operatic or dramatic declamation. The work is essentially a violin sonata with accompaniment, and the violin-part points to the extraordinarily rapid advance to mastery which was made in the few years after its being accepted as an instrument fit for high-class music. The writing for the instrument is decidedly elaborate and difficult, especially in the double stops and contrapuntal passages which were much in vogue with almost all composers from this time till J. S. Bach. In the structure of the movements the fugal influences are most apparent, and there are very few signs of the systematic repetition of subjects in connexion with well-marked distribution of keys, which in later times became indispensable.

Similar features and qualities are shown in the curious set of seven sonatas for clavier by Johann Kuhnau, called 'Frische Clavier Früchte,' etc., of a little later date; but there are also in some parts indications of an awakening sense of the relation and balance of keys. The grouping of the movements is similar to those of Biber, though not identical; thus the first three have five movements or divisions, and the remainder four. There are examples of the same kind of rhapsodical slow movements, as may be seen in the sonata (No. 2 of the set) which is given in Pauer's 'Alte Meister'; there are several fugal movements, some of them clearly and musically written; and there are some good illustrations of dance types, as in the last movement of No. 3, and the ciaccons of No. 6. But more important for the thread of continuous development are the peculiar attempts to balance tolerably defined and distinct subjects, and to distribute key and subject in large expanses, of which there are at least two clear examples. In a considerable proportion of the movements the most noticeable method of treatment is to alternate two characteristic groups of figures or subjects almost throughout, in different positions of the scale and at irregular intervals of time. This is illustrated in the first movement of the sonata No. 2, in the first movement of No. 1, and in the third movement of No. 5. The subjects in the last of these are as follows:

The point most worth notice is that the device lies half-way between fugue and true sonata-form. The alternation is like the recurrence of subject and counter-subject in the former, wandering hazily in and out, and forwards and backwards, between nearly allied keys, as would be the case in a fugue. But the subjects are not presented in single parts or fugally answered. They enter and re-enter for the most part as concrete lumps of harmony, the harmonic accompaniment of the melody being taken as part of the idea; and this is essentially a quality of sonata-form (see FORM). So the movements appear to hang midway between the two radically distinct domains of form; and while deriving most of their disposition from the older manners, they look forward, though obscurely, in the direction of modern practices. How obscure the ideas of the time on the subject must have been, appears from the other point which has been mentioned above; which is, that in a few cases Kuhnau has hit upon clear outlines of tonal form. In the second sonata, for instance, there are two arias, as they are called. They do not correspond in the least with modern notions of an aria any more than do the rare examples in Bach's and Handel's suites. The first is a little complete piece of sixteen bars, divided exactly into halves by a double bar, with repeats after the familiar manner. The first half begins in F and ends in C, the second half goes as far as D minor and back, to conclude in F again. The subject-matter is irregularly distributed in the parts, and does not make any pretence of coinciding with the tonal divisions. The second aria is on a different plan, and is one of the extremely rare examples in this early period of clear coincidence between subject and key. It is in the form which is often perversely misnamed 'Lied-form,' which will in this place be called 'primary form' to avoid circumlocution and waste of space. It consists of twenty bars in D minor representing one distinct idea, complete with close: then sixteen bars devoted to a different subject, beginning in B \flat and passing back ultimately to D minor, recapitulating the whole of the first twenty bars in that key, and emphasising the close by repeating the last four bars. Such decisiveness, when compared with the unregulated and unbalanced wandering of longer movements, either points to the conclusion that composers did not realise the desirableness of balance in coincident ranges of subject and key on a large scale; or that they were only capable of feeling it in short and easily grasped movements. It seems highly probable that their minds, being projected towards the kind of distribution of subject which obtained in fugal movements, were not on the look-out for effects of the sonata order which to moderns appear so obvious. So that, even if they had been capable of realising them more systematically, they would not yet have thought it worth while to apply their knowledge. In following the development of the sonata, it ought never to be forgotten that composers had no idea whither they were tending, and had to use what they did know as stepping-stones to the unknown. In art, each step that is gained opens a fresh vista; but often, till the new position is mastered, what lies beyond is completely hidden and undreamed of. In fact, each step is not so much a conquest of new land, as the creation of a new mental or emotional position in the human organism. The achievements of art are the unravellings of hidden possibilities of abstract law, through the constant and cumulative extension of instincts. They do not actually exist till man has made them; they are the counterpart of his internal conditions, and change and develop with the changes of his mental powers and sensitive qualities, and apart from him have no validity. There is no such thing as leaping across a chasm on to a new continent, neither is there any gulf fixed anywhere, but continuity and inevitable antecedents to every consequent; the roots of the greatest masterpieces of modern times lie obscurely hidden in the wild dances and barbarous howlings of the remotest ancestors of the race, who began to take pleasure in rhythm and sound, and every step was into the unknown, or it may be better said not only unknown but non-existent till made by mental effort.

The period from about 1600 to about 1725 contains the very difficult steps which led from the style appropriate to a high order of vocal music—of which the manner of speech is polyphonic, and the ideal type of form, the fugue—to the style appropriate to abstract instrumental music, of which the best manner is contrapuntally expressed harmony, and the ideal type of form, the sonata. These works of Kuhnau happen to illustrate very curiously the transition in which a true though crude idea of abstract music seems to have been present in the composer's mind, at the same time that his distribution of subjects and keys was almost invariably governed by fugal habits of thinking, even where the statement of subjects is in a harmonic manner. In some of these respects he is nearer to, and in some further back from, the true solution of the problem than his famous contemporary Corelli; but his labours do not extend over so much space, nor had they so much direct and widespread influence. In manner and distribution of movements they are nearer to his predecessor and compatriot Biber; and for that reason, and also to maintain the continuity of the historic development after Corelli, the consideration of his works has been taken a little before their actual place in point of time.

CORELLI'S STYLE.—The works of Corelli form one of the most familiar landmarks in the history of music, and as they are exclusively instrumental it is clear that careful consideration ought to elicit a great deal of interesting matter, such as must throw valuable light on the state of thought of his time. He published no less than sixty sonatas of different kinds, which are divisible into distinct groups in accordance with purpose or construction. The first main division is that suggested by their titles. There are twenty-four 'Sonate da chiesa' for strings, lute, and organ, twenty-four 'Sonate da camera' for the same instruments, and twelve solos or sonatas for violin and violoncello, or cembalo. In these the first and simplest matter for observation is the distribution of the movements. The average, in church and chamber sonatas alike, is strongly in favour of four, beginning with a slow movement, and alternating the rest. There is also an attempt at balance in the alternation of character between the movements. The first is commonly in 4-time, of dignified and solid character, and generally aiming less at musical expression than the later movements. The second movement in the church sonata is freely fugal, in fact the exact type above described as a canzona; the style is commonly rather dry, and the general effect chiefly a complacent kind of easy swing such as is familiar in most of Handel's fugues. In the chamber sonatas the character of the second movement is rather more variable; in some it is an allemande, which, being dignified and solid, is a fair counterpart to the canzona in the other sonatas: sometimes it is a courante, which is of lighter character. The third movement is the only one which is ever in a different key from the first and last. It is generally a characteristic one, in which other early composers of instrumental music, as well as Corelli, clearly endeavoured to infuse a certain amount of vague and tender sentiment. The most common time is 3-2. The extent of the movement is always limited, and the style, though simply contrapuntal in fact, seems to be ordered with a view to obtain smooth harmonious full-chord effects, as a contrast to the brusqueness of the preceding fugal movement. There is generally a certain amount of imitation between the parts, irregularly and fancifully disposed, but almost always avoiding the sounding of a single part alone. In the chamber sonatas, as might be anticipated, the third movement is frequently a sarabande, though by no means always; for the same kind of slow movement as that in the church sonatas is sometimes adopted, as in the third sonata of the Opera Seconda, which is as good an example of that class as could be taken. The last movement is almost invariably of a lively character in church and chamber sonatas alike. In the latter, gigas and gavottes predominate, the character of which is so familiar that they need no description. The last movements in the church sonatas are of a similar vivacity and sprightliness, and sometimes so alike in character and rhythm as to be hardly distinguishable from dance-tunes, except by the absence of the defining name, the double bar in the middle, and the repeats which are almost inevitable in the dance movements. This general scheme is occasionally varied without material difference of principle by the interpolation of an extra quick movement, as in the first six sonatas of the Opera Quinta; in which it is a sort of show movement for the violin in a 'Moto continuo' style, added before or after the central slow movement. In a few cases the number is reduced to three by dropping the slow prelude, and in a few others the order cannot be systematised.

In accordance with the principles of classification above defined, the church sonatas appear to be much more strictly abstract than those for chamber. The latter are, in many cases, not distinguishable from suites. The sonatas of Opera Quinta are variable. Thus the attractive sonata in E minor, No. 8, is quite in the recognised suite-manner. Some are like the 'Sonate da Chiesa,' and some are types of the mixed order more universally accepted later, having several undefined movements, together with one dance. The actual structure of the individual movements is most uncertain. Corelli clearly felt that something outside the domain of the fugal tribe was to be attained, but he had no notion of strict outlines of procedure.

One thing which hampered him and other composers of the early times of instrumental music was their unwillingness to accept formal tunes as an element in their order of art. They had existed in popular song and dance music for certainly a century, and probably much more; but the idea of adopting them in high-class music was not yet in favour. Corelli occasionally produces one, but the fact that they generally occur with him in gigas, which are the freest and least responsible portion of the sonata, supports the inference that they were not yet regarded as worthy of general acceptance even if realised as an admissible element, but could only be smuggled-in in the least respectable movement with an implied smile to disarm criticism. Whether this was decisively so or not, the fact remains that till long after Corelli's time the conventional tune element was conspicuously absent from instrumental compositions. Hence the structural principles which to a modern seem almost inevitable were very nearly impracticable, or at all events unsuitable to the general principles of the music of that date. A modern expects the opening bars of a movement to present its most important subject, and he anticipates its repetition in the latter portion of the movement as a really vital part of form of any kind. But association and common sense were alike against such a usage being universal in Corelli's time. The associations of ecclesiastical and other serious vocal music, which were then preponderant to a supreme degree, were against strongly salient points, or strongly marked interest in short portions of a movement in contrast to parts of comparative unimportance. Consequently the opening bars of a movement would not be expected to stand out in sufficiently strong relief to be remembered unless they were repeated at once, as they would be in fugue. Human nature is against it. For not only does the mind take time to be wrought up to a fully receptive condition, unless the beginning is most exceptionally striking, but what comes after is likely to obliterate the impression made by it. As a matter of fact, if all things were equal, the portion most likely to remain in the mind of an average listener, is that immediately preceding the strongest cadences or conclusions of the paragraphs of the movement. It is true, composers do not argue in this manner, but they feel such things vaguely or instinctively, and generally with more sureness and justice than the cold-blooded argumentation of a theorist could attain to. Many examples in other early composers besides Corelli, emphasise this point effectively. The earliest attempts at structural form must inevitably present some simply explicable principle of this sort, which is only not trivial because it is a very significant as well as indispensable starting-point. Corelli's commonest devices of form are the most unsophisticated applications of such simple reasoning. In the first place, in many movements which are not fugal, the opening bars are immediately repeated in another position in the scale, simply and without periphrasis, as if to give the listener assurance of an idea of balance at the very outset. That he did this to a certain extent consciously, is obvious from his having employed the device in at least the following sonatas—2, 3, 8, 9, 10, 11, of Opera 1^{ma}; 2, 4, 7, 8, of Opera 3^{ra}; and 2, 4, 5, and 11, of Opera 4^{ta}; and Tartini and other composers of the same school followed his lead. This device is not, however, either so conspicuous or so common as that of repeating the concluding passage of the first half at the end of the whole, or of the concluding passages of one half or both consecutively. This, however, was not restricted to Corelli, but is found in the works of most composers from his time to Scarlatti, J. S. Bach and his sons; and it is no extravagant hypothesis that its gradual extension was the direct origin of the characteristic second section and second subject of modern sonata movements. In many cases it is the only element of form, in the modern sense, in Corelli's movements. In a few cases he hit upon more complicated principles. The corrente in sonata 5 of Opera 4^{ta}, is nearly a miniature of modern binary form. The well-known giga in A in the fifth sonata of Opera 5^{ta}, has balance of key in the first half of the movement, modulation, and something like consistency to subject-matter at the beginning of the second half, and due recapitulation of principal subject-matter at the end. The last movement of the eighth sonata of the Opera Terza, is within reasonable distance of rondo-form, though this form is generally as conspicuous for its absence in early sonatas as tunes are, and probably the one follows as a natural consequence of the other. Of the simple primary form, consisting of corresponding beginning and end, and contrast of some sort in the middle, there is singularly little. The clearest example is probably the 'Tempo di gavotta,' which concludes the ninth sonata of Opera Quinta. He also supplies suggestions of the earliest types of sonata form, in which both the beginnings and endings of each half of the movement correspond; as this became an accepted principle of structure with later composers, it will have to be considered more fully in relation to their works.

Of devices of form which belong to the great polyphonic tribe, Corelli uses many, but with more musical feeling than learning. His fugues are not remarkable as fugues, and he uses contrapuntal imitation rather as a subordinate means of carrying on the interest, than of expounding any wonderful device of pedantic wisdom, as was too common in those days. He makes good use of the chaconne-form, which was a great favourite with the early composers, and also uses the kindred device of carrying the repetition of a short figure through the greater part of a movement in different phases and positions of the scale. In some cases he merely rambles on without any perceptible aim whatever, only keeping up an equable flow of sound with pleasant interlacings of easy counterpoint, led on from moment to moment by suspensions and occasional imitation, and here and there a helpful sequence. Corelli's position as a composer is inseparably mixed up with his position as one of the earliest masters of his instrument. His style of writing for it does not appear to be so elaborate as that of other contemporaries, both older and younger, but he grasped a just way of expressing things with it, and for the most part the fit things to say. The impression he made upon musical people in all parts of the musical world was strong, and he was long regarded as the most delightful of composers in his particular line; and though the professors of his day did not always hold him in so high estimation, his influence upon many of his most distinguished successors was unquestionably powerful.

THE VIOLIN SCHOOLS.—It is possible, however, that appearances are deceptive, and that influences of which he was only the most familiar exponent, are mistaken for his peculiar achievement. Thus knowing his position at the head of a great school of violinists, which continued through several generations down to Haydn's time, it is difficult to disunite him from the honour of having fixed the type of sonata which they almost uniformly adopted. And not only this noble and vigorous school, comprising such men as Tartini, Vivaldi, Locatelli, Nardini, Veracini, and outlying members like Leclair and Rust, but men who were not specially attached to their violins, such as Albinoni and Purcell, and later, Bach, Handel and Porpora, equally adopted the type. Of Albinoni not much seems to be distinctly known, except that he was Corelli's contemporary and probably junior. He wrote operas and instrumental music. Of the latter, several sonatas are still to be seen, but they are, of course, not familiar, though at one time they enjoyed a wide popularity. The chief point about them is that in many for violin and figured bass he follows not only the same general outlines, but even the style of Corelli. He adopts the four-movement plan, with a decided canzona in the second place, a slow movement first and third, and a quick movement to end with, such as in one case a corrente. Purcell's having followed Corelli's lead is repudiated by enthusiasts¹; but at all events the lines of his 'Golden Sonata' in F are wonderfully similar. There are three slow movements, which come first, second and fourth; the third movement is actually called a canzona; and the last is a quick movement in 3-8 time, similar in style to corresponding portions of Corelli's sonatas. The second movement, an adagio, is the most expressive, being happily devised on the principle above referred to, of repeating a short figure in different positions throughout the movement. In respect of sonata-form the work is about on a par with the average of Corelli or Biber.

The domain of the sonata was for a long while almost monopolised by violinists and writers for the violin. Some of these, such as Geminiani and Locatelli, were actually Corelli's pupils. They clearly followed him both in style and structural outlines, but they also began to extend and build upon them with remarkable speed. The second movement continued for long the most stationary and conventional, maintaining the canzona type in a loose fugal manner, by the side of remarkable changes in the other movements. Of these the first began to grow into larger dimensions and clearer proportions even in Corelli's own later works, attaining to the dignity of double bars and repeats, and with his successors to a consistent and self-sufficing form. An example of this is the admirable 'Larghetto affettuoso' with which Tartini's celebrated 'Trillo del Diavolo' begins. No one who has heard it could fail to be struck with the force of the simple device above described of making the ends of each half correspond, as the passage is made to stand out from all the rest more characteristically than usual. A similar and very good example is the introductory largo to the sonata in G minor, for violin and figured bass, by Locatelli.¹ The subject-matter in both examples is exceedingly well handled, so that a sense of perfect consistency is maintained without concrete repetition of subjects, except, as already noticed, the closing bars of each half, which in Locatelli's sonata are rendered less obvious through the addition of a short coda starting from a happy interrupted cadence. It is out of the question to follow the variety of aspects presented by the introductory slow movement; a fair proportion are on similar lines to the above examples, others are isolated. Their character is almost uniformly solid and large; they are often expressive, but generally in a way distinct from the character of the second slow movement, which from the first was chosen as the fittest to admit a vein of tenderer sentiment.

The most important matter in the history of the sonata at this period is the rapidity with which advance was made towards the realisation of harmonic and tonal principles of structure, or, in other words, the perception of the effect and significance of relations between chords and distinct keys, and consequent appearance of regularity of purpose in the distribution of both, and increased freedom of modulation. Even Corelli's own pupils show consistent form of the sonata kind with remarkable clearness. The last movement of a sonata in C minor, by Geminiani, has a clear and emphatic subject to start with; modulation to the relative major, E \flat , and special features to characterise the second section; and conclusion of the first half in that key, with repeat after the supposed orthodox manner. The second half begins with a long section corresponding to the working out or 'free fantasia' portion of a classical sonata movement, and concludes with recapitulation of the first subject and chief features of the second section in C minor; this latter part admitting a certain amount of discursiveness, which is characteristic of most of the early experiments in this form. Similar to this is the last movement of Locatelli's sonata in G minor, the last movement of Veracini's sonata in E minor, published at Vienna in 1714, the last movements of Tartini's sonatas in E minor and D minor, and not a few others. It is rather curious that most of the early examples of what is sometimes called first-movement form are last movements. Most of these movements, however, in the early times, are distinguished by a peculiarity which is of some importance. It has been before referred to, but is so characteristic of the process of growth that it will not be amiss to describe it in this place (cf. FORM). The simple and almost homely means of producing the effect of structural balance by making the beginning and ending of each half of a movement correspond, is not so conspicuously common in its entirety as the correspondence of endings or repetition of cadence bars only; but it nevertheless is found tolerably often, and that in times before the virtue of a balance of keys in the first half of the movement had been decisively realised. When, however, this point was gained, it is clear that such a process would give, on as minute a scale as possible, the very next thing to complete binary form. It only needed to expand the opening passage into a first subject, and the figures of the cadence into a second subject, to attain that type which became almost universal in sonatas till Haydn's time, and with some second-rate composers, like Reichardt, later. The movements which are described as binary must be therefore divided into two distinct classes: that in which the first subject reappears in the complementary key at the beginning of the second half, which is the almost universal type of earlier times; and that in which it appears in the latter part of the movement, after the working-out portion, which is the later type. The experiments in Corelli and Tartini, and others who are close to these types, are endless. Sometimes there are tentative strokes near to the later form; sometimes there is an inverted order reproducing the second portion of the movement first. Sometimes the first subject makes its appearance at both points, but then, may be, there is no balance of keys in the first half, and so forth. The variety is extraordinary, and it is most interesting to watch the manner in which some types by degrees preponderate, sometimes by combining with one another, sometimes by gradual transformation, some nearer and more decisively like the types which are generally adopted in modern times as fittest. The later type was not decisively fixed on at any particular point, for many early composers touched it once or twice at the same period that they were writing movements in more elementary forms. The point of actual achievement of a step in art is not marked by an isolated instance, but by decisive preponderance, and by the systematic adoption which shows at least an instinctive realisation of its value and importance.

These writers of violin sonatas were just touching on the clear realisation of harmonic form as subsequently accepted, and they sometimes adopted the later type, though rarely, and that obscurely; they mastered the earlier type, and used it freely; and they also used the intermediate type which combines the two, in which the principal or first subject makes its appearance both at the beginning of the first half and near the end. As a sort of embryonic suggestion of this, the 'Tempo di gavotta,' in the eighth sonata of Corelli's Opera Seconda, is significant. Complete examples are—the last movement of Tartini's fourth sonata of opus 1, and the last movement of that in D minor above referred to; the last movement of Geminiani's sonata in C minor; the main portion, excluding the coda, of the corrente in Vivaldi's sonata in A major; the last movement of a sonata of Nardini's, in D major; and two capriccios in B \flat and C, by Franz Benda, quoted in F. David's 'Hohe Schule,' etc.

The four-movement type of violin sonata was not invariably adopted, though it preponderates so conspicuously. There is a set of twelve sonatas by Locatelli, for instance, not so fine as that in F. David's collection, which are nearly all on an original three-movement plan, concluding with an 'aria' and variations on a ground-bass. Some of Tartini's are also in three movements, and a set of six by Nardini are also in three, but always beginning with a slow movement, and therefore, though almost of the same date, not really approaching the distribution commonly adopted by Haydn for clavier sonatas. In fact the old violin sonata is in many respects a distinct genus, which maintained its individuality alongside the gradually stereotyped clavier sonata, and only ceased when that type obtained possession of the field, and the violin was reintroduced, at first as it were furtively, as an accompaniment to the pianoforte. The general characteristics of this school of writers for the violin, were nobility of style and richness of feeling, an astonishing mastery of the instrument, and a rapidly-growing facility in dealing with structure in respect of subject, key, modulation, and development; and what is most vital, though less obvious, a perceptible growth in the art of expression and a progress towards the definition of ideas. As a set-off there are occasional traces of pedantic manners, and occasional crudities both of structure and expression, derived probably from the associations of the old music which they had so lately left behind them. At the crown of the edifice are the sonatas of J. S. Bach. Of sonatas in general he appears not to have held to any decisive opinion. He wrote many for various instruments, and for various combinations of instruments. For clavier, for violin alone, for flute, violin and clavier, for viola da gamba and clavier, and so on; but in most of these the outlines are not decisively distinct from suites. In some cases the works are described as 'Sonatas or Suites,' and in at least one case the introduction to a church cantata is called a sonata. Some instrumental works which are called sonatas only, might quite as well be called suites, as they consist of a prelude and a set of dance-tunes. Others are heterogeneous. From this it appears that he had not satisfied himself on what lines to attack the sonata in any sense approaching the modern idea. With the violin sonatas it was otherwise; and in the group of six for violin and clavier he follows almost invariably the main outlines which are characteristic of the Italian school descended from Corelli, and all but one are on the four-movement plan, having slow movements first and third, and quick movements second and fourth. The sixth sonata only differs from the rest by having an additional quick movement at the beginning. Not only this but the second movements keep decisively the formal lineaments of the ancient type of free fugue, illustrated with more strictness of manner by the canzonas. Only in calibre and quality of ideas, and in some peculiar idiosyncrasies of structure do they differ materially from the works of the Italian masters. Even the first, third and fifth sonatas in the other set of six, for violin alone, conform accurately to the old four-movement plan, including the fugue in the second place; the remaining three being on the general lines of the suite. In most of the sonatas for violin and clavier the slow movement is a tower of strength, and strikes a point of rich and complex emotional expression which music reached for the first time in Bach's imagination. His favourite way of formulating a movement of this sort was to develop the whole accompaniment consistently on a concise and strongly marked figure, which by repetition in different conditions formed a bond of connexion throughout the whole; and on this he built a passionate kind of recitative, a free and unconstrained outpouring of the deepest and noblest instrumental song. This was a sort of apotheosis of that form of rhapsody which has been noticed in the early sonatas, such as Biber's and Kuhnau's, and was occasionally attempted by the Italians. The six sonatas present diversities of types, all of the loftiest order; some of them combining together with unflinching expressiveness perfect specimens of old forms of contrapuntal ingenuity. Of this, the second movement of the second sonata is a perfect example. It appears to be a pathetic colloquy between the violin and the treble of the clavier part, to which the bass keeps up the slow constant motion of staccato semiquavers: the colloquy at the same time is in strict canon throughout, and, as a specimen of expressive treatment of that time-honoured form, is almost unrivalled.

In all these movements the kinship is rather with the contrapuntal writers of the past, than with the types of Beethoven's adoption. Even Bach, immense as his genius and power of divination was, could not leap over that period of formation which it seems to have been indispensable for mankind to pass through, before equally noble and deeply felt things could be expressed in the characteristically modern manner. Though he looked further into the future in matters of expression and harmonic combination than any composer till the 19th century, he still had to use forms of the contrapuntal and fugal order for the expression of his highest thoughts. He did occasionally make use of binary form, though not in these sonatas. But he more commonly adopted, and combined with more or less fugal treatment, an expansion of simple primary form to attain structural effect. Thus, in the second movements of the first and second sonatas, in the last of the third and sixth, and the first of the sixth, he marks first a long complete section in his principal key, then takes his way into modulations and development, and discussion of themes and various kinds of contrapuntal enjoyment, and concludes with simple complete recapitulation of the first section in the principal key. Bach thus stands singularly aside, from the direct line of the development of the sonata as far as the structural elements are concerned. His contributions to the art of expression, to the development of resource, and to the definition and treatment of ideas, had great effect, and are of the very highest importance to instrumental music; but his almost invariable choice of either the suite-form, or the accepted outlines of the violin sonata, in works of this class, caused him to diverge into a course which with him found its final and supreme limit. In order to continue the work in veins which were yet unexhausted, the path had to be turned a little, and joined to courses which were coming up from other directions. The violin sonata continued to make its appearance here and there as has already been mentioned, but in the course of a generation it was entirely supplanted by the distinct type of clavier sonata.

THE CLAVIER SONATA.—Meanwhile there was another composer of this time who appears to stand just as singularly apart from the direct high road as Bach, and who, though he does not occupy a pedestal so high in the history of art, still has a niche by no means low or inconspicuous, and one which he shares with no one. Domenico SCARLATTI was born in the same year as J. S. Bach. His most valuable contributions are in the immense number of sonatas and studies which he wrote for the harpsichord. The two names are used as synonyms, for each of the thirty 'Esercizii per gravicembalo' is separately entitled 'Sonata.' But whatever they are called they do not correspond in appearance to any form which is commonly supposed to be essential to the sonata. Neither can they be taken as pure-bred members of the fugal family, nor do they trace their origins to the suite. They are, in fact, in a fair proportion of cases, an attempt to deal with direct ideas in a modern sense, without appealing to the glamour of conscious association, the dignity of science, or the familiarity of established dance rhythms. The connexion with what goes before and with what comes after is alike obscure, because of the daring originality with which existing materials are worked upon; but it is not the less inevitably present, as an outline of his structural principles will show.

His utterance is at its best sharp and incisive; the form in which he loves to express himself is epigrammatic; and some of his most effective sonatas are like strings of short propositions bound together by an indefinable sense of consistency and consequence, rather than by actual development. These ideas are commonly brought home to the hearer by the singular practice of repeating them consecutively as they stand, often several times over; in respect of which it is worth remembering that his position in relation to his audience was not unlike that of an orator addressing an uncultivated mob. The capacity for appreciating grand developments of structure was as undeveloped in them as the power of following widely spread argument and conclusion would be in the mob. And just as the mob-orator makes his most powerful impressions by short direct statements, and by hammering them in while still hot from his lips, so Scarlatti drove his points home by frequent and generally identical reiterations ; and then when the time came round to refer to them again, the force of the connexion between distant parts of the same story was more easily grasped. The feeling that he did this with his eyes open is strengthened by the fact that even in the grouping of the reiterations there is commonly a perceptible method. For instance, it can hardly be by accident that at a certain point of the movement, after several simple repetitions, he should frequently resort to the complication of repeating several small groups within the repetition of large ones. The following example is a happy illustration of his style, and of his way of elaborating such repetitions :

It must not be supposed that he makes a law of this procedure, but the remarkably frequent occurrence of so curious a device is certainly suggestive of conscious purpose¹ in structural treatment. The result of this mode is that the movements often appear to be crowded with ideas. Commonly the features of the opening bars, which in later times would be held of almost supreme importance, serve for very little except to determine the character of the movement, and do not make their appearance again.

¹ It is only right to point out the recognised custom of repeating phrases on the harpsichord with a change of registration, which may account in some measure for the habit here referred to.

On the other hand, he carries the practice before referred to, of making the latter part of each half of the movement correspond, to an extraordinary pitch, and with perfect success ; for he almost invariably adopts the key distribution of binary form in its main outlines ; and though it would not be accurate to speak of such a thing as a 'second subject' in his sonatas, the impression produced by his distribution of repetition and the clearness of his ideas is sufficient, in his best movements, to give a general structural effect very similar to complete binary form on a small scale. In order to realise to what extent the process of recapitulation is carried by him, it will be as well to consider the outline of a fairly characteristic sonata. That which stands fifteenth in the edition of Breitkopf & Hartel² begins with eight bars only in E minor ; the next forty-six, barring merely a slight and unimportant digression, are in G major. This concludes the first half. The second half begins with reference to the opening figures of the whole and a little key digression, and then a characteristic portion of the second section of the first half is resumed, and the last thirty-four bars of the movement are a recapitulation in E minor of the last thirty-five of the first half, the three concluding bars being condensed into two.

In many respects his principles of structure and treatment are altogether in the direction of modern ways, and alien to fugal principles. That vital principle of the fugue—the persistence of one principal idea, and the interweaving of it into every part of the structure—appears completely alien to Scarlatti's disposition. He very rarely wrote a fugue ; and when he did, if it was successful that was less because it was a good fugue than because it was Scarlatti's. The fact that he often starts with imitation between two parts is unimportant, and the merest accident of association. He generally treats his ideas as concrete lumps, and disposes them in distinct portions of the movement, which is essentially an unfugal proceeding, but the most important matter is that he was probably the first to attain to clear conception and treatment of a self-sufficing effective idea, and to use it, if without science, yet with management which is often convincingly successful. He was not a great master of the art of composition, but he was one of the rarest masters of his instrument ; and his divination of the way to treat it, and the perfect adaptation of his ideas to its requirements, more than counterbalance any shortcoming in his science. He was blessed with ideas, and with a style so essentially his own that even when his music is transported to another instrument the characteristic effects of tone often remain unmistakable. Vivacity, humour, genuine fun, are his most familiar traits. At his best his music sparkles with life and freshness, and its vitality is apparently quite unimpaired by age. He rarely approaches tenderness or sadness, and in the whole mass of his works there are hardly any slow movements. He is not a little 'bohemian,' and seems positively to revel in curious effects of consecutive fifths and consecutive octaves. The characteristic daring of which such things are the most superficial manifestations, joined with the clearness of his foresight, made him of closer kinship to Beethoven and Weber, and even Brahms, than to the typical contrapuntists of his day. His works are genuine 'sonatas' in the most radical sense of the term—self-dependent and self-sufficing sound-pieces, without programme. To this the distribution of movements is at least of secondary importance, and his confining himself to one alone does not vitiate his title to be a foremost contributor to that very important branch of the musical art. No successor was strong enough to wield his bow. His pupil Durante wrote some sonatas, consisting of a 'Studio' and a 'Divertimento' apiece, which have touches of his manner, but without sufficient of the nervous elasticity to make them important.

The contemporary writers for clavier of second rank do not offer much which is of high musical interest, and they certainly do not arrive at anything like the richness of thought and expression which is shown by their fellows of the violin. There appears, however, amongst them a tendency to drop the introductory slow movement characteristic of the violin sonata, and by that means to draw nearer to the type of later clavier or pianoforte sonatas. Thus a sonata of Wagenseil's in F major presents almost exactly the general outlines to be met with in Haydn's works—an allegro assai in binary form of the old type, a short andantino grazioso, and a 'Tempo di minuetto.' A sonata of Hasse in D minor has a similar arrangement of three movements ending with a Gigue; but the first movement is utterly vague and indefinite in form. There is also an allegro of Hasse in B \flat , quoted in Pauer's 'Alte Meister,' which deserves consideration for the light it throws on a matter which is sometimes said to be a crucial distinction between the early attempts at form and the perfect achievement. In many of the early examples of sonata-form, the second section of the first part is characterised by groups of figures which are quite definite enough for all reasonable purposes, but do not come up to the ideas commonly entertained of the nature of a subject; and on this ground the settlement of sonata-form was deferred some fifty years. Hasse was not a daring originator, neither was he likely to strike upon a crucial test of perfection, yet in this movement he sets out with a distinct and complete subject in B \flat of a robust Handelian character:

and after the usual extension proceeds to F, and announces by definite emphasis on the Dominant the well-contrasted second subject, which is suggestive of the polite reaction looming in the future:

The movement as a whole is in the binary type of the earlier kind.

The period now approaching is characterised by uncertainty in the distribution of the movements, but increasing regularity and definition in their internal structure. Some writers follow the four-movement type of violin sonata in writing for the clavier; some strike upon the grouping of three movements; and a good many fall back upon two. A sonata of Galuppi in D illustrates the first of these, and throws light upon the transitional process. The first movement is a beautiful adagio of the arioso type, with the endings of each half corresponding, after the manner traced from Corelli; the second is an allegro, not of the fugal or canzona order, but clear binary of the older kind. A violin sonata of Locatelli, of probably earlier date, has an Allemande of excellent form in this position, but this is not sufficiently definite in the inference it affords to throw much light on any transition or assimilation of violin sonata-form to clavier sonata-form. Galuppi's adoption of a movement of clear sonata-qualities in this place supplies exactly the link that was needed; and the fugal or canzona type of movement being so supplanted, nothing further was necessary but expansion, and the omission of the introductory adagio (which probably was not so well adapted to the earlier keyed instruments as to the violin), to arrive at the principle of distribution adopted in the palmiest days of formalism. Later, with a more powerful instrument, the introductory slow movement was often reintroduced. Galuppi's third movement is in a solid march style, and the last is a Giga. All of them are harmonically constructed, and the whole work is solid and of sterling musical worth.

Dr. Arne was born only four years after Galuppi, and was amenable to the same general influences. The structure of his sonatas emphasises the fact above mentioned, that though the order of movements was passing through a phase of uncertainty their internal structure was growing more and more distinct and uniform. His first sonata, in F, has two movements, andante and allegro, both of which follow harmonically the lines of binary form. The second, in E minor, has three movements, andante, adagio, allegro. The first and last are on the binary lines, and the middle one in simple primary form. The third sonata consists of a long vague introduction of arpeggios, elaborated in a manner characteristic of the time, an allegro which has only one subject but is on the binary lines, and a minuet and two variations. The fourth sonata is in some respects the most interesting. It consists of an andante, siciliano, fuga and allegro. The first is of continuous character but nevertheless in binary form, without the strong emphasis on the points of division between the sections. It deserves notice for its expressiveness and clearness of thought. The second movement is very short, but pretty and expressive, of a character similar to examples of Handel's tenderer moods. The last movement is particularly to be noticed, not only for being decisively in binary form, but for the ingenuity with which that form is manipulated. The first section is represented by the main subject in the treble, the second (which is clearly marked in the dominant key) has the same subject in the bass, a device adopted also more elaborately by W. Friedemann Bach. The second half begins with consistent development and modulation, and the recapitulation is happily managed by making the main subject represent both sections at once in a short passage of canon. Others of Arne's sonatas afford similar though less clear examples, which it is superfluous to consider in detail; for neither the matter nor the handling is so good in them as in those above described, most of which, though not rich in thought or treatment, nor impressive in character, have genuine traits of musical expression and clearness of workmanship.

In the same year with Dr. Arne was born Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, the eldest son of Johann Sebastian. He was probably the most gifted, the most independent, and unfortunately the wildest and most unmanageable of that remarkable family. Few of his compositions are known, and it is said that he would not take the trouble to write unless he was driven to it. Two sonatas exist, which are of different type, and probably represent different periods of his chequered career. One in D major, for its richness, elaborateness, expressiveness, is well worthy of the scion of so great a stock; the other is rather cheap, and though masterly in handling and disposition of structural elements, has more traces of the elegance which was creeping over the world of music than of the grave and earnest nobleness of his father and similar representatives of the grand period. The first, in D, is probably the most remarkable example, before Beethoven, of original ingenuity manipulating sonata-form under the influence of fugal associations and by means of contrapuntal devices. The whole is worked out with careful and intelligible reasoning, but to such an elaborate extent that it is quite out of the question to give even a complete outline of its contents. The movements are three—Un poco allegro, adagio, vivace. The first and last are speculative experiments in binary form. The first half in each represents the balance of expository sections in tonic and complementary keys. The main subject of the first reappears in the bass in the second section, with a new phase of the original accompaniment in the upper parts. The development portion is in its usual place, but the recapitulation is tonally reversed. The first subject and section is given in a relative key to balance the complementary key of the second section, and the second section is given in the original key or tonic of the movement; so that instead of repeating one section and transposing the other in recapitulation, they are both transposed analogously. In each of the three movements the ends of the halves correspond, and not only this but the graceful little figure appended to the cadence is the same in all the movements, establishing thereby a very delicate but sensible connexion between them. This figure is as follows:

The formal pauses on familiar points of harmony characteristic of later times are conspicuously few, the main divisions being generally marked by more subtle means. The whole sonata is so uncompromisingly full of expressive figures, and would require to be so elaborately phrased and 'sung' to be intelligible, that an adequate performance would be a matter of considerable difficulty. The second sonata, in C, has quite a different appearance. It is also in three movements—allegro, grave and vivace. The first is a masterly, clear and concise example of binary form of the type which is more familiar in the works of Haydn and Mozart. The second is an unimportant intermezzo leading directly into the finale, which is also in binary form of the composite type. The treatment is the very reverse of the previous sonata. It is not contrapuntal, nor fugal. Little pains are taken to make the details expressive; and the only result of using a bigger and less careful brush is to reduce the interest to a minimum, and to make the genuineness of the utterances seem doubtful, because the writer appears not to have taken the trouble to express his best thoughts.

Wilhelm Friedemann's brother, Carl Philipp Emanuel, his junior by a few years, was the member of the younger family who attained the highest reputation as a representative composer of instrumental music and a writer on that subject. His celebrity is more particularly based on the development of sonata-form, of which he is often spoken of as the inventor. True, his sonatas and writings obtained considerable celebrity, and familiarity induced people to remark things they had overlooked in the works of other composers. But in fact he is neither the inventor nor the establisher of sonata-form. It was understood before his day, both in details and in general distribution of movements. One type obtained the reputation of supreme fitness later, but it was not nearly always adopted by Haydn, nor invariably by Mozart, and was consistently departed from by Beethoven; and Emanuel did not restrict himself to it; yet his predecessors used it often. It is evident therefore that his claims to a foremost place rest upon other grounds. Among these, most prominent is his comprehension and employment of the art of playing and expressing things on the clavier. He understood it, not in a new sense, but in one which was nearer to public comprehension than the treatment of his father. He grasped the phase to which it had arrived, by constant development in all quarters; he added a little of his own, and having a clear and ready-working brain, he brought it home to the musical public in a way they had not felt before. His influence was paramount to give a decided direction to clavier-playing, and it is possible that the style of which he was the foster-father passed on continuously to the masterly treatment of the pianoforte by Clementi, and through him to the culminating achievements of Beethoven.

In respect of structure, most of his important sonatas are in three movements, of which the first and last are quick and the middle one slow; and this is a point by no means insignificant in the history of the sonata, as it represents a definite and characteristic balance between the principal divisions, in respect of style and expression as well as in the external traits of form. Many of these are in clear binary form, like those of his elder brother and his admirable predecessor, yet to be noted, P. Domenico Paradisi. He adopts sometimes the old type, dividing the recapitulation in the second half of the movement; sometimes the later, and sometimes the composite type. For the most part he is contented with the opportunities for variety which this form supplies, and casts a greater proportion of movements in it than most other composers, even to the extent of having all movements in a work in different phases of the same form, which in later times was rare. On the other hand, he occasionally experiments in structures as original as could well be devised. There is a sonata in F minor which has three main divisions corresponding to movements. The first, an allegro, approaches vaguely to binary form; the second, an adagio, is in rough outline like simple primary form, concluding with a curious barless cadenza; the last is a fantasia of the most elaborate and adventurous description, full of experiments in modulation, enharmonic and otherwise, changes of time, abrupt surprises and long passages entirely divested of bar lines. There is no definite subject, and no method in the distribution of keys. It is more like a rhapsodical improvisation of a most inconsequent and unconstrained description than the product of concentrated purpose, such as is generally expected in a sonata movement. It was, however, not unfamiliar in those days, and superb examples in the same spirit were provided by Johann Sebastian, such as the 'Fantasia cromatica' and parts of some of the toccatas. Johann Ernst Bach also left something more after the manner of the present instance as the prelude to a fugue. Emanuel Bach's position is particularly emphasised as the most prominent composer of sonatas of his time, who clearly shows the tendency of the new counter-current away from the vigour and honest comprehensiveness of the great school of which his father was the last and greatest representative, towards the elegance, polite ease and artificiality which became the almost indispensable conditions of the art in the latter part of the 18th century. Fortunately the process of propping up a tune upon a dummy accompaniment was not yet accepted universally, as a desirable phenomenon of high-class instrumental music;

as fact such a stride downward in one generation would have been too cataclysmic; so he was spared the temptation of shirking honest concentration, and padding his works, instead of making them thoroughly complete; and the result is a curious combination, sometimes savouring strongly of his father's style:

and sometimes coldly predicting the style of the future:

In general, his building up of movements is full of expressive detail, and he does not spare himself trouble in enriching his work with such things as ingenuity, genuine musical perception and vivacity of thought can suggest. He occasionally reaches a point of tenderness and poetic sensibility which is not unworthy of his descent, but there is also sometimes an uncomfortable premonition in his slow movements of the posturing and posing which were soon to be almost inevitable in well-bred adagios. The spirit is indeed not greatly deep and earnest, but in outward things the attainment of a rare degree of point and emphasis, and of clearness and certainty in construction without emptiness, sufficed to give Philipp Emanuel a foremost place among the craftsmen of the art.

P. Domenico Paradies was Emanuel Bach's senior by a few years. Two of his sonatas, at least, are deservedly well known to musicians. The structural qualities shown by the whole set of twelve emphasise the opinion that binary form was familiar to composers of this period. They differ from Philipp Emanuel's chiefly in consisting uniformly of two movements only. Of these, the first movements are almost invariably in binary form. That of the first sonata is perfectly complete and of the later type; many of the others are of the early type. Some details in the distribution of the movements are worth noticing. Thus the last movement of No. 4 is a very graceful and pretty minuet, which had hitherto not been so common an ingredient in sonatas as it afterwards became. The last movement¹ of No. 3 is called an aria; the arrangement of parts of which, as well as that of the last movement of No. 9, happens to produce a rondo, hitherto an extremely rare feature. His formulation and arrangement of subjects is extremely clear and masterly, and thoroughly in the sonata manner—that is, essentially harmonical. In character he leans towards the style of the latter part of the 18th century, but has a grace and sincerity which are thoroughly his own. In a few cases, as in the last movements of the sonatas in A and D, Nos. 6 and 10, which are probably best known of all, the character assumed is rather of the bustling and hearty type which is suggestive of the influence of Scarlatti. In detail they are not so rich as the best specimens of Emanuel's, or of Friedemann Bach's workmanship; but they are thoroughly honest and genuine all through, and thoroughly musical, and show no sign of shuffling or laziness.

The two-movement form of clavier sonata, of which Paradies's are probably the best examples, seems to have been commonly adopted by a number of composers of second and lower rank, from his time till far on in the century. Those of Durante have been already mentioned. All the set of eight by Domenico Alberti are also in this form, and so are many by such forgotten contributors as Roesser and Barthélemon, and some by the once popular Schobert. Alberti is credited with the doubtful honour of having invented a formula of accompaniment which became a little too familiar in the course of the century, and is sometimes known as the ALBERTI BASS (q.v.). He may not have invented it, but he certainly called as much attention to it as he could, since not one of his eight sonatas is without it, and in some movements it continues almost throughout. The movements approach occasionally to binary form, but are not clearly defined; the matter is for the most part dull in spirit and poor in sound; and the strongest characteristic is the unfortunate one of hitting upon a cheap device, which was much in vogue with later composers of mark, without having arrived at that mastery and definition of form and subject which alone made it endurable. The times were not quite ripe for such usages, and it is fortunate for Paradies, who was slightly Alberti's junior, that he should have attained to a far better definition of structure without resorting to such cheapening.

There are two other composers of this period who deserve notice for maintaining, even later, some of the dignity and nobility of style which were now falling into neglect, together with clearness of structure and expressiveness of detail. These are Rolle and George Benda. A sonata of the former in E_b shows a less certain hand in the treatment of form, but at times extraordinary gleams of musically poetic feeling. Points in the adagio are not unworthy of kinship with Beethoven. It contains broad and daring effects of modulation, and noble richness of sentiment and expression, which, by the side of the obvious tendencies of music in these days, is really astonishing. The first and last movements are in binary form of the old type, and contain some happy and musical strokes, though not so remarkable as the contents of the slow movement. George Benda was a younger and greater brother of the Franz who has been mentioned in connexion with violin sonatas. He was one of the last writers who, using the now familiar forms, still retained some of the richness of the earlier manner. There is in his work much in the same tone and style as that of Emanuel Bach, but also an earnestness and evident willingness to get the best out of himself and to deal with things in an original manner, such as was by this time becoming rare. After him, composers of anything short of first rank offer little to arrest attention either for individuality in treatment or earnestness of expression. The serious influences which had raised so many of the earlier composers to a point of memorable musical achievement were replaced by associations of far less genuine character, and the ease with which something could be constructed in the now familiar forms of sonata, seduced men into indolent uniformity of structure and commonplace prettiness in matter. Some attained to evident proficiency in the use of instrumental resource, such as Turini; and some to a touch of genuine though small expressiveness, as Haessler and Grazioli; for the rest the achievements of Sarti, Sacchini, Schobert, Méhul and the otherwise great Cherubini, in the line of sonata, do not offer much that requires notice. They add nothing to the process of development, and some of them are remarkably behindhand in relation to their time, and both what they say and the manner of it is equally unimportant.

JOSEF HAYDN'S CONTRIBUTION.—Midway in the crowd comes the conspicuous form of Haydn, who raised upon the increasingly familiar structural basis not only some fresh and notable work of the accepted sonata character, but the great and enduring monument of his symphonies and quartets. The latter do not fall within the limits of the present subject, though they are in reality but the great instrumental expansion of this kind of music for solo instruments. An arbitrary restriction has been put upon the meaning of the word sonata, and it is necessary here to abide by it. With Haydn it is rather sonata-form which is important, than the works which fall under the conventional acceptance of the name. His sonatas are many, but they are of exceedingly diverse value, and very few of really great importance. As is the case with his quartets, some, which internal evidence would be sufficient to mark as early attempts, are curiously innocent and elementary; and even throughout, with a few exceptions, their proportionate value is not equal to that of other classes of his numerous works. But the great span of his musical activity, reaching from the times of the Bach family till fairly on in Beethoven's mature years, the changes in the nature of keyed instruments, and the development of their resources which took place during his lifetime, make it inevitable that there should be a marked difference in the appearance and limits of different members of the collection. However, he is always himself, and though the later works are wider and more richly expressed, they represent the same mental qualities as the earliest. At all times his natural bent is in favour of simplification, as against the old contrapuntal modes of expression. His easy good-humour speaks best in simple but often ingeniously balanced tunes and subjects, and it is but rare that he has recourse to polyphonic expression or to the kind of idea which calls for it. Partly on this account and partly on account of narrowness of capacity in the instrument to which in solo sonatas he gave most attention, his range of technical resource is not extensive, and he makes but little demand upon his performers. His use of tunes¹ and decisively outlined subjects is one of the most important points in relation to structure at this period. Tunes had existed in connexion with words for centuries, and it is to their association with verses balanced by distinct rhythmic grouping of lines that the sectional tune of instrumental music must ultimately be traced. It appears not to be a genuine instrumental product, but an importation; and the fact that almost all the most distinguished composers were connected with opera establishments, just at the time that the tune-element became most marked in instrumental works, supports the inference that the opera was the means through which a popular element ultimately passed into the great domain of abstract music. In preceding times the definition of subject by hard outlines and systematic conformity to a few normal successions of harmony was not universal; and the adoption of tunes was rare. In Haydn and Mozart the culmination of regularity in the building of subjects is reached.

The virtue of this process is that it simplifies the conditions of structure in the whole movement. When a correct system of centralisation is found by which the subject is restrained within the limits which strictly illustrate but one single tonality, the feelings which this suggests to the hearer are such as will be satisfied with equally simple order in all other parts of the complete structure. If the creative power is not sufficiently concentrated and disciplined to restrain the direction of its activity within comprehensible bounds, the result can only be to make perfect balance and proportion impossible. Thus if the first section of a movement is so decentralised that its connexion with any particular key cannot possibly be followed by the hearer, one of the primary conditions of abstract music has been violated, and the balance of parts rendered undistinguishable. Yet the subject or section may range broadly in its course, and touch upon many alien tonalities without violating these conditions; and then the horizon is broadened so as to necessitate an equal relative extension in every part of the movement. If a poet sets out with a passage expanded to the full with imagery and implication, in which almost every word is suggestive of wide horizons of thought, and carries inference behind it as complicated as those which lie in simple external manifestations of nature, it is useless for him to go back afterwards to a more limited and statuesque mode of expression. Even a person of little cultivation would feel at once the violation of artistic proportion. A relative degree of heat and intensity must be maintained at the risk of the work being as a whole unendurable. But if a more restricted field of imagination be appealed to at the outset, the work may be the more easily and perfectly carried out in simpler and narrower limits. In abstract music, balance, proportion, equality in the range of emotional and structural elements are some of the most important conditions. Not that there is to be equal intensity all through, but that the salient and subordinate parts shall be fairly proportionate; and this cannot be tested or stated by formulas of science, but only by cultivated artistic instinct. In music the art of expressing an idea within the limits and after the manner necessary for abstract music had to be discovered. The process of selection from experimental types had brought this to the closest point consistent with completeness in the latter half of the 18th century. At that time the disposition of the musical mind was specially set upon obviously intelligible order and certainty in the structural aspect of works. It was a necessary condition for art to go through; and though not by any means the sole or supreme condition of excellence, it is not strange that the satisfaction derived from the sense of its achievement should cause people, in social circumstances which were peculiarly favourable, to put disproportionate stress upon it; and that later writers who have not been able to keep pace with the inevitable march and change in the conditions of musical utterance should still insist on it as if it were the ultimate aim of art; whereas in fact its prominence in that epoch was a passing phase having considerable dependence upon unique social conditions, and its existence in art at any time is only one of numberless constituent elements.

The condition of art of that time enabled the greatest composers to express the utmost of their ideas, and to satisfy their audiences, within the limits of a very simple group of harmonies. And this simplified the whole process of building their works to the utmost. Haydn manipulates the resources which lie within such limits to admiration. Hardly any composer so successfully made uniformity out of compounded diversity on a small scale. He delights in making the separate limbs of a subject of different lengths, and yet, out of their total sum, attaining a perfect and convincing symmetry. The harmonic progression of the subjects is uniformly obedient to the principles of a form which is on a preconceived plan, and without some such device the monotony of well-balanced phrases must soon have become wearisome. With regard to the actual distribution of the movements, Haydn does not depart from that already familiar in the works of earlier composers. Out of forty sonatas, comprising works for pianoforte alone, for pianoforte with accompaniment, and some adaptations, ten have only two movements, twenty-nine have three, and only one has four, this last comprising the only scherzando in the whole collection of one hundred and eleven movements. Nearly all the first movements are in binary form with an occasional rondo; the last is often a rondo, more often in binary form, and occasionally a theme and variations. In the sonatas which have more than two movements, at least twice as many retain the old adagio as those which have the characteristic minuet and trio; but as a set-off, several of the sonatas either conclude with a dance form, or a rondo, or set of variations in the 'Tempo di minuetto.'

The actual structure of the movements presents occasional peculiarities. In a few cases the pure old binary type, with repeat of first subject at the beginning of the second half, reappears. A considerable number are in the composite form, in which the first subject makes two distinct reappearances in full in the second half, as before described. The two halves of the movement are generally, but not invariably, repeated—the first half almost invariably; in fact, the absence of the double bar in the middle of the sonata in D major (No. 32 in Breitkopf & Härtel's edition) appears to be the only exception. The distribution of subjects in balancing keys appears to be absolutely without exception, as tonic and dominant, or tonic minor and relative major. Each movement has usually two distinct subjects, but occasionally, as is observable in Haydn's predecessors, the second is not strongly marked. In a few cases the same subject serves for both sections. There are a few examples of his anticipating Beethoven's usage of introducing clear accessory subjects to carry on the sections. Haydn illustrates forcibly the usefulness of defining the main division of the movement, not only by emphasising the harmonic formula of the cadence, but by appending to it a characteristic phrase or figure, the position of which, immediately before the full stop, renders it particularly easy to recognise. The purpose and fitness of this has been already discussed. Haydn's cadence-figures are generally peculiarly attractive, and seem to be made so of set purpose.

As a rule the outlines of his binary movements are more persistently regular than those of his rondos. Haydn was the first composer of mark to adopt the rondo with frequency in sonatas. It had existed in isolation and in suites for a long while, and examples there are in plenty by Couperin and other early Frenchmen, who were much given to it; and also by various members of the Bach family, including the great Johann Sebastian. But hundreds of sonatas, from the highest to the lowest grade, may be taken at random with a fair probability of not finding a single example. The influence of the opera may probably be here traced again, in the set tunes and dance types as significantly as in the general structure. However, though Haydn's kind of rondo is peculiarly familiar and characteristic, he does not make use of the form in his sonatas nearly so proportionately often as later composers do. The proportion in comparison with Mozart is almost as one to two. The value and appropriateness of this form is a matter of opinion. The greatest masters have used it frequently, and Beethoven with the profoundest effect. The usage of some other composers may be fairly described as obtrusively obvious, and it lends itself with greater readiness than any other plan of its scope to frivolity and commonplace. Haydn's subjects are often singularly slight, but his development of the form is almost always ingenious. Thus he varies his disposition of the episodes, so that sometimes the main subject and a single episodic subject alternate in different circumstances throughout; at other times they are disposed so as to resemble the recapitulation in binary form. In the returns of the main theme he always exercises some consideration. In hardly any case does he simply repeat the theme as it stands throughout; commonly each reappearance is a fresh variation. Occasionally the middle repeats are variations, and the first and last statements simple and identical; and sometimes variations of theme and episode alternate. In all such points his readiness and energy are apparent, and make his treatment of the form a model in its particular line.

The slow movements of all the composers of sonatas till Beethoven's time are rather artificial and inclined to pose, owing partly to the weakness and want of sustaining power in their instruments. They contain too little of the deep and liberal feeling which is necessary to make the highest impression, and too much decorative finger-play, corresponding no doubt to the roudades and vocal gymnastics for which operatic singers found such admirable opportunities in the slow beats of adagios. Haydn's management of such things is artistic, and he occasionally strikes upon an interesting subject, but hardly any of the movements approach to the qualities expected in the ideal slow movement of modern times.

His distribution of the keys of the movements is simple. In some of the earlier sonatas all three are in the same, or major and minor of the same key. In more mature examples he adopts the familiar antithesis of subdominant, which in later works preponderates so strongly. In one case he adopts a very unusual antithesis. This is in the largest and most elaborate of all the sonatas, of which the first and last movements are in E \flat , and the middle movement in E \natural .

One point requires notice in connexion with his violin sonatas, viz. that they are the very reverse of those of the great school of half a century earlier; for inasmuch as with them the violin was everything, with Haydn it was next to nothing. Except in obviously late sonatas it does little more than timidly accompany the pianoforte. It was in this manner that the violin, having departed grandly by the front door in the old style, crept back again into modern instrumental music by the back. But small as such beginnings were, Haydn's later and fuller examples are the ostensible starting-point of a class of music which in the 19th century has extended the domain of the solo sonata, by enlarging its effective scope, and obtaining a new province for experiment in the combination of other instruments with the pianoforte upon equal terms, and with equal respect to their several idiosyncrasies.

Johann Christian Bach, the youngest son of Johann Sebastian, was Haydn's contemporary and junior by three years. In his day he was considered an important composer for the pianoforte, and his style is held to have had some influence upon Mozart. (See MOZART, Vol. III. p. 539.) A sonata of his, in B \flat , op. 17, is fluent and easily written, but not particularly interesting, and thoroughly in the style of the latter part of the 18th century. It consists of three movements, all in binary form of the older type. Another sonata, in C minor, is, for the date, in very singular form; beginning with a slow movement, having a fugue in the middle, and ending with a 'Tempo di gavotta.' Its style is not strikingly massive, but there are many traits in it which show that his parentage was not entirely without influence. The fugue, though ably written, has too much of the hybrid effect common in such works, after the harmonic structural ideas had laid strong hold of men's minds, to be worthy of comparison with the genuine achievements of his father. The style of the work is broad, however, and some ideas and turns of expression may not unreasonably be taken to justify the influence attributed to him.

COMPARISON OF HAYDN AND MOZART.—The difference of age between Haydn and Mozart was twenty-four years, but in this interval there was less change in the form of the sonata than might be expected. It was, in fact, an almost stationary period, when the attainment of satisfactory structural principles by the labours of a century and more of composers left men time to pause and contemplate what appeared to them to be perfection; the rhythmic wave of progress poised almost balanced for a short time before the rush which brought about an unexpected culmination in Beethoven.

The difference between Haydn and Mozart is plainly neither in structure nor altogether in style of thought and expression, but in advantages of temporal position. Haydn began nearer to the time of struggle and uncertainty. He found much ready to his hand, and he tested it and applied it and improved it; and when Mozart came there was little to do but adapt his supreme gifts of fluency, clearness and beauty of melody to glorify the edifice.

The progression of artistic instinct is at present an unexplained phenomenon; it can only be judged from observation that the children of a later generation are born with a predisposed facility to realise in perfect clearness the forms which preceding generations have been wanderingly and dimly striving after. It is possible that the affinity between genuine music and the mental conditions of the race is so close that the progress of the latter carries the former with it as part of the same organic development. At all events, Mozart was gifted with an extraordinary and hitherto unsurpassed instinct for formal perfection, and his highest achievements lie not more in the tunes which have so captivated the world, than in the perfect symmetry of his best works. Like Haydn's his ideas are naturally restricted within limits which simplify to the utmost the development of the form which follows from them. They move in such perfect obedience to the limits and outlines of the harmonic progressions which most certainly characterise the key, that the structural system becomes architecturally patent and recognisable to all listeners that have any understanding. In his time these formal outlines were fresh enough to bear a great deal of use without losing their sweetness; and Mozart used them with remarkable regularity. Out of thirty-six of his best-known sonatas, twenty-nine are in the now familiar order of three movements, and no less than thirty-three have the first movement in binary form. That binary form is moreover so regular, that the same pauses and the same successions of harmony, and the same occurrences of various kinds, may often be safely anticipated at the same point in the progress of the movements. He makes some use, often conspicuously, of the device of repeating short phrases consecutively, which has already been described in connexion with Scarlatti's work. Thus in a sonata in D major for violin and pianoforte, the first section of the first movement may be divided into seven distinct passages, each of which is severally repeated in some form or other consecutively. There are some peculiarities, such as the introduction of a new subject in the working-out portion of the work, instead of keeping consistently to development of the principal ideas; and the filling of the episodes of a rondo with a variety of different ideas, severally distinct; but as these points are not the precursors of further development, they are hardly worth discussing. It only requires to be pointed out that occasionally in pianoforte and other sonatas he makes experiments in novel distribution and entirely original manipulation of the structural elements of binary and other forms; which is sufficient to prove not only that he recognised the fitness of other outlines besides those that he generally adopted, but that he was capable of adapting himself to novel situations, if there had been any call for effort in that direction. As it happened, the circumstances both of musical and social life were unique, and he was enabled to satisfy the highest critical taste of his day without the effort of finding a new point of departure.

His treatment of rondo-form is different, and less elementary than Haydn's. Haydn most commonly used a very decisively sectional system, in which every characteristic portion, especially the theme, was marked off distinct and complete. This accorded with the primitive idea of rondos as exemplified, often very happily, in the works of early French composers, and in certain forms of vocal music. The root-idea appears in the most elementary stages of musical intelligence as a distinct verse or tune which forms the staple of the whole matter, and is, for the sake of contrast, interspersed with digressions of subordinate interest. It is so obvious a means of arriving at something like structural balance, that it probably existed in times even before the earliest of which evidence remains. In the earliest specimens to be found in sonatas, the traces of their kinship can be clearly followed. Reference has been already made to the two examples in the sonatas by Paradise, which consist of an aria, a contrasting passage, and then the aria pure and simple again, and so forth. Haydn adopted the general outline. He frequently begins with a complete theme systematically set out with double bars and repeats, and a full conclusion. He then begins something entirely different either in a new related key, or in the minor of the principal key, and makes a complete whole of that also, and so on right through, alternating his main tune with one or more others, all equally complete. Under such circumstances his principle of giving variations at each return of the theme or repetition of an episode is almost indispensable to avoid monotony. Mozart rarely makes any point of this plan of adopting variations in his sonata-rondos, because it is not required. He does not often cast his theme in such extremely distinct outlines. In structure it is more what an ordinary binary subject would be; that is, complete and distinct in itself as an idea, without being so carried out as to make its connexion with the rest of the movement a matter of secondary rather than intrinsic consequence. Haydn's conception is perfectly just and rational, but Mozart's is more mature. The theme and its episodes are more closely interwoven, and the development of the whole has a more consistent and uniform texture. Mozart does not avoid varying his theme; on the contrary, he constantly puts in the most delicate strokes of detail and of graceful adornment, and sometimes resorts to delightfully ready development of its resources; but with him it is not so indispensable, because his conception of the form gives it so much more freedom and elasticity.

The central movement of his three-movement sonatas is almost invariably a slow one, commonly in the key of the subdominant. The style of these is characteristic of the time; that is, rather artificial and full of graces,¹ which require to be given with a somewhat conscious elegance of manner, not altogether consonant with the spirit of later times. They rarely touch the point of feeling expected in modern movements of the kind, because the conception formed of the proper function of the slow movement in his time was clearly alien to that of the 18th century. As specimens of elegance and taste, however, Mozart's examples probably attain the highest point possible in their particular genus.

The technique of his sonatas, from the point of view of instrumental resource, is richer and fuller than Haydn's, but still thin and rather empty in sound to ears that are accustomed to the wonderful development of the resources of the modern pianoforte; but the refinement and self-containment of his style make him particularly acceptable to artists who idealise finish and elegance in solo performance, and nicety of ensemble in works for combined instruments, as the highest and most indispensable condition of art. His instinct for adapting his thoughts to instrumental idiosyncrasies was of a very high order when the instruments were familiar and properly developed. This with the pianoforte was not yet achieved, and consequently some of his forms of expression are hardly adapted to its nature, and seem in these days to be rather compromises than perfectly suitable utterances.

INFLUENCE OF PIANO TECHNIQUE ON FORM.—With regard to the technical matter of the development of the resources of the pianoforte, Mozart's contemporary, Muzio Clementi, occupies a most important position. Clementi, in his early days, according to his own admission, applied himself rather to the development of the resources of playing than to the matter to be played, and attained a degree and a kind of mastery of which no one before his time had heard the like. When he began to apply himself more to the matter, this study served him in good stead; and his divination of the treatment most appropriate to the instrument, expanded by this means in practical application, marks his sonatas as among the very first in which the genuine qualities of modern pianoforte music on a large scale are shown. They begin to approach to that broad and almost orchestral style which is sometimes said to be characteristic of Beethoven; and the use of octaves and fuller combinations of sounds, and the occasional irruption of passages which bring into play stronger muscles than those of the fingers, are all in the direction of modern usage. In respect of structure, it is not necessary to consider more than that he commonly accepted the three-movement type of sonata, beginning with a movement in binary form and ending with a rondo, and having a slow movement in the middle. His handling is free and at the same time thoroughly under control. One of his characteristics is the love of importing little touches of learning or scientific ingenuity into the treatment; as in the sonata in G (of four movements) in which two canons in direct and contrary motion take the place of the minuet and trio. In another sonata, in F, one figure is woven through the whole substance of the first movement, appearing in the different sections diminished and inverted, and in various phases of expression which quite alter its aspect. His slow movements are sometimes equally simple and expressive, but also frequently of that ornamental order which has been sufficiently commented on.

In one celebrated case he anticipated the modern taste for programme by calling one of his longest and most pretentious sonatas 'Didone abbandonata. Scena tragica.' But appearance of dramatic purpose does not turn him aside from regularity of form any more than in other sonatas. His style is not exempt from the family likeness which is observable in all composers of the latter part of the century. His ideas are large and broad, and not unworthy to have exerted some influence upon both Mozart and Beethoven. A certain dryness and reticence makes him unlikely to be greatly in favour in modern times, but his place as an important figure in the development of the sonata in its relation with the pianoforte is assured.

One further composer who deserves some consideration in connexion with the sonata before Beethoven's time is J. L. Dussek, who was born ten years after Clementi, and soon after Mozart. His most noteworthy characteristics are an individual, though not incisive style, and an instinct of a high order for the qualities and requirements of the pianoforte. There is some diversity in point of value between his early and his later sonatas. The former are rather narrow in idea and structure, whereas the latter, such as op. 70 in A♭, are quite remarkable for freedom and elaboration of form and subject. Both in this sonata and in the op. 77 he makes use of the hitherto almost unknown device of extending the effect of the first sections by subordinate transitions as well as by accessory subjects. In the first movement of op. 70 there is the unusual feature of a happy modulation out and back again in the actual substance of the second subject—a characteristic which is common enough in the works of Schumann and Brahms, but was exceedingly rare in Dussek's time. Another characteristic which Dussek has in common with more modern writers is the infusion of a certain amount of sense and sentiment even into his passages and flourishes, which with his immediate predecessors had been too commonly barren. He also takes thought to enliven his recapitulations by variation or ingeniously diversified transposition of order in the ideas (as in op. 77). His writing for the instrument is brilliant and sparkling, and has certain premonitions of Weber in it. The ideas are sometimes, even in his best works, trite and vapid, but more often delicate and attractive. The slow movements have a sustained and serious manner, also unusual in his time, and said to be derived from his having studied the organ considerably in his younger days. He stands historically with giants on either hand, and this has contributed to make him appear somewhat of a parenthesis in the direct course of sonata development. Their vastness of artistic proportion did not, however, suppress his personality, or extinguish his individuality, which is still clear in his own line, and has exerted some influence both upon the modern style of playing and also upon the style of musical thought of a few modern composers for the pianoforte to whom the giants did not strongly appeal.

BEETHOVEN AND THE 'IDEA.'—The direct line of development after Haydn, Mozart and Clementi is obviously continued in Beethoven. As we have pointed out, the changes which took place after Emanuel Bach's labours were less rapid and remarkable than in times preceding. The finishing touches had been put to the structural system, and men were so delighted with its perfection as structure, that they were content to hear it repeated over and over again without calling for variety or individuality in the treatment, and very often without caring much about the quality of the thing said. The other side of development was technical. The pianoforte being a new instrument, the manner of musical speech best adapted to it had to be discovered. With the earlier composers forms of expression better suited to other instruments were adopted; but by degrees experiments in effect and assiduous attention to the capabilities of the hand, such as Clementi gave in his early years, had brought the mechanism of expression to a tolerably consistent and complete state; so that when Beethoven appeared he was spared the waste of force incident to having to overcome elementary problems of instrumental technique, and the waste of effect incidental to compromises, and was enabled to concentrate all his powers upon the musical material.

Beethoven's works introduce a new element into the problem, and one that complicates matters immeasurably. With his predecessors structural simplicity had been a paramount consideration, and often straitened somewhat the freedom of the idea. The actual subjects seem drilled into a regular shape, admitting of very little variation, in order that the development of the movement might march direct and undeviating in its familiar course. Musicians had arrived at that artificial state of mind which deliberately chose to be conscious of formal elements. Their misconception was a natural one. The existing conditions of art might lead a man to notice that uncultivated people delighted in simple and single tunes, and that cultivated people enjoyed the combination of several, when disposed according to certain laws, and to conclude from this that the disposition was of more importance than the matter. But, in fact, the mind is led from point to point by feelings which follow the ideas, and of these and their interdependence and development it is necessarily conscious; but of the form it is not actively conscious unless the ideas have not sufficient force to possess it, or the necessities of logical consequence are outrageously violated. It is only under peculiar social and intellectual conditions that structural qualities can be so excessively emphasised. The production of a genuine master must be ultimately reducible to logical analysis, but not on the spot or at once; and to insist upon art being so immediately verifiable is not only to set the conclusion to be drawn from its historical development upside down, but to refer the enjoyment of its highest achievements to the contemplation of dry bones. The imagination and the reason must both be satisfied, but before all things the imagination.

In the middle years of the 18th century the imaginative side had not a fair chance. Music was too much dependent upon the narrow limits of the taste of polite circles, and the field of appeal to emotion was not free. But when at last the natural man threw off the incubus that had so long oppressed him, the spiritual uprising and the broadening of life brought a new kind of vigour into art and literature. Beethoven was the first great composer to whom the limitless field of unconventionalised human emotion was opened, and his disposition was ready for the opportunity. Even in the ordinary trifles of life he sometimes showed by an apparently superfluous rebellion against polite usages his antipathy to artificiality, and conversely the bent of his sympathy towards unmistakable realities of human feeling. He thus became the prototype of genuine modern music, and the first exponent of its essential qualities; and the sonata form being ready in its main outlines for his use, and artistic instinct having achieved the most perfect spontaneity in its employment, he took possession of it as an appropriate mode of formulating some of the richest and most impressive of his thoughts. With him the idea asserted its rights. This is not to say that structure is ignored, but that the utmost expansion and liberty is admitted in the expression of the vital parts which can be made consistent with perfect balance in the unfolding of the whole; and this obviously depends upon the powers of the composer. Under such circumstances he can only be guided by the highest development of instinct, for the process of balance and distribution becomes so complicated that it is almost out of the reach of conscious analysis, much more of the dictation of science.

The evolution of this vital ingredient, the idea, is so obscure and difficult that it is out of the question to enter upon it in this place. It is an unhappy fact that the scientists who have endeavoured to elucidate music, with a few great and honourable exceptions, foreseeing that the analysis of ideas was quite beyond their reach, at all events until immense advances are made in the sciences which have direct reference to the human organism, have set their faces to the structural elements, as if music consisted of nothing but lines and surfaces. The existence of idea is so habitually ignored that it necessarily appears to be non-existent in their estimate of art. On the other hand, the philosophers who have said anything about it appear on the surface not to be in accord; though in reality their views are both compatible and necessary, but require a more detailed experience of the art and of its historical development to explain their interaction. But meanwhile the external method of the scientists gains disproportionate pre-eminence, and conscientious people feel uneasily that there may be no such things as ideas at all, and that they will be doing better to apply themselves to mathematics. And yet the idea is everything, and without it music is absolutely null and void; and though a great and comprehensive mathematician may make an analysis after the event, a synthesis which is merely the fruit of his calculations will be nothing more than a sham and an imposture. In fact, the formulation of the idea is a most vital matter in musical history, and its progress can be traced from the earliest times, proceeding simultaneously with the development of the general structure of the sonata. The expressive raw material was drawn from various sources. The style of expression developed under the influences of religion in the ages preceding the beginnings of instrumental music supplied something; dance music of all orders, mimetic and merely rhythmic, supplied much; the pseudo-realism of the drama, in respect of vocal inflexion and imitations of natural circumstances, also something; and the instincts surviving in the race from countless past ages, the actual cries arising from spontaneous nervous reaction, and many other similar causes, had a share in suggestion, and in actual, though unrealised, motive power. And all these, compounded and inseparably intermingled, supplied the basis of the expressive element in music. Through all the time from Monteverdi to Beethoven this expressive element was being more and more clearly drawn into compact and definite proportions; floating at first vaguely on the surface, springing out in flashes of exceptional brightness here and there, and at times presenting almost perfect maturity by fits of individual good fortune; but hardly ever so free but that some of the matrix is felt to be clinging to the ore. It obtained complete but restricted symmetry with the composers immediately preceding Beethoven, but arrived only at last with him at that expansion which made it at once perfect and intelligible, and yet boundless in range within the limits of the art-material at the composer's command.

Before Beethoven, the development of a long work was based upon antitheses of distinct tunes and concrete lumps of subject representing separate organisms, either merely in juxtaposition, or loosely connected by more or less empty passages. There were ideas indeed, but ideas limited and confined by the supposed necessities of the structure of which they formed a part. But what Beethoven seems to have aimed at was the expansion of the term 'idea' from the isolated subject to the complete whole; so that instead of the subjects being separate, though compatible items, the whole movement, or even the whole work, should be the complete and uniform organism which represented in its entirety a new meaning of the word 'idea,' of which the subjects, in their close connexion and inseparable affinities, were subordinate limbs. This principle is traceable in works before his time, but not on the scale to which he carried it, nor with his conclusive force. In fact, the condition of art had not been sufficiently mature to admit the terms of his procedure, and it was barely mature enough till he made it so.

His early works were in conformity with the style and structural principles of his predecessors; but he began, at least in pianoforte works, to build at once upon the topmost stone of their edifice. His earliest sonatas (op. 2) are on the scale of their symphonies. He began with the four-movement plan which they had almost entirely reserved for the orchestra. In the second sonata he already produces an example of his own peculiar kind of slow movement, full, rich, decisive in form, unaffected in ideas, and completely divested of the elaborate graces which had been before its most conspicuous feature. In the same sonata also he produces a scherzo, short in this instance, and following the lines of the minuet, but of the genuine characteristic quality. Soon, in obedience to the spread of his idea, the capacity of the instrument seems to expand, and to attain an altogether new richness of sound, and a fullness it never showed before, as in many parts of the fourth sonata (op. 7), especially the largo, which shows the unmistakable qualities which ultimately expanded into the unsurpassed slow movement of the opus 106. As early as the second sonata he puts a new aspect upon the limits of the first sections; he not only makes his second subject in the first movement modulate, but he develops the cadence-figure into a very noticeable subject. It is fortunately unnecessary to follow in detail the various ways in which he expanded the structural elements of the sonata, as it has already been described in the article BEETHOVEN, and other details are given in the article FORM. In respect of the subject and its treatment, a fortunate opportunity is offered by a coincidence between a subordinate subject in a sonata of Haydn in C and a similar accessory in Beethoven's sonata for violoncello and pianoforte in A major (op. 69), which serves to illustrate pregnantly the difference of scope which characterises their respective treatment. Haydn's is as follows:

etc.

and Beethoven's:

As has been already explained, an expansion of this kind makes inevitable a similar expansion in the whole structure of the movement, and a much wider choice of relative keys than simple tonic and dominant in the expository sections; or else a much freer movement in every part of the sections, and emphasis upon unexpected relations of harmony. Even without this, the new warmth and intensity of the subject precludes mere reiteration of the accustomed usages, and necessitates a greater proportionate vitality in the subordinate parts of the work. The relative heat must be maintained, and to fall back upon familiar formulas would clearly be a jarring anomaly. In this manner the idea begins to dictate the form.

But in order to carry out in equal measure the development of the idea, every resource that the range of music can supply must be admissible to him that can wield it with relevance. Hence Beethoven, as early as op. 31, No. 2, reintroduces instrumental recitative with extraordinary effect. Later, he resumes the rhapsodical movement which Bach and earlier composers had employed in a different sense, as in the sonata in E♭, op. 81, and in the third division of that in A, op. 101, and in the most romantic of romantic movements, the first in E major of op. 109. And lastly, he brings back the fugue as the closest means of expressing a certain kind of idea. In these cases the fugue is not a retrogression, nor a hybrid, but a new adaptation of an old and invaluable form under the influence of perfectly assimilated harmonic principles. The great fugue in the sonata in B♭, op. 106, for instance, is not only extraordinary as a fugue but is distributed in a perfectly ideal balance of long contrasting periods in different states of feeling, culminating duly with a supreme rush of elaborate force, as complex and as inexorable as some mighty action of nature. In these sonatas Beethoven touches all moods, and all in the absolute manner, free from formality or crude artifice, which is the essential characteristic of genuine modern music. In a few of the earlier sonatas he reverts to manners and structural effects which are suggestive of the principles of his predecessors. But these occasional incursions of external influence are with rare exceptions inferior to the works in which his own original force of will speaks with genuine and characteristic freedom. The more difficult the problem suggested by the thought which is embodied in the subject, the greater is the result. The full richness of his nature is not called out to the strongest point till there is something preternaturally formidable to be mastered. The very statement of the opening bars of such sonatas as that in D minor, op. 31, No. 2; C major, op. 53; F minor, op. 57; B \flat , op. 106; C minor, op. 111, is at such a level of daring breadth and comprehensive power that it becomes obvious in a moment that the work cannot be carried out on equal proportionate terms without almost superhuman concentration, and unlimited command of technical resources, both in respect of the instrument and the art of expression. In such cases, Beethoven rises to a height which has only been attained by two or three composers in the whole history of music, in that sublimity which is almost his peculiar monopoly.

But, fortunately for average beings and average moods of people who have not always a taste for the sublime, he shows elsewhere, on a less exalted scale, the highest ideals of delicate beauty and all shades of the humours of mankind, even to simple exuberant playfulness. The beauty and the merriment often exist side by side, as in the exquisite little sonata in G, op. 14, No. 2, and in that in F \sharp major, op. 78; and in a loftier and stronger spirit, in company with more comprehensive ranges of feeling, in the sonata in A, op. 101. In all these and many more there is an ideal continuity and oneness which is musically felt even where there is no direct external sign of the connexion. In a few, however, there are signs of more than this. In the B \flat sonata, op. 106, for instance, the similar disposition of intervals in the subjects of the various movements has led to the inference that he meant to connect them by transformations of one principal subject or germ. The same occurs with as much prominence in the sonata in A \flat , op. 110, which is in any case a specimen where the oneness and continuity are peculiarly felt. It is possible that the apparent transformations are not so much conscious as the result of the conditions of mind which were necessary to produce the oneness of effect, since concentration upon any subject is liable to exert influence upon closely succeeding action, whether of the mind or body, and to assimilate the fruit unconsciously to the form of the subject contemplated. This, however, would not lessen the interest of the fact, but would possibly rather enhance it. It only affects the question whether or no Beethoven consciously reasoned about possible ways of extending and enhancing the opportunities of sonata-form—too large a subject to be entered upon here. As a rule, great masters appear to hit upon such germinal principles in the process of composition, without exactly formulating them in so many equivalent terms; and those who come after note the facts and apply them as useful resources or sometimes as invaluable starting-points of fresh lines of development.

It is a noticeable fact that Beethoven only seldom indicated a programme, and it is extremely rare in him to find even the dimmest suggestions of realism. In fact, as must be true of all the highest music, a work of his is not representative of a story, but of a mental process. Even if it deals with a story it does not represent the circumstances, but the condition of mind which results from its contemplation; or, in other words, the musical counterpart of the emotion to which it gives rise; and it is the coherency and consistent sequence of the emotions represented which produce the effect of oneness on the colossal scale of his greatest works which is Beethoven's crowning achievement. With him the long process of development appears to find its utmost and complete culmination; and what comes after, and in sight of his work, can be little more than commentary. It may be seen, without much effort, that mankind does not achieve more than one supreme triumph on the same lines of art. When the conditions of development are fulfilled the climax is reached, but there is not more than one climax to each crescendo. The conditions of human life change ceaselessly, and with them the phenomena of art, which are their counterpart. The characteristics of the art of any age are the fruit of the immediate past as much as are the emotional and intellectual conditions of that age. They are its signs, and it is impossible to produce in a succeeding age a perfect work of art in the same terms as those which are the direct fruit of a different and earlier group of causes; and it is partly for this reason that attempts to return to earlier conditions of art which leave out the essential characteristics of contemporary feeling invariably ring false.

BEETHOVEN'S CONTEMPORARIES.—The time produced other real men besides Beethoven, though not of his stamp. Weber and Schubert were both of the genuine modern type, genuinely musical through and through, though neither of them was a born writer of sonatas as Beethoven was. Beethoven possessed, together with the supremest gift of ideas, a power of prolonged concentration and the certainty of self-mastery. This neither Weber nor Schubert possessed. Beethoven could direct his thought with infallible certainty; in Weber and Schubert the thought was often too much their master, and they both required, to keep them perfectly certain in the direction of their original musical matter, the guiding principle of a consciously realised dramatic or lyrical conception, which was generally supplied to them from without.

As should be obvious from the above survey of the process of sonata development, the absolute mastery of the structural outlines, the sureness of foot of the strong man moving, unaided but direct in his path, amidst the conflicting suggestions of his inspiration, is indispensable to the achievement of great and genuine sonatas. The more elaborate the art of expression becomes, the more difficult the success. Beethoven probably stood just at the point where the extremest elaboration and the most perfect mastery of combination on a large scale were possible. He himself supplied suggestion for yet further elaboration, and the result is that the works of his successors are neither so concentrated nor so well in hand as his. Weber was nearest in point of time, but his actual mastery of the art of composition was never very certain nor thoroughly regulated, though his musical instincts were almost marvellous. He had one great advantage, which was that he was a great pianist, and had the gift to extend the resources of the instrument by the invention of new and characteristic effects; and he was tolerably successful in avoiding the common trap of letting effect stand for substance. Another advantage was his supreme gift of melody. His tunes are for the most part of the old order, but infused with new life and heat by a breath from the genius of the people. His two best sonatas, in A \flat and D minor, are rich in thought, forcible, and genuinely full of expression. He always adopts the plan of four movements, and disposes them in the same order as Beethoven did. His treatment of form is also full and free, and he often imports some individuality into it. As simple instances may be taken—the use of the introductory phrase in the first movement of the sonata in C, in the body of the movement; the rondo structure of the slow movements, especially in the sonata in D minor, which has a short introduction, and elaborate variations in the place of exact returns of the subject; and the interspersing of subjects in the first movement of the sonata in E minor, op. 70, so as to knit the two sections of the first half doubly together. An essentially modern trait is his love of completing the cycle of the movement by bringing in a last allusion to the opening features of the whole movement at the end, generally with some new element of expression or vivacity. Specially noticeable in this respect are the first and last (the 'Moto perpetuo') of the C major, the last of the A \flat , and the first and last in both the D minor and E minor sonatas. Weber had an exceptional instinct for dance-rhythms, and this comes out very remarkably in some of the minuets and trios, and in the last movement of the E minor.

As a whole the Weber group is a decidedly important item in pianoforte literature, instinct with romantic qualities, and aiming at elaborate expressiveness, as is illustrated by the numerous directions in the A \flat sonata, such as 'con anima,' 'con duolo,' 'con passione,' 'con molt' affetto,' and so forth. These savour to a certain extent of the opera, and require a good deal of art and musical sense in the variation of time and the phrasing to give them due effect; and in this they show some kinship to the ornamental adagios of the times previous to Beethoven, though dictated by more genuinely musical feelings.

Schubert's sonatas do not show any operative traits of the old manner, but there is plenty in them which may be called dramatic in a modern sense. His instincts were of a pre-eminently modern type, and the fertility of his ideas in their superabundance clearly made the self-restraint necessary for sonata-writing a matter of some difficulty. He was tempted to give liberty to the rush of thought which possessed him, and the result is sometimes delightful, but sometimes also bewildering. There are movements and even groups of them which are of the supremest beauty, but hardly any one sonata which is completely satisfactory throughout. His treatment of form is often daring, even to rashness, and yet from the point of view of principle offers but little to remark, though in detail some perfectly magical feats of harmonic progression and strokes of modulation have had a good deal of influence upon great composers of later times. The point which he serves to illustrate peculiarly in the history of music is the transition from the use of the idea, as shown in Beethoven's sonatas, on a grand and richly developed scale to the close and intensely emotional treatment of ideas in a lyrical manner which has since found its highest exponent in Schumann. In this process Schubert seems to stand midway—still endeavouring to conform to sonata ways, and yet frequently overborne by the invincible potency of the powers his own imagination has called up. The tendency is further illustrated by the exquisite beauty of some of the smaller and more condensed movements, which lose nothing by being taken out of the sonatas; being, like many of Schumann's specimens of intense concentration in short space, the fruit of a single flash of deep emotion. Among the longer movements, the one which is most closely unified is the first of the A minor, op. 143, in which a feature of the first subject is made to preponderate conspicuously all through, manifestly representing the persistence of a special quality of feeling through the varying phases of a long train of thought. Like many other movements, it has a strong dramatic element, but more under appropriate control than usual.

As a whole, though illustrating richly many of the tendencies of modern music, the sonatas cannot be taken as representing Schubert's powers as a composer of instrumental music so satisfactorily as his quartets, his string quintet, and his finest symphonies. In these he often rose almost to the highest point of musical possibility. And this serves further to illustrate the fact that since Beethoven the tendency has been to treat the sonata-form with the fresh opportunities afforded by combinations of instruments, rather than on the old lines of the solo sonata.

Two other composers of sonatas of Beethoven's time require notice. These are Woelfl and Hummel. The former chiefly on account of his once celebrated sonata called 'Ne plus ultra,' in which he showed some of the devices of technique which he was considered to have invented—such as passages in thirds and sixths, and ingenious applications of the shake. The matter is poor and vapid, and as throwing light upon anything except his powers as a player, is worthless. Its very title condemns it, for Woelfl had the advantage of being Beethoven's junior; and it is astonishing how, by the side of the genuine difficulty of Beethoven's masterpieces, such a collection of tricks could ever have been dignified even by the supposition of being particularly difficult. It seems impossible that such work would have had any influence upon genuinely musical people; but the sonata has all the signs of a useful piece for second-rate popular occasions; for which the variations on 'Life let us cherish' would doubtless be particularly effective.

Hummel in comparison with Woelfl was a giant, and certainly had pre-eminent gifts as a pianoforte-player. Like Weber he had an aptitude for inventing effects and passages, but he applied them in a different manner. He was of that nature which cultivates the whole technical art of speech till able to treat it with a certainty which has all the effect of mastery, and then, instead of using it to say something, makes it chiefly serviceable to show off the contents of his finger repertory. However, his technique is large and broad, full of sound and brilliancy, and when the works were first produced and played by himself they must have been extremely astonishing. His facility of speech is also wonderful, but his ideas were for the most part old-fashioned even when he produced them—for it must not be forgotten that he was eight years younger than Beethoven and twenty-six younger than Clementi. The spirit which seems to rule him is the consciousness of a pianist before an audience, guided by the chances of display. His modulations are free and bold, but they are often superfluous, because the ideas are not on the level of intensity or broad freedom which necessitates or even justifies them. He probably saw that modulation was a means of effect, but did not realise that there is a ratio between the qualities of subject and the development of the movement that springs from it. From this it will be obvious that his sonatas are not written in the mood to produce works that are musically important. He had the very finest possible opportunities through living in Mozart's house during his most impressionable days, and the fruit is sufficiently noticeable in the clearness with which he distributes his structural elements and in much of his manner of expressing himself; but he had not the inventive gift for musical ideas, which contact and even familiar intercourse with great masters seems inadequate to supply. The survival of traits characteristic of earlier times is illustrated by some of his slow movements, in which he brought the most elaborate forces of his finished technique to serve in the old style of artificial adagio, where there is a hyper-elaborated grace at every corner and a shake upon every note that is long enough; and if a chord be suitable to rest upon for a little, it is adorned with quite a collection of ingenious finger exercises, artificially manipulated scales and arpeggios, and the like contrivances; which do not serve to decorate anything worthy of the honour, but stand of their own merits. There are occasional traits of expression and strokes of force in the sonatas, but the technique of the pianist preponderates excessively over the invention of the composer. At the same time the right and masterly use of the resources of an instrument is not by any means a matter of small moment in art, and Hummel's is right and masterly in a very remarkable degree.

CHOPIN'S CHARACTERISTICS.—After the early years of the 19th century, the sonata, in its conventional sense of instrumental work for a solo or at most for two instruments, occupies a smaller and decreasing space in the domain of music. Great composers have paid it proportionately very little attention, and the few examples they afford have rather an effect of being out of the direct line of their natural mode of expression. In Chopin, for instance, the characteristic qualities of modern music, in the treatment of ideas in short and malleable forms specially adapted to their expression, are found abundantly, and in these his genuine qualities are most clearly displayed. His sonatas are less successful, because, though quite master enough to deal with structure clearly and definitely, it was almost impossible for him to force the ideas within the limits which should make that structure relevant and convincing. They are children of a fervid and impetuous genius, and the classical dress and manners do not sit easily upon them. Moreover, the luxuriant fancy, the richness and high colour of expression, the sensuous qualities of the harmony, all tend to emphasise detail in a new and peculiar manner, and to make the sonata-principle of the old order appear irrelevant. The most successful are the sonatas in B \flat minor for pianoforte, op. 35, and that for pianoforte and violoncello in G minor, op. 65. In both these cases the first movements, which are generally a sure test of a capacity for sonata writing, are clearly disposed, and free from superfluous wandering and from tautology. There are certain idiosyncrasies in the treatment of the form, as for instance in the recapitulation, which in both cases is almost limited to the materials of the second section, the opening features of the movement being only hinted at in conclusion. The subjects themselves are fairly appropriate to the style of movement, and are kept well in hand, so that on the whole, in these two cases, the impression conveyed is consistent with the sonata-character. In scherzos Chopin was thoroughly at home, and, moreover, they represent a province in which far more abandonment is admissible. In both sonatas they are successful, but that in the pianoforte sonata is especially fascinating and characteristic, and though the modulations are sometimes rather reckless the main divisions are well proportioned, and consequently the general effect of the outlines is sufficiently clear. The slow movements of both are very well known; that of the pianoforte sonata being the Funeral March, and the other being a kind of romance in Chopin's own free manner, which is familiar to players on the violoncello. The last movement of the pianoforte sonata is a short but characteristic outbreak of whirling notes, in general character not unlike some of his preludes, and equally free and original in point of form, but in that respect not without precedent among the last movements of early masters. In the mind of the composer it possibly had a poetical connexion with the Funeral March. The other last movement is a free kind of rondo, and therefore more consonant with the ordinary principles of form, and is appropriate, without being so interesting as the other movements. The total effect of these sonatas is naturally of an entirely different order from that of the earlier types, and not so convincing in oneness as the works of great masters of this kind of form; they are nevertheless plausible as wholes and in details most effective; the balance and appropriate treatment of the two instruments in the op. 65 being especially noteworthy. The other sonatas for pianoforte, in C minor and B minor, are more unequal. The first appears to be an early work, and contains some remarkable experiments, one of which at least has value, others probably not. As examples may be mentioned the use of 5-4 time throughout the slow movement, and the experiment of beginning the recapitulation of the first movement in B \flat minor, when the principal key is C minor. In this sonata he seems not to move with sufficient ease, and in the B minor, op. 58, with something too much to have the general aspect of a successful work of the kind. The technical devices in the latter as in the others are extremely elaborate and effective, without being offensively obtrusive, and the ideas are often clear and fascinating; but as a complete and convincing work it is hardly successful.

Sonatas which followed implicitly the old lines without doing more than formulate subjects according to supposed laws do not require any notice. The mere artificial reproduction of forms that have been consciously realised from observation of great works of the past without importing anything original into the treatment, is often the most hopeless kind of plagiarism, and far more deliberate than the accidents of coincidence in ideas which are obvious to superficial observers.

MENDELSSOHN'S ORGAN SONATAS.—As examples of independent thought working in a comparatively untried field, Mendelssohn's six sonatas for the organ have some importance. They have very little connexion with the pianoforte sonata, or the history of its development; for Mendelssohn seems to have divined that the binary and similar instrumental forms of large scope were unsuitable to the genius of the instrument, and returned to structural principles of a date before those forms had become prominent or definite. Their chief connexion with the modern sonata type lies in the distribution of the keys in which the several movements stand, and the broad contrasts in time and character which subsist between one division or movement and another. Different members of the group represent different methods of dealing with the problem. In the large movements fugal and contrapuntal principles predominate, sometimes alternating with passages of a decidedly harmonic character. In movements which are not absolute fugues the broad outlines of form are commonly similar to those already described as exemplified in Bach's sonatas, and in the first and last movements of his Italian concerto. This form in its broadest significance amounts to a correspondence of well-defined sections at the beginning and end, with a long passage of 'free fantasia,' sometimes fugally developed, in the middle. The clearest example in these sonatas is the first movement of the third sonata, in A major, in which the corresponding divisions at either end are long, and strongly contrasted, in the modern quality and more simultaneous motion of the parts, with the elaborate fugal structure of the middle division. In the last movement of the sonata in B \flat the corresponding sections are very short, but the effect is structurally satisfying and clear. In no case is the structural system of keys used with anything approaching the clearness of a pianoforte sonata. Material is contrasted with material, sometimes simply as subjects or figures, sometimes even in respect of style; as a Choral with recitative, Choral with fugal passages, or harmonic passages with contrapuntal passages. Sometimes these are kept distinct, and sometimes, as in the first movement of the sonata in B \flat , they are combined together at the end. The general laying out of the complete works, though based on the same broadest radical principles, is in actual order and manner quite distinct from that of pianoforte sonatas. The longer movements alternate with very short ones, which commonly resemble romances, Lieder ohne Worte, or such expressive lyrical types; and occasionally the whole sonata concludes with a little movement of this sort, as No. 3 in A and No. 6 in D. They are generally in the simplest kind of primary form with a proportionately important coda. In point of actual style and treatment of the instrument there is a great diversity in different sonatas. In some the solid old contrapuntal style predominates in similar proportion to that in the organ preludes, sonatas, etc., of Bach; but this rarely occurs without some intermixture of modern traits. The most completely and consistently modern in style is the sonata in D major, No. 5, which is practically in three divisions. The first is a Choral, the second a kind of 'song without words' in B minor, and the third a species of fantasia, in which the sections are balanced by distinct figures, without more tonal structure than emphasis upon the principal key at the beginning and end, and variety of modulation with some thematic development in the middle. In other sonatas different modes of writing for the instrument are used as a means of enforcing the contrast between one movement and another. Thus in the second sonata the first division is a kind of prelude in a modern manner, chiefly homophonic and orchestral; the second corresponds to a distinct romance or 'song without words' with clearly defined melody and graceful and constantly flowing independent accompaniment. In the third movement, which though in 3-4 time has something of a march quality, the modern harmonic character is very prominent, and the last movement is a fugue. Similar distribution of styles and modes of writing are as clearly used in the first and fourth sonatas; in the former more elaborately.

THE LATER ROMANTICISTS.—Among attempts to add something genuine to the literature of the pianoforte sonata, that in F \sharp minor, op. 11, by Schumann, first published under the pseudonym of Florestan and Eusebius, is most interesting. This was clearly an attempt to adapt to the sonata-form the so-called romantic ideas of which Schumann was so prominent and successful a representative.

The outward aspect of the matter is twofold. First, the absolute subordination of the sectional distribution to the ideas contained, and, secondly, the interchange of the subject-matter so as to connect the movements absolutely as well as intrinsically. The first point is illustrated by the continuity of the allegro vivace and the constant shifting and swaying of modulation and changing of tempo; also by the variety of the subjects and the apparently irregular manner of their introduction, if judged from the point of view of the older sonatas. Thus the part which corresponds to the first section comprises a first subject, containing a figure which may be called the text of the movement, and many subsidiary features and transitions. The second section follows continuously, with new matter and allusions to the first subject, all in a constant sway of transition, till at the end of the first half of the movement a long continuous subject in A is reached, which in its sustained and earnest calmness seems to supply the point of rest after the long preceding period of activity. This same subject is the only one which is given with complete fullness at the end of the whole movement, the rest of the subject-matter, though all represented in the recapitulation, being considerably condensed and curtailed.

The second point is illustrated by the connexion between the introduction and the two following movements. The introduction itself is in an elaborate kind of primary form. Its impressive principal subject is reintroduced in the middle of the succeeding allegro; and the subject of the middle portion serves as the main staple of the beautiful aria which is the central movement of the whole sonata. The success of such things certainly depends on the way in which they are done, and mere description of them gives very little impress of their effectiveness in this case. There can hardly be a doubt that in these devices Schumann hit upon a true means of applying original thought to the development of the structural outlines, following the suggestion which is really contained in Beethoven's work, that the structure is perceptible through the disposition of the ideas, and not only by emphasising the harmonic sections. The actual distribution of the structure which is hidden under the multiplicity of ideas is remarkably careful and systematic. Even in the development portion there is method and balance, and the same is true of large expanses in the last movement.

The freedom with which Schumann uses subordinate transitions makes the balance of keys a matter requiring great concentration; but it is remarkable in his work, as contrasted with similar modern examples by other composers, that he rarely makes random and unrestrained flights, but keeps within the bounds which make proportionate balance possible.

Schumann's second sonata, in G minor, op. 22, though written during almost the same period, seems to be a retrogression from the position taken up by that in F# minor. It is possibly a more effective work, and from the pianist's point of view more capable of being made to sound convincing. And yet in detail it is not so interesting, nor is it technically so rich, nor so full and noble in sound. He seems to aim at orthodoxy with deliberate purpose, and the result is that, though vehement and vigorous in motion, it is not, for Schumann, particularly warm or poetical. The second subjects of the first and last movements are characteristic, and so is a great part of the peculiarly sectional and epigrammatic scherzo. The andantino also has remarkable points about it, but is not so fascinating as the slow movement of the F# minor sonata.

The principles indicated in the sonata opus 11 reappear later with better results, as far as the total impression is concerned, in larger forms of instrumental music, and also in the D minor sonata for violin and pianoforte. In this there is a close connexion between the introduction and the most marked feature of the succeeding quick movement, and similar linking of scherzo and slow movement by means of a reference to the subject of the former in the progress of the latter, with a distinctly poetic purpose. The sonata in A minor for the same combination of instruments is not on such an elaborate scale, nor has it as many external marks to indicate a decided purpose; but it is none the less poetical in effect, which arises in the first movement from the continuity of structure and the mysterious sadness of spirit which it expresses, and in the slow movement from its characteristic tenderness and sweetness.

Liszt, in his remarkable sonata in B minor dedicated to Schumann, undoubtedly adopts the same principles of procedure, and works them out with more uncompromising thoroughness. He knits the whole sonata into an unbroken unity, with distinct portions passing into one another, representing the usual separate movements. The interest is concentrated upon one principal idea, to which the usual second subjects and accessories serve as so many commentaries and antitheses, and express the influences which react upon its course. This is further illustrated by the process sometimes defined as 'transformation of themes,' already referred to in connexion with Beethoven's sonatas in B \flat and A \flat ; which is really no more than a fresh way of applying that art of variation which had been used from almost the earliest times of sonata-writing, in recapitulating subjects in the progress of a movement, as well as in regular set themes and variations; though it had not been adopted before to serve a poetical or ideal conception pervading and unifying the whole work. In the actual treatment of the subject-matter, Liszt adopts, as Beethoven had done, the various opportunities afforded not only by harmonic structural principles, but by the earlier fugal and contrapuntal devices, and by recitative, adapting them with admirable breadth and freedom to a thoroughly modern style of thought. It seems almost superfluous to add that the purpose is carried out with absolute mastery of technical resource, in respect both of the instrument and of the disposition of the parts of the movement.

The pianoforte sonatas of Brahms are as astounding specimens of youthful power and breadth and dignity of style as exist in the whole range of the art. All three appear to have been written before he arrived at the age of 20; and it is certain that he was then more influenced by the romantic theories which Schumann represented than he was in his later works. His adoption of shorter and more individual forms, such as capricci, intermezzi, rhapsodies, in his mature age, lends at least indirect countenance to the view that the tendency of music is to subordinate form to idea; and that, if the classical form of the sonata is not expansible enough, other forms must be accepted which will admit of more freedom of development.

This implies a question as to the proper meaning of the word 'sonata,' and a doubt as to its being legitimately assimilable to the tendency to centralise the interest upon the idea, as a contrast to the old practice of making an equal balance between two main subjects as a means of structural effect. If the word is to be so restricted, it will only be another conventional limitation, and, it may be added, must before long put an end to further enrichment of the literature of so-called sonatas.

In the finest of Brahms's three early sonatas, that in F minor, op. 5, the first slow movement is headed by a quotation from a poem of Sternau, and another movement is called 'Rückblick.' These are clearly external marks of a poetical intention. In the actual treatment of the subjects there is no attempt to connect the movements; but the freedom of transition, even in the actual progress of a subject (see the second subject of the first movement), is eminently characteristic of the composer, and of a liberal view of sonata development. In the last movement—a rondo—the most noticeable external mark of continuity is the elaborately ingenious treatment of the subject of the second episode in the latter part of the movement. Brahms added no more to the list of solo pianoforte sonatas, but he illustrated the tendency to look for fresh opportunities in combinations of solo instruments, as in his pianoforte quartets and quintet, which are really just as much sonatas as those usually so designated; in fact, one of the versions of the quintet, which stands as a duet for two pianofortes, is in that form published as a 'sonata.' The three for pianoforte and violin require notice as the work of a great master, but throw very little light on any sort of extension of the possibilities of sonata-form. There seems to be a sort of poetic design in the complicated arrangement of the first half of the first movement in the sonata, op. 78, in which the characteristic figures of the first subject reappear, as if to connect each section with the centre of interest; and the half concludes with a complete restatement of the first subject simply and clearly in the original key, as is the case also in the same composer's Serenade in A for small orchestra. It may be observed in passing that this device curiously recalls the early composite form, in which the first subject reappears at the beginning of the second half (see pp. 814-15). There is one other slightly suggestive point—namely, the reappearance of the introductory phrase of the slow movement in one of the episodes of the final Rondo.¹

Certain traits in his treatment of form, such as the bold digressions of key at the very outset of a movement, and the novel effects of transition in the subjects themselves, have already been described in the article FORM. It is only necessary here to point out that Brahms seems most characteristically to illustrate the tendency in modern music which has been styled 'intellectualism'; which is definable as elaborate development of all the opportunities and suggestions offered by figures, harmonic successions, or other essential features of subjects or accessories, so as to make various portions of the work appear to grow progressively out of one another. This sometimes takes the form of thematic development, and sometimes that of reviving the figures of one subject in the material or accompaniment of another, the object being to obtain new aspects of close and direct logical coherence and consistency. Beethoven is the prototype of this phase of modern music, and the examples of it in his later instrumental works are of the finest description. There are several examples which illustrate this tendency in Brahms's F minor quintet. One of the most obvious is the case in which the cadence concluding a paragraph is formulated, as in the following example at (a), the phrase being immediately taken up by a different instrument and embodied as a most significant feature in the accessory subject which follows, as at (b).

(a) Pianoforte.

(b) Violin.

Under the same head of intellectualism is sometimes erroneously included that broad and liberal range of harmony which characterises the best composers of the day. This may doubtless call for intellectual effort in those who are unfamiliar with the progress of art, or of inexpressive powers of appreciation, but in the composer it does not imply intellectual purpose, but only the natural step onwards from the progressions of harmony which are familiar to those which are original. With composers of second rank such freedom is often experimental, and destructive to the general balance and proportion of the structure, but with Brahms it appears to be a special study to bring everything into perfect and sure proportion, so that the classical idea of instrumental music may be still maintained in pure severity, notwithstanding the greater extension and greater variety of range in the harmonic motion of the various portions of the movement. In fact Brahms appears to take his stand on the possibility of producing new instrumental works of real artistic value on the classical principles of abstract music, without either condescending to the popular device of a programme, or accepting the admissibility of a modification of the sonata-form to suit the impulse or apparent requirements of a poetical or dramatic principle.

GENERAL SUMMARY

The whole process of the development of the sonata as an art-form, from its crudest beginnings to its highest culmination, took nearly two hundred years; and the progress was almost throughout steady, continuous and uniform in direction. The earlier history is chiefly occupied by its gradual differentiation from the suite-form, with which for a time it was occasionally confounded. But there always was a perceptible difference in the general tendency of the two. The suite gravitated towards dance-forms, and movements which similarly had one principal idea or form of motion pervading them, so that the balance of contrasts lay between one movement and another, and not conspicuously between parts of the same movement. The sonata gravitated towards more complicated conditions and away from pure dance-forms. Diversity of character between subjects and figures was admitted early into single movements, and contrasts of key were much more strongly emphasised; and while in the suite, except in extremely rare cases, all the movements were in one key, amongst the very earliest sonatas there are examples of a central movement being cast in a different key from the rest.

In a yet more important manner the capacity of the sonata was made deeper and broader by the quality and style of its music. In the suite, as we have said, the contrasts between one movement and another were between forms of the same order and character—that is, between dance-forms and their analogues; but in the sonata the different movements very soon came to represent different origins and types of music. Thus in the early violin sonatas the slow introductory first movement generally shows traces of ecclesiastical influence; the second, which is the solid kind of allegro corresponding to the first movement of modern sonatas, was clearly derived from the secular vocal madrigals, or part music for voices, through the instrumental canzonas, which were their closest relations. The third, which was the characteristic slow movement, frequently showed traces of its descent from solo vocal music of various kinds, as found in operas, cantatas or other similar situations; and the last movement earliest and latest showed traces of dance elements pure and simple. A further point of much importance was the early tendency towards systematic and distinct structure, which appears most frequently in the last movement. The reason for the apparent anomaly is not hard to find. The only movement in the group on a scale corresponding to the last was the second, and this was most frequently of a fugal disposition. The fugue was a form which was comparatively well understood when the modern harmonic forms were still in embryo; and not only did it suffice for the construction of movements of almost any length, but it did not in itself suggest advance in the direction of the sonata kinds of form, though it was shown to be capable of amalgamation with them when they in their turn had been definitely brought to perfection. In the dance movements, on the other hand, when the fugal forms were not used, all that was supplied as basis to work upon was the type of motion or rhythm, and the outlines of structure had to be found. As long as the movements were on a small scale the structure which obtained oftenest was the equal balance of repeated halves without contrasting subjects, of which the finest examples are to be found in Bach's suites. The last movement was in fact so long a pure suite movement. But when it began to take larger dimensions, emphasis began to be laid upon that part of the first half of the movement which was in the dominant key; then the process of characterising it by distinct figures or subjects became prominent; and by degrees it developed into the definite second section. Meanwhile the opening bars of the movement gradually assumed more distinct and salient features, making the passage stand out more clearly from its immediate context; and in this form it was repeated at the beginning of the second half of the movement, the second section being reserved to make a complete balance by concluding the whole in a manner analogous to the conclusion of the first half. So far the change from the suite type of movement rests chiefly on the clearer definition of parts, and more positive exactness in the recapitulation of the subjects; but this is quite sufficient to mark the character as distinct, for in the movements of the suite (excluding the prelude) balance of subject and key was never systematically recognised. The further development of binary form, in which the recapitulation of the distinct subjects was reserved for the conclusion, took some time to arrive at, but even at this early stage the essential qualities of sonata-form are clearly recognisable.

The violin sonata was naturally the kind which first attained to perfection, since that instrument had so great an advantage in point of time over the keyed instruments used for similar purposes; and its qualities and requirements so reacted upon the character of the music as to make it appear almost a distinct species from the clavier sonata. But in fact the two kinds represent no more than divergence from a similar source, owing to the dissimilar natures of the instruments. Thus the introductory slow movement was most appropriate to the broad and noble character of the violin, and would appeal at once by its means to an audience of any susceptibility; whereas to the weak character of the early keyed instruments, so deficient in sustaining power, it was in general inappropriate, and hence was dropped very early. For the same reason, in a considerable proportion of the early clavier sonatas the third or principal slow movement was also dropped, so that the average type of sonatas for clavier was for a time a group of two movements, both generally in a more or less quick time. In these the canzona movement was early supplanted by one more in accordance with the modern idea, such as is typified in the clavier sonata of Galuppi in four movements (see p. 818), and by occasional allemandes in the earlier sonatas. As keyed instruments improved in volume and sustaining power the central slow movement was resumed; but it was necessary for some time to make up for deficiencies in the latter respect by filling in the slow beats with elaborate graces and trills, and such ornaments as the example of opera-singers made rather too inviting. The course of the violin solo-sonata was meanwhile distinctly maintained till its climax, and came to an abrupt end in J. S. Bach, just as the clavier sonata was expanding into definite importance.

In fact the earliest landmarks of importance are found in the next generation, when a fair proportion of works of this class show the lineaments of clavier sonatas familiar to a modern. Such are the disposition of the three movements with the solid and dignified allegro at the beginning, the expressive slow movement in the middle, and the bright and gay quick movement at the end; which last continued in many cases to show its dance origin. From this group the fugal element was generally absent, for all the instinct of composers was temporarily enlisted in the work of perfecting the harmonic structure in the modern manner, and the tendency was for a time to direct special attention to this, with the object of attaining clear and distinct symmetry. In the latter part of the 18th century this was achieved; the several movements were then generally cast on nearly identical lines, with undeviating distribution of subjects, pauses, modulations, cadences and double bars. The style of thought conformed for a while sufficiently well to this discipline, and the most successful achievements of instrumental music up to that time were accomplished in this manner. Extrinsically the artistic product appeared perfect; but art could not stand still at this point, and composers soon felt themselves precluded from putting the best and most genuine of their thoughts into trammels produced by such regular procedure. Moreover, the sudden and violent changes in social arrangements which took place at the end of the century, and the transformation in the ways of regarding life and its interests and opportunities which resulted therefrom, opened a new point of public emotion, and introduced a new quality of cosmopolitan human interest in poetry and art. The appeal of music in its higher manifestations became more direct and immediate; and the progression of the idea became necessarily less amenable to the control of artificialities of structure, and more powerful in its turn of reacting upon the form. This is what lies at the root of much which, for want of a more exact word, is frequently described as the poetic element, which has become so prominent and indispensable a quality in modern music. By this change of position the necessities of structural balance and proportion are not supplanted, but made legitimate use of in a different manner from what they previously were; and the sonata-form, while still satisfying the indispensable conditions which make abstract music possible, expanded to a fuller and more co-ordinate pitch of emotional material.

Partly under these influences, and partly, no doubt, owing to the improvements in keyed instruments, the clavier sonata again attained to the group of four movements, but in a different arrangement from that of the violin sonata. The slow introduction was sometimes resumed, but without representing an ingredient in the average scheme. The first movement was usually the massive and dignified allegro. The two central portions, consisting of a highly expressive slow movement and the scherzo which was the legitimate descendant of the dance movement, were ruled in their order of succession by the qualities of the first and last movements, and the work ended with a movement which still generally maintained the qualities to be found in a last movement of Corelli or Tartini. The tendency to unify the whole group increased, and in so far as the influence of intrinsic character or of the idea became powerful it modified the order and quality of the movements. For particular purposes which approve themselves to musical feeling the number of movements varied considerably, some exceedingly fine and perfect sonatas having only two, and others extending to five. Again, it is natural that in certain moods composers should almost resent the call to end with the conventional light and gay movement; and consequently in later works, even where the usual form seems to be accepted, the spirit is rather ironical than gay, and rather vehement or even fierce than light-hearted. The same working of the spirit of the age had powerful effect on the intrinsic qualities of the scherzo; in which there came to be found, along with or under the veil of ideal dance motions, sadness and tenderness, bitterness, humour, and many more phases of strong feeling; for which the ideal dance rhythms, when present, are made to serve as a vehicle: but in some cases also are supplanted by different though kindred forms of expression. In other respects the last movement moved farther away from the conventional type, as by the adoption of the fugal form, or by new use of the variation-form in a more continuous and consistent sense than in early examples. In many cases the movements are made to pass into one another, just as in the earlier stages the strong lines which marked off the different sections in the movements were gradually toned down; and by this means they came to have less of the appearance of separate items than limbs or divisions of a complete organism. This is illustrated most clearly by the examples of slow movements which are so modified as to be little more than intermezzi, or introductory divisions appended to the last movement; and more strongly by a few cases where the distinct lines of separation are quite done away with, and the entire work becomes a chain of long divisions representing broadly the old plan of four distinct movements with kindred subjects continuing throughout.

Since Beethoven the impetus to concentrate and individualise the character of musical works has driven many genuine composers to the adoption of forms which are less hampered by any suspicion of conventionality; and even with sonatas they seemed to have grasped the object in view with less steadiness and consistency than in previous times. Some have accepted the artifice of a programme, others admit some doubtful traits of theatrical origin; others develop poetic and æsthetic devices as their chief end and object, and others still follow up the classical lines, contenting themselves with the opportunities afforded by new and more elaborately perfect treatment of details, especially in music for combinations of solo instruments. In the latter case it is clear that the field is more open than in sonatas for single instruments, since the combination of such instruments as the pianoforte and violin or pianoforte and violoncello in large works has not been dealt with by the great masters so thoroughly and exhaustively as the solo sonata. But in any case it is apparent that fresh works of high value on the classical lines can hardly be produced without increasing intellectualism. The origin and reason of existence of abstract music are, at least on one side, intellectual; and though up to a certain point the process of development tended to reduce the intellectual effort by making the structural outlines as clear and certain as possible, when these were decisively settled the current naturally set in the direction of complication. The inevitable process of accumulating one device of art upon another is shown in the free range of modulation and harmony, and in the increasing variety and richness of detail both in the subjects and in the subordinate parts of works. In such cases the formal outlines may cease to be strictly amenable to a definite external theory; but if they accord with broad general principles, such as may be traced in the history of abstract music so far, and if the total effect is extrinsically as well as intrinsically complete and convincing, it appears inevitable to admit the works to the rank of 'sonatas.' The exact meaning of the term has in fact been enforced with remarkable uniformity during the whole period under survey, and decisively in favour of what is called abstract music. Fair examples of the successful disregard of form in favour of programme or a dramatic conception can hardly be found; in fact, in the best examples extant, programme is no more than the addition of a name or a story to an otherwise regular formal sonata; but on the other hand there is plenty of justification of the finest kind for abstract works in free and more original forms, and it rests with composers to justify themselves by their works, rather than for reasoning to decide finally where the limit shall be. C. H. K. P.

SOME LATER EXAMPLES

There is little to add to and nothing to retract from the above statement¹ of principles, but later history has illustrated several aspects of them.

In his discussion of current developments of the sonata Sir Hubert Parry, in a couple of paragraphs not here reproduced, laid stress on Sterndale Bennett's piano sonata 'The Maid of Orleans' and the sonatas of Raff and Rubinstein as examples of poetic treatment of the form. These no longer appear to be salient. Sterndale Bennett's use of literary quotations to explain the purpose of his several movements may show poetic intention, but poetic expression has been often more surely attained in works without these clues. The romanticism of the later 19th century was illustrated in the sonatas of Grieg (one for P.F. alone in E minor, three for violin and P.F., one for violoncello and P.F.), and more consciously in the several sonatas for P.F. with descriptive titles by Edward MacDowall, the American composer, and a pupil of both Raff and Liszt. The general trend of taste in the direction of orchestral colouring served to keep the output of solo sonatas rather a small one. Most of the masters of the late 19th century either avoided the piano sonata or attempted it with varying success merely as an occasional stylistic essay.

Its progress in Russia is of some interest. Tchaikovsky left a solitary and not very interesting example, but Glazounov concerned himself more seriously in manipulating the form and Scriabin in his series of ten sonatas for the piano produced a development which must be regarded as of considerable historic importance. Little as at first sight there seems to be in common between the later sonatas of Scriabin and the classical type described above, a perusal of the series in order shows that they represent a personal evolution of idea, and that beginning from conventional standards of structure Scriabin proceeded steadily to that final manner which to some musicians of his generation appeared to possess the force of an apocalyptic revelation and by others was rejected as the rhodomontade of excessive egotism. But here attention may be recalled to that paragraph in Sir Hubert Parry's article above in which, amidst his discussion of Brahms (p. 835), he raises the question of the proper meaning of the word 'sonata,' and with prophetic prescience foreshadows just such developments as have in fact come about in the 'subordination of form to ideas' of which Scriabin's work is but one example among many.

A similar process, though a saner one, may be traced in the French school from César

Franck to Debussy. Franck himself left no PF. sonata, and indeed only one work, the famous one for violin and PF., which bears the name. But in his whole output as a composer he was much concerned with questions of FORM (see the introduction to that article), and he laid the impress of his views on the school which he founded (see DUKAS; D'INDY; LEKEU). Franck, like Brahms, can be regarded as a neo-classic. His work is capable of analysis along the traditional lines, and only the late appearance of his major works prevented the consideration of them in conjunction with those of Brahms and Liszt. But a wide gap yawns between him and his school and the series of works called 'sonatas' which were the outcome of the last years of Debussy's career. The viewpoint has changed. The latter no longer takes a standard pattern as normal, to be varied, expanded or condensed. The name has returned to its first connotation of 'a piece of sound,' it does not denote a form independent of the idea.

A few examples of the PF. solo sonata deserve attention among the works of English composers of to-day, notably J. B. DALE, ARNOLD BAX, JOHN IRELAND and FRANK BRIDGE, but the cultivation of the sonata for more than one instrument has been very much wider. The duet sonata for violin or other melodic instrument with PF. has never flagged; the output of works of this kind in all countries is one of the most richly varied departments of the chamber music repertory, and ranges from the gentle clarity of Elgar's sonata in E minor to the desperate deeds of Béla Bartók. Amongst the laborious products of Germany in the generation after Brahms the name of MAX REGER (q.v.) stands forward for many ingenious manipulations of the sonata type, and especially for his revival of the sonata for violin alone, which had been dormant since Bach. Reger's activity in this direction has recalled to some minds the saying as to the wisdom of letting sleeping dogs lie. Whatever may be the individual importance of these several manifestations, and this summary can make no attempt at an exhaustive record, the chief fact which emerges is that for the time being the name 'sonata' has lost the definition gained in three centuries of development. It still implies a work of serious intention and large scope, but the bestowal of the name is largely a matter of chance, and many rhapsodies, fantasies and the like would merit the title as fully as the works which receive it. c.

SONATINA (Fr. sonatine). This is a work in the same form and of the same general character as a sonata, but shorter, simpler and slenderer.

The sonatina form has proved peculiarly convenient for the making of pieces intended to be used in teaching. The familiar outlines and the systematic distribution of the principal harmonies afford the most favourable opportunities for simple but useful finger-passages, for which the great masters have supplied plentiful formulas; and they furnish at the same time excellent means of giving the student a dignified and conscientious style, and a clear insight into the art of phrasing and into the simpler rules of classical form. The most famous and most classical examples of this kind are Clementi's sonatinas, of opp. 36, 37 and 38. And much of the same character are several by F. Kuhlau, which are excellently constructed and pure in style. Of later works of a similar kind there are examples by L. Koehler. Those by Carl Reinecke and Hermann Goetz are equally adapted for teaching purposes, and have also in general not a little agreeable musical sentiment and really attractive qualities. Some of Beethoven's works which are not definitely described as such are sufficiently concise and slight to be called sonatinas: as for instance those in G and G minor, op. 49, which were first announced for publication as 'Sonates faciles' in 1805. That in G major, op. 79, was published as a 'Sonatine' in 1810, though it is rather larger in most respects than the other little examples.

Ravel's 'Sonatine' for PF. is a conspicuous example of the successful treatment of the diminutive form, and Busoni left six specimens, written during the later years of his career, as follows: two in 1910; No. 3, 'Ad usum infantis,' 1915; No. 4, 'In signo Joanni Sebastiani Magni,' 1917; 'In diem Nativitatis Christi,' 1918; 'Sonatina super Carmen,' 1921. c.
